"Why, Alice, how you jump at conclusions. Because I hinted that Mr. Waldmyer may have received some benefit abroad, you—woman-like—conclude at once that he has thrown away his crutches, and can now walk as well as you do yourself."

"Well, that will comfort Lina a little. I will tell her that."

"No—wait and let her find it out."

A few months after this, Mr. Lennox and Mr. Hargrave were walking together, when the attention of the latter was drawn to the handsome sign on which the name of "Waldmyer, Artist," was conspicuous.

"Is that the same whom you recommended to me as a portrait painter?"

"The same. He is making a great sensation here. His room is constantly occupied by sitters, and already he has acquired a fortune, although it is only a few months since he came from Italy."

"Italy! and has he travelled?"

He has, and since he returned his success has been unrivalled, not only professionally, but socially, for he is now admitted to very select circles."

"Yes, very likely," said Mr. Hargrave; "by the way it was I who advised his going to Italy. I knew it would save his life, and moreover, I discovered such wonderful talent in him."

Mr. Lennox bit his lip. "Let us go in," said he. They did so, and Mr. Hargrave greeted the artist with so much cordiality, and congratulated him so warmly upon his restoration to health, and paid him so many compliments upon his success, that Waldmyer ventured to draw the curtain from a large picture which stood in the room. It was Madeline—so lifelike, so beautiful that one would have almost expected to hear her voice. It was a full length portrait, and perfectly matched another standing just behind it, which Mr. Lennox had employed him to paint for Alice. The two girls had sat privately, at hours when no one but themselves and Mr. Lennox were admitted.

Mr. Hargrave gazed and wondered; and then he gazed at Waldmyer—at Waldmyer, standing erect, or leaning but lightly upon a crutch of a peculiar French manufacture; and which seemed a light support to a cripple, such as he remembered him when he asked him for his daughter.

* * * * *

"If ever life was prosperously cast," it was that of the two beings whose love had endured so long and so well. It was not in Mr. Hargrave's nature to withstand the pleadings of Waldmyer and his two friends, Mr. Lennox and Alice; and there is not a happier little wife in the whole world than Lina Waldmyer, the Artist's Bride.

EXTRAORDINARY DISCOVERY.

One of the most singular accidents which sometimes bring to light the fruits of crime, the discovery of which has baffled all the efforts of official vigilance, has transpired in the city of Berlin, and has caused a great deal of conversation in commercial circles. On the 19th of last month, a well known firm, engaged in the bullion trade, were waited upon by a respectable-looking person, who asked them to dispose of some Prussian, Russian, and Polish bonds, amounting, in value to 10,000 thalers. Upon examining the bonds, it was discovered that the coupons attached to the bonds were overdue for nearly six years, and this circumstance occasioning some suspicion in their minds, the firm refused to make a purchase of any of the bonds until inquiry were made respecting them by their agents in Berlin. On the 24th the bonds were sent to their agents, and the following day the firm received a telegraphic message from the former, stating that some bonds of a similar description had been forwarded to the agents of another London banker, and that a full explanation would be afforded respecting the bonds by two Berlin officers, who were on their way to this country.

About half an hour after the receipt of the message the two officers called upon the firm, who were informed that the bonds were the property of a lady of the name of Henrietta Hirsch, a native of Berlin, who was foully murdered in October 1849, and plundered of Russian, Prussian, and Polish bonds of the value of 18,000 thalers or £2700; and that a man and two women were concerned in this murder, who had ever since its discovery been confined in Berlin jail, in which one of the women had died a short time since. It was added that all attempts to recover the missing bonds had been unavailing, notwithstanding the most vigilant inquiries of the police authorities in Berlin, and that those inquiries were set on foot by the Berlin agents of the firm, who were the nephews of the murdered lady.

Upon this information Messrs. — had the Berlin officers at call to await the return of the person who had offered them the bonds. On the next day this person called at Messrs. — counting house, and, being asked whether the bonds belonged to him, he replied that they did not; upon which Messrs. — stated that they must decline to negotiate with any one but the owner. The person answered that the owner was confined to his bed by illness, and, in order to obviate this difficulty, Messrs. — proposed that he should be accompanied to the owner by one of their officers which was agreed to. The Berlin officers followed at a distance, and the result was the apprehension of the soi-disant owner of the bonds, who it is believed is the brother of the murderer.—London Paper.

THE CASNET.

BY MRS. M. W. CUSTIA.

The casnet is open for jewels of thought,
Not flashes of flattery—those are not sought;
The gems of the heart are the riches desired,
By loving ones penned, and by friendship inspired.

This casnet of memory will bring to the mind
Of the owner a garland of flowerets combined,—
Of the sweet hopes of youth, and the blessings of age,
'Twill speak of the absent from each written page.

This bright earth hath many a beautiful spot,
And many a sun-ray will ne'er be forgot;
O this be the site of the autographs here,
To meet in the realms where the angels appear.

THE TWO LADY WATCHERS.

BY JOHN THORNBERRY.

RIGHT next door to one another, lived two unmarried ladies, who were each busily occupied with getting into matrimony as fast as they could. Their names were Miss Padd and Miss Tilly. The former lived in No. 175, and the latter in No. 176. The exteriors of the houses were remarkably similar, so that it would be the easiest thing in the world for a man to get through one door, when he meant all the while to go into the other. There were several striking little circumstances connected with these two ladies and their beaux, among which were two that I will be at the trouble especially to mention. First, each of them felt compelled, by the force of unhappy domestic prejudices, to receive and entertain her favorite in a secret sort of style, and if it happened to be in the evening, always in the dark. Such coincidences may be common enough, if you take the entire sex through; but when you come to place them side by side in a way like this, and the two houses so very like one another, too, it really offers a subject for the liveliest remark.

In the second place, the names of their worshippers exactly made rhyme with their own names! That was stranger yet, if anything. For example,—The gentleman who waited upon Miss Padd, was named Mr. Dadd; and the name of Miss Tilly's favorite was Mr. Lilly. Rather ludicrous, perhaps, considered from some points of view, and something that almost any person in his senses would be apt to notice as at least very peculiar.

It turned out, in the natural course of events, that both Miss Dadd and Miss Tilly—who, by-the-by, were not acquaintances at all—had made private appointments for their lovers one evening, and the better to admit them to their houses without suspicion on the part of their friends, they had arranged to fasten back the night-locks on the hall doors, and to have them enter as stealthily as they could, and slip up stairs into the front parlors. The families were in the habit of passing the evening in their back sitting-rooms; but the courageous lovers were expected to take their seats in rooms without lights, and without fires, too. For shivering weather, it was not exactly the most comfortable arrangement we have ever heard of.

On this particular evening, the two young ladies sat in their parlors, surrounded by nothing but the dark. Miss Padd at 175, and Miss Tilly at 176. Both waiting. Both shivering. Both rattling their teeth together like the rolling clatter of castanets. By-and-by Mr. Dadd came creeping along up the street, and put his hand on the door knob of No. 176! He should have gone to the other number. But there was no gas light flaming near by, and, so long as he felt very sure he was right, stopping to study the number was the last thing he would have thought of. He opened the door softly, and climbed the stairs. Working his way along a tip-toe, he finally found the parlor door, which was situated just where it was in No. 175, and went in.

"It's me," he whispered, as soon as he had got safely into the room.

That was signal enough. Immediately a female figure glided along into the centre of the room, with its arms outstretched and rambling around in every direction. He extended his own to embrace it, although he was perfectly unconscious at the time that he was making the most, in an affectionate way, of Miss Tilly. He thought of course she must be Miss Padd.

So close was the parlor to the other room, that Miss Tilly dared express her feelings only in the most chastened whispers, articulating her words slowly and with much difficulty. And upon her visitor she enjoined the same caution. It were better not to say anything, she told him, than even by a careless whisper to arouse the suspicions of her dear papa. Accordingly there was very little talking done on the premises; what there was, was more in the way of a slow and thick lip, than anything after the style of spoken words or syllables.

As for Miss Padd, she still sat alone, shaking and shivering in the cold. She had told the family that she was going up-stairs for a while; which occasion she improved to come down again slyly, and slip into the parlor in the dark. And there she sat now; while Mr. Dadd and Miss Tilly were having such a sweet time of it, she was freezing for her negligent lover. She could only sit and wonder what it meant. The clock had struck another hour since she had been there. It would not do for her to stay away from the family too long at a time, and so she went back up stairs, took her light, and came down again among them. It would be easy enough to slip into the parlor again, on one pretence or another to see when he did arrive; which she did several times, but no Mr. Dadd was to be discovered there. And because he was passing the evening, agreeably to a mistake of which both remained ignorant, with Miss Tilly.

Mr. Dadd sat with Miss Tilly as long as he thought it safe, and then took his leave. They had enjoyed their secret interview highly. Each had been deceived, but O, how pleasantly! Miss Tilly was in a flutter of excitement, and Mr. Dadd was ditto.

By-and-by Mr. Lilly came along. Something or another had happened to make him late that evening; but better late, thought he, than never. He made no mistake in the number, I warrant you. He did not go in at Miss Padd's door, when he had promised to go in and see—or try to see—Miss Tilly. But he got the right figures to begin upon, and in he went, working up very softly to the door of the parlor. Having opened it, he listened. All was as still as a tomb.

He sat down, after calling in a whisper many times vainly on the name of his lady-love, and tried to settle his thoughts into a mood something like patience. For a time this plan worked quite well, but it soon began to wear itself out. He could hear Miss Tilly chatting and laughing gaily in the next room, and wondered why she did not come in to meet him. He heard one after another pass along the little hall to bed, but still she sat and talked and laughed incessantly. He wondered what it meant, and shivered as he wondered.

And then he thought that there must be some untoward family circumstance in the way, which she would know much better how to manage than himself. This thought buoyed him up a little, making him feel assured that she would certainly come in as soon as the coast was all clear. And still he sat and listened, and wondered and shivered, until Miss Tilly took her light, passed through the hall exactly by the parlor door, and went—to bed! This was more than Mr. Lilly was going to stand from any one. He had sat there in the cold long enough. Now he was going home. He would be careful to keep free from any such engagements for the future. He took his hat accordingly, and crept down through the door again. And the town clocks began to strike twelve on the frosty air, as he carefully shut the outer door—which had had the night-lock properly fixed by Miss Tilly since his arrival—and put his foot out upon the sidewalk again.

From that day forward, Miss Tilly could see nothing of him. He avoided her in the street, and went round the shortest corners if he found such sort of travel necessary to escape her. He determined that he would give up his passion forever, and clear himself of the foolish thralldom into which he had fallen.

Miss Padd, on the other hand, went back into her parlor after the family retired, and there held her cold and lonely vigils for a long, long season. But in vain. No Mr. Dadd was destined to call on her that night, let her wait there in solitude the whole night through. He had made his visit—though at the next door—and gone home upon it. And she grew more and more vexed as the hours wore on, and finally worked herself up into a very respectable passion. And at last she pushed off up stairs again, this time determined to go to bed in her wrath. She did not forget, however, to run down and fasten the outer door. But from that night forward, she was resolved on giving her lover the “go-by.” Anything so ungallant as this negligence, she could not find it in her heart to forgive. She would have nothing more to do with Mr. Dadd whatever!

It was just such a case with Mr. Lilly. Both of them determined on the same evening to turn over new leaves entirely. And still, for the time being at least, Mr. Dadd certainly thought he had met his engagement properly that evening. Miss Tilly likewise thought she had met hers. And both had finally gone to bed perfectly satisfied with themselves, and expecting to dream of wonderful pictures for their future. Stranger and shallower infatuations than these lead the world by the nose every day that is counted off the calendar.

Mr. Dadd afterwards met Miss Padd in the street, but she knew no such man. She threw him one single cutting look, and then lifted her chin as high as it would go. And Miss Tilly met Mr. Lilly in her turn, too, and thought she was certainly going to stop and chat with him as he came up. But he never came up! He turned off at a cross walk, bestowing on her a hasty glance of anger as he went, and passed on his way alone.

And thus were two very good matrimonial engagements broken off forever, which, but for so trifling an accident, might have made a deal of difference with the hearts of four individuals at least for a lifetime! Reader, if you mean ever to go to No. 175, don't pray drop in at No. 176. That's the moral.

THE SWEETEST SONG I EVER HEARD.

BY HENRY D. T. HOBBS.

The sweetest song I ever heard,
Was one calm summer night;
'Twas like the carol of a bird,
It thrilled me with delight;
It seemed not like a maiden's voice,
It was so low and clear,
It trembled on my spirit's chords,
And forced a pearly tear.

I sought a sylvan bower hard by,
And met the songstress there;
She was a child some twelve years old,
With flowing auburn hair;
"Tell me," said I, "sweet child of song,
Whence gushed that thrilling lay?
Didst learn it at thy mother's knee—
In childhood's earliest day?"

Her mild blue eyes were bright with tears,
She sweetly answered, "Yes:
'Tis full of tender memories,
A mother's smile and kiss:
I never knew that others prized
The song I love to sing;
I wonder, lady, that you weep,
It is a simple thing."

And often now when I am sad,
And deem the world unkind,
The pleading looks of that fair child
Come thronging o'er my mind.
Though oft I've heard sweet, dulcet strains,
That turned my thoughts above,
I ne'er shall hear a song again,
So full of truth and love.

A SEA-SIDE STORY.

BY FREDERICK W. SAUNDERS.

"MANY tailors have done wisely, but thou hast excelled them all," was my involuntary ejaculation, as I stood before the mirror, one day last summer, and viewed my exquisite figure in the inimitable garments for which I am still heavily indebted to the most accommodating clothier in existence. "Now I will go forth to conquer," said I, still addressing the individual whom I consider superior to any other gentleman at the present time sojourning in any portion of the solar system. "Never before have I looked so irresistibly fascinating. This coat is perfection with tails to it;" and I made an insane attempt to see how it fitted in the small of the back, by looking over my right shoulder, as men always do with a new coat on. "What though I have been jilted by Lucy Tompkins, because she fancied a beau more to her mind? or got the mitten from Mary Jones, because that blustering Jack Smith took it into his head to 'wait upon her?' Thank fortune, the race is not always to your fast men, nor the battle to your stout covies. With such a rig as this, there is little fear that I can create a sensation, and I'm bound to do it. Let me see; where shall I go, this hot weather? Newport is rather too lively; Cape May, ditto. Nahant—ah yes, Nahant might do; but I fear I could hardly get the very best accommodations for three dollars and a half per week, which must be the extent of my expenditures. Ah, now I have it; I will go to Pugwash. The water-cure establishment is in full blast—or perhaps I should say full flood. Blessings on those water-cure establishments; a fellow, under the pretence of looking after his health, can doctor a lean purse to great advantage, and still contribute his drop to the 'pail' of fashionable society.

It is a long ride, from here to Pugwash. The sun was very hot, the road was very dusty, and the panting travellers would insist on keeping the car windows open; so that upon arriving at the station, each delighted pleasure-seeker found itself amply supplied with cinders—at least a peek of cinders in its hair, rather more in its mouth, scarcely less in its eyes, and an unlimited quantity sifted down between its collar and neck, and sprinkled over its person generally.

Having accomplished the usual amount of handkerchief-brushing, and made a frantic attempt to improve our personal appearance by wiping the adhering cinders from our perspiring faces, which only resulted in rubbing in and spreading out the black abominations, thereby giving to each countenance a streaked and savage aspect, infinitely more picturesque than beautiful, we were deposited inside a lumbering old stage.

A short but stormy passage, over a fearfully agitated road, brought us in front of the water-cure establishment—a long, low range of yellow, consumptive-looking buildings, attached to a large garden, in which at stated intervals stately pines, stirred by the summer breezes, gracefully waved their foliage almost as high as your head; while in the centre of this terrestrial paradise, a melancholy little squirt drizzled pitifully, doing its best, yet evidently depressed by a sense of its utter inability to deserve the sounding title of "the fountain," bestowed on it by its proprietor. On the piazza in front of the house were seated the identical young ladies you invariably see on the piazza at watering places, some reading, some sewing, others working out startling zoological specimens, in little square frames, with crewel (appropriately so named), and all giggling sweetly, as young ladies will.

As we drew up at the door, the giggling ceased, and there was a solemn hush, each young lady becoming instantly absorbed in her occupation, and apparently totally unconscious that a stage-full of new arrivals was being unloaded near them. Having made all necessary arrangements at the office with the "gentlemanly landlord," the porter shouldered my trunk, and preceded me up as many pairs of stairs as the structure of the building would admit, showing me into a little love of a room, eight feet square, with a gracefully sloped ceiling overhead, of which, in consideration of certain weekly payments, I was to be absolute lord and master.

It is unnecessary to detail, step by step, the occurrences of the first few days. Let us suppose that I have been at Pugwash three weeks, have taken all sorts of baths, douches, plunges, sitz shower, rising douches, been "packed" and had a wet blanket thrown over my young aspirations, besides a wilderness of other performances, the very name of which can only be remembered by a Dutchman.

It is evening. The great, round, pewter-colored moon is flooding the entire landscape, after the manner described in story-books; the beautiful bay of Pugwash seems a boundless sheet of silver, stretching far as the eye can reach; while from the very feet of the wanderer by the shore, a long and glorious line of light passes on and on to the horizon, a seeming path to the spectator by which he might pass to the bright orb of night.

On such a night as this, the subject of the present memoir, with love in his heart, and his new suit of irresistible garments on his person, wandered slowly along one of the paths leading from the "establishment" to the bay. But not alone did he wander; by his side stood one of those bright visions one sees in dreams, or at a watering place, and nowhere else, a woman, and yet a child, just old enough to be bewitching, and just young enough to be artless and confiding. It matters not how these two beings became acquainted, how their acquaintance ripened into friendship; let it suffice that for three short but happy weeks, they had been all in all to each other. And now there they stood on the hill above the bay, looking—my overweening modesty forbids me to say how he looked; but she—ah, you should have seen her, as she stood there, her dark luxuriant hair clustering in rich curls about her beautiful forehead, her soft brown eye, so deep and full of meaning, the color coming and going on her peachlike cheek, and her bosom heaving with excitement and the gentle toil of the ascent. With one little hand she held one of those dear little crocheted hoods, which she had removed from her flowing tresses, while the other was clasped in that of her friend.

"And must you really go to-morrow?" she asked, in the sweetest and most musical voice imaginable, as she lifted those soft brown eyes, pleading so eloquently for a favorable answer; then blushing, dropped them again, as she met the glance of her companion gazing so sedately on her. "Must you go to-morrow, Aristides?"

Mr. Jinx did not reply at once. He was thinking; calculating the same thing he had calculated a hundred times, during the preceding three weeks, whether, with the very limited expectations of the fair young creature before him, and the no expectations at all of his own, he could in any way contrive to commence house-keeping. His heart said yes, but judgment said none the less plainly, no; and it was therefore with a heavy heart that he placed his arm about her taper waist, and drawing her yielding form towards him, printed a kiss upon those ruby lips, sadly articulating: "Yes, Carrie, I must indeed go to-morrow."

Gently removing his arm from her waist, and withdrawing her hand from his grasp, she stood long, silently gazing far out on the waters of the bay, while her companion moodily bent his eyes on the ground. At length she turned, and with the slightest perceptible tremor in her voice, said: "I think we had better return to the house, Mr. Jinx; it is growing late."

Mr. Jinx offered his arm; she either did not, or affected not to observe the motion, and in silence they turned their steps homeward. Several times, during the walk, Mr. Jinx essayed to break the silence; but he felt a choking sensation in his throat, which interrupted his articulation. She never raised her eyes from the path before her.

"Good night, Carrie," said Mr. Jinx, with a violent effort, as they stood upon the piazza, where they were to separate.

"Good night, Mr. Jinx," she returned, in a mournful tone; "or rather good-by. As you go to-morrow, I suppose I shall not see you again."

"Good-by," stammered Mr. Jinx. But neither moved from the spot.

"I suppose you are anxious to meet some one—your lady-love, perhaps—that hurries you away so soon?" said Carrie, at length breaking the silence which had lasted some minutes.

"O, Carrie, how can you say so!" gasped Mr. Jinx, now completely overcome with emotion. And in a hurried voice he told her all—how he had loved her from the first moment of their meeting, would cheerfully endure everything for her dear sake, but that he must go. It was necessary to the happiness of both that they should part; for he was poor, and could never find it in his heart to take her from her luxurious home to make her the wife of a beggar.

But Carrie could not see how that made such a great difference. She was not rich herself, did not want to be rich, and thought it the nicest thing in the world to make pies and things herself, without the assistance of those disagreeable servants. Mr. Jinx intimated that man could not live by pie alone, and that she was too inexperienced, too young, and too delicately nurtured, to contend against the iron hand of poverty; at which she manifested a great deal of indignation, and assured Mr. Jinx that, so far from being so very young as he seemed to think, she would be seventeen in less than ten months. And as to what she was capable of doing, she entered into such a wonderful recital, that had any one else told it, Mr. Jinx would have been inclined to doubt the correctness of some of the statements.

It was a feverish night that Mr. Jinx passed, turning and tossing, flapping and frowning on his bed, and catching now and again a short catnap, in which he dreamed of heaps of gold, of untold magnitude; and when he stooped to pick up the glittering coin, he found to his astonishment they were all marked with Carrie's name, and bore the impress of Carrie's sweet face, instead of an eagle. And while he gazed, they were not coin at all, but soft brown eyes that looked lovingly yet sadly on him, and said, mournfully: "Good-by, Aristides; good-by, Mr. Jinx." And when he started from his troubled slumbers, it was morning, and the sun was shining brightly through the curtain.

If Mr. Jinx carried a heavy heart to bed, it was like lead, as he made his arrangements for his departure. You would have thought him possessed of a very satanic disposition, could you have seen him tumbling his clothes into his trunk, topsy-turvy, and punching them down with his boot-heels, accompanying each kick with a mild malediction. At length everything was packed in, the cover shut down with the catch of the lock through the centre of a shirt bosom; the straps buckled, and the porter bore it away on his shoulder, very civilly indeed, for as the gentleman was going, he was on the look out for the odd change.

The coach was to start very early; indeed, it was but just sunrise, and no one beside the servants were astride in the house. "Carrie can hardly be up at this hour," thought Mr. Jinx, as he meekly turned the key in his door for the last time and strode along the passage. "I have looked my last upon her; well, perhaps it is better as it is." But Mr. Jinx was wrong, as he often is; for upon passing a hall which intersected the one in which he was, a sad, sad little face was before him, and those soft brown eyes of his dream looked mournfully into his own, while two little white hands were held out to him in a mute farewell.

"Good-by, Aristides," sobbed Carrie, burying her face in his bosom, as he drew her to him, and with a trembling hand smoothed her silken curls. "You'll think of me, sometimes, won't you?" and the little fluttering dove drew a fresh rosebud from her bosom and placed it in his hand.

He could not answer; his heart was too full. One kiss, a pressure of the hands, and he tore himself from the spot where he had been so happy, and yet so miserable.

As the coach turned the corner which shut the house from view, he looked back. Carrie was standing on the piazza, and he thought—yes, he was sure, she had her handkerchief to her face, though he couldn't see very well. Something was wrong with his eyes, probably the want of last night's sleep; so he coughed smartly two or three times, brushed the back of his hand across his eyes, in a careless manner, cleared his throat again, with a savage ahem, tried to whistle, and couldn't make any sound, and so buried his face among the cushions in the corner of the carriage.

Only those who have returned from a summer tour, leaving their heart in the keeping of the dearest little creature in existence (and who has not?), can imagine the desolation of spirit, the utter loneliness of heart, with which Mr. Jinx returned to his city home and his customary avocations. It was strange how three short weeks could have so altered every person and thing with which he was familiar. The places where he had once enjoyed himself and been happy, were now pleasant no longer. Did he hear sweet music? They were not the strains to which he had danced with Carrie, nor yet the sweeter music of her voice. Did he meet fair and joyous maidens? Alas, they had not her face or figure, nor those gentle, loving eyes, which haunted him so sweetly, and yet so mournfully.

Meanwhile, the little fresh, white rose-bud, so fit an emblem, he thought, of his beloved, began to wither, like his hopes—each delicate white leaf turning brown at the edges; and as day followed day, the sombre hue of decay extended, though he cherished it carefully, until at length the bud was dry and lifeless, falling to pieces in his hand. So he chose his favorite volume of poems, and selecting passages of beauty, laid each withered leaf, as a holy relic, carefully upon them, and placed the book among the most precious of his heart's secret treasures.

And so a month passed away, until one warm, summer Sunday afternoon he sat by the open window, reading his precious volume of poems, looking at the withered rose-leaves, and thinking of Carrie, when he fell into a delicious reverie of such sweet sorrow as to lose all sense of outward things; and dropping his open book upon the window-sill, he leaned his head upon his arms, and dreamed such dreams as young lovers will, as I have understood. And as he dreamed, the gentle summer breeze played in and out at the window, now toying with the flowers upon the sill, now gently rustling the drapery of the curtain, until catching sight of the open book, it began flustering its leaves, gently at first, but, as if curious to learn what therein might be, it began hastily turning them over and back, shaking out here and there a rose-leaf, until the last precious leaf floated on the breeze high over the housetops; then, as if angry at finding no more, or out of mere wantonness, to display the mischief it had wrought, it shook the leaves rudely and strongly, awakening the dreamer from his dreams.

It would have made you laugh could you have seen the look of dismay which overspread the countenance of Mr. Jinx, as he gazed upon the empty book, and felt that the last memento of his love was gone. But it soon vanished, for a new train of thoughts took possession of his mind, and he soliloquized. "Why," he muttered, "should I refuse the blessing that I might enjoy? True, I parted with Carrie from a sense of duty; but is it duty? I am not so very poor, after all, and if she is willing— Perhaps, too, she suffers, poor child." Ah! the selfish heart, for the first time, began to think that some one else might be unhappy. He wondered why he had not thought of that before; but Mr. Jinx did not consider how much of selfishness there is in the truest love. But the thought that she might suffer as much as he, opened his eyes, and he ejaculated, with great vehemence: "I will go to Pugwash to-morrow."

The next day found Mr. Jinx hurrying over the dusty road, with a heart so light, that the heat, the dust and the cinders only served to make him more joyous, for it reminded him of Carrie and his first trip to Pugwash. Indeed, he brought himself to believe that he rather liked to have cinders in his eyes, than otherwise. How his heart palpitated, as he got into the dear old stage, and tied his legs in a knot to accommodate the other passengers! He hoped and yet trembled at the thought of seeing Carrie on the piazza, but she was not there; he looked into the parlor, as he passed—she was not there either. Could she have left the place, and not informed him? Yet why should she? he had not asked her to communicate with him. Almost staggering to his room—the same he had occupied before—he rang the bell for the chamber-maid; she, at all events, could give him the desired information. She came; placing some coin in her hand, he asked for Carrie. "Carrie was still stopping at the house." Had the presence of two tons and a half of coal been suddenly removed from his heart, Mr. Jinx could not have felt more relieved. He was in ecstasies; he could have kissed the chamber-maid (she was rather good-looking) for her glad tidings. The girl hesitated; he felt there was something new to be communicated. "What is it?" he asked, placing more money in her hand.

The girl, with all the volubility of her sex, added to the extra volubility of the chamber-girl species, informed him that in his absence, a rich old uncle of Carrie's, just such an uncle as one reads about in story books, had returned from foreign parts, bringing with him a young gentleman, a very nice looking young gentleman, too; and she rather thought—she didn't know for certain, but from what she heard the ladies say, when she was doing their rooms, that it was the uncle's wish for Carrie to marry the young gentleman, and in case of her complying she was to be his heir. The young gentleman, she went on to say, seemed to think a sight of her, but whether she liked him or not, she could not say; she had been dreadful kind of still and mopish for a month or more.

"That will do," said Mr. Jinx; and as the door closed behind the retreating figure of the girl, he fell into a reverie of a nature as pleasant as can well be imagined. While he thought her poor, he had scarcely allowed himself to entertain the idea that she could by any possibility become anything more to him than she then was; but now, when by marrying contrary to her uncle's wishes, she would in all probability forfeit a fortune, the thing was not so thought of. Besides, how did he know that she still cared for him? Their acquaintance had been short, she was very young, and might not be as much interested in the young gentleman of her uncle's choice, and who was such a "nice looking young gentleman, too," as he ever was in him? No; he would not believe that. Still, it might be so. At all events, he was see Carrie; so making a careful toilet, he descended to the parlor.

Within the room were congregated most of the guests of the house, for it was evening, and the visitors at Pugwash did pretty much as the visitors at any place of more or less pretensions, and amid the throng of people stood Carrie. How his foolish heart fluttered, as he gazed upon her! She was leaning upon the arm of a young gentleman, and a confoundedly handsome fellow he was too, Mr. Jinx thought, gritting his teeth. Both Carrie and the young gentleman were listening to the remarks of an old gentleman, whose every word and motion bespoke him a millionaire, and who jingled a huge bunch of watch seals incessantly.

Mr. Jinx did not accost her at once; he liked to feast his eyes upon her unobserved. She was looking paler than usual, and very pensive and sad. Presently raising her eyes, she encountered the gaze of Mr. Jinx fixed earnestly on her. A deep flush suffused her cheek, and her eyes sparkled, and slipping her arm from the gentleman by her side, she tripped hastily across the room.

"O, I am so glad to see you again, Aristides," she said, in a joyous tone, holding out both hands.

There is no knowing what answer Mr. Jinx might have made, for before he could frame a reply anywhere near glowing enough to express what he felt, Carrie's uncle and the young gentleman followed her to the part of the room where she was standing. She felt that an introduction was necessary, which she rendered with a troubled look, awkwardly indeed for one so graceful as she.

The young gentleman gazed superciliously at Mr. Jinx, bowing stiffly, while the uncle merely nodded, without turning his eyes in the direction of the person he was addressing. "Carrie," he said, "I wish to see you;" and the poor child, looking anxious, obeyed him, whispering to Mr. Jinx, "I shall be on the piazza early in the morning."

When the sun rose in the morning, Mr. Jinx was on the piazza, and Carrie and he wandered away into one of the delightful paths of the dim old woods of Pugwash, and talked of all that was in their hearts. Having confided to each other all that they had thought, done and felt, during the month of their separation, they proceeded to speak of the future, and their hopes and fears. Carrie's story corroborated all that Mr. Jinx had learned from the chamber-girl. It appeared that her uncle had heard of their intimacy, and forbade her having anything to say to Mr. Jinx, for the future, on pain of his severe displeasure. And Carrie placed her little hands in his, and looked beseechingly with her soft brown eyes into her companion's face, and asked if she should obey her uncle. And Mr. Jinx, smoothing her silken curls with his trembling hand, kissed her fair forehead, and in a sad whisper, told her she must; and Carrie buried her face in his bosom and sobbed bitterly.

"How can I see you here, and not speak to you?" she asked, in a broken voice.

"I shall not be here, my child," said Mr. Jinx, in a scarcely audible tone. "I shall go away to-morrow, and you will see me no more."

So they parted—those two loving hearts—and returned to the house by different paths. Very mournful and sad was the heart of Mr. Jinx, as he saw Carrie lifted into a grand carriage by the young gentleman who was to be her husband, and in company with the stern old uncle, drive towards the beach. Strong east winds had blown for many days, and the surf was breaking into the bay furiously, with a roar that could be heard for miles, and Carrie, with her companions, had gone to enjoy the dangerous pleasure of surf bathing. As Mr. Jinx had no heart to do likewise, he wandered away to the hill overlooking the bay, and seating himself at the foot of an oak, watched the carriages as they rolled over the beach. He saw the carriage belonging to Carrie's uncle drive up; he saw her, too, as she alighted and mixed with the throng. But he could not keep sight of her; something was wrong with his eyes again, and his sight was dim.

Suddenly, he was startled by a commotion on the beach; people running confusedly to and fro, shouting for help or gazing at the sea, while in the midst of the fierce breakers a struggling form rose and fell on the heaving waters.

The sight of a person in such imminent peril caused him to forget his own sorrows, and rushing hastily down the steep hillside, he was on the beach in a moment. His worst fears were confirmed. Carrie's uncle had rushed madly into the waves, but had been restrained by the bystanders, who were now holding him; and he, struggling to break from their grasp, with alternate prayers and imprecations besought the young gentleman who accompanied him to rescue her. But the young man, pale as the white foam at his feet, shrank back.

All this Mr. Jinx took in at a glance, as he dashed through the crowd, divested himself of his most cumbersome garments, and plunged into the waves. It was a desperate undertaking to swim out among those wild breakers. Again and again the fierce surf threw him back almost to the beach, but he battled manfully with the waves, gaining slowly but surely upon his object. At length a monstrous comber rose high above his head, gathering strength as it rushed towards him, and breaking with a prolonged roar, buried him deep beneath the seething waters, now hurling him with terrific force against the sandy bottom, now whirling him over and over with inconceivable velocity, as the undertow caught him and bore him out towards the sea. At length, when nature was almost exhausted, he rose to the surface. He was on the smooth sea, outside the outermost breaker. But where was Carrie? Nothing was visible on the face of the water, but deep down beneath, was something swaying backward and forward with the heave and swell of the ocean, that might be a human body. Taking a long inspiration, he dove, and after an interval that seemed an eternity to those on shore, he rose again, bearing in his arms a lifeless form. Brushing the salt spray from his eyes, he gazed on that beloved face. He raised her above the water; her head fell on his shoulder without life or motion. Could it be that she was indeed dead? With the terrible thought, the strength fled from his heart, and he felt himself sinking. At least, he would preserve her body. The boat was already near, the men bending to the oars with energy. He strove to strike out towards them, but his muscles refused to obey his will. He was going down; the salt sea filled his mouth as he gasped for breath. One stroke more would bring the boat to him. He held the body above his head as he sank beneath it. He was conscious some one lifted it from his grasp, and that was all.

When he returned to consciousness, he was lying on the bed in his room, about which people moved on tip-toe, occasionally bending over and looking at him anxiously. His first thought was of Carrie. Where was she—was she dead? he asked. They looked grave, and told him he must keep calm; his life depended on his remaining quiet. This could not satisfy him—he must know the worst. Springing from the bed, he dressed himself hastily, and hurried down to the parlor, near which her room was situated. About her door were standing a number of people, while others moved hastily in and out with vials and medicines, and all looked sad, and spoke in whispers. He did not ask how she was; he feared to do so. So he tottered into the parlor, and sinking on the sofa, buried his face in his hands, absorbed in anxious thought.

A long time he sat there; it might be an hour, it might be five—he could not tell. Some one else was in the room, but he did not look up to see who. It was Carrie's uncle, who, with his hat pulled over his eyes, paced back and forth jingling his watch seals; and though the time was long, still he never varied his step, so spoke. Once a grave looking man stepped gently into the room; the uncle never halted in his step nor ceased jingling his seals. Mr. Jinx did not raise his head. "You must prepare yourself for the worst, sir; there is very little hope," the grave looking man said, and went noiselessly out again.

Another long interval Mr. Jinx sat listening to the monotonous step of the old man, and the jingling of his seals. Presently the grave looking man came into the room again, looking less grave and stepping quicker. "I have waited, sir," he said, "until our hope became a certainty. The young lady is now out of danger, she will recover;" and he left the room.

Mr. Jinx, who had raised his head when the man entered, let it fall into his hands again, and the tears ran through his fingers and fell upon the carpet. The old man continued to pace back and forth, jingling his seals, as before. Presently he halted, and gazed long and earnestly at Mr. Jinx. "God bless you, my boy!" he said, and quitted the room; and Mr. Jinx returned to his own room, and slept.

A day or two later, Mr. Jinx was walking on the piazza, with Carrie on his arm, looking very pale and very lovely, as she turned her soft brown, eloquent eyes to her companion's face with the old look of love and confidence. As they walked, the uncle came to the door, and gazed at them long and earnestly, and went in again. Presently he came back, and looked at them again. Then he called to them, and they followed him into his own room.

It was more than an hour before the door opened again; and when it did open, it was the old man who came out, and he walked several times briskly up and down the piazza, chuckling to himself, and jingling his seals very smartly. By-and-by he stopped and looked into the window, and chuckled audibly and jingled his seals furiously; and could you have looked in at the window, you would have seen Mr. Jinx with one arm round Carrie's waist, while with the other he smoothed her silken curls. But his hand did not tremble then; and when Mr. Jinx did come out of the room, the old man shook him heartily by the hand, and said, in a cheerful voice: "One year from this, my boy, if you love me as well then as now."

That was enough. Mr. and Mrs. Jinx were now among the happiest of the happy.

Railery is the lightning of calumny.

PLANT FLOWERS ON MY GRAVE.

BY VERA VAUGHAN.

I muse in the gray twilight,
And in the midnight deep;
I'm thinking in the starlight,
When others are asleep.
And this I'm wishing ever,
That, when I'm dead and gone,
Some one will plant sweet flowers
Beside my funeral stone.

The bright and pretty flowers!
May guardian angels save
Them from the rude destroyer,
And plant them on my grave.
I care not for proud mourners,
And endless, careless train,
If one will plant sweet flowers,
When spring shall come again.

When grief and care oppressing,
Weigh heavy on my heart,
Hope whispers, there's an ending
To this life's stinging smart;
It is in yonder churchyard,
When thou shalt sleep below
A little mound of grassy earth,
And flowers above thee grow.

When peacefully I slumber
In the graveyard cold and dim,
Let breezes sing above me,
And chant my requiem;
And when my wearied spirit
From earthly sorrow's free,
I'll whisper to some dear one,
Plant flowers over me.

POVERTY AND WEALTH.

BY ELLA FORREST.

"I WISH you would step into Hammond's, on your way home to-night, and get a set of coats for Edith. Poor little thing! it is too bad her neck and arms are so bitten by the mosquitoes. You send home a mosquito-net to-day—will you? Mother thinks it is ridiculous we should let her be so bitten, when a few dollars would prevent it." Scarcely waiting for a reply, and without noticing that her husband's face was clouded by an anxious, serious look, Mrs. Mendon went on: "When Edith and I go to Newport, this season, I hope you will be able to leave your business with the clerks for a few weeks, at least, and be with us. It's so dreary, only to see you once or twice a week."

"I don't think I can go to Newport at all, this season, it is so expensive. And then my business has been very poor, hardly paying for itself of late."

"Can't go at all? Mother said yesterday she thought we'd better go very soon, as I haven't been very well, and Edith looks so pale. I don't know what she'd think to hear you say we can't go at all," said Mrs. Mendon.

"I can't help what she thinks. I have all I can do to pay my bills, and keep my head above water, now, and I can't go to any extra expense to please anybody. I newly furnished the parlors, last spring, and hired another servant, to please you, because your mother thought best; but I can't go to Newport this season, and that's all there is about it," said Mr. Mendon, in a very decided tone.

"I could give it up, Charles, and not feel badly, only so many of our friends are going. Then mother always feels so sad, and says so much about it, when I'm deprived of a comfort or pleasure, on account of our limited means," said Mrs. Mendon, in a peevish way.

"I am sorry to hear you say that again, Ellen," said Mr. Mendon. "Do you think more of your mother, and of pleasing her, than you do of me?"

"Of course I don't; but I can't bear to have her complain of you. I wish we were rich—then I should be happy. If you had been contented to stay in California a little longer, perhaps we might now have been as rich as Tom Mason."

"Good heavens, Ellen, you drive me mad. Mason was base enough to gamble, and shrewd enough to cheat everybody that came in his way. That's how he got his money. Would you like to have me do that?"

"I didn't know how he made his money. Mother said that Mason, who went to California when you did, had now returned home with great wealth, bought and furnished a splendid house, and was now living in great style."

"Having a fine house, and living in great style, is all you think about, I believe, Ellen. But these would never make us happy—no, nor anything else, so long as your mother meddles so much with our affairs, and you think more of her opinion than of mine."

"Why, Charles, I never heard you talk so before? What does it mean?"

"I know you never heard me talk so. I have borne insult after insult, and have never said anything; but I have thought, you may well believe. How came I to come home, and leave Mason in California? Every letter I received while there, was filled with some dreadful tale about you, or dear little Hattie that's gone, and what a dreadful thing for you to be left so. Then, your mother (unknown to you, I suppose,) wrote me a long letter herself, saying she thought you would live but a short time, your health was so poor. I waited not a moment, but left, just as I had begun to do something (for then it took much longer to get under way, than it does now). And how often has it been thrown in my face that so much money was spent, and so little earned, in those two years?" said Mr. Mendon, his face coloring, and his voice assuming quite an angry tone.

Mrs. Mendon was by this time venting her own feelings by a flood of tears, for this was the first time her husband had ever complained of her mother. And without trying to soothe her, or dry up her tears, Mr. Mendon left his home, and walked towards his store.

"How do you do? Why, I should as soon have thought of meeting my old grandfather in the city, as you, Jones," said Mr. Mendon, as he met an old acquaintance from the country. "What, pray, can have brought you here?"

"The love of gold, I suppose, friend Mendon, and I expect it will carry me a great deal further, too."

"What, you are not going to California, are you?"

"Yes, and I only wish you were going, too."

"I going? I wish I was going somewhere—anywhere. I'm sick of living here, or trying to live."

"Come, then, make up your mind, and be off with me to-night?"

"O, don't mention it. I couldn't do any such thing, Jones. Do you start to-night?"

"Yes, for New York, and from there to-morrow, I suppose."

"Come into the store, Jones. I want to have a chat with you, for I've not heard from the friends in your vicinity for a long time."

But Mr. Mendon had other business to attend to; as he entered his counting-room, a gentleman was waiting.

"Can you settle this bill this morning, Mr. Mendon?"

"How much is it?" said he, taking the bill. "Seventy-five dollars. I have a note due to-morrow—if you could wait till next week, Mr. Twist, it would accommodate me very much."

"Very well, sir," said Mr. Twist, quite satisfied with Mr. Mendon's promise to pay next week, for he well knew he would fulfil it, if possible.

"I shall hardly be able to settle with Twist next week, after all," thought Mr. Mendon, "for I have another note due, and my rent to pay. I am really discouraged. Seventy-five dollars! Just what I gave Ellen yesterday to purchase her shawl, a thing she didn't need—no, nor she wouldn't have thought so, either, but Mrs. Martin and Mrs. Bailey had one, and then nothing would satisfy Ellen's mother but for her to have one, too. And now I must study and calculate, make promises and be dunned. Ellen ought to be more independent, more considerate, think a little of consulting my wishes, and of living within my means, not always expect me to pay this and that (no matter about the cost), just because her mother thinks she needs them. I can't live so, and it's no use to think about it longer. I'm tempted to go off with Jones, and leave Ellen and her mother to manage matters as they please."

Thus mused Mendon, as he stood gazing out of his counting-room window, which only served to increase the anger with which he left his home in the morning. He sat down, trembling with excitement, and wrote a note to his wife in the most hasty manner, stating that unexpected business had called him to New York, therefore she needn't expect him home that night.

He arrived in New York in the morning, and before he had time to cool his passion, and repent his rash measure, the steamer was ready to leave for California. He merely wrote a line to his wife, which ran thus:

"DEAR ELLEN:—While you read this, I am far away on the broad ocean, in the steamer ———, bound for California. I have left all I possess with you, except enough to buy my ticket. CHARLES."

Mrs. Mendon was an only daughter, and though her father was kind, and inclined to be indulgent, he died when she was very young, leaving her to the sole care of her mother, a stern, rigid woman, who held the reins of government tightly, but like Queen Elizabeth, without their being felt to be so.

She seldom indulged her daughter, but taught her to think and act as she directed, without consulting her own inclinations at all. And unfortunately she married and settled quite near her mother; therefore she still consulted her, and knew not how to do or say anything contrary to her wishes, to gratify herself or please her husband.

On the morning we have described, after her husband left, Mrs. Mendon soon managed to dry up her tears, and then resolved never again to quote her mother in any matter that should in the least irritate her husband, and by her cheerfulness at noon she hoped she would both be able to forget the unhappy affair of the morning.

"What is the matter, Ellen, that makes you look so grave?" said her mother, as she entered at this moment. "Is Edith sick?"

"No, nothing is the matter, only my head aches, and I've been trying to sew."

"I met Miss Dillaway last evening, and engaged her to come and make your dresses next week; and, as it is so pleasant this morning, I think we'd better go out and purchase them."

"My head aches, mother, and Edith don't seem very well, so I think I'd better not go out to-day," replied Mrs. Mendon, in a timid voice.

She had not the courage or the independence to say that she shouldn't need the dresses, that her husband didn't think of going to Newport, and so forth; therefore, she allowed herself to be censured for giving up to a little headache, and for putting off, till the last minute, those things that might be done at once just as well.

Thankful was Mrs. Mendon when she found herself alone again. "O, dear," sighed she, "I wish I could please Charles and mother too. I know I offended him this morning, and I feel so unhappy about it, and now I've offended her. I seem never to be allowed to have a wish of my own, but I'll not think of this now," thought Mrs. Mendon, "for I'm determined to appear happy and cheerful, when Charles comes home, and try, if possible, to heal the wound of the morning. But why is Charles so late? It's nearly an hour past his usual hour for return. There he is, and I'll run myself to answer the bell."

She started back in astonishment to meet one of the clerks (instead of her husband), who handed her the note before mentioned, and shuddered as she opened it, for a shadow of something undefinable fell upon her. The day passed sorrowfully away, and the night fell gloomily around the troubled wife.

"He'll come to-morrow," said she, as the first ray of morning peeped into her window. Still she felt sad. "What could have called him to New York so suddenly, that he couldn't come home to see Edith and me before starting?" thought Mrs. Mendon; "he must have known I should feel anxious."

To-morrow came; but instead of the looked-for husband came a letter, which, though it contained but few lines, conveyed much. Mrs. Mendon read it over and over again, doubting what her eyes beheld.

"It's not like him. He would never do so. Somebody else has sent this to me." And half frantic, she started for the store, to ascertain what she could of his strange departure.

She found them all collected in the counting-room, evidently conversing on some very exciting subject. The story was soon told. A letter had just been received at the store, which contained the strange intelligence that Mendon was then far away, and instructions to Marsh, the head clerk, to settle up his business in the best way he could, and after paying his debts, give what should be left to his wife.

"How could he leave little Edith and me?" Thus thought Mrs. Mendon, much grieved, and her pride not a little wounded. "What shall I do?"

She had just resolved to consult her mother less, but now the one whom she ought ever to have consulted was gone, and she could only go to her and tell her troubles. Mrs. Walton, her mother, was in the greatest rage imaginable.

"One thing is certain, Ellen," said she. "He don't care anything about you or little Edith, else he would never leave you in this way. Depend upon it, there is something wrong somewhere (not dreaming she had had any influence in the matter). But don't sit down and cry, till you make yourself sick, Ellen. You must do the best you can, with what he has left for you. You'd better give up your house at once, and come home with me."

Ellen did so, giving up both her servants, for she was thought able to take care of Edith herself, now, and there was no more said about Newport, notwithstanding she was troubled by debility, and Edith looked pale.

Mr. Mendon had now been gone six months, during which time several letters had been received; but now Ellen was quite overjoyed to learn that he had been very fortunate, and in his next, designed sending her a draft for a considerable amount.

Ellen didn't rejoice because she wanted the money to spend—no, for she had learned, and was encouraged to practise the strictest economy now; but she could scarce endure longer the censure against her husband, and hear the same repeated morning and evening.

The two weeks (which were to elapse ere he sent the letter) passed rapidly and joyfully away, but no letter came; and two and two again were numbered with the past, when Ellen, with great delight, received and carefully opened her letter. But alas! it contained no draft—no, but a long account of a severe fit of sickness, occasioned by the climate and exposure, and the great expense attending his sickness. He wrote in a very desponding strain, and ended by saying that to stay where he was would soon end his days, and as soon as he could make arrangements, and his health would admit, he should return home.

"He's coming home!" said Ellen, smiling through her tears, as her eyes fell on that word.

"Coming home!" exclaimed Mrs. Walton. "He has no home to come to. He left you, and I have taken you home; but I can never take him too, sick and penniless as he will be. He'd better stay there till he gets better, and then see if he can't do something, and I should tell him so, if I were his wife."

"It is so strange," thought Ellen, "when mother has so much property, which of course I shall have some time, that she is so determined Charles shall make a fortune, even at the risk of his life, and say too, in such a decided tone, that he can't come to live with her, till his health has improved, and he is able to do business again! But if he comes home, and is without money, what can we do?" thought Ellen, in great trouble. "We couldn't live here, among our old acquaintances, but should be obliged to go to some other place, and he take the situation of a clerk, or worse still, he might have to work at his trade, which he learned when a boy. I think I must write him at once, and explain how it would be, and try to encourage him to stay awhile longer, till he has acquired a little, at least. Perhaps he is quite well and strong even now."

Had he been so, even when he read her letter, the advice it contained had been received quite differently. But his sickness had been severe; and it was long before he could stand under a burning sun, without great pain and dizziness. After his first day's labor, he came into the rough place he and his companions called a house, and threw himself upon the floor, weary, exhausted, aching in every limb, and sick at heart, saying, as he did so:

"I wouldn't ask to live another day, but for my wife and child. It's horrible to feel as I have to-day, and know that I must work, or starve."

"O, don't be discouraged, Mendon," said young Randall, a noble-hearted fellow, who was ever ready to pity and help the suffering, "you will feel better after you have some supper, and I have it most ready. Better still, here comes Joe Smith with letters for some of us. Cheer up, Mendon, one for you from home, all full of little nice sayings, of course. I wish I had a wife, or anybody to send me a letter," said Randall, who had from his earliest remembrance been an orphan.

Mendon began reading his letter, but instead of becoming more cheerful, he threw it down and buried his face in his hands; for much as men despise tears, when sickness has enfeebled them, and repeated defeat drank up their courage, a few of these "signs of weakness" may glitter upon the cheek and dim the eye.

"Is it possible," thought Mendon, "that Ellen could advise me to stay, when I told her plainly that I could live but a short time! Then, too, to say we couldn't live among our old acquaintances, unless I make a fortune here! That shows how much regard she has for me. Well, she's told me to stay now, and I will stay till I am rich, or die! But she'll not hear from me again very soon, nor shall she ever enjoy a fortune with me, unless I am convinced that she has changed her ideas a little, and is willing to live with me, even in poverty, regardless of her mother's opinion, or that of those old acquaintances, as she calls them."

Mrs. Mendon waited with greater anxiety than usual for her husband's next letter; but she waited in vain. Months passed by, and no news from him. None could conjecture the cause of his long silence, till a paragraph appeared in one of the morning papers (taken from a California paper), announcing the death of "C. Mendon, from Massachusetts." There were no particulars—not even the town or city of his former residence was mentioned; still, none doubted that Charles Mendon, of Boston, was the said "C. Mendon."

Mrs. Mendon was frantic with grief for many weeks. She felt that his life had been one of toil and care, and feared—ay, she knew that she had not tried to lighten his burden, and throw sunshine in his path, as it was her duty, and ought to have been her pleasure. But repentance came too late, and mingling with her grief at the loss of her husband, it cast a shadow over her life, and even made it a burden to her.

Mrs. Walton never mentioned his name from the day she learned his death, but tried by every means to divert the mind of her daughter. She gazed on her and her little child with a troubled heart, for she could expect to live but a few years, as her health and strength failed daily.

A year had now passed since Mrs. Mendon had worn the sable dress of a widow, but her heart mourned the lost one with the same deep grief of the day she learned his death.

"Ellen," said her mother, as they were alone in her chamber, "perhaps when I tell you what I have always endeavored to conceal from you, and every one else, you may be induced to act differently in this matter, and treat Malden less coldly."

"But I can never love him, mother. I can never regard him as other than my cousin."

"But he is not your cousin exactly, Ellen, though you have always called him so. You ought to feel flattered by his preference for you, rather than treat it indifferently, for he is from one of the first families in the city of ——. His father was one of its richest and most influential men, and though he lost a large portion of his wealth, Melden is now worth enough to make a good appearance in the world, and live easy."

"But mother," said Ellen, the tears filling her eyes, "I can never marry Melden Ashley, or any one else."

"Perhaps you will think differently, when I tell you all. Your father, at his death, had in his possession a vast amount of real estate; he had been very rich, but entering largely into speculation, he lost much, and at his death was much in debt. But I had the widow's claim upon his real estate that remained unsold. These houses, and the property you have always supposed mine, will at my death go to your father's creditors. This must account for many things which may have seemed strange to you."

"Does Melden know this, mother?"

"No, I presume not; but you can't think that in seeking you, he thinks of my money, for he has enough of his own, and you have no right, child, to doubt his sincerity."

"But I don't love him, mother, and I don't wish to marry. The more I think of the matter, the further I am from it."

"Listen to me now, Ellen; it is my last request. I can live but a short time, and I can't think of leaving you in the condition you must be in, if you still persist. That the daughter of George Walton must be a beggar, is to me more dreadful than the pangs of death. But I doubt not you will do as I wish, and that I shall see you and Melden united in marriage before that sad day," said the mother.

Mrs. Mendon made no reply to these last words, for they fell like stunning blows upon her humbled heart, and she left the chamber that she might weep over her troubles alone, as usual. A few weeks from this time we find her again lone and sorrowful.

"Mother's last request," said she, "yes, and my last obedience my last act. I have ever done as she requested, but this will end my life. Why do I now think so much of my dear, dear lost husband? Why do I dream of him every night such bright dreams? O, I would rather live with him in a hut, than with Melden in a palace."

"Why are you looking so gloomy and sad, Ellen?" said her cousin Fanny, as she entered the room at this moment. "I thought everybody was laughing and gay at the bridal hour."

"I don't know why I feel sad, Fanny," said Ellen, "but I do, and can't help it. There seems such a shadow over my life, the future looks so dark, so uncertain, and seems filled with such fearful forebodings, I dare not proceed into it. I feel as if I was leaving everything beautiful and lovely forever. The rustling of the leaves on that old maple, the rippling of the fountain, and the ticking of the clock, seem whispering farewell to me."

"Nonsense, Ellen," said Fanny, "for you to feel so. If you don't dry up your tears, and look gay at once, I'll call Melden, and tell him about you. He's cheerful enough, I assure you."

"I can't be gay, Fanny. I just went into the chamber where lay all my bridal attire, and such a chill as ran over me, at that sight! Had it been my coffin and shroud, it couldn't have made me feel worse. But I'll save you the trouble of calling Melden, for I'm going to call him myself, and have our marriage put off till to-morrow evening."

"How strangely you talk, Ellen. Your friends are all invited, and what reason could you give for putting it off till to-morrow?"

The clock chimed out the hour of eight, and Mrs. Mendon, pale and trembling, stood beside her lover, and the good man commenced the ceremony that unites hands and destinies forever. At this moment, the door-bell rang, and Sally, fearing some guest would find himself too late for the wedding, hastened to open the door. But to her astonishment, she saw a rough-looking and very poorly-clad man, whom she took to be a beggar, or purchaser of old boots and clothes, and was about to shut the door in his face, when he inquired if Mrs. Ellen Mendon lived there.

"Yes," said Sally, "she lives here, but you can't see her to-night, for she is just being married," and she made another effort to shut the door.

"Being married!" exclaimed the man; and he burst open the door, and rushed into the parlor, which he had observed was brilliantly lighted.

None knew him except Mrs. Mendon, who shrieked, "my husband!" and rushed to meet him just as the words were trembling upon the lips of the good parson that would have made her Mrs. Ashley; but she fainted and fell.

"Begone, villain!" said several, who didn't even now dream who it was.

"No, not till my wife bids me go!" said he, in such a tone none dared approach him; and he raised the prostrate woman, who seemed revived sufficiently to whisper:

"Am I dreaming? or is it you, Charles, and are you alive?"

"Alive, Ellen? Did you suppose I was dead?"

"We heard so, more than a year ago."

He now assisted her in reaching a chair, near the window, and then glanced round the room for his little Edith, fearing to ask for her, lest during his absence she had been laid beside his darling Hattie.

"Are you looking for Edith?" said Mrs. Mendon. "She was not quite well to-night, and Sally has put her in her little bed. Would you like to see her?"

After kissing his little child over and over again, he said:

"Ellen, how unfortunate that I returned, and thus deprived you of the honor of being connected with the Ashley family, and the comforts of the wealth Melden possesses!"

"That honor and wealth would have been dearly bought, Charles. I would rather live in poverty while I do live."

"Ellen, you know nothing about poverty. Could you dress to correspond with the garments I have on, and leave this beautiful house, for a few rooms?"

"Yes, to be with you, I will with pleasure go anywhere, and live as your means may permit."

"But what will your mother and your friends say?" replied Mr. Mendon.

"I care not what they say," replied she, with great earnestness. "I have listened to them too long, and have learned by bitter experience that a wife, to be happy, must forsake her friends, and live for her husband."

Mr. Mendon now rose to his feet, threw off his coarse garments, untied his faded cravat, wiped his face, and took a shabby wig from his head, and the handsome, finely-dressed Charles Mendon then caressed his wife tenderly, and whispered to her his plans for the enjoyment of the great wealth, with which he had returned, all of which he had obtained honestly.

"And now let us never mention, but forget the dark and gloomy past, from which I hope we have both learned a profitable lesson."

The guests soon dispersed, after Mr. and Mrs. Mendon left the parlor. Mrs. Walton found herself quite exhausted after the excitement of the wedding, and her disappointment and anger, when her daughter threw herself into the arms of a beggar, as she supposed. And Melden Ashley has ever since believed there is some truth in the homely saying of our grandmothers, that "there is many a slip 'twixt cup and lip."

There is ever the least in talent who become malignant and abusive.

HOW TO OPEN OYSTERS.

"Talk of opening oysters," said old Hurricane, "why, nothing's easier, if you only know how."

"And how's how?" inquired Starlight.

"Scotch snuff," answered old Hurricane, very sententiously. "Scotch snuff. Bring a little of it ever so near their noses, and they'll sneeze their lids off."

"I know a genius," observed Meister Karl, "who has a better plan. He spreads the bivalves in a circle, seats himself in the centre, and begins spinning a yarn. Sometimes it's an adventure in Mexico—sometimes a legend of his loves—sometimes a marvellous stock operation in Wall Street. As he proceeds, the 'natives' get interested—one by one they gaze with astonishment at the tremendous and direful whoppers which are poured forth, and as they gaze, my friend whips them out, peppers 'em and swallows them."

"That'll do," said Starlight, with a long sigh. "I wish we had a bushel of the bivalves here now, they'd open easy."—Philadelphia Post.

HALLUCINATIONS OF GREAT MEN.

Spiello, who has painted the Fall of the Angels, thought he was haunted by the frightful devils which he had depicted. One of our artists, who was much engaged in painting caricatures, became haunted by the distorted faces he drew; and the deep melancholy and terror which accompanied these apparitions, caused him to commit suicide. Miller, who executed the copper plate of the Sistine Madonna, had more lovely visions. Towards the close of his life, the virgin appeared to him, and thanking him for the affection he had shown her, invited him to follow her to heaven. To achieve this, the artist starved himself to death. Beethoven, who became completely deaf in the decline of life, often heard his sublime compositions performed distinctly. It is related of Ben Jonson, that he spent the whole of one night in regarding his great toe, around which he saw Tartars, Turks, Romans and Catholics climbing up and fighting. Goethe, when out riding one day, was surprised to see an exact image of himself on horseback, dressed in a light-colored coat, riding towards him.—Historical Researches.

IMPORTANT DISCOVERY.

Jean Blanc, of New Orleans, represented to be an agriculturist of considerable scientific attainments, has secured letters patent from the United States for the discovery of a process of converting thirty different varieties of plants, which grow wild in enormous quantities in various sections of the Union, into flax of great strength and beautiful texture. Specimens are now in New York, and among them are said to be the flax made from the stalks of the cotton plant, large quantities of which are burned on the Southern plantations to get them out of the way; the century tree, or wild Manilla, which grows in abundance in Florida; the wild hollyhock, with a fibre ten to fifteen feet long; the gold nankeen, of a natural nankeen color; the vegetable silk, and the vegetable wool.—Western Enterprise.

"THIS BUT A DREAM."

BY TAMAR ANNE KERNORE.

"This but a dream," said the aged man,
As he lay at death's dark door;
"This world, with its changes, a long, long dream,
And now it is nearly o'er."

"How fair was its promise in youth's bright hours,
How sweet were its hopes of joy;
It seemed like an Eden—this world of ours,
To me when a careless boy."

"Yet soon I passed on to manhood's prime,
Then thorns were around me cast;
I looked in vain for my Eden flowers,
They remained with the gladsome past."

"Then on with the busy, restless throng,
I rushed in pursuit of gold;
When this was obtained to my heart's desire,
I found I was growing old."

"That my eye was losing its lustre bright,
My step its elastic tread,
That my brown hair was thickly sprinkled with grey,
And that soon I'd be laid with the dead."

"This world with its changes is but a dream,
Its strong ties will soon be riven;
But O, when awakened from death's deep sleep,
May I open my eyes in heaven."

THE LAST SIXPENCE.

BY AUSTIN C. BURDICK.

It was on a chill, bleak morning in November that Charles Aubrey emerged from an old shed where he had passed the last part of the night under a pile of sheep skins. He was a young man, not over two-and-twenty, and yet retained great beauty of person, though his clothes were torn and dirty, and his face pale and haggard. Only one year before he had been left an orphan, with eleven thousand dollars in money in his possession. He had always been a generous-hearted, frank, and loving companion, but evil associations had gathered about him, and in an unfortunate hour he gave himself up to their influence. He thought not of the value of money, but designing knaves, under the guise of friendship, could always draw it from him. But the poor, misguided youth had run the race, and was now alone. His money was gone, and his sunshine companions had left him. He had reached the goal towards which for a whole year he had been dashing on.

As young Aubrey stood there now, his lips were parched, and his limbs shook as though with the palsy. He mechanically placed his hand in his pocket, and took therefrom a sixpence. He searched further—felt in every pocket—but he could find no more. That single sixpence was the last of his fortune.

"Ah, Charley, Charley," he murmured to himself, "you've run your race. Where now are the friends who have so long hung about you? One poor sixpence! It will buy me one glass of grog to allay my burning thirst. O, would to God it would buy me one true friend!"

He spoke thus, and with the words came rushing through his mind the memory of the past. He remembered his mother as she held him for the last time to her bosom and blessed him; and he remembered when he saw them cover her body up in the warm flowery earth of the summer, not many years ago. He remembered his kind, good father, and how that father had loved him and blessed him with his last breath. And he remembered one other, a bright-eyed, joyous girl, in whose keeping he had once placed all his love, and all his hopes of joy. But it was gone now! Thus he stood, with the small coin in his hand, when he heard footsteps approaching. He raised his eyes, and beheld an old woman, with bended back, who came tottering on, slowly and tremblingly. Her garments were torn and tattered, and the thin, gray hair hung matted and uncombed. She stopped when she came to where the youth stood, and leaned heavily upon her staff.

"Charity, good sir!" she uttered, in hoarse, tremulous tones. "Give me wherewith to purchase a single meal, and I'll ask God to bless thee."

"By my life, good woman, you are the very one I have been wishing for. Here—it is all I have—it is my last sixpence! Take it. I have only wished that it could buy me one true friend."

The old woman hesitated.

"Will you not take it?" asked Charles, earnestly. "Take it, so that I may feel that I have one friend."

"I need it, sir," the woman said, "but I dare not take it from you, for you would not profit by my friendship."

"Yes I would. It would send a ray of sunshine through my soul, to know that one human being blessed me."

"But what good could come of that while you continued to curse yourself?"

The youth started, but he spoke not.

"If you would have me for a friend, will you listen to me as a friend?"

"Listen? Yes."

"Then let this be your lowest vale of life," said the woman, with startling solemnity. "Turn now and go up hill. Go up, up, until you have reached the sunshine once more. I knew your mother, Charles Aubrey, and I remember well how kind she was. O, did she ever think that her well beloved son would sink so low!"

"Stop, stop," groaned the unhappy youth. "O, who shall give me the first lift to regain all I have lost?"

"I will."

"You? Who are you? You say you knew my mother. Who are you?"

"Never mind. Suffice it for you to know that I have suffered as deeply as you ever did. I know what it is to suffer. I say I can give you the first lift. I mean by that that I can show you the way. Follow my counsel, and you may yet recover all that you have lost."

"No, no, not all. O, there is one loss I can never make up!" And as he spoke he bowed his head and covered his face with his hands.

"Let not such feelings be with you now. First resolve that you will turn from the evil that has brought you down. You know what it is as well as I do. Can you do this?"

"Ay, I had done it ere you came up."

"Then take the next step. Go and make a friend who can help you further. Go to Amos Williams and—"

"No, no, not there. O, not there," interrupted Charles.

"Go to his store and freely confess to him all your faults," resumed the woman, without seeming to notice the interruption. "Tell him all, and then ask him to trust you once more."

"No, no, I dare not go to him."

"But listen: I heard Mr. Williams say with his own lips that he would help you if he could; that he would give you his hand if you would only help yourself."

"Did he say that?" uttered Charles, eagerly.

"He did. And now, Charles Aubrey, be assured that you have not lost everything. Let people know that you mean to arise and be a man, and all whose friendship is worth having will give you their hands. Go to Amos Williams first."

"I will go."

"Then give me the sixpence."

* * * * *

Amos Williams stood at the great desk in his counting-room, and he was alone. While he thus stood, casting up a column of figures upon a page of one of the ledgers, the door was opened and Charles Aubrey entered. He was yet pale and haggard, and looked as he did when we saw him two hours ago. The merchant started back with an utterance of pain and surprise as he recognized in the miserable form before him the once happy and beloved youth whom he had delighted to honor.

"Charles," he uttered, as soon as he could command his speech, "why have you come here?"

"Mr. Williams," spoke the youth in a choking voice, "I have come to—to—tell you that my course of wickedness is run, and from this moment I am—a—"

Here he stopped. He hesitated a moment, and then his feelings overcame him, and bowing his head he burst into tears, and sobs, loud and deep, broke from his lips. The merchant was deeply affected, and with the warm tears gathering thickly in his own eyes, he started forward and placed his hand upon the youth's head.

"Charles," he uttered in a tremulous, eager voice, "have you resolved to be a man?"

"With God's help I will be a man again!" was the youth's reply.

"Is your money all gone?"

"Yes, sir. This morning I had one solitary sixpence left, and that I gave to a poor old woman who bade me to come here."

"Ay, I know her. She is an unfortunate creature, and has suffered much. I bade her if she saw you, and you were cast down and repentant, to send you here, for I heard yesterday that you were at the foot of the precipice. Now if you are determined, you shall not want for help."

In eager, broken, sobbing sentences, Charles poured out his thanks, and stated the resolution he had taken.

"And now," said Mr. Williams, after the matter had been talked over some, "we must find a place where you can recruit your strength a little before you try to work. There is my brother, who owns a farm out in M——. He would be glad to have you come there and stop awhile; and when you wholly recover your wasted strength you shall have a place here."

At first the youth refused to accept so much, for he knew his unworthiness; but the merchant simply answered him:

"You can pay me for all this if you choose, so you need not be delicate about it; and as for your unworthiness—when the lost ones of earth are not worth redeeming, then some other standard of worth must be regarded than that simple one which Jesus of Nazareth gave to his followers."

So it was settled that Charles should go out into the country and remain awhile. He found Mr. Williams, the brother, ready and happy to receive him, and there he soon began to regain his health and spirits. In two weeks he was as strong as ever, and at the end of a month the marks of dissipation had all left his face. Then he returned to town, and entered the store. Amos Williams gave him a lucrative station, and bade him remember nothing of the past save the one great lesson he had learned.

"Charles," he said, "you know the widow Swan?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, I have engaged board for you there. I hope the arrangement will suit you."

"Yes, sir," returned the youth, with emotion.

From that time Charles Aubrey went on nobly and truly in the path he had marked out. As soon as he again made his appearance in prosperity his old companions sought his company once more; but he repulsed them with a stern firmness that left them no hopes. Yet for a month he was beset with temptations in every shape, but he hesitated not once. His mind was made up, and he made but one answer to all invitations to depart from his course. At length these temptations became less frequent, and finally he was left to pursue his own course.

Little did Charles Aubrey know how closely he had been watched. Mr. Williams knew his every movement, even to his prayers which he poured forth in the privacy of his own apartment. Thus passed away three months, and at the end of that time Mr. Williams called the young man into the counting-room one evening, after the rest of the people had gone.

"Well, Charles," the merchant commenced, "how would you like to change your boarding-place?"

There was something in the look and tone of the man as he spoke these words that made the youth start. The blood rushed to his face, and soon he turned pale.

"If you would like," the merchant resumed, in the same low, strange tone, "you may come and board with me. I will not deceive you, Charles. Until I could know that you would entirely reform, I dared not carry you to my house. But I am satisfied, now. I have not doubted you, but I would prove you. And now, if you please, you may inform Mrs. Swan that you shall board with her no more. She will not be disappointed, for I have spoken with her on the subject."

With these words Mr. Williams left the store, and as soon as Charles could recover from the strange emotions that had, almost overpowered him, he called for the porter to come and lock up, and then, having locked the great safe, he took his departure.

On the next morning he came to the store, and when his employer came he informed him that he had given his notice to Mrs. Swan.

"Very well," returned the merchant. "This evening, then, you will go home with me."

Evening came, and Charles Aubrey accompanied his old friend home. Tea was ready, the rest of the family having eaten an hour before. After tea Charles was conducted to the sitting-room, where lamps were burning, and where Mr. Williams informed him he could amuse himself by reading.

Charles sat down there, and his employer went out, but he could not read. His heart beat wildly in his bosom, and his soul was strangely worked upon. O, how natural everything there appeared. And how many happy, blissful hours he had spent in that same room. Thus he sat, when the door was slowly opened, and a female appeared within the apartment. She was a bright-eyed, beautiful maiden, and when she first entered a happy smile was upon her face. But the smile faded away, and her lips trembled. She tried to speak, but she could not. She only stood there with her hands half-extended, gazing tremblingly upon the youth. In a moment more her bright eyes overran with tears, and then Charles started up. He could doubt no more. Why else should he have been brought hither? why left thus? why placed on such probation? He hesitated no more. With one quick step he sprang forward, and without a word he caught the fair girl to his bosom.

"Mary," he uttered, as he gazed into the sparkling eyes of the fair being who still clung fondly to him, "you still love me—you forgive me all—and trust me once more?"

"Yes," she murmured; and ere she could speak further her father entered the room.

"Aha—so you've found him, have you, Mary?" he cried, in a happy, joyous tone.

"Mr. Williams," uttered Charles, still holding Mary by the hand, and speaking with difficulty, "I hope I am not deceived. 'O, you have not brought me here to kill me! You cannot have passed this cup to my lips only to dash it away again!'"

"Of course not," returned the merchant. "But you must know now the whole truth, and for fear my child may not tell you all, I'll tell you myself. This noble girl has never ceased to love you, and when you were the lowest down, she loved you the most. She came to me and asked me if she might save you if she could. I could not tell her nay, and she went at the work. She has suffered much, and, Charles, it remains with you to decide whether her future shall be one of happiness or not. She knew that you were down, that your money was gone, and that your false friends had forsaken you. Then it was that her love for you grew bold and strong. She wondered if you would repulse her. She knew not what might be your feelings, and to save herself the pain of a direct repulse from you she assumed a disguise, so that she might approach you without being known, and yet gain some idea of your feelings, and save you if she could. I think she has done well. At any rate she has regained you to herself, and it must now be your own fault if the silken tie is loosed again."

With these words the father left the apartment.

"You, Mary? you in disguise?" queried Charles, as soon as he could speak.

"Ay, dear Charles; and you know why I did it. "Here—do you not remember it?" And as she spoke she drew from her bosom a small silken purse, and took therefrom a sixpence.

The youth recognized it in an instant.

"O!" he cried, as he strained the noble girl to his bosom, "what can I say? Mary—Mary—my own heart's truest love—let my life in the years to come tell my gratitude. O, my all of life is yours, and my last breath shall bear your name in gratitude to God."

And Charles Aubrey never forgot his promise. With this noble companion by his side he travelled up the hill, and in his path the flowers of life grew thick and fragrant.

Upon the wall of his sitting-room hangs a picture. It is a splendid painting of the Prodigal Son's Return. Upon the face of a heavy, gilt frame, visitors notice a small blemish, but which, upon closer examination, proves to be a small silver coin. Our readers need not be told why that bit of metal is thus carefully preserved.

A BRAVE MAN.

We have read of a battle in India, where column after column reeled back from a breach that vomited forth death on thousands, until an ensign at the head of his company rushed up through the rain of bullets, and planted the British flag on the ramparts. His example encouraged the troops, and the town was taken. The gallant young soldier was found dead, but still standing, clinging to the staff of the flag he had planted so bravely. His body had formed a target for the enemy's marksmen. When they tried to remove him, they found the staff could not be released from his death grasp without force. So they buried him with "the banner he had borne so well." And without the walls of that city a tall tamarind sheds its fruit over the grave of Ensign Vernon.—Boston Bee.

The praise of the envious is far less creditable than their censure. They praise only that which they can surpass; but that which surpasses them they censure.

VALUE OF JEWELS.

A lot of jewelry, sold at auction a few years since in London, brought $229,000. The crown of her British Majesty cost $555,000. The pearl which Cleopatra dissolved and drank to the health of Marc Antony, is estimated by Pliny at about $375,000. Fenchwanger records a small box, containing a diamond, a blue sapphire, a Brazilian berge, and a few Peruvian emeralds, sold for $830,000. Murray mentions a pair of bracelets set with brilliants, valued at the enormous sum of $5,000,000. But the most precious of all gems is the diamond; it exceeds in value a hundred thousand times its weight in gold. It is a portable empire. The great Russian diamond is estimated at $1,000,000; one belonging to the Rajah of Mattan, in Borneo, at $1,840,000; the celebrated Regent diamond, now among the crown jewels of France, at $2,000,000; one is the Austrian diadem, at $450,000; and three is the Persian, dignified with the grandiloquent titles, "Mountain of Splendor," "Sea of Glory," and "Crown of the Moon," at $900,000. The largest diamond known, that of the King of Portugal, is counted worth $2,500,000; and the famous "Koh-i-noor," or "Mountain of Light," belonging to Queen Victoria, is said to be equal in value to half the daily expenses of the whole world. A string of such pearls a mile long would purchase the fee-simple of the globe; and one that would belt Britain might, at the same rate, buy up the solar system.—Life Illustrated.

EXTRAVAGANCE OF TURKISH LADIES.

Life in the harem would be insupportable were it not for the stimulants of luxury and dress; and the extravagance of the favorites of the Seraglio in particular is proverbial. A correspondent writing from Constantinople says: "These ladies have at length run up such terrible long bills, that the Sultan has just caused all the creditors to be called together, and their accounts examined. The charges of these dealers being judged too high, as is usual, both in the East and elsewhere, the merchants were obliged to consent to a deduction of ten per cent. on their accounts; and this point being satisfactorily settled, the Sultan has engaged to pay up the amount (no less than fifty-four millions of piasters), in monthly instalments, out of his private purse. But to think of a company of women, secluded from the rest of the world, and with nothing better to do than to run up bills for silks, gauzes, cachemires, jewels, sweetmeats, and cosmetics, to the tune of fifty-four millions of piasters ($4,320,000)!"—New York Mirror.

SENSIBILITIES OF THE BRAIN.

Extreme emaciation, produced by low diet and exhausting diseases, is highly injurious to the brain. Great mental depression, and even in some cases insanity, are generally produced by the exhausted and bloodless condition arising from protracted abstinence, exhausting diseases, blood-letting, hemorrhage, or any cause by which the quantity of blood is greatly reduced and its quality impaired. A copious supply of good blood enables the brain to nourish itself properly, diminishes its irritability, and prevents those degenerations of its substance which are apt to occur in all impoverished constitutions.—Hall.

MUSINGS.

BY U. D. THOMAS.

I was musing—musing lonely,
At my window yester-night,
While my candle, burning dimly,
Shed around a fitful light;
While the wind without was moaning—
Moaning through the naked trees,
I was musing on the future,
And its dread uncertainties.

Darkness o'er my spirit brooded,
Like the darkness of a room,
Where the dying embers only
Gave distinctness to the gloom;
Wearily the moments glided,
Wearily, with sadness fraught;
Clad in sable robes of mourning,
Seemed each melancholy thought.

Then the future to my vision
Seemed its mysteries to unclose;
I beheld life's dreary pathway
Thickly set with lurking foes;
Friendship seemed unreal and fleeting,
Love inconstant and untrue—
And the stars that hope had lighted,
One by one in clouds withdrew.

Then I prayed in deepest anguish,
That the cup might pass from me,
That those days of darker sorrow
I might never live to see;
And, the while, a change came o'er me,
Like a wave from Lethe's tide,
A most sweet and soothing calmness
O'er my spirit seemed to glide.

Then a something spoke within me,
That did more than mortal seem;
Whispering softly—whispering sweetly,
Like an angel in a dream:
"Fear not thou to trust the future!
Whate'er thy lot may fall:
God is with thee and above thee;
He directs and governs all."

LITTLE KINDNESSES.

We have long since come to the conviction that the habit (easily acquired) of conferring and reciprocating little kindnesses is the heart's proper element. Their cost is so trifling, they afford so much pleasure to the parties who are in the secret, and make the pulse beat so healthily, that from a motive of very selfishness they should be kept up. The mutual exchanges of love, regard and pure affection which we hint at, are the very lungs of life. They are not to be occasional, studied, or of necessity. O, no! Let them be free-will offerings, perpetual in their freshness. If we have a beautiful flower given us, or growing in our garden, the poet will convey it to a friend, unharmed. Send it; ay, send anything, however trifling, that can speak the eloquent feelings of a tender, loving heart.—Boston Evening Gazette.

No cord or cable can draw so forcibly, or bind so fast, as love can do with only a single thread.

GREAT DIAMOND OF RUSSIA.

In the first volume of the quarto edition of "P. S. Pallas's Travels through the Southern Provinces of the Russian Empire in the years 1793 and 1794," which was taken from a wreck on the coast of Cape Cod, we find a very full and interesting account of "The Moon of the Mountain," the celebrated diamond of Russian royalty. Pallas was Counsellor of State to the Czar Alexander, and during his stay at Astrakan became acquainted with the heirs of Grigori Safarov Shaf-rass, the Armenian who sold the precious gem to Russia. Shah Nadir had in his throne, with this diamond, another of equal splendor, called the "Sun of the Sea." At the time of his assassination the soldiers secured and secretly sold many of the richest ornaments belonging to the Persian Crown. Shaf-rass, also named Millionshik, or the Man of Millions, resided at Bassora. One day an Arganian Chief visited him, and secretly proposed to sell the diamond, with other precious stones. He was surprised at the low price demanded, and affirming that he had not money enough to buy the jewels, asked time to consult two brothers who were in business with him. The Armenian, with the approval of his brothers, went in pursuit of the vender. He wandered in vain in search of the treasure. Shaf-rass at length accidentally met the Arganian in Bagdad, and bought all the jewels in his possession for 50,000 piastres.

The gem of the first water, with a large emerald and ruby, was laid away in brilliant seclusion for twelve years. Then the Armenian, whose fears of losing the royal plunder were overcome by the love of money, set off with the jewels for a market. Passing through Itham and Constantinople, he directed his course across Hungary and Silesia to Amsterdam, where he made the first public display of the beautiful stones, and offered them for sale. It is said that the English Government was among the bidders. Russia sent for the "Moon of the Mountain," promising to pay the expenses of transmitting it if not purchased. The Russian Minister, Count Panin, through M. Laseref, the Court jeweller, made the following offer:—Shaf-rass was to have the patent of hereditary nobility, an annual pension of 6000 roubles, i. e., $4500, during life, and 500,000 roubles, or $375,000 in cash. The Armenian, feeling that "blessings brighten as they take their flight," became so extravagant in his demands that the negotiation was broken off and the diamond returned. Shaf-rass was now in trouble. His outlay had been great, and he had borrowed large amounts. He absconded, and went back to Astrakan. Afterward, Count Grigoricish Orlov renewed the Russian offer to purchase; and Shaf-rass accepted 450,000 roubles, or $337,500, ready money, together with the grant of Russian nobility. About one quarter of the sum was paid to the negotiators, and the rest, which at the death of the Armenian was the dower of his daughters, was squandered by the extravagance of their husbands. The diamond was secure, and shines on, though royal eyes which beheld its light with pride of power have lost their fire forever. Such is the story of the "Moon of the Mountain,"—the ornament of a sceptre which is shaken now in its sweep over the domain of the sultan. Who shall tell its history in the future? —New York Sun.

TOGETHER IN THE ARK.

BY WILLIE E. PABOR.

Wearily our hearts were drifted,
O'er the dark, uncertain wave,
Where the tide of error lifted
Phantoms from their alkmy grave.

She was proud, but I was prouder;
Each to each would scorn to yield;
As the voice of pride grew louder,
So each stubborn heart grew steeled;

Steeled against the plaintive pleading
Of the voice within the soul;
Though that very soul lay bleeding
At the threshold of life's goal.

I had fame and she had beauty,—
Each had once been lovers true,
And the shrine of love and duty
Never vows so holy knew.

We had pictured out our bridal Underneath the skies of May;
But the bark that held the idol
On the shore of error lay.

Thus it happened for a season—
Each a friend and yet a foe;
Though to think of love was treason,
Each no other thought could know.

But at last stern pride has yielded;
All is bright that once was dark;
And our hearts, by true love shielded,
Are together—in the ark.

THE BELLE OF GRANADA.

BY ELLEN HUSTACE.

CELESTINE PEREZ, at the age of eighteen, was the most famous beauty of Granada. An orphan, and heiress to an immense fortune, she lived under the care of an old uncle, hard and avaricious, who was called Alonzo. He was occupied during the day in counting his ducats, and through the night in driving away the serenaders who sought the window of Celestine. The intention of Alonzo was to marry this rich heiress to Don Henrique, his son, who had already studied six years at Salamanca, and had begun to translate Cornelius Nepos quite passably.

All the handsome cavaliers of Granada were lovers of Celestine; but they could only see her at mass, and the church days were strictly kept by these worthy devotees. Among the most distinguished of these was Don Pedro Alvarez, captain of cavalry. Of little wealth, but of noble family, brave and distinguished, he attracted the eyes of all the dames of Granada, but he only perceived Celestine. This she soon discovered, and her glances, in return, were directed to him alone.

Thus they passed two months without daring to speak, but at the end of that time Don Pedro found means to convey to his mistress a letter, in which he disclosed to her all that she well knew already. He also solicited permission to stand beneath her window, and behold her near him, if for only a moment. Such is the custom in Spain, where the lattices serve more for the night than the day. At a late hour, when the street is deserted, the lover, enveloped in his cloak, armed with his sword, and invoking the god of love and silence, walks joyfully toward the happy spot, and takes his station beneath the barred window. Soon it is softly opened. A charming Spaniard appears, and asks, in trembling tones, if any one is below. Her lover, transported with joy, re-assures her; he speaks in a low voice; they interrupt each other, saying a thousand times the same thing; vows ascend to the lattice; kisses fly through the air. But the day approaches—they must separate. An hour is passed in bidding adieu, and they part without having said a thousandth portion of all they had intended.

The window of Celestine overlooked a small place, almost deserted, and occupied only by a few poor people. The old nurse of Don Pedro there dwelt in a miserable chamber, opposite the room of his mistress. Pedro soon sought his old friend.

"My good woman," said he, "I have too long suffered you to remain in this miserable place. This forgetfulness is culpable on my part; go and occupy a room near me, and leave this humble abode for me to dispose of."

The good nurse could only reply with her tears. She accepted with joy the exchange, and kissed the hands of her pious foster-son.

No king ever took possession of his regal palace with greater joy than Don Pedro felt, when established in his nurse's apartment. As soon as night came, Celestine appeared at the window; the days were passed in writing to each other, and no cloud seemed to obscure their happiness, when Don Henrique, the son of Alonzo, and the future husband of Celestine, arrived from Salamanca, bringing a declaration of love in Latin, which he had been months in writing.

While Alonzo was preparing the marriage contract for his son and Celestine, the lovers determined to secure their happiness by an elopement. They decided to fly to Lisbon. Every preparation was made; Don Pedro, after having left his horses outside the city, was to seek Cestine, who would descend from the window, and both were to fly to Portugal.

Don Pedro employed all the hours of the day in arranging his affairs; and Celestine, on her part, re-opened again and again a little casket of jewels which her mother had left for her. It was filled with diamonds and other precious stones, and among the rest shone a ring of emerald polish Don Pedro had lately given her. This treasure she was to bear away, and guarding it carefully, Celestine sat watching at the window, as Don Pedro hurried towards the spot, his heart palpitating with joy and expectation.

But just as he arrived at the street, he heard cries for succor, and turning, saw two men attacked by five assassins, armed with swords and clubs, and evidently intent on murder. The brave Pedro forgot everything to throw himself on the aggressors; he pounded two, when the others fled. What was his surprise at recognizing in those he had delivered, Alonso the uncle of Celestine, and Don Henrique! Don Pedro sought in vain to free himself from his companions. In their gratitude, they determined that he should pass the night with them, and the poor lover found that he had already lost two hours of his precious time. Alas, he little knew of the misfortune that had already occurred!

One of the assassins, in his flight, passed beneath the window of Celestine. The night was very obscure, and the unhappy maiden, when she saw the ruffian appear, believed that Don Pedro had at last arrived. Extending her hand with a sigh of impatience and joy, and presenting the casket:

"Take these diamonds," she said to him, "while I descend."

At the word diamonds, the assassin stopped, seized the casket without replying, and while Celestine was occupied in descending, he fled precipitately.

Judge of the surprise of Celestine when alone in the street she looked around her in vain for him she had thought to be Don Pedro! She called in a low voice, but no one responded. Fear seized her; she knew not what to do. Should she return to the house? Should she leave the city and seek for the horses and attendants of Don Pedro who awaited them? She hesitated; the silence and obscurity of the streets redoubled all her fears. At last she encountered a man, and asked in a trembling voice for the street which conducted to the gate of the city. The man pointed it out. She advanced with courage, and soon found herself in the environs of Granada. Here she sought in vain for Don Pedro; calling him at every step, she still advanced, but in a direction opposite to Portugal.

However, Don Pedro, believing that Celestine had seen or learned the cause of his delay, submitted to the entreaties of Alonso and his son, and entered the house with them. Here the tutor sent to the chamber of his niece, to inform her of the peril they had escaped. But the room was deserted, and by the open window they saw that Celestine had fled. The house was alarmed; all started in pursuit. Don Pedro, in despair, would have followed on the moment, but Henrique, thanking him for the interest he seemed to take in their misfortune, insisted on accompanying him. Don Pedro then convinced him that each should take separate roads; he ran to rejoin his people, not doubting that Celestine had taken the road to Portugal, while Henrique galloped towards the road which the fugitive had really taken.

The sad Celestine continued to travel on toward the mountains. Soon she heard the sound of horses behind her. Her first thought was that it might be Don Pedro, her second that either travellers or brigands were approaching. She left the road, trembling, and concealed herself in a thicket. Soon she saw Don Henrique pass, followed by his attendants. Alarmed at the sight, and fearing to fall again into the power of Alonso, she left the main road, and turned into the entrance of a wood.

The Sierra Nevada are a chain of mountains that lie between Granada and the Mediterranean Sea. They are inhabited only by shepherds and laborers. As Celestine, worn and weary, rested a moment from her journey, she heard a voice singing a sad and touching air. Turning towards the spot from whence the voice proceeded, she perceived a young man habited as a hunter; in his hands he carried a gun, and at his side was suspended a bundle covered with goat-skin. Approaching the stranger, Celestine thus addressed him:

"I am alone and unprotected; have pity on my unfortunate state, and direct me to a village or habitation where I can find repose and sustenance."

"Alas, madam, I would gladly conduct you to the village of Gadara, situated behind these rocks, but you will require it not, when I tell you that my mistress resides there, and yesterday espoused my rival. I quit these mountains forever, carrying only with me my gun and a shepherd's suit, as a remembrance of happy days forever passed and gone."

These few words inspired Celestine with a new idea. "My friend," she said to the youth, "you cannot travel without money. I have many pieces of gold which I will share with you, if you will give me the garments which you carry in the package."

The young stranger accepted the offer. Celestine gave him a dozen ducats, and after having inquired the road to Gadara, she bade adieu to the hunter, and entered a grotto to attire herself as a shepherd.

She soon appeared again, with a jacket of chamois skin, slashed with celestial blue, a hat ornamented with ribbons, and was more beautiful in this disguise than when covered with jewels and decked for the balls of Granada. She then took the road to the village, stopped in the market-place, and inquired if any one needed a keeper on his farm. All surrounded, and gazed upon her. The young girls admired the beautiful golden locks that hung upon her shoulders, her eyes so soft and brilliant, her noble carriage and graceful motions—all surprised and delighted them. No one believed that it was other than a handsome young man. One thought it was a great lord in disguise. Another said it was a prince, in love with a shepherdess. And the magistrate, who was the poet of the place, declared that it was Apollo descended to earth again more charming than ever.

Celestine, who now assumed the name of Marcello, was not long in finding a master. It was the old alcade of the village, regarded as the most honest man of the country. This good laborer, for the alcades are not much more, soon felt the most tender friendship for Celestine. Not more than a month passed, in her duty as shepherd, when she was employed to direct the household affairs; and Marcello performed every duty with such sweetness and fidelity, that master and servants were equally pleased. Marcello was the example and love of the village. His sweetness, his graces and wisdom won all hearts.

"See," said the mothers to their sons, "see this good Marcello. He is always with his master; he is occupied ever in making others comfortable and happy; and he never quits his duties, like you, to run after the shepherdesses."

Thus passed two years. Celestine, thinking always of Don Pedro, had secretly sent a shepherd, whom she could trust, to Granada to obtain information of her lover, Alonzo, and Don Henrique. The messenger, on his return, reported that the old man Alonzo was dead, that Henrique was married, and that Don Pedro, for two years, had not been seen in the country. Celestine then gave up all hope of ever seeing him again, and strove to content herself with the prospect of passing her life in the village, with a heart dead to the sentiment of love, when the old alcade, her master, fell dangerously ill. Marcello watched over him with the greatest care and tenderness, but notwithstanding this, he died in a few days, and left all his property to her.

All the village wept for the alcade, and after the funeral assembled to choose his successor. In Spain, certain villages have the right to name their alcade, who performs the duties of magistrate and judge, pronouncing sentence upon, or restoring liberty to the few offenders who occasionally transgress the laws among these simple rustics.

The villagers, on assembling to decide upon their new ruler, declared unanimously that the will of the old alcade had pointed out his successor. The old men, followed by all the youth of the place, then marched with much ceremony to the dwelling of Marcello, carrying the mark of dignity, an ivory baton. Celestine accepted it, and touched to tears by this proof of affection from these honest people, she resolved to consecrate to her duties a life which could never be blessed by affection.

While the new alcade is thus occupied, we will return to the unhappy Don Pedro, whom we left galloping on the road to Portugal, seeking always for her whom he hoped to encounter. At length he arrived at Lisbon, without having heard any news of Celestine. He retraced his steps, searching in vain on the borders of the route, and returned discouraged and hopeless. After having assured himself that his dear Celestine had not returned to Granada, he imagined that she had perhaps gone to Seville, where she had relatives. He hastened to Seville; the relatives had lately left in a vessel for Mexico. Don Pedro doubted not that his mistress had departed with them, and took passage in the next vessel, arrived at Mexico, found the friends of Celestine, but they could give him no information regarding her. In returning to Spain, the ship was wrecked upon the coast. Don Pedro saved himself upon the fragments of the wreck, reached the shore, and penetrating into the mountains to ask succor, the chances of love conducted him to Gadara.

Having entered the first inn that they met with, Don Pedro and his companions in misfortune congratulated themselves on their escape, and while talking over their dangers, one of the passengers commenced quarrelling with a sailor for the possession of a casket, which the passenger declared to be his property. Don Pedro, who sought to appease the quarrel, requested the claimant to describe the contents of the casket, and opened it himself to ascertain the truth.

Imagine his astonishment at recognizing the jewels of Celestine, and among them the emerald that he had given her! Remaining for an instant immovable, he examined more attentively the precious treasure; then fixing his eyes, filled with fury, on the passenger, he exclaimed:

"Of whom did you obtain this casket?"

"That is of no importance to you," fiercely replied the man; "it is sufficient that I claim it as my property."

He then attempted to wrest the treasure from Don Pedro, but he, placing it within his doublet, drew his sword, and attacking the robber:

"Traitor," cried he, "confess thy crime, or thou diest within the hour."

In saying these words, he threw himself upon his enemy, who defended himself with valor, but soon fell, pierced with a mortal wound.

At this sight, all the villagers gathered around Don Pedro; they surrounded and seized him, threw him into a prison, and the innkeeper ran to urge his wife to seek a priest, while he went to deliver the casket into the hands of the alcade and inform him of what had happened.

What was the joy and astonishment of Celestine at recognizing her diamonds and hearing that the robber was in custody! She ran hastily to the inn; the priest was already there, and the dying man, touched by his exhortations, confessed that two years before, in passing through a street in Granada, a female from a window had lowered to him a casket, telling him to guard it while she descended, that he had fled with the jewels, and that he asked pardon of God and the person he had robbed. After this recital, he expired, and Celestine hastened to the prison.

How her heart palpitated, as she advanced! She believed, after having heard of the rescue of her jewels, that she should behold Don Pedro; but she feared to be recognized by him. Drawing her hat over her eyes, enveloping herself in her cloak, and preceded by the jailor carrying a light, she descended to the dungeon.

Hardly had she reached the foot of the stairs, when she recognized her lover. At this sight, joy for a moment clouded her senses; she leaned against the wall; her head fell on her shoulder, and tears flowed over her cheeks. But soon rising, she sought to subdue her emotion, and approached the prisoner.

"Stranger," said she, disguising her voice, "you have committed a crime; you have killed your companion. What has led to an act so culpable?"

Here her voice failed her, and sinking upon a stone bench, she covered her face with her hand.

"Alcade," replied Don Pedro, "I have not committed a crime; it was an act of justice. But I demand death. Death alone will end the sufferings of which this villain, whom I have slain, was the first cause. Condemn me—I have no wish to defend myself; deliver me of a life which has no joys for me since I have lost all hope of ever finding—"

As he finished, his lips pronounced the name of Celestine.

Celestine trembled, in hearing him pronounce her name. She was no longer mistress of herself; she rose, and would on the instant have revealed herself to her lover, but the presence of the jailor restrained her.

"Go," she said to him, "I would remain alone with the prisoner."

She is obeyed. Then advancing to Don Pedro and extending her hand, she said, with much emotion:

"You have always loved, then, her who has lived only for you?"

At the sound of her voice, at these words, Don Pedro raised his head, but dared not believe his eyes.

"O, heaven! is it you? Is it my Celestine? Or is it an angel who has taken this figure? Ah, it is she; I can doubt no longer," he cried; and folding her in his arms, he kissed away her tears. "It is my love, my Celestine, and all my misfortunes are ended."

"No," replied Celestine, after some moments' silence, "you are guilty of murder. I cannot break your chains, but I will go to-morrow to the city, reveal all to the governor, tell him my birth and history, recount our misfortunes, and if he refuses thee thy liberty, I will return here to end my days in a prison."

Day had hardly dawned when Celestine, who had revealed her story to her loved companions the villagers, went, accompanied by them, to the palace of the governor. There she betrayed her sex, told her adventures, and informed the ruler of the crime which Don Pedro had committed, and of the motives which rendered it excusable. All the inhabitants fell at the feet of the governor, entreating that the request of their loved Marcello should be granted. A pardon is pronounced, and they hasten back to open the prison doors of Don Pedro.

As the happy lover pressed Celestine once more to his heart, an old man advanced from among the villagers.

"Stranger," said he, "we have given you your liberty, but you would take from us our Marcello ; and our loss will be greater than your benefit. Deign to become our alcade, our master, and our friend. Live for the future among us, and permit us to reverence and admire as your wife her, who as a noble youth first won our affections."

Don Pedro and Celestine, touched by this new proof of affection, could not refuse the request of the inhabitants of Gadara. They returned to Granada, where they converted their wealth into money, and after their nuptials were solemnized, they chose for their future home a domain among these friendly people, who never ceased to bless the day when the youth Marcello first sought an asylum among them.

ASTONISHED!

A newspaper in one of the midland counties of Pennsylvania relates the following:

"A singular accident occurred on the Reading Railroad on Monday last. As the morning train was approaching Manayunk, the cylinder-head of the engine blew out, and with such tremendous violence, that, at the distance of forty yards, it struck a man who was walking between two others on the opposite track, carrying away the top of his head entirely, leaving his companion uninjured, but—considerably astonished."

"Considerably astonished!" We should think so.

A man—a friend—is walking by your side, along the public highway. You are talking as you jog along, when presently your friend has half of his head completely blown off by an explosion, and you are "considerably astonished!"

That is to say, the man was quite surprised! It seems to us that the use of this word, in this place, is almost as ridiculous as the Frenchman who said to an American friend, that he was "very much dissatisfied," having just heard of the death of his father!—Harper's Magazine.

KILL OR CURE.

When old Bogus's wife fell ill, he sent for a doctor as sordid and avaricious as himself. Before the doctor saw the patient, he wished to have an understanding with the miserly husband.

"Here's forty dollars," said Bogus, "and you shall have it whether you cure my wife or kill her."

The woman died, and the doctor called for the fee.

"Did you kill my wife?" asked Bogus.

"Certainly not!" replied the indignant doctor.

"Well, you didn't cure her?"

"You know she's dead."

"Very well, then, leave the house in double quick time," said Bogus. "A bargain's a bargain. It was kill or cure, and you did neither."
—Eccentric Anecdotes.

A WILL IN RHYME.—A Chancery Lane lawyer died lately in London, and the following was actually probated as his last will and testament:

"As to all my earthly goods, now and to be in store,
I give them to my beloved wife and sons forevermore;
I give all freely—I no limit fix;
This is my will, and she's executrix."

BASKET WILLOW.

There is no fear about finding a ready market for any quantity of willow. It can be used for such a great variety of purposes that there is no calculating the amount that will be used in this country when it can be obtained. It can be peeled by machinery, at a cost not exceeding ten dollars a ton, and the whole cost of raising and peeling a ton not exceeding twenty dollars; it will sell for one hundred and fifty dollars, and it will be a long time before the market can be supplied so as to reduce the price, and it will never be reduced so that it will not pay better, perhaps, than any other farm crop. The amount annually imported into this country from France and Germany is variously stated to be from five to six million dollars worth. At present New York monopolizes the whole willow trade; but they will find a ready market when offered in any city in the Union. In St. Louis and all the Western cities they are worth three cents per pound more than in the Eastern cities. Two or three tons may be considered a fair average yield per acre, in good situations and with proper cultivation. After the second year they will generally shade the ground, and so they require no cultivation. Willows can be cut any time after the leaves fall, before the buds begin to swell in the spring. The bark makes good mulching for fruit-trees. It contains a large amount of potash.—Tribune.

RAILWAYS IN INDIA.

The progress of railways in India exceeds all anticipation. The line of 1000 miles from Calcutta to Delhi, for which government gave the land, is advancing at each extremity. One hundred and twenty-five miles from Calcutta to Ranagungee are open; and another seventy-five miles, to Rajamahall, will soon be ready. The four hundred miles from Delhi to Allahabad are to be finished in 1857. To travel between those two cities at present takes four days and nights, and costs $125; but by rail it will be a journey of twenty-four hours, at a charge of $30. The whole line is to be completed in 1859.—Boston Journal.

GAS ENGINE.

Many attempts have been made to construct gunpowder and explosive gas engines, but Dr. Drake of Philadelphia, is the first inventor who has succeeded in harnessing this mighty agent, and making it subservient to driving machinery. In external appearance, Dr. D.'s machine resembles a horizontal engine. It has a piston and cylinder, but in its other parts a number of new devices are involved that are not required for steam. Motion is produced by exploding gas in the cylinder, first behind and then in front of the piston, just the same in effect as steam is employed.—Philadelphia Ledger.

The day is passed when science and learning were feared as contradicting the Bible; rightly used and applied, they verify every page. Progress and improvement are the business and duties of reasonable beings. We are not to live merely upon the past, upon other man's thoughts and opinions.

TO S. J. S.—

BY BLANCHÉ LEE.

Thou'rt far away!

Thy vessel ploughs the foaming main,
Where the billows heave and foam again,
Where the lightnings flash,
And thunders crash,
On the restless, ever moving sea;
Yet, dear one, I remember thee,
Far, far away.

I think of thee

When morn unbars the gates of day,
And evening shades fly swift away,
When the sun rides high
In the boundless sky,
And sinks from our gaze in the west;
When darkness falls,
Like a leaden pall,
O'er the earth, and the world is at rest;
Then, love, I think of thee.

And when amid the world's gay throng,
In halls of mirth and pride,
I cannot join in jest and song,
Thou art not by my side.
My heart is sad; I turn away
To shed a silent tear,
And weep in loneliness of heart,
Because thou art not here.

Then hasten from the dark blue sea,
Where the rolling waves are dashing free,
To thine own dear home,
No more to roam
From the friends who are waiting for thee.

Almighty Father! thou that calm'st
The angry wind and wave,
Protect the loved, the absent one,
From a cold, watery grave;
And, by thy everlasting hand,
O, bring him to his native land.

THE ROYAL BIRTH MARK.

On the banks of the sonorous river Tsampa, whose thundering cataracts refresh the burning soil, and sometimes shake the mighty mountains which divide Thibet from the empire of Mogul, there lived a wealthy and revered lama, whose lands were tributary to the Supreme Lama, or Secordotal Emperor, who governs all the land from China to the pathless desert of Cobi; but though his flocks and herds were scattered over a hundred hills, and the number of his slaves exceeded the breathings of man's life, yet was he chiefly known, throughout all the east, as the father of Serinda. It was the beauty, the virtue, the accomplishments of Serinda that gave him all his fame, and all his happiness; for Lama Zarin considered the advantages which birth, and wealth, and power, conferred, as trifling, when compared with that of being father to Serinda. All the anxiety he ever felt, proceeded from the thoughts relative to her welfare, when he could no longer guard the innocence of her, whom he expected soon to quit forever. A dreadful malady, which had long seized him at a stated hour each day, he found was gaining on him, and threatened, in spite of all the arts of medicine, to put a speedy period to his existence.

One day, after a fit which had attacked him with more violence than usual, he sent for the fair Serinda, and, gently beckoning her to approach his couch, he addressed her thus:

"Daughter of my hopes and fears! Heaven grant that thou mayest smile forever! Yet, while my soul confesses its delight in gazing on thee, attend to the foreboding melancholy dictates of a dying father's spirit; my Serinda, whose breath refreshes like the rose; and whose purity should, like the jessamine, diffuse voluptuous satisfaction on all around her, disturbs the peace of her dejected father, embittering all the comforts of his life, and making his approach to death more terrible!"

At these words, Serinda, unconscious of offence, and doubting what she heard, fell on her knees, and urged her father to explain his meaning; while he, gently raising her, proceeded thus:

"The angel of death who admonishes and warns the faithful in the hour of sickness, ere he strikes the fatal blow, has summoned me to join thy holy mother, who died when she gave birth to my Serinda; yet let me not depart to the unknown and fearful land of death, and leave my daughter unprotected. O, my Serinda, speak! hast thou ever seriously reflected on the danger to which thy orphan state must soon be subject; surrounded as thou then wilt be, with suitor lamas of various dispositions and pretensions! Some with mercenary cunning, wooing thy possessions through thy person; others, haughtily demanding both, and threatening a helpless heiress with their powerful love?"

He then reminded her that he had from time to time presented her with portraits of the several princes and lamas who had solicited a union with his house; and which they had sent, according to the custom of Thibet—where the sexes can never see each other, till they are married; he also repeated, that he had already himself given her in writing an epitome of their characters, their good and evil qualities, their ages, their possessions, and their rank in the priesthood of the lama; and concluded by saying: "Tell me, then, my Serinda, which of all these mighty princes can claim a preference in the soul of my beloved daughter?"

Serinda blushed and sighed, but answered not. Lama Zarin desired that she would withdraw, to consult the paper which he had given her; to compare it with the several portraits; and determine before his next day's fit returned, which might be most deserving of her love.

At the word love, Serinda blushed again, but knew not why. Her father saw the crimson on her cheek; but said it was the timid flushing of a virgin's modesty; and urged her to withdraw, and to be quick in her decision.

Serinda, with innocence, replied: "My father knows that he is himself the only man I ever saw, and, I think, the only being I can ever love; at least, my love will ever be confined to those objects which delight or benefit my father, whether they be man, or beasts! I love this favorite dog, which my father so frequently caresses; I loved the favorite horse on which my father rode till, by a fall he put his master's life in danger—then, I hated him. But, when the tiger had seized my father on the ground, and he was delivered by his trusty slave, I loved Tarempou; and, since my father daily acknowledges that he saved his life, I love Tarempou still."

The father heard her artless confession; and told her that Tarempou was no lama.

"But," said she, "which of all those lamas who now demand my love, has made an interest in my heart by services to my father, like the slave Tarempou? And yet I have not seen his person, or his picture; nor know I whether he is old or young; but he has saved my father's life, and is a favorite of my father; therefore, it is my duty surely to love, and I will love the good Tarempou."

The lama, smiling, gently rebuked his daughter for the freedom of her expression, and desired her to withdraw; after he had explained to her that love was impious, according to the law of Thibet, betwixt any of the race of lamas and their slaves. Serinda left her father; and, as she stroked his favorite dog, which lay at the door of his apartment, a tear trembled in her eye, lest she should be guilty of impiety.

And now the slave, Tarempou, who for his services had been advanced from chief of the shepherds to chief of the household, had an audience of his master; and, observing him unusually dejected, declared that he had himself acquired some knowledge of medicine, and humbly begged permission to try his skill where every other attempt had proved unsuccessful. The lama heard his proposal with a mixture of pleasure and contempt—or, as it is expressed in the original, "His eyes flashed joy, his brow looked forgiveness; but contempt and incredulity smiled on his lips, while his tongue answered the faithful Tarempou in gratitude and doubt."

The slave replied: "May Lama Zarin live forever! I boast no secret antidote; no mystic charm, to work a sudden miracle; but I have been taught, in Europe, the gradual effects of alterative medicines. It is from these, alone, that I expect to gain in time, by perseverance, a complete victory over the disease; and if, in seven days, the smallest change encourage me to persevere, I will then boldly look forward, and either die or conquer."

The prince assented; and from that day became the patient of Tarempou, whose situation, both as chief in the house, and as physician, gave him a right to be at all times in the lama's presence, save when Serinda paid her daily visit to her father, and then he had notice to withdraw.

The first week had not elapsed, before the lama was convinced that his disease gave way to the medicines of his favorite; the fits returned, indeed; but, every day, they attacked him with less violence, and were of shorter duration. In proportion as Tarempou became less necessary as a physician, his company became more desirable as a friend. He possessed a lively imagination, and had improved his natural good understanding by travel in distant countries; thus his conversation often turned on subjects which were quite new to the delighted lama. They talked of laws, religion, and customs of foreign kingdoms, comparing them with those of Thibet; and, by degrees, the slave became the friend, and almost equal, of his master. Among other topics of discourse, the lama would often tell of the virtues and endowments of his beloved daughter; while Tarempou listened with delight and felt an interest in the subject, which he was at a loss himself to comprehend. On the other hand, in the conversations of the lama with Serinda, he could talk of nothing but the skill and wisdom of Tarempou; wondering at such various knowledge in so young a man.

It happened, one day, when he had been repeating to his daughter the account Tarempou gave of European manners, that Serinda blushed and sighed; her father asked the cause, when she ingenuously confessed, that he had so often mentioned this young slave, that she could think of nothing else by day or night; and that, in her dreams, she saw him, and thought he was a lama worthy of her love. Then, turning to her father, with artless innocence, she said:

"O, lama, tell me! can my sleep be impious?"

Her father saw her with emotion; and told her that she must think of him no more.

"I will endeavor to obey," she said; "but I shall dream, and sleep will impiously restore my banished waking thoughts."

The lama, dreading the flame which he had himself kindled in his daughter's bosom, endeavored to check her rising passion: and resolved, henceforth, never again to tell her of the slave Tarempou. But it was now too late; love, of the purest kind, had taken full possession of the virgin's heart; and, while she struggled to obey her father, the fierce contention betwixt this unknown guest, and the dread of being impious, preyed upon her health, till feverish days, and sleepless nights, at length exposed her life to danger.

It was impossible for Lama Zarin to conceal from Tarempou—whom we will no longer call his slave, but his faithful friend—the sickness of Serinda; and while he confessed his alarm for his fair daughter's safety, he plainly saw that he had too often described that daughter to his favorite. He saw, what it was impossible for Tarempou to conceal, that he had been the fatal cause of mutual passion, to two lovers, who had never seen, and but for him, could never have essentially heard of each other. Thus situated—even if the laws of Thibet had permitted the visit of a male physician—prudence would have forbade his employing the only skill in which he now had confidence; but Serinda, whose disease was occasionally attended with delirium, would only call on the name of Tarempou; often repeating: "He saved my father, and it is he alone, who can save the lingering Serinda."

Overcome by the entreaties of his sorrowing daughter, the afflicted father, in an agony of grief, cursed the cruel laws of Thibet; and told her that she should see Tarempou. Serinda heard this with ecstasy; and, knowing that a lama's promises must ever be performed, the words became a balsam to the wounds of love; but the lama had not fixed the time when his sacred promise should be fulfilled; nor would he, until he had first withdrawn, and weighed the consequences of what had fallen from his lips. The oftener he revolved the subject in his thoughts the less appeared the difficulties; and having, by his conversations with Tarempou, raised his mind above the slavish prejudices and customs of his country, he at length resolved to overcome all scruples, and to give his beloved daughter to the only man whom he thought worthy of her.

Full of the idea of their future happiness, he determined to obtain all that remained necessary for its completion; which was the sanction of that higher power to which all the lamas of Thibet are subject. He instantly dispatched messengers to the great lama, who resides at Tonker; with whom his influence was so great, that he had no doubt that he should obtain whatever he might ask, though unprecedented in the laws of Thibet; laws which forbade the holy race of lamas to intermarry with any but of their own sacred order. And now, unable to suppress the joy which he felt in communicating to the lovers that plan of future bliss he had formed, he raised Tarempou to a pitch of hope, which neither his love, nor his ambition, had ever dared to cherish; and to Serinda he promised, that the sight of her physician, and her lover, should only be deferred one week, or till the messenger returned from the great lama at Tonker.

From this day the physician was no longer necessary; but the week appeared a tedious age to the expecting love of young Tarempou, and his promised bride, Serinda.

The seven days at length elapsed; when the messenger returned from Tonker, with the following answer:

"The most sacred sultan, the mighty sovereign lama, who enjoyeth life forever, and at whose nod a thousand princes perish or revive, sendeth to Lama Zarin, greeting. Report has long made known, at Tonker, the beauty of Serinda; and, by the messenger, we learn the matchless excellence of thy slave Tarempou. In answer, therefore, to thy request, that these may be united, mark the purpose of our sovereign will, which not to obey is death, throughout the realms of Thibet. The lovers shall not see each other, till they both stand before the sacred footsteps of our throne at Tonker; that we ourselves, in person, may witness the emotion of their amorous souls."

This answer, far from removing the suspense, created one a thousand times more terrible. The Lama Zarin thought it portended ruin to himself and family; he now reflected on the rash steps he had taken, and feared that his sanguine hopes had been deceived, by frequent conversations with a stranger, who had taught him to think lightly of the laws and customs of Thibet, for which he now recollected with horror, the great lama's bigotry and zeal. He knew that he must obey the summons, and trembled at his situation. Tarempou was too much enamored, to think of any danger which promised him a sight of his beloved mistress; and all the fear he felt was, lest the beauty of Serinda should tempt the supreme lama to seize her for himself. But she, in whose love-sick heart dwelt purest innocence—a fountain from whence sprung hope; which, branching in a thousand channels, diffused itself over all her soul, and gleamed in her countenance, half seen and half concealed, like the meandering veins that sweetly overspread her swelling bosom—revered the lama for his decree; and thought it proceeded from his desire of being witness to the mutual happiness of virtuous love. With these sentiments, she felt only joy at their departure, which took place that very day, with all the pomp and retinue of eastern splendor.

Here, in the original, follows a long detail of their journey; describing the number of their attendants, with the camels and elephants employed on the occasion. It relates that the lama would sometimes travel in the sumptuous palanquin of his daughter, and sometimes rode on the same elephant with Tarempou; dividing his time betwixt the conversation of each, but unable to suppress his apprehensions, or dissipate the fears of his foreboding mind. To compress the story within suitable limits, we shall immediately proceed to the tribunal, which was held in the great Hall of Silence, and leave the reader to imagine the magnificence, which there is not now room to describe at large. At the upper end of a superb apartment, sat, on a throne of massive gold, the supreme lama. Before him, at some distance, were two altars, smoking with fragrant incense; and, around him knelt a hundred lamas, in silent adoration—for, in Thibet, all men pay divine honor to the supreme lama, who is supposed to live forever, the same spirit passing from father to son! To this solemn tribunal, Lama Zarin was introduced by mutes, from an apartment nearly opposite to the throne; and knelt, in awful silence, betwixt the smoking altars. At the same time, from two doors facing each other, were ushered in Tarempou and Serinda; each covered with a thick veil, which was fastened to the summit of their turbans, and touched the ground; and each, accompanied by a mute, fell prostrate before the throne. A dreadful stillness now prevailed—all was mute as death—while doubt, suspense and horror chilled the bosoms of the expecting lovers. In this fearful interval of silence, the throbbing of Serinda's heart became distinctly audible, and pierced the soul of Tarempou. The father heard it, too; and a half-smothered sigh involuntarily stole from his bosom, which resounded through the echoing dome. At length, the solemn, deep-toned voice of the great lama uttered these words:

"Attend! and mark the will of him who speaks with the mouth of Heaven; arise, and hear! Know, that the promise of a lama is sacred as the words of Alla! therefore are ye brought hither, to behold each other; and in this august presence, by a solemn union, to receive the reward of love, which a fond father's praise has kindled in your souls; and which, he having promised, must be fulfilled. Prepare to remove the veils. Let Lama Zarin join your hands, and then embrace each other; but, on your lives, utter not a word; for know that, in the Hall of Silence, it is death for any tongue to sound, but that which speaks the voice of Heaven."

He ceased—and his words resounding from the lofty roof, gradually died on the ear, till the same dreadful stillness again prevailed through all the building—and now, at a signal given, the mutes removed the veils, at the same moment, and discovered the beauteous persons of Tarempou and Serinda. What language can describe the matchless grace of each! far less convey an adequate idea of that expression with which each beheld the other, in agonies of joy, suspense, and rapture! But they gazed in silence; till, by another signal from the throne, the father joined their hands; and then Tarempou, as commanded, embraced his lovely bride; while she, unable to support this trying moment, fainted in his arms.

And now, Tarempou, regardless of the prohibition, exclaimed—"Help! my Serinda dies."

Instantly, the voice from the throne returned this melancholy sound—"Tarempou dies!"

Immediately two mutes approached, with the fatal bow-string; and seizing Tarempou, fixed an instrument of silence on his lips, while other mutes hurried away Serinda, insensible of the danger of her lover.

But the father unable to restrain the anguish of his soul, cried out with bitterness—"If to speak be death, let me die also; but first, I will execrate the savage custom, and curse the laws that doom the innocent!"

He would have proceeded, but other mutes surrounded him, and stopped his speech, as they had done that of Tarempou.

Then the supreme lama again addressed them in these words—"Know, presumptuous and devoted wretches, that before ye broke that solemn law which enjoins silence in this sacred presence, ye were already doomed to death. Thou, Lama Zarin, for daring to degrade the holy priesthood of lamas, by marrying thy daughter to a slave—and thou, Tarempou, for presuming to ally thyself with one of that sacred race. The promise which this foolish lama made, was literally fulfilled; these daring rebels against the laws of Thibet have seen and been united to each other, and the embrace which was permitted, was doomed to be the last. Now therefore, mutes, perform your office on Tarempou first."

They accordingly bound the victim, who was already gagged, to one of the altars, and were fixing the cord about his neck—when they desisted on a sudden, and prostrating themselves before Tarempou, they performed the same obeisance, which is paid only to the heir of the sacred throne of Tonker! A general consternation seized all present! and the supreme lama, descending from his throne, approached Tarempou, on whose left shoulder, which had been uncovered by the executioners, he now perceived the mystic characters with which the sacred family of Thibet are always distinguished at their birth. He saw the well-known mark; the voice of nature confirmed this testimony of his sight; and falling on the neck of Tarempou, he exclaimed:

"It is my son! my long-lost son! Quickly restore his voice. Henceforth, this place shall be no longer called the Hall of Silence, but of Joy; for in this place, we will to-morrow celebrate the nuptials of Tarempou and Serinda!"

The history then explains this sudden event, by relating, that some Jesuit missionaries, who had gained access to the capital of Thibet, in their zeal for religion, had stolen the heir of the throne, then an infant, hoping to make use of him in the conversion of these people; but, in their retreat through the great desert of Cobi, they had been attacked by a bandit, who killed the Jesuits, and sold the young lama for a slave. He had served in the Ottoman army; he had been taken by the knights of Malta; and afterwards, became servant to a French officer, with whom he travelled through all Europe, and at length accompanied him to India; where, in an engagement with the Mahrattas, he had been again taken prisoner, and sold as a slave to some merchants of Thibet. By these means he came into the service of Lama Zarin, without knowing anything of his origin; or the meaning of those characters which he bore on his left shoulder, and which had effected this wonderful discovery.

The history concludes with saying, that Tarempou was wedded to the fair Serinda, and that their happiness was unexampled; that the lessons he had been taught in the school of adversity, and the observations which he had made in the various countries he had seen, prepared him to abolish the many foolish and impious customs of Thibet; and he caused to be written over the great throne of the great hall this inscription:

"Mark the cries of distress, and give relief—receive the blessings of the grateful, and rejoice in them—hearken to the words of age, experience and goodness, and obey them—stifle not the feelings of humanity, but encourage virtuous love: for the still small voice of innocence and nature is in every country, the true voice of Heaven!"

THE MOON.

"If the moon is made of green cheese," said a philosophical old lady once upon a time, in the town of Rye, on Long Island Sound, "then that settles the question about its being inhabited; 'cause everybody knows that cheese is inhabited!"

Good reasoning; but Lord Ross (whose famous telescope is one of the wonders of the world) don't seem to think so. He says, in a late communication to an English paper:

"Every object on the surface of the moon, of the height of one hundred feet, has been distinctly seen through my instrument; and I have no doubt that, under very favorable circumstances, it would be so with objects of sixty feet in height. On its surface are craters of extinct volcanoes, rocks, and masses of stone almost innumerable. I have no doubt whatever, that this building, or such an one as we are now in, if it were upon the surface of the moon, would be rendered distinctly visible by these instruments. But there are no signs of habitations such as ours; no vestiges of architectural remains to show that the moon is, or ever was, inhabited by a race of mortals similar to ourselves. It presents no appearance which would lead to the supposition that it contained anything like the green fields and lovely verdure of this beautiful world of ours.

"There is no water visible; not a sea, or a river, or even the measure of a reservoir for supplying a town or a factory. All is desolate!"

"Hence," says Dr. Scoresby, "would arise the reflection in the mind of the Christian philosopher, 'Why had this devastation been? Was it a lost world? Had it suffered for its transgression? Had it met the fate which Scripture foretold us was reserved our world? All, all is mysterious conjecture.'"—Knickerbocker.

REFRESHINGLY COOL.

A conductor on a New-England road was sent for by the president or superintendent of the road one day, and rather summarily informed that after that week the company would not require his services. He asked who was to be his successor, and the name was given him. He then asked why he was to be removed. After pressing the question some time, and failing to obtain a satisfactory explanation, a little light dawned upon him, and he addressed his superior officer nearly as follows: "You're about making a great mistake, sir, a great mistake. You know, sir, I have a nice house, a fast horse, a splendid gold watch, and an elegant diamond ring. That fellow you have chosen to take my place has got to get all these things." It is said the argument was conclusive, and the conductor was allowed to retain his position.—Franklin Express.

"How do you like the character of St. Paul?" asked a parson of his landlady one day, during a conversation about the old saints and the apostles. "Ah, he was a good, clever old soul, I know—for he once said, you know, that we must eat what is set before us, and ask no questions for conscience sake. I always thought I should like him for a boarder."—Post.

CELEBRATED CASES OF POISONING.

THE OLD SCHOOLHOUSE.

BY MRS. S. E. DAWES.

In a shady spot by the quiet roadside,
It stands in all its ancient pride,
Save that its olden coat of red
Is now with snowy white o'erspread.

How many forms, years long ago,
Have passed within its portals low,
And up the aisle with cautious feet,
Have safely climbed their lofty seat.

How many aching limbs and sore,
From thence have sought the distant floor,
And finding vain their efforts all,
Have sighed to be like giants tall.

How oft, perchance, some rogue so sly,
Unseen by teacher's watchful eye,
Has down the aisle, on mischief bent,
An apple or an orange sent.

Perhaps beneath the ancient seat,
The girls have dressed their dolls so neat,
Or held a whispered, social chat,
With schoolroom chums who next them sat.

And there enthroned in chair of state,
Behind the desk the master sat,
And while he thundered forth each rule,
Terror reigned in the village school.

From youthful sports and schoolday dreams
Those forms have passed to other scenes,
And other feet now tread the floor,
And play around the schoolhouse door.

CELEBRATED CASES OF POISONING.

BY FRANCIS A. DURIIVAGE.

Our press has briefly alluded to the case of William Palmer, the alleged poisoner and forger, which has caused an excitement all over England, and on the continent of Europe. The cases of which this man stands charged seem to carry us back to the days of the Borgias, in which poisoning was a crime as common as robbery now is. William Palmer is a surgeon by profession, and his house at Rugeley, Staffordshire, in the valley of the Trent, on the line of the North-western Railway, is described as a beautiful residence. Mrs. Palmer, his mother, is the widow of a wealthy dealer in wood. She had five sons and two daughters. Of the five, the first was a lawyer, the second a clergyman, the third a surgeon, the fourth a corn dealer, and the fifth a wood dealer, like his father. One of the daughters is still living; the other died at an early age, the victim of intemperance.

William Palmer, who is now about thirty-five years of age, always passed for a man of skill in his profession, a jovial, good-natured fellow, very fond of the turf, but rather lax in his morals. He married a daughter of Colonel Brooks, who is said to have been mysteriously assassinated. Palmer passed whole nights in his study, studying the properties of poisons—strychnine, prussic acid and morphine. He carried his passion for the science to such an extent that he gave the name of "Strychnine" to one of his favorite race-horses. He was very fond of horses. Brought up in a town which is famous for its annual horse-fair, and which is eminently popular with the heroes of the turf, he was accustomed to attend the races, to back the horses heavily, and to enter animals of his own. He spent the few thousand pounds his brother left him on his stables and the course. He bet very high and rarely won. As gambling debts are debts of honor, he was compelled to liquidate them, and often borrowed money at sixty per cent. At his wit's end for means, he had recourse to his mother-in-law. The latter was afraid of the man. She feared for the happiness of her daughter, and left Stafford to reside in Palmer's house, at Rugeley. Four days after she reached it, she died. Her fortune passed to her daughter, whose husband now found himself possessed of a considerable income; but on her death it was to go to her children. The Rugeley doctor was a cautious man, and accordingly set about effecting an insurance on the life of his dear Anne. Three companies agreed to pay, collectively, the sum of $65,000 on the day of her death. On the 24th of January, 1854, a child was born, which lived two days. The second day the father summoned Mr. Bamford, an old physician of eighty, who prescribed a potion. Palmer administered it, and one hour afterwards wrote in his memorandum book, "Baby died at 10 P. M."

Some months after this incident, a Mr. Bladen, the agent of a large brewery, to whom Palmer owed £400, borrowed on the turf, came to Rugeley to demand immediate payment. His friend—for Palmer only borrowed of his friend—invited him to pass the night at his house. During the night he fell sick. Old Dr. Bamford was called in, and administered a sedative potion. One hour afterwards Mr. Bladen no longer lived, and Mr. Palmer no longer owed two thousand dollars. In the month of September, 1854, Mrs. Palmer fell sick, was attended by Dr. Bamford, and died—the doctor signing in advance a certificate that she had died of cholera. A Dr. Knight and the old nurse afterwards signed the certificate. The insurance companies promptly paid the sixty-five thousand dollars. Palmer tried the insurance policy speculation again. He had a brother, Walter Palmer, who had already suffered from an attack of delirium tremens. But he found physicians to give him a certificate of good health, and by dint of all sorts of intrigues, he effected an insurance of $70,000 on his head. He now placed beside Walter a man who, day and night, ministered to his passion for liquor, giving him gin constantly. Returning drunk from the Wolverhampton races, August 14, 1855, Walter was urged to drink more by this servant, and died of congestion—Dr. Bamford certifying that he had died a natural death. The insurance company, however, refused payment, and suspicions of foul play attached to Palmer; but were not pressed.

Last autumn, Mr. John Parsons Cook, a young man of twenty-eight years, after being in Palmer's company at Rugeley, and drinking with him, was seized with convulsions. Palmer was called professionally, and administered a soothing draught. Dr. Bamford came in and prescribed two opium pills, which the patient refused to take. After which, another physician, Dr. Jones, a friend of Cook, arrived and remained with the patient. He gave him two ammonia pills, after taking which Cook expired in terrible convulsions. An inquest in the case could not be avoided. Dr. Bamford asserted that there was a cerebral congestion, but Dr. Taylor, a famous chemist, to whom Cook's father sent the stomach of the deceased for analysis, gave the following reply to the questions asked: "Death produced by tetanus—tetanus produced by strychnine."

The next morning Palmer was arrested, charged with voluntary homicide. But this was not all. Of the £700 Cook was known to have with him, only £15 could be found; and his betting-book, which he had placed on the marble mantelpiece was gone. Then it was shown that the first day of the deceased's illness, Palmer had run up to London to get some notes discounted, to which the signature of Cook had been forged. The chief of police now obtained permission of Sir G. Gray to exhume the bodies of Mrs. Palmer and of Walter Palmer. Dr. Taylor, after making his analysis, reported that while Mr. Cook had been poisoned by the aid of strychnine, Mrs. Palmer had succumbed to repeated doses of antimony, and Walter Palmer to the effects of prussic acid. He is now charged with having obtained by forgery sums amounting to £10,000 sterling. How indefatigable and marvellous must have been the activity of this man, if we suppose him guilty of the crimes laid to his account. An English journal remarks that he combines in himself the audacity of Napoleon, the memory of Wellington, and the strategic genius of the greatest of conquerors. The evidence at the inquest, for which we have no room, developed the most extraordinary ingenuity and fertility of resources on his part. Dr. Taylor says he occupied six months in poisoning his wife; he took a year in killing his brother with gin, in the meantime plying him with prussic acid—it is known that he purchased an ounce at Wolverhampton.

And what an accumulation of incidents in this dreadful history! Mr. Palmer, the father, amasses a colossal fortune, no one knows how, and dies of apoplexy. One of his daughters dies of drink; one of his sons dies poisoned by his own brother. Col. Brooks is killed, without his assassin being discovered; his companion dies, poisoned by her son-in-law; their daughter poisoned by her husband—four of her children descend prematurely into the grave. Five years ago this man poisons one of his friends—two months since he kills another. Are there not enough horrors heaped on the head of one man? Public opinion maintains that the plans crowned with such success in the cases of Bladen and Cook, were tried upon twenty other persons of note, belonging to London, Manchester, Newcastle, Cambridge and Nottingham. People even talk, in connection with Palmer, of the sudden death, two years ago, of Lord George Bentinck, son of the Duke of Portland, one of the most influential members of the conservative party in Parliament, and at the same time one of the most distinguished turf men in England. How much can be legally proved against Palmer remains to be seen. At the time of preparing this article for the press, we are without advices of the trial.

The crime of poisoning is by no means rare in Great Britain. A few years since the community was horrified by the discovery of frequent murders, committed for the most part by mothers on the persons of their own children, solely in order to obtain the miserable sums paid by the "burial clubs" for funeral expenses, when any of their members died. It had, indeed, horrible as the statement may appear, become a regular system—the lives of children were bartered for these burial fees with little more compunction than a grazier would exhibit in disposing of his flocks for the shambles. So frequent were these murders, that people began to look upon these burial clubs as positive incentives to infanticide, until, by the strong force of popular opinion, the societies were for the most part done away with.

The crime of poisoning, according to Voltaire, first became known in France during the age of Louis XIV. This cowardly vengeance had previously only been resorted to amidst the horrors of civil war. This crime, by a fatal singularity, infected France during the period of glory and pleasure which refined her manners, as it glided into ancient Rome during the brightest days of the republic.

Two Italians, one of them named Exili, had for a long time been laboring with a German apothecary, named Glaser, to discover what was called the "Philosopher's Stone." The two Italians lost the little they had in this business, and sought to repair the consequences of their folly by crime. They sold poisons secretly. By means of the confessional, the grand penitencier of Paris learned that some persons had died of poison, and gave information to the government. The two Italians were suspected and thrown into prison, where one of them died. Exili remained there without being convicted; and from the depths of the prison circulated through Paris those fatal secrets that cost the lives of the civil lieutenant D'Aubrai and his family, and which gave rise to the erection of the tribunal of poisons called "The Burning Chamber."

St. Croix, a captain in the regiment of the Marquis of Brinville, had excited the jealousy of the latter by his attentions to the marchioness, and was sent to the Bastille. He was lodged in the same room with Exili, who taught him how to avenge himself. He was soon liberated; but his associate, the marchioness, refused to attempt the life of her husband. She, however, poisoned his father, his two brothers, and his sister. It must be observed here that the marchioness enjoyed a high reputation for piety and charity, and the poor were her devoted friends. No suspicion attached to her in consequence of the numerous deaths in her family. But they were talked of in all the saloons of Paris, and caused the greatest anxiety to St. Croix. Still he pursued his chemical experiments in an obscure part of the city, away from his proper place of residence. Although his manipulations in regard to the preparation of subtle poisons were conducted with all possible secrecy, a just retribution was at no great distance. Already, he was so ill, though ignorant of the cause, that unable at length to quit his dwelling-house, he had got a furnace brought to him, that he might still continue his experiments. He was at that time engaged in researches into the nature of a poison so subtle, that its mere emanation was fatal. It was amidst these fearful occupations, at the moment when bending over the furnace, watching, no doubt, the deadly operation approach its greatest intensity, that the glass mask worn by him as a protection against its fumes, went to pieces, and the agent or accomplice of so many murders, by means of his fell knowledge and preparations, was struck down as by a thunderbolt. His wife—for the villain was a married man—surprised that he remained so unusually long in his laboratory, went thither, and found him lying extended and quite lifeless near to the furnace, the fragments of the glass mask round him. It was impossible for her to conceal the circumstances of his death. The servants had seen the body and could reveal the facts. The proper functionary was therefore required to put everything under seal, thus insuring a proper scrutiny into the affairs and conduct of the deceased.

As soon as the Marchioness de Brinville heard of the death of her associate, with its attendant circumstances, she took refuge in a convent at Liege. Lauchausse, St. Croix's servant, and the agent of the guilty pair in their poisonings, was arrested, "struck in the boots," as Macaulay says of that mode of torture, made a full confession, implicating his deceased master and the marchioness, and was broken alive on the wheel. Desgrais, one of the most active of the Paris police, succeeded in winning the confidence of the marchioness at Liege, under the guise of a gallant abbe, and prevailed on her to leave the convent and the city with him. She was brought to Paris under arrest, her captor having foiled all her attempts at self-destruction. Among her papers was found a full confession of her crimes. Yet she behaved with great firmness on her trial, denying everything, and treating the witnesses against her with haughty contempt. She was put to the rack, and then conducted in penitential garments, and holding a taper, first to the church of Notre Dame, and then to the Place de Greve, the spot appointed for the execution. She was beheaded, and her head and trunk afterwards burned to ashes in presence of the assembled populace.

"On the morrow," says Madame de Sevigne, "the bones of the marchioness were sought for, as the people believed she was a saint."

By the execution of this French Medea, the practice of poisoning was not suppressed; many persons died from time to time under very suspicious circumstances; and the archbishop was informed, from different parishes, that this crime was still confessed, and that traces of it were remarked both in high and in low families. For watching, searching after, and punishing poisoners, a particular court, called the Chambre de poison, or Chambre Ardente, was at length established in 1679. This court, besides other persons, detected two women, named La Vigoureux and La Voisin, who carried on a great traffic in poisons. Both of them pretended to tell future events, to call up ghosts, and to teach the art of finding hidden treasures, and of recovering lost or stolen goods. They also distributed philtres, and sold secret poison to such persons as they knew they could depend upon, and who wished to employ them either to get rid of bad husbands, or recover lost lovers. Female curiosity induced several ladies of the first rank, and even some belonging to the court, to visit these women, particularly La Voisin; and who, without thinking of poison, only wished to know how soon a husband, a lover, or the king would die. In the possession of La Voisin was found a list of all those who had become dupes to her imposture. They were arrested and carried before the above-mentioned court, which, without following the usual course of justice, detected secret crimes by means of spies, instituted private trials, and began to imitate the proceedings of the Holy Inquisition. In this list were found the distinguished names of the Countess de Soissons, her sister the Duchess de Bouillon, and Marshal de Luxembourg. The first fled to Flanders, to avoid the severity and disgrace of imprisonment; the second saved herself by the help of her friends; and the last, after he had been some months in the Bastile, and had undergone a strict examination, by which he almost lost his reputation, was set at liberty as innocent. Thus did the cruel Louvois, the War Minister, and the Marchioness de Montespan, ruin those who opposed their measures. La Vigoureux and La Voisin were burned alive, on the twenty-second of February, 1680, after their hands had been bored through with a red-hot iron, and cut off. Several persons of ordinary rank were punished by the common hangman; those of higher rank, after they had been declared by this tribunal not guilty, were set at liberty; and in 1680 an end was put to the Chambre Ardente, which in reality was a political inquisition.

The case of Palmer has revived the story of Thomas Griffin Wainwright, who, under the nom de plume of "James Weathercock," wrote for the London Magazine when Lamb, Proctor, Hazlitt and Allan Cunningham were among its contributors. He was an epicurean, very fond of self-indulgence, a good-natured egotist, had a good deal of literary talent, and was quite an artist. Lamb called him, "kind, light-hearted James Weathercock."

In 1829, Wainwright went with his wife to visit his uncle, by whose bounty he had been educated, and from whom he had expectancies. His uncle died after a brief illness, and Wainwright inherited his property. Nor was he long in expending it. A further supply was needed; and Helen Frances Phoebe Abercrombie, with her sister Madeline, step sisters to his wife, came to reside with Wainwright; it being soon after this that Wainwright effected insurances on Helen's life at various offices, amounting in all to £18,000. By a forgery of the names of the trustees of his wife's property, he obtained the principal, which was invested in the Bank of England, and soon squandered it. Miss Abercrombie died suddenly, and he then claimed his £18,000 from the various offices. The "Imperial" resisted payment on the ground of deception, but their counsel insinuated a charge of murder against Wainwright. Wainwright lost his case, and in the interim had been compelled to fly to France on account of the discovery of his forgery on the Bank of England. At Boulogne, he insured the life of an English officer, with whom he lived, for £5000. One premium only was paid, the officer dying in a few months after the insurance was effected. Wainwright then left Boulogne, passed through France under a feigned name, was apprehended by the French police, and that fearful poison known as strychnine being found in his possession, he was confined at Paris for six months.

After his release, he ventured to London, intending to remain only forty-eight hours. In a hotel near Covent Garden, he drew down the blind and fancied himself safe. But for one fatal moment he forgot his habitual craft. A noise in the street startled him; incautiously he went to the window and drew back the blind. At the very moment, a person passing by caught a glimpse of his countenance, and exclaimed: "That's Wainwright, the Bank Forger." He was soon apprehended, and his position became fearful enough.

The difficulty which then arose was, whether the insurance offices should prosecute him for attempted fraud, whether the yet more terrible charge in connection with Helen Abercrombie should be opened, or whether advantage should be taken of his forgery on the bank, to procure his expatriation for life. A consultation was held by those interested, the Home Secretary was apprised of the question, the opinions of the law officers of the crown were taken, and the result was that, under the circumstances, it would be advisable to try him for the forgery only. This plan was carried out, the capital punishment was foregone, and when found guilty he was condemned to transportation for life.

The career of Wainwright has its moral. Selfish indulgence hurried him into crime—crime brought punishment in its train. He died in a hospital at Sydney under circumstances too painful to be detailed. It is painful to dwell on these fearful records of great crimes. Truly "the way of the transgressor is hard."

SALE OF A WIFE.

A short while ago, Mr. Robert Rhodes was united in the bonds of matrimony with a Miss Eastham, of Longbridge, but the marriage was unfortunate. Both parties very soon forgot their vows to "love and cherish," for shortly after, they relinquished the fascination of each others' charms and separated. Since this event, they have both lived in private lodgings. To bring the marriage knot to a solution, the husband recently led his wife through the streets of the village by a halter, offering her for sale, when, being viewed by one and examined by another, she was ultimately, after a little higgling, knocked down for 20s. The purchaser was a Mr. George Banks, who quietly but gallantly seized the halter and led her away.—Preston (Eng.) Chronicle.

THE ANT THAT FIGHTS ITSELF.

The insects, as I have often said, are countless; swarm everywhere, and over everything. Their tenacity of life is most amazing. I have told you of the manner in which one half of a bull-dog ant fights the other if cut in two. I saw an instance of it just now. Our giant cut one in two that was annoying him. The head immediately seized the body with its mandible, and the body began stinging away manfully at the head. The fight went on for half an hour without any diminished sign of life; and this is what they always do. Instead of dying as they ought to do, they set and fight away for hours, if some of the other ants do not come and carry them away; whether to eat them or bury them we know not.—Howitt's Australia.

A TITLE.

A certain widow O'Keefe, who flourished in the city of Cork, and who did a little banking business, on her own account, cashing bills for gentlemen in distress, made her appearance at Bath in the height of the season.

"She must be a lady of quality," said one gentleman.

"A marchioness," said another.

"A duchess," said a third.

"By the powers! You're all wrong," said an Irish officer. "I know the lady well—she's not even a countess!"

"What then?" was the simultaneous question.

"Why, gentlemen, the fact is, she is a dis-countess."—Eccentric Anecdotes.

BRITTANY.

Of all the provinces of France, Brittany is the richest in religious sentiment. The country where are found the most extensive and magnificent relics of Druidism, now reposes most calmly beneath the shadow of the cross. Christianity seems to have pursued her triumphs into the last strongholds of that gigantic idolatry which once exercised so marvellous an influence over the human mind. Churches rise side by side with Druidical temples, and many of the stupendous ruins are connected by exulting tradition with the victories of Christian faith. One of these old legends, still repeated by the peasantry, declares that the "stories of Carnac" owe their origin to a heathen army, which chased St. Cornelius into the valley because he had renounced paganism. Being close pressed and surrounded on all sides, he had recourse to prayer, whereupon the whole host were petrified in their lines as they stood; and thus the stories of Carnac were formed.

Throughout Brittany, the fields, the causeways, the roads and the mountains, are dotted with churches, chapels, crosses, images, expiatory monuments and consecrated chaplets. The sanguinary agents of the revolution had difficult work to accomplish in this sturdy province. The Britons clung to their religion until the guillotine was wearied of its victims. The Republican committees pronounced the penalty of death in vain against the minister who should perform any of the functions of the church. "I will pull down your belfries," exclaimed the famous Jean-Bon-Saint-Andre to the mayor of a village, "in order that you may have no more objects to recall to you the superstitions of past times." "You must leave us the stars, and we can see them farther off," was the memorable reply of the enlightened peasant.—Portfolio.

A GREAT STORY.

The following "thrilling story," although not of the highest order of merit in a literary point of view, may serve as an amusing theme for lovers of "puzzles" to exercise their ingenuity:

We once saw a young man gazing at the *ry heavens, with a † in 1 ☞ and a ~ of pistols in the other. We endeavored to attract his attention by ling 2 a ¶ in a paper we held in our ☞, relating to a young man in that ‡ of country who had left home in a state of derangement. He dropped the † and pistols from his ☞ ☞ with the † "It is I of whom U read. I had left home b4 my friends knew my design. I had s0 the ☞ of a girl who had refused 2 lis10 to me but smiled upon another. I —ed madly from the house, uttering a wild † to the god of love, and without replying to the ? ? ? of my friends, came here with th s † & ~ of pistols to put a . to my Xistence. My case has no || in this ‡." —Philadelphia Ledger.

A writer in a late English paper, speaking of the culinary nicety of the French, relieves himself of the following:

"Full many a fruit of purest juice serene,
The dark unfathom'd woods of Galia bear;
Full many a mushroom springs to rot unseen,
And waste its ketchup on the desert air."

THE RIPPLING SEA.

BY CARLO CARRINGTON.

Ghiding o'er the rippling sea,
Come sail, my love, with me;
Why must I roam and leave thee here,
While I am on the sea,
While I am on the sea—
To tarry still O do not seek,
But come with me at morning break.

A joy thou hast not tasted yet,
Is travelling on the sea;
The pleasure that I find in it
I wish to share with thee,
I wish to share with thee—
Then do not stay to mourn the time,
But come with me to another clime.

Thou wilt not fear the danger, love,
Whilst I am near to thee;
The arm that round thee now is thrown,
Shall thy protection be,
Shall thy protection be—
Then say thou'lt come and make the sea
Thine only home while 'tis for me.

I would not tempt thee to forsake
Thine home to come with me,
Were I not sure that I could make Thee happier o'er the sea,
Far happier o'er the sea—
In place of friends that thou wilt leave,
I'm then thine own—how canst thou grieve?

Hurrah! we're on the bright blue sea,
My bark, my love, and me;
Our sails are trim—we skim with ease
Across the rippling sea,
Across the rippling sea—
Away we speed to spend the time
Of sweetest love in a foreign clime.

OUR OWN FAULTS NEVER VISIBLE.

Of all this common failing of our nature the heathen were very sensible, and represented by saying that every man carries a wallet, or two bags, with him, the one hanging before him, the other behind him—into that before he puts the faults of others, into that behind him that of his own—by which means he never sees his own failings, whilst he has those of others always before his eyes. But self-knowledge helps to turn this wallet, and place that which has our own faults before our eyes, and that which has those of others, behind our back.

A very necessary regulation, this, if we would behold our own faults in the same light in which others do; for we must not expect that others will be as blind to our foibles as we ourselves are; they will carry them before their eyes whether we do or not. And to imagine that the world takes no notice of them because we do not, is just as wise as to fancy that others do not see us, because our eyes are shut.—Mason's Self-Knowledge.

Whoever makes the fewest persons uneasy, is the best bred in the company.

HANNIBAL AS A GENERAL.

Hannibal in his 28th year was nearly of the same age at which Napoleon Bonaparte led the army of the French Republic into Italy. Bred in the camp, he possessed every quality necessary to gain the confidence of his men. His personal strength and activity were such that he could handle their arms, and perform their exercises on foot or horseback more skilfully than themselves. His endurance of heat and cold, of fatigue and hunger, excelled that of the hardest soldier in the camp. He never required others to do what he could not and would not do himself. To these bodily powers he added an address as winning as that of Hasdrubal, his brother-in-law, and had talents for command fully as great as those of his father, Hamilcar. His frank manners and genial temper endeared him to the soldiery; his strong will swayed them like one man. The different nations who made up his motley army—Africans and Spaniards, Gauls and Italians—looked upon him each as their own chief. Polybius twice remarks that, amid the hardships that his mixed army underwent for sixteen years in a foreign land, there never was a mutiny in his camp. This admirable versatility of the man was seconded by all the qualities required to make the general. His quick perception and great sagacity led him to marvellously correct judgment of future events and distant countries—which, in those days, when travellers were few and countries unknown, must have been a task of extraordinary difficulty. He formed his plans after patient inquiry, and kept them profoundly secret till it was necessary to make them known. But with this caution in designing was united marvellous promptness in execution. "He was never deceived himself," says Polybius, "but never failed to take advantage of the errors of his opponent." Nor was he a mere soldier. In leisure hours he delighted to converse with learned Greeks on topics of intellectual interest.—The Court and Camp.

PHILOSOPHY.

What oddities men are, to worry because they are not so well off as "that fellow across the street!" The richest man in town will be as forgotten in fifty years as the mason who built the Pyramids. In 1843, we attended the funeral of a millionaire. We visited his grave recently, and saw four bob-tailed pigs rooting the soil from his grave. And this was the end of influence—a neglected grave, with four stub-tailed pigs rooting up the soil. "So passes the glory of the world!" —Life Illustrated.

GOLD WATCH CASES.

The Philadelphia Ledger, in speaking of the manufacture of watch cases, which is carried on extensively in that city, says there are eleven firms engaged in the business, all of whom employ over 300 hands, and turn out at least 500 cases per week, at a cost of some $20,000, or more than $1,000,000 annually. The gold manufactured into cases weekly will not amount to much less than $14,000, or over a half million of dollars annually.

TWILIGHT MUSINGS.

BY GERTY.

Silently the twilight shadows
 Gather o'er earth's quiet breast,
 And the gorgeous hues are fading
 Slowly from the glowing west;
 In the azure vault of heaven
 Myriad stars are gleaming forth,
 And the night is closing sadder,
 Deeper, o'er the snow-robed earth.

But the night is not eternal,
 And its hours will pass away,
 And again earth's busy millions
 Will hail the cheerful day;
 But with my spirit dwelleth
 Deeper gloom than night can shed,
 There a darkness reigneth ever,
 Sadder than by nature spread.

There were hopes which lit my pathway,
 Bright unto my spirit's view
 As the clouds around the sunset,
 But like them they faded too.
 There were friends who clustered round me
 When my sun was shining bright,
 Now, alas, I seek them vainly,
 In the gloom of sorrow's night.

Though to me no morrow cometh,
 Save the morning which shall dawn
 When the night of life is over,
 And its fears and darkness done;
 Yet in hope of that bright morning,
 Heavenward still I lift my eyes,
 For I know the sun is shining
 Evermore beyond the skies.

THE MAN OF THE WILLOWS.

BY ANNE T. WILBUR.

"THE mad-woman! the mad-woman!" exclaimed the children of St. Florentin, half laughing, half trembling, at sight of a poor girl wrapped in a blue shawl, her head covered with red rags, marching like the heroine of a tragedy on the road to The Willows.

The children laughed much at her singular dress. But the vagueness of her look, and the sadness of her countenance, extremely pale, caused them an indefinable terror.

The poor girl marched with measured step, seeing and hearing nothing. She passed the mill situated at the foot of the little town. The mill was turning, the miller singing; she heard neither the mill nor the miller. Very soon she passed the numerous poplars along the road, and traversed the meadows, among the elms which were rustling in the breath of evening.

"Poor girl!" murmured an old woodcutter, who was slowly regaining his dwelling; "there she is, taking, as usual, the path to The Willows.

May God have pity on her soul! Run in, children!" And one saw only, through the dark and gnarled trees, a silent shadow becoming by degrees effaced, dying in the distance, then disappearing.

In those days, a poor woman lived in a faubourg of St. Florentin. Left a widow with two daughters, she managed to provide for the wants of her little family. The widow Gremi was a washerwoman.

These two daughters were named—the one Mariette, the other Rosette. Mariette was the youngest of the two sisters. She was a simple creature, thinking only of keeping the house in order, and of lightening, as much as possible, the difficult task of her mother. She was, one of those who are born and die in the shade, after having fulfilled their duties without ostentation; not thinking they have merited anybody's esteem for having remained prudent and good. But whether she wished it or not, Mariette was beloved, praised, admired by the whole neighborhood. Mariette was a genuine wild-flower. Although she was only eighteen, she did not suspect that there could exist any other sky than that which, overcast or sunny, hung over the cottage of the widow Gremi.

Rosette was not less beloved; nevertheless, the neighbors could not help noticing her want of taste for rustic labors, her aversion for monotonous household cares. Her poor mother had never been able to prevail upon her even to drive the cow to pasture. To put a little wood under the kettle when the humble food of the family was cooking, was for this child quite an effort. Rosette passed long hours in watching the ladies as they promenaded in the avenues of the chateau. It was then that her mob-cap seemed to oppress her forehead like an evil thought. She would begin to weep, and crouch before the fire, dreaming of a thousand foolish things.

One day, Jean Louis, a stout youth of the village, her betrothed, an industrious laborer and a pleasant fellow, by whom more than one maiden in the place would have been proud to have been led to church, said to her:

"We have no ambition, we wish above all to love our wife, and we think a little property on our side, if not a sufficient evidence that we love her, if we offer it heartily, at least proves that we do not mean she shall take up her abode with poverty, pouting and quarrelsomeness. You see why, Rosette, we are proud of having a little property under the sun."

Rosette blushed.

"It is true," said she, "you remind me, in fact, that I do not possess a single inch of ground."

Jean would have taken her hand; Rosette withdrew it.

"You slight me!" resumed Jean, a little disconcerted, not comprehending how a word from the heart could disturb the susceptibilities of the mind. "We did not think that the sincere word of an honest youth could cause you vexation. You are too proud, Rosette. That does not become us poor folks; it should be left to those who have nothing better to do. And besides, every one knows that your pretty walnut sabots may walk without disgrace in the same path with my iron-heeled shoes."

Rosette made an effort to conceal her pretty walnut sabots.

"Certainly your striped blue woolen petticoat is as good as my coarse gray frock," continued Jean.

Rosette fell back in her chair like lightning, and as if overwhelmed by the striped blue woolen petticoat.

"And if anything should blush, it is our coarse hempen cap, when we meet you at the market with your pretty white cap, so coquettish, so nicely plaited," added he, again.

Rosette felt a thunderbolt fall on her cap, so coquettish, so nicely plaited. She cast down her head.

"We are not as rich as the Marquis of Carabas," continued Jean; "nevertheless, when we commence housekeeping, we will raise our little dwelling one story, add to it a wing, and surround it with a pretty whitewashed fence, with a gate of red bricks. At this very moment, two beautiful hens are setting to prepare for us a nice poultry-yard. Chickens and ducklings await your appearance, to break their shells and flutter before their gentle mistress. Carillon, my beautiful white cow, has a pretty calf. The harvest will fill the barn, and the vintage the wine-press. To-morrow let us kneel together, to ask the blessing of the curate; you will be, we hope, the happiest of wives, and we the most favored of husbands."

"We have time," replied Rosette, with a pouting air; "what hurries us?"

All Jean's vexation betrayed itself at these words.

"That is a wicked answer, miss; you do not reply thus, doubtless, to the gentleman who passes and re-passes the door of your house every evening," added the poor boy, bitterly.

In fact, a man of singular physiognomy, wearing a grotesque costume, his head covered with a cap surmounted by a floating plume, theatrically enveloped in a long mantle, passed and re-passed the house of Rosette every evening, and went away only when he had perceived the young girl and been seen by her.

Rosette became as red as a cherry.

"Monsieur Jean," cried the young girl, sharply, "it seems to me your tools are rusting in the court."

"So I will rejoin them," replied Jean, with a heavy heart.

As he went out, a merry voice exclaimed: "Rosette! Rosette, come and help me." It was the voice of Mariette returning from the stream with a heavy load of linen on her back. Jean helped Mariette to lay aside her burden.

"Here is a brave girl!" exclaimed he; then he went away.

"Thanks, Monsieur Jean," replied Mariette, "not for the compliment, but for the service."

Jean disappeared without replying. Mariette busied herself in spreading out her linen on the hedge in the garden.

Rosette began to devour the pages of a bad book, lent her recently by a discreditable woman in the neighborhood. All the pride of the world was presented there under the most alluring, the most perfidious colors. The Bible was forsaken in the dust, on the old mantel-piece of the chimney. The bad book never left her. On this day, the extravagances with which she fed her imagination had raised such a degree of excitement, that it was impossible for madness itself to surpass it.

Mariette entered, still damp from the water of the stream. Rosette hastily concealed her book. Her eyes were full of tears.

"What is the matter, my good sister?" said Mariette to her, throwing an armful of vine-branches in the fire, to dry her garments.

"Nothing," replied Rose, who was embarrassed by the question.

"You are weeping then for pleasure, good sister?" said the little washerwoman, smiling playfully; and the little Mariette began to prattle without her sister's listening to her:

"The day has been pleasant; the birds were never gayer, the trees were never greener, the water never softer; our luncheon on the grass, on the banks of the stream, in the shade of the tall lindens, would have given us much pleasure, if the sun had not darted its rays so brightly upon us; never was the beetle lighter in our hands; fatigue was, as it were, asleep in the reeds. So, good sister, your cap is white as the flower of the hawthorn; your apron, red as a poppy; your dress, clear as a field-flower."

Night fell; the precipitate roll of an equipage was heard returning to the chateau ; it was a caleche ; it stopped. Some ladies descended from it ; Rosette saw them and sighed ; Mariette uttered a cry and almost fainted ; her eyes had met the eyes of The Man of The Willows. The ladies buried themselves beneath the shady avenues of the chateau ; the man disappeared. Mother Gremi entered the cottage ; Rosette wiped away her tears, Mariette forgot her terror. Rosette began to smile ; Mariette thought she had dreamed, so dreamed that she did not perceive that Rosette concealed in her bosom a billet which The Man of The Willows had deposited mysteriously on the little window opening on the garden.

"Let us sup, children," said the widow Gremi ; and they supped.

The village was profoundly asleep, when, at the first strokes of midnight, the door of the house of the widow Gremi opened and turned discreetly on its hinges. A person, pale and trembling, issued from it hastily, holding her sabots in her hand, scarcely daring to touch the ground with her foot. The door closed as it had opened. Meanwhile the widow Gremi, who was not asleep, thought she heard an unusual movement in the house. She rose, then lighted the lamp.

Let us follow Rose, for it was she who was directing her steps rapidly towards the valley of The Willows. The mysterious billet had produced its effect. This step of Rose was the reply.

"Thou shalt be queen if thou wilt, young girl. To-morrow, thy beauty shall eclipse that of the ladies of the chateau. I can lay at thy feet the attire of an empress, all the pleasures of the world, all the power of kings ; thou shalt be beloved, admired, obeyed. Come to us, as we come to thee. At midnight ; to-morrow will be too late. At the valley of The Willows.

"Signed, THE MAN OF THE WILLOWS."

Rosette had resolution. She quitted without regret the paternal roof, arrived without terror at the spot designated. The infernal billet, in passing over her breast, seemed to have withered her heart. As she arrived, some one said, with a diabolical smile :

"It is here."

She stopped. It was the voice of The Man of The Willows.

"Enter," said he, "through the cavernous trunk of this old tree ; it is the baronial door of our castles," added he, with an imperceptible mocking tone.

Rosette entered without replying. He followed her. The old willow trembled from roots to branches, and Rosette found herself transported into an enchanted place, dazling with lights, assure and gold.

"Here are your apartments, beautiful Rose," said the mysterious man tranquilly, as he led her by the hand.

Then transpired one of those scenes of sorcery worthy of the enchanter Merlin. The pretty walnut sabots, so much admired by poor Jean, were changed into pretty boots of white satin, with red heels, and laced with a silver ribbon. Her petticoat of striped blue wool was transformed into a silk dress of such dazling whiteness, such a perfect cut, such a rare fit, that it seemed woven, cut, adjusted by the hand of a little fairy. Nothing can express the art which had presided over her coiffure ; a gold comb, sparkling with jewels, glistened like a flame in her black, glossy and abundant tresses ; a necklace of the brightest coral surrounded her snowy neck, like a circlet of fire ; on her fingers, diamonds of inestimable value gleamed like live sparks ; bracelets of massive gold, surmounted by the richest topazes, adorned her arms.

A mirror stood opposite Rosette. When she saw herself in it, she thought she should die of joy.

"Rose," then said the mysterious man to her, "you must know that I possess a power unknown to men, which power makes me richer than mines of silver and gold. Science has no secrets for me."

"Yes, sir," replied Rosette, who could not tire of admiring herself.

He conducted her by the hand into vast gardens, full of the rarest flowers, planted with the choicest fruits of earth ; thousands of birds of the most varied plumage, from distant climes, were flying about and singing. The light in this garden was strange ; it was like a day without sun, like a sun without heat. Rosette nevertheless experienced a secret terror. As she passed beneath a flowery eglantine, The Man of the Willows shook this tree, and roses detached themselves from it in abundance and fastened themselves to the white robe of Rosette. And, again, advancing beneath an immense hedge, The Man of The Willows shook the dew from it ; thousands of pearls were scattered among the tresses of the young girl, on her pretty boots, in the roses which set off the brilliancy of her dress ; then, a little mist suddenly arose, hovered above Rosette, enveloped her, descended upon her shoulders. The mysterious man stretched out his hand, and this mist became a long mantle of azure ; then, raising his eyes to heaven, a thousand stars dropped among the folds of this imperial mantle. They passed into the court; coursers were impatiently pawing the ground, harnessed to an equipage of sombre green; a richly liveried coachman held the reins. At the approach of the mysterious man, two lacqueys came to open the caleche. The Man of The Willows and Rosette hastily entered; the two lacqueys silently took their places behind. The equipage started at a full gallop.

"Where are we going?" said Rosette to The Man of The Willows.

"To Paris!" replied the latter; and the carriage went on, on like lightning.

As Rosette passed by the house of her mother, which she left an hour before, she heard a loud sigh, something like a death-rattle, then sobs. The widow Gremi was expiring; Mariette was weeping. The horses started back; the coachman whipped them; they sprang forward again, fire flashing beneath their feet.

"How beautiful you are thus!" then said to her The Man of The Willows.

Rosette forgot the sighs and sobs of the cottage to smile at this compliment. Nevertheless she could not help saying:

"What are those sighs? Whence come those sobs?"

The man replied:

"It is the wind whistling among the trees by the roadside."

Behold her at Paris, enjoying the world and its pleasures, always under the guidance of the strange man who had carried her off from the poor village. A secret torment began to devour the heart of Rose; ennui seized her. There is a voice which we silence with difficulty, which we can never wholly silence; it is the voice of conscience. It began to trouble the heart of Rosette. A violent desire seized her to throw herself at her mother's feet. Her heart, enervated by pleasures, was incapable of executing such a resolution; she was ignorant of the death of the widow Gremi. The poor woman having risen, as we have said, having lighted her lamp, had perceived the flight of Rosette. The billet, found on the floor, at the threshold of the door, had explained all. She expired just as her daughter was passing by the door; the sobs which Rosette heard were those of her good sister Mariette, who did not know what was to become of her. Jean Louis had hastened to them. The brave youth, on seeing the desolation of the poor cottage, was desolate himself; and, as Mother Gremi looked anxiously at her faithful and gentle Mariette, the honest boy said:

"Mother, fear nothing for her; our head was turned yesterday, but our heart tells us to-day that it is Mariette whom we ought to marry."

The good woman could only press the hand of Mariette and that of the good Jean Louis within her dying hands; the widow Gremi expired like a Christian, without cursing, but asking God to pardon her unhappy daughter.

After the mourning was over, Jean Louis espoused Mariette, who had always cherished a secret affection for him. On her death-bed, the widow Gremi had said to Mariette:

"Mariette, take this ring which was given me by your father; it is blessed, my child; seek to find your sister; she is the eldest; give it to her."

The poor woman labored under the idea that her daughter Rosette was the victim of a spell. She had faith that this ring would release her and restore her to repose. Mariette promised to comply with her wishes.

By chance, Mariette discovered the dwelling of Rosette. She set out for Paris; Jean accompanied her. She arrived at the house of Rosette; but each time she presented herself, received only evasive replies:

"Madame is not up;" "madame is at her toilette;" "madame is bathing;" "madame is breakfasting;" "madame is visiting;" "madame has company and cannot receive calls;" "madame is at a party;" "madame is at the opera."

Mariette related all this to Jean Louis, who did not fail to confirm the opinion of the widow Gremi.

"Our poor sister Rosette is certainly the sport of some sorcerer," said he.

It was the season of carnival. One evening, when a crowd of people disguised and masked were surrounding the hotel of Rosette, Mariette resolved, by aid of the confusion, to penetrate there. In order to do this, she put on her prettiest peasant's costume: beaver shoes with silver buckles; a round cap, flowered handkerchief, figured dress; a golden heart and cross on her breast. Mariette entered suddenly. All eyes were turned upon her.

"There is a pretty costume," said the domino. "The little one is very well disguised. What freshness! what whiteness! a genuine wild-flower!"

Mariette did not stop to hear all these compliments; she sought her sister amid the crowd which encumbered the apartments; she found her in the dancing-hall, surrounded like a queen. Her heart beat. She soon entered. This strange man was about to essay the last act of the temptation which was to overcome the soul of Rosette. False priests were awaiting her decision to give her their benediction. On this day, Rosette would certainly have yielded. No one could surpass her in beauty, in decoration, in power. Pride seemed to have vanquished all her repugnance. Mariette appeared. Rosette saw her, and uttered a cry which was heard through the house. The two sisters fell, weeping, into each other's arms.

"And my mother!" exclaimed Rosette; "my mother?" repeated she.

"Dead!" replied Mariette, wishing to give a deep wound to this almost insensible heart.

Rosette cast down her head. Here The Man of The Willows, suspecting some conjuration against his power, made a sign. The orchestra gave forth strange sounds; a diabolical choir howled fearfully. They could hear each other no more. Mariette then drew from her finger her mother's ring, and presented it to her sister. Rosette took it.

"It is our poor mother's ring," said Mariette to her.

Rosette, bursting into tears, raised it to her lips. The infernal orchestra and choir were silent, and behold her pretty satin boots became pretty walnut sabots; her silk dress, a striped blue woollen petticoat; her gold comb, a white and nicely plaited cap; the azure mantle dissolved into mist; the pearls became dew-drops; the roses fell withered at her feet; the lights were extinguished one by one; and the dancers seemed to be shadows passing through each other, effacing and re-appearing like beings of phosphorus. A cry of despair was then heard, and all was extinct. It was The Man of The Willows lamenting the loss of his prey. This fascinating demon, whose name is Pride, was vanquished; the blessed ring had triumphed. Mariette carried her sister back to the village. Jean took her in his willow carriage. From that day, poor Rosette did not cease to go from the cottage to the valley of The Willows, to seek what she had left there—repose. It was in vain; she never found it again. This is the reason why she wandered about silently, why she was indifferent to all around. She was now only a kind of phantom among the living. It seemed as if she sought, despairingly, the innocence of her early days.

One summer night, a shepherd of the place saw Rosette enter mysteriously the village cemetery, then advance, kneel and pray at the foot of a wooden cross planted on a tomb still new. The old shepherd approached; then he heard heart-rending sighs, bitter words. Rosette wept; her long and black hair was dishevelled and hang down over her shoulders; her aspect was so mournful, that the old shepherd dared not disturb the prayer of the poor girl. By degrees the voice of Rosette became extinct; the unhappy child sank down and lay extended on the funeral turf. Very soon the shepherd heard and saw no more; but raising his eyes, watching a moonbeam obstructed by the clouds, he saw something like two shadows closely embracing—a poor woman, a kind mother, who, all in tears, was bearing away in her arms a sad and pale child, invoking God and looking upward to the sky. It was the soul of the widow Gremi; it was the soul of the unfortunate Rosette.

And as the young men and young girls interrogated the good curate concerning the story of the old shepherd, saying to him: "What, then, has wrought this miraculous reconciliation?" the good pastor replied to them:

"It is, my children, filial repentance and maternal love!"

CAUSE OF THE COLD.

In a communication to the Scientific American, Mr. T. Barrows, of Dedham, Mass., alluding to the intense cold of the past winter, states that he never saw the sky so brilliant and clear by day and night before. He attributes the cause of the cold to the hundreds of thousands tons of powder which have been burned at Sebastopol, and other places, having put into circulation large quantities of nitrous gas. "If saltpetre and sal ammoniac," he says, "be put into a given quantity of water at fifty degrees Fahr., it will reduce its temperature fifty degrees." He therefore concludes that the gases of the exploded gunpowder named have exerted a great cooling influence upon the atmosphere, both in Europe and America. On account of the pure cold air this winter, he is of opinion that cholera, yellow fever, and the potato rot will not be so prevalent during the present, as in former years.

A CUSTOM WORTH IMITATING.

It is a custom among certain tribes in Siberia, that, when a woman is married, she must prepare the wedding dinner with her own hands. To this feast all the relatives and friends, both of her own family and that of the groom, are invited. If the viands are well-cooked, her credit as a good housewife is established. But if the dishes are badly prepared, she is disgraced in that capacity forever. The result is, that a Siberian wife is generally a good housekeeper, whatever else she may be, and thus is competent, beyond her sex generally, for the practical duties of life. Girls, bear that in mind!—Russian Life.

No evil is wholly evil. Behind the blackest cloud the sun shines, or the stars. All our trials and sorrows have elements of good in them; hopeful features, which smile upon us in gentle reproof of our unbelief and discouragement.

HOME BY THE SEA.

BY MARY W. CUTLER.

Where the sunlight danceth o'er the crested wave,
And the murmuring of the billows lave,
Where are rocks half-hidden 'neath a sea of foam,
And the wild bird fleeth—there I'd have my home.

There, when twilight shadeth in a summer eve,
Oft I love to wander, and bright fancies weave,
Listening to the chiming of the sea and shore—
There I love to linger when the day is o'er.

When the moonlight resteth with its silver light
On the ocean's bosom, in a summer's night,
Then the sparkling moon-rays, lovely to behold,
Cast a spell around me with entrancing fold.

When the sunbeams sparkle o'er the glassy deep,
And the wintry storm winds 'neath the wavelets sleep,
Azure skies above us, whence the zephyrs come,
On the shore I linger—there I'd have my home.

A NIGHT AMONG WOLVES.

BY E. S. MIDGLEY.

POOR JEAN BRAGG was a Texan ranger known to almost every fighting Mexican or Indian over the whole borders of Texas. But at last he is missing, and none know where his bones lie, or of his fate, save that he must have met it on the prairies or in the forest he once loved so well.

Speaking of wolves reminds me of one of Jean's bold and perilous adventures, which even he could scarcely refrain from shuddering at, as, seated round the camp fires, he whiled away the time by repeating it. He had just eluded the vigilance of a band of hostile savages, when he came upon the track of one of those terrible prairie-fires, which devastate the country for hundreds of miles at a time. Before him, as far as the eye could reach, there was only one charred, levelled, smouldering waste, that had to be crossed before he could reach water for which both himself and his wearied horse were now almost perishing. To return in his track, were death, for the yelling redskins were scarcely out of sight; and feeling sure, from the actions of his companion, that escape was impossible in that direction, as the animal was already run down, he determined that the safest course for him would be to cross the still smouldering track of the destroying element, whose glare and smoke could be seen towards the west. But water, water he must have, or they would both die. He urged on his wretched steed with the last energies of his sinking life.

In an hour he had begun to grow dizzy, and the blackened earth swam round and round, and tossed him to and fro! Now strange noises were around him, and in the wavy moments of consciousness, he could catch glimpses of huge wolves careering about him, who would turn up their fiery eyes to his, and howl at him with red-hot, open mouths, and boiling tongues.

Suddenly his horse rushes down a steep bank, and there was a great splashing. Water! O, how thankful! water! He tumbled from his saddle into the cold, delicious fluid, and the bath at once restored his consciousness, and he saw himself surrounded by thirty or forty prairie wolves, some of whom were swimming in the water after him, while the others sat upon the bank of the small lake he now discovered it to be, and howled fiercely at him.

He struck those which were the nearest with his gun-barrel and beat them off, while he had time to draw his hunting-knife. One of them had seized his passive horse (who stood and drank) and endeavored to pull him down; his head was split by the heavy knife. But those on the bank only howled the louder, and they were answered by hundreds of others, who were swiftly gathering at the well known call to banquet; for these wearied and infernal brutes always collect to follow the course of a prairie-fire, and tear the carcasses of those animals that are killed, or to chase and drag down those that, scorched, blind and staggering, are yet alive. The creatures at other times are utterly contemptible for their cowardice, but Jean shuddered when he called to mind their deadly fierceness at such times as these.

The horse, also, now refreshed, gazed round with staring eye-balls upon the crowds that lined the shores. He snorted in affright, and lifted his head with a mournful neigh that seemed the most piteous sound poor Jean had ever heard. He mounted, and after firing his rifle with deliberate aim into the thickest of them, charged through at full speed. They leaped at his feet and attempted to seize his horse's legs; but through them he trampled, and across the prairie flies snorting with terror, and moving with as great speed as if fresh and strong. And away, too, in pursuit, swept the crowd of wolves, now numbering over a hundred; and as Jean glanced his eyes around, they seemed close to his heels. The greater part, particularly those that seemed the most fierce and ravenous, were scorched nearly naked. With the white foam flying from their long red tongues, and their fiery, glaring eyes, they presented the most unearthly terror that ever mortal lived to be chased by.

The appalling conviction that if his horse should fail or give out, they would both be torn in fragments in an instant, caused him to give all his attention to guiding his steed, for the only hope now lay in him. He soon found that he was gaining, for there is little comparison between the speed of a horse and that of a prairie-wolf, and hope began to rise in his bosom as he sees timber ahead, and he shouted in an ecstasy of joy, for he, at least, can be safe. His horse sees and is inspired too, but they have scarcely reached the timber, when the poor animal gives out, and after a few ineffectual efforts, can only lean against the trunk of a tree and groan with exhaustion. He is tied to one of the lower limbs, while his master ascends the tree and loads his arms in the vain hope of defending him. He ascends higher to look out for the approachers, in the vain hope that they have given up the chase; but there they come, and several large white wolves have joined them now, and his heart sinks as he knows the tameless ferocity of those red-eyed monsters, and feels that his true, his noble horse must die. The poor steed shivers, as he hears their cry, and utters that wailing neigh, as they rush upon him in a body. In a twinkling he's down and torn to atoms. Jean fires upon them; of what avail is it? and the empty halter hangs useless beside the tree.

Now they lie panting around, with their fiery eyes turned up wistfully at him. Whenever he makes a movement, they rise, and leap with eager yells towards him, as if to meet his face. In this dreadfully hopeless position, a grotesque sort of humor suddenly possessed him, and he commenced deliberately firing at the glaring eyeballs of the white wolves, and fairly danced with glee when he saw them tumble over with the shrill death-cry, then the whole pack rush on and tear them into shreds in an instant. In this way, every white wolf that had joined the chase was slain. This sport delighted him so much, that he became careless and commenced falling, and only saved himself by dropping his gun, which they seized and almost tore its stock to pieces before they discovered it was not eatable.

Darkness was coming on, and they seemed not in the least disposed to go; and he felt that he must tumble from the faintness of hunger and fatigue, if he was compelled to stay another hour in that tree without food.

It is a peculiarity worthy of remark that these pieces of timber, or islands, as they appear on the smooth face of the undulating prairies, are nearly always of one sort of tree, and it is very rare to meet with one where there are two sorts. Like the beasts of the forest that herd together according to their kind, so does this wild vegetation preserve itself distinct in its several species. One island will be composed of live oaks, another of plum, and a third of pecan trees; the vine only is common to them all, and embraces them all alike with its tenacious but slender branches. They are generally perfectly free from bushes and carpeted with the most beautiful verdure. In this instance, the huge volumes of smoke and flame that had passed so near and only suffered the island to escape from the dampness and luxuriance of the foliage, and from its being situated on the summit of a high knoll, had withered the leaves and crested all with the same sable pall of the smoking prairies around.

In the moments of almost despair, prompted by the pangs of hunger, he began chewing the bitter and smoky bark of the tree on which he had taken refuge, when suddenly he observed that those surrounding him were loaded with plums now just ripe, and the thought that if he could only pass to the next tree, he might be safe, flashed through his mind.

The distance was scarcely ten feet, and yet to reach it, he must dare the ferocity of the yelling pack below, who, with fiery eyes and ivory teeth laid bare, waited anxiously to tear him in pieces. But Jean was one to whom all expedients were common. He saw to descend were death, and his only safety was in bridging the intervening space; and he immediately commenced cutting off with his stout hunting-knife the top of the tree above him, after first carefully trimming it of all branches.

If he can only succeed in guiding the fall of the pole thus produced, so that one end may lodge firmly on the nearest tree, and thus form a bridge on which to cross, he may yet be saved; and the hope of life grows strong within him. Cut through at length, he sees it tremble—he exerts his feeble strength—it cracks—it slowly moves! O, if it falls, there's no more hope for Jean! It falls, goes crashing through the withered leaves and smoky branches, and catches—moves again—but finally becomes firmly fixed in the opposite tree, while the end just severed (and which he had taken the precaution to firmly fasten with his hunting-belt) is safely secured, and a bridge is formed, on which to cross would require a strong man's arms; but still the weak tired and suffering hunter must dare or die. He seizes the frail support with both his hands and commences passing himself across, while his dangling feet, scarcely a man's height from the ground, seem the mark for an hundred fiends to precipitate themselves against. But their haste is his safety; and in their eagerness and thirst for blood, they hinder each other, and battling, they roll and rage in madness at their failure.

At this moment, as if to seal his fate, the treacherous branch to which he clung with convulsive grasp, began to crack and bend. At such a time, fear in a brave strong man might be excused, and hope grow dim. But for poor Jean there seemed no hope. Even his broad Panama, as if forsaking its master, and influenced by the evening breeze, fell off and was borne away. As his eye glanced after it, his brain grew dizzy, and murmuring a prayer for mercy from Heaven, the faithless tree-top broke and he fell to the ground.

Man's life hangs on a single hair, and oft the destiny of nations turns upon the smallest point, and it was thus with Jean Bragg; and to the simplest accident he owed his life. When his hat blew off, the crowd of wolves pursued, and he had gained the foot of the long-coveted tree before they, apprized by the loud crash of his fall, came rushing on. And need was there of haste, for scarcely had he gained the lowest branches before the merciless leaders of the hideous throng dashed at him, but missing their way so narrowly, that they carried away in their ugly and frightful jaws part of the hunter's clothes. But trembling and breathless, he felt that at least he was safe, and hastened at once to assuage those keen demands of appetite that had so nearly cost him his life; and the small sour fruit, smoked and sodden, seemed to his parched and fevered taste the most delicate of dainties.

Somewhat refreshed and at length satiated, Jean observed for the first time that the sun was just sinking behind clouds of smoke that hovered over the flames now hidden by distance, like the vulture over the track of war and desolation, and the question at once arose in his mind, how was he to pass the night? He knew that if he slept, it was but to fall into the ravenous jaws of demons whose eyeballs he could see glaring around him like globules of fire, shining through the rapidly increasing darkness, and who, with parched lips and snapping teeth, kept watch around. Securely buckling himself to the tree with his belt, he resolved to keep watch, if possible, through the live-long hours of darkness in silence, in hope that, wearied out and despairing of obtaining the morsel so longed for, they would leave him. This very silence induced sleep, and after vainly resisting the overpowering inclination, his eyes imperceptibly closed and he slept.

How long he remained unconscious, he knew not; but visions wild and fanciful chased in dreadful dreams repose away. The scenes of the day came before him, and the horrid acts seemed acted over again. It seemed to his disordered fancy that a colossal phantom blacker than the darkest night encircled him with its huge sable arm; and the poor hunter shrieked piercingly in the midst of his slumber, for it seemed as if the cold and slimy contact of a tremendous snake were coming upon him, and he writhed and struggled with horrible convulsions in the imaginary grasp of the sable being. And then it appeared as if he were suddenly carried away with appalling rapidity through an atmosphere as black as pitch, and dense as if it were one vast mass of soot. His tongue seemed paralyzed, so that he could not give vent to the scream which he wished to send forth as an expression of his agony, when he became aware that the shape of the colossal being was growing every instant more and more terrible. The legs and feet became elongated in the form of a tremendous serpent—the vast mass of moving, loathsome, undulating blackness stretching away to an incalculable distance, till at length it became lost in the soot-like gloom; while its head seemed turned to a multitude of wolves' heads, with gaping mouths and long red tongues, nodding and winking with those fiery eyes, that seemed to burn into his very soul and scorch his very blood with terror.

But suddenly the demon stops, and his sable arms placed the dreamer upon the summit of a pillar shooting up from some unfathomable abyss, and shrieking aloud in tones so like the last loud plaintive neigh of his faithful steed, mixed with the yells of grinning fiends innumerable, that the sounds rang in the hunter's ears for years. The demon relinquished his hold upon his trembling prey, who instantly fell, screaming and shrieking horribly, through the air.

But just as it appeared to the wretched Jean that he was about to be plunged headlong into the bottomless pit, he awoke with so convulsive a start, that the vast tree-trunk shook and quivered as he clung to it in an agony of terror. Then he hung motionless—utterly motionless—for a few moments, striving to collect his scattered thoughts and deface the conviction that it was all a dream.

But such a dream—the deathbed knows no anguish, and the churchyard has seen no mental misery, more poignant than he had passed through in this phantasy. Still upon his haggard brow stood the big drops of terror, and still was the sense of an awful consternation upon his brain and heart.

At length, when assured that there was nothing of reality in all that he had gone through, he raised himself only to see the glaring, horrid eyes of the wolves fixed upon him. And there he clung, silent and sleepless, until the rising sun cast its bright, glorious, warming rays over the desolate and charred prairies. They glanced on him, warming his stiffened limbs and kindling within his despairing heart fresh hopes of life, and longings to escape the fate which half an hour before he had almost wished to dare, as a panacea for all his pains. He watched it as it climbed slowly up the vast blue arch until overhead it marked with shortening shadows the hour of noon, and hope again began to wane, as slowly it passed on its way to the golden gates of the west; and the conviction forced itself upon his mind that at last he must surely perish before another sun arose. He had become entirely reckless now, and loaded his pistols, determined, if he must fall, to bring death with him for some more of his ferocious persecutors.

Suddenly he heard a distant yelling on the prairie like that which had sounded so dreadfully behind his flight. The wolves sprang to their feet and with pricked ears, listened. He looked towards the prairie, and could faintly discover a large buffalo bull plunging along over the plain, surrounded by a great herd of wolves, who were tearing him at every jump. He could even hear the low bellowing of the creature's agony—another victim!—and his thirsty guardians started to join the chase. One after one they went, while those who staid behind would turn their heads to look wistfully back at him and whine and lick their dry chops.

When the chase came in sight, off they started in a body with savage yells. He knew he should be safe now if he could get a fire kindled before they returned, if they did so at all. Before they were out of sight, he had reached the ground, and with trembling eagerness proceeded to light a fire with the help of the tinder-box which every ranger carries. He soon had a great blazing fire, and then curtailing a piece from the last wolf killed—for when they started off, he had fired his pistols after them, killing one and breaking the shoulder of another, who kept on yelling with the pack—he proceeded to roast it for food. Having eaten, he felt so much refreshed that he could now proceed to make provision for the night's rest. He gathered a great heap of wood and built a large blazing circle about the spot selected to sleep upon. The wolves came back in about an hour after he had made his arrangements for the night; but he now felt perfectly secure, for though he could see their hungry eyes shining all around, and they kept up a continual howling all night long, he laid himself down and slept soundly until morning, and when he awoke the wolves were all gone but one or two cranching at the bones of yesterday's feast. He shot one of them and made a breakfast off of it. On picking up his gun, he found that although much torn and gnawed, it could still be used. He now took his course and started towards the settlements, which after a long tramp he reached safely.

PETRIFIED CITY.

The enterprising traveller, Mr. Ritchie, who proceeded, some years since, with an expedition from Tripoli, for the purpose of exploring the interior of Africa, wrote as follows:—"As one of my friends desired me to give him, in writing, an account of what I knew, touching the petrified city, situated seventeen days' journey from Tripoli, by a caravan, to the southeast, and two days' journey south from Ongnala, I told him what I had heard from different persons, and particularly from the mouth of one man of credit, who had been on the spot; that is to say, that it was a spacious city, of a round form, having great and small trees therein, furnished with shops with a large castle magnificently built. That he has seen there several sorts of tree, the most part olive and palms, all of stone, and of a blue, or rather lead color. That he saw also figures of men, in postures of exercising their different employments; some holding in their hands staffs, others bread; every one doing something; even women suckling their children, all of stone. That he went into the castle by three different gates, though there were many more; that there were guards at the gates, with pikes and javelins in their hands. In short that he saw in this wonderful city, many sorts of animals, as camels, horses, asses, and sheep, and various birds, all of stone, and of the color above-mentioned."

PLAYING WILLIAM TELL.

In Pittstown, Rensselaer County, N. Y., Horace H. Wadsworth, with his rifle at arm's length at twenty paces, shot a potato from the head of a young man named Crogan. The potato was cut in two, and by the force of the ball a wale as big as a man's finger was raised on Crogan's head, and the poor fellow thought his skull was split, though no blood was drawn nor any real harm done. The truth is, a party in the tavern, somewhat elevated, had been discussing the story of William Tell, and that led to the perilous trial. Crogan says it was the first and last time that he will ever stand as a live illustration of Swiss patriotism.—Boston Transcript.

SHARP WORK.—Professor Gould, in a recent lecture on astronomy, at New Orleans, said, when the great book of Copernicus was being published in 1543, the populace were so exasperated against his new doctrine that they threatened to destroy the printing-office, and "printers set it up with a composing stick in one hand and a gun in the other." They must have had smart compositors in those days. Of course they must have set type with their teeth, both hands being occupied.

FAREWELL TO THEE, ERIN.

BY WINNY WOODBINE.

Farewell to thee, Erin, thou home of my childhood;
I've wandered afar 'neath the shade of thy wild-wood,
I have roamed through thy valleys, thy mountains roved o'er,
And now I am leaving thy dearly loved shore.

How oft by the streamlet I've wandered at even,
To gaze on the glory that shone from the heaven—
Till my heart, in its loving, deemed the stars ne'er could be
As bright elsewhere as in Erin, the gem of the sea.

The memories of home softly round me are stealing,
And moving the waters of love and deep feeling;
And I sigh for the oot, by the wide spreading wild-wood,
And the maiden who shared all my griefs in my childhood.

But fate hath ordained that far away I must roam,
To fight in the behalf of my country and home;
To battle for freedom; our fair Ireland to save
From the grasp of the tyrant—or else find a grave.

Far, far o'er the ocean our vessel is flying, [ing;
While the wind through the white sails in sorrow is sigh-
And echoes back sadly to our passionate grieving,
A dirge for the homes and the land we are leaving.

Then fare thee well, Erin, I know not if e'er
I shall view thy fair plains and thy cottages dear;
Should I fall in the strife, then my last words shall be
The name of my Alline, and a farewell to thee.

ONE OF A THOUSAND.

BY HOWARD STANHOPE.

"I say, she's one of a thousand, my mother.
Such wit, such loveliness, such vivacity."

"Ah, my son, I fear you have in this instance been led away by outside show. Did I not know Ellen Varney well, I would not say one word against your proposal; but I do know her well.
She is not the girl to make you a good wife.
And were she even an excellent girl—which she could not be under the circumstances I am about to state—you would do wrong in a measure to take her for a wife. You know Lucius Warren has waited upon her nearly two years; and she has always given him encouragement until she found you. You are no better than he, but he has no money, and you have. Your few thousand dollars have attracted her. It is no noble quality she has detected in you, take my word for it."

"You mistake her, mother. She does love me, well—and for myself, too; for she has told me so in language not to be mistaken. I tell you she is one of a thousand."

"But I know her, my son, and I cannot see you take an unworthy partner to your bosom without using all my efforts to save you. Ah, you do not yet know how much of your future welfare depends upon the wife you shall choose.

Look upon the home you would have when your poor old mother is gone,"

"Speak not so, my mother. I cannot bear to hear you."

"But, my son, I cannot always remain with you. You know that. You have been my only care for years. I have loved you well, and I know that you have loved me in return, so all my cares have been joys, and all my labors for you only so many sources of blessedness. But the time must come when you will have no mother;
and then who shall take that mother's place?
When you are worn and weary with the business of the day, who shall give you peace and comfort? Remember, my boy, what you will want for a home. It is not a beautiful face, nor is it wit and vivacity—though these are worthy qualities in a woman who is worthy of them.
Think calmly of Ellen Varney, and see if you can find—I mean not to praise myself, but yet I will ask it—can you find the signs of your mother's home qualities in her?"

"But, mother, you—you are prejudiced. You do not like Ellen. You have seen some little thing which you did not like, and hence you fancy she is not the girl I think she is."

"I have seen some things in her which I did not like, Vulcain. I will tell you one, if you will listen."

"Tell me."

"Then, only last week I was at her mother's.
While I was there, a poor blind man came to the door and asked for food. He was cold and hungry, and his limbs were weak and tremulous.
The servant-girl had gone out, and there was no fire in the kitchen. The only fire in the house, was in their little, back sitting-room. Ellen, at first objected to admitting the old man to the house, though she thought he might have some food out of doors. But her mother saw my look, and she admitted him. I proposed having him come into the sitting-room where he could warm himself, but Ellen came nigh going into paroxysms at the bare idea. She said she could not remain in the room with such a 'horrid creature!' And so the poor, shivering old man was forced to sit down in the cold kitchen and eat. The door was left ajar at the suggestion of Ellen, who feared that the 'old wretch,' as she termed him, might steal something. In a few moments the old man's dog came into the sitting-room, and crawling up to where Ellen sat, he wagged his tail and whined imploringly. He either wanted food or drink. She started up and gave him a kick that sent him crying away to his master. The noble brute had led his poor blind owner over the earth when all other friends had forsaken him. And this was the treatment the noble animal received at Ellen Varney's hands. I was sick at heart when I came away; but I came not until I had bade the old man follow me. That was the man who remained here two nights, and in whose conversation we found so much pleasure and profit."

"But Ellen—a—has very sensitive feelings, I know. Her nerves are not strong," returned the son, somewhat perplexed.

"And is such the woman for the wife of one who wants love and care through all the dark hours of a lifetime? Suppose you were sometime to be struck blind?"

"O, mother, you wrong Ellen, now. Whom she loved she would protect and care for."

"I don't know, my son. I fear, were you to become maimed in body, now, she would leave you at once."

"There, now I know you are prejudiced, or you would not have spoken those words. I know you do not understand Ellen."

"I will say no more, Vulcain. I have only spoken for your good, for I fear you do not fully realize the vast importance of the choice you are to make for a wife. You know what HOME is; and remember that all of your future home on earth will depend upon the character of the wife. One word more, my son: Poor Julia Lawrence loves you truly and well. You should not have turned from her."

"But I never, never, gave Julia any hopes of being my wife. If she loves me, how can I help it? She is not the girl that Ellen is. I tell you, Ellen is one of a thousand. She loves me, and I love her."

"Very well, my child; I only hope that ere your fate is irrevocably fixed, you may know exactly how much Ellen Varney loves you."

After this the son went to attend to important business, and the mother was left alone.

Vulcain St. Egbert was twenty-two years of age, and was just upon the point of going into business. His father had come over from France, at the accession of Louis XVIII. He had loved Napoleon, and when the mighty hero was banished to Elba, the elder St. Egbert came to America, and here his only child was born. When the father died, he left his widow, in keeping for his son, ten thousand dollars, also leaving the same amount for her use and comfort. Vulcain was then only ten years of age, and since then, his mother had kept him at school at her own expense, being resolved that when he came of age he should have his patrimony untouched for such business as he might select to prosecute.

And now Vulcain was going into business. Under the careful superintendence of his mother, the ten thousand dollars had more than doubled, and he was now able to buy out one of the most extensive business places in the town. An old man had grown gray, and accumulated a fortune, in his store, and he now sold out to Vulcain St. Egbert. But none in the town, save the youth and his mother, and the old merchant and his attorney, knew the extent of Vulcain's wealth. Those who knew him, knew that he had considerable, but they knew not how much.

Not far from where Vulcain lived, resided a poor widow who had an only child—a Mrs. Lawrence, who supported herself by hard labor, though of late years her child had been of much assistance to her. Julia Lawrence was nineteen, and though not so fair and beautiful as some, yet she was a lovely and loving girl. She possessed a noble look—a soft, winning nobleness—and it required acquaintance to develop all her beauty. She had been a schoolmate and playmate of Vulcain, and she loved him for his noble qualities of heart and soul. And once Vulcain had loved her; but as he came nigh to his commencement of business, and it became known that he had considerable money, people began to court his favors. Among this class were Mrs. Varney and her daughter Ellen. The latter had a quick, flashing wit, the transitory brightness of which hid its shallowness. And she had some outward beauty, too. Her mother had commenced the onset—for it had been calmly planned that the young man should be caught and secured. She commenced the work by very adroitly leading Vulcain's mind astray. To this end she brought the whole force of her social powers to bear, and gradually she made him feel that by associating with poor people, he was losing his influence in society. This point was not presented bare and unrelieved, for had it been, Vulcain's soul would have scorned the idea; but the way was curiously paved for it, and it came upon him unawares. He was caught and ensnared, and Ellen's influence she thought complete. Vulcain knew not how Julia Lawrence wept all alone in her chamber, for he knew not how truly she had loved him. Ah, he knew not his own heart. It was in a state of fusion, caught and bound by elements not congenial with his nature, and living upon the ideal alone.

It was on the first of January when Vulcain concluded the bargain with Mr. Forbes, the man of whom he was to buy. He paid down seventeen thousand dollars in cash, and the store with all its contents was his. That evening he came home and held a long consultation with his mother, upon a simple subject that he had held in contemplation for some time; and in the end, she agreed with his opinion.

"And now," said the mother, after this matter was disposed of, "I suppose in the coming spring you mean to take a wife."

"I think of it," replied Vulcain."

"And are you still determined to make Ellen Varney your partner?"

"Of course."

"I wish you could know her better, my son."

"I know her well enough. I have made myself acquainted with her character, and I like it. And then her station in society is good."

"Ah, Vulcain, there is the rock upon which your bark may founder. Station in society is of much importance, I will admit, but stand up now, like a man as you are—stand up before me—look me in the eye—and then tell me if you want a wife to give you station in society! You want an honest, noble-hearted, pure-souled wife, and then, be she plebeian or patrician, her station will be with your own. You forget your own honor when you allow such a thought to enter your mind. You are what the world calls handsome—your features are noble, your hair is dark, glossy, and curling, and hence has Ellen——"

"Stop, my mother; you do not surely know Ellen Varney. I tell you she is one of a thousand."

"No, Vulcain, it is you who know her not. You have only seen her when she was prepared for your reception. I have been intimate in the family, and I know all her domestic qualities. O, my son, not for worlds would I thus speak of Ellen Varney, were it not that your whole future of earthly happiness is dependent upon your choice here. But we will say no more about it now. Seal not your vows with her until you have studied her character more carefully."

"Vulcain was perplexed, but he knew that his mother meant only for his good, and he was not offended. On the next morning he started for the city, where he was going to purchase goods, and Mr. Forbes accompanied him, partly to settle up his own affairs, and partly to introduce his youthful successor to the merchants of the metropolis. He was to be gone a week. On the fourth day of his absence, his mother received a letter from him, in which he stated that he had not quite money enough with him to do as he wished to do, and asking her to send him five hundred dollars. She did so, at once, and wrote a fond letter in reply.

That evening Mrs. St. Egbert called in upon Mrs. Varney. She found the mother and daughter both at home, and she was kindly welcomed.

"Have you heard from Vulcain, since he left?" asked Mrs. Varney, after various other topics had been touched upon.

"Yes, I received a letter from him to-day," replied Mrs. St. Egbert, in a low, sad tone.

"When is he going to buy Forbes out?" continued Mrs. Varney, not seeming to notice the tone of the answer she had just received.

"Well, they had some talk on the subject the day before my son went away. I think if Vulcain should look over his account, he would find himself—well, perhaps he will have to work diligently. A month ago he felt sure he had a number of thousand dollars, but from the tone of his letter, to-day, I am sure he finds himself with not so much money as he needed. However, he has found a good friend who can furnish him with a little. But I care not so much about that. I see by the same letter that he has lost one of his eyes!"

"Lost an eye!" gasped Ellen. "You don't mean so!"

"He has, Ellen—lost it entirely. But he has one good one left which he can use."

"O, mercy!" cried the affrighted girl, "how horribly he must look with only one eye. O, I never could bear the sight of a one-eyed man. That dreadful socket—all shrunk away and hollow! How did he lose it?"

"He didn't write me how. But then it will not hurt him for business."

"O, how dreadfully, dreadfully, he must look!" murmured Ellen, spasmodically. "And he hasn't so much money as he thought he had?"

"No. He must have been spending money lately—he must have spent a great deal; I am sure of it. But I care not for that. He is young and healthy, and business is before him."

"But only one eye! But he can have a glass one put in."

"No, that would be impossible. The nature of the loss is such that art cannot do anything for it."

"How dreadful he must look!" repeated Ellen, shuddering.

"And do you suppose it hurt him any?" said Mrs. St. Egbert, severely.

"O, it must have hurt him. But what is that compared with the looks of the thing?"

"And what are simple looks, compared with the loss?"

After this the conversation was dull and unpleasant, and ere long Mrs. St. Egbert took her leave. Two days after that her son came home, and on that very evening a servant came from Mrs. Varney's with a note for Vulcain. The young man recognized Ellen's hand, and he opened the missive eagerly. It read as follows :

"TO VULCAIN ST. EGERT. Dear Sir,—However painful it must be for me to pen these lines, still duty bids me do it. If there has been in your bosom any thoughts of a union between us other than that of common friendship, I hope you will banish it from this time. I sincerely pity you in your misfortune, but more than that I cannot do. I cannot unite myself for life to a man whose very face would make me shudder, every time I looked at it.

"Yours very respectfully, ELLEN VARNEY."

The young man read the missive through twice, and then he handed it to his mother.

"In mercy's name, what does she mean?" he uttered.

His mother read the note, and she smiled as she laid it down.

"What do you think of it, my son?"

"Think? Why—I know not what to think. You know something of it. Now what is it? Tell me."

"But first answer me, my son. What kind of love can the girl have felt for you who wrote this note? Answer me?"

"But I first must know what she thinks, and then I may answer."

"Well—she thinks you have lost one of your eyes, and that a glass one cannot be put in its place. And she also thinks that you have not so much money as you thought you had."

"But how should she have thought this?"

"Why, I must confess that I am at the bottom of it. I was in there on the evening after I received your letter, and upon their asking after you, I told them I saw by your letter that you had lost one of your eyes, and the only feeling Ellen expressed was horror at the thought of how you would look. They also asked me if, or when, you were going to buy Forbes out. I did not tell them that the thing was already done, but I told them I thought, if you were to look over your money, you would not find so much as you thought you had a month ago. I also told them you had to borrow some to get through in Boston; and also that I thought you had been spending much money very recently. All of which, you know, is strictly true. And if, in the result, I meant to deceive, the end must justify the means, for in no other earthly way could I have shown you Ellen's true character."

The youth bowed his head in silent thought, and for half an hour he spoke not a word. During that time a new spirit seemed to spring to life within him. His thoughts wandered away to the lowly widow's cot, and he knew that beneath that roof was one who loved him. The assurance was not such an assurance as he had had of Ellen's love—it was a calm, solemn truth which his soul embraced without a lingering doubt.

"We will speak of this in the morning," he at length said, and then he retired.

When he came down to breakfast his face was lighted up by a look of calm, self-satisfied joy.

"My mother," he said, taking her hand, "forgive me for the doubts I have held of your judgment. Half of this long night have I laid awake and pondered upon the subject we have conversed so much upon of late. I can only say now that Ellen Varney is not what I could have wished. The woman who can fling away a loved object for so slight a cause is not surely the companion for a lifetime. She could not have loved me for what there was good or true in me. It cost me a pang last night—a torturing one—but it is past now. I must away to business early this morning, but we will converse further upon the subject this evening."

* * * * *

"My dear Mr. Forbes," said Mrs. Varney, meeting that gentleman in the street—Ellen was with her—"so it seems that young St. Egbert will not purchase your store, after all?"

"No—don't think he will, madam," replied the blunt old man.

"So I was informed. Poor youth! He must have spent a great deal of money lately."

"Yes—I think he must. He paid me seventeen thousand dollars in cash about a week ago."

"What? Paid you—seventeen thousand—A—But—"

"He bought my store, madam, over a week ago, and is now sole owner," said the old man, while Mrs. Varney was stammering.

"But I was told that he had to borrow money to—to—"

"Ah, yes. After having paid away twenty-three thousand dollars of his own, he wrote up to his mother for a few hundred, which she sent him, he being determined to buy for cash."

The scheming mother and daughter went home with a peculiarly annoying little insect in each ear.

Very soon the old sign came down from the great brick store, and a new one went up in its place, with the name—"VULCAN ST. EGERT."

* * * * *

"Mrs. St. Egbert, how could you tell me such a falsehood?" Mrs. Varney indignantly asked, as she met the former lady for the first time after the interview last alluded to between them. It was in front of St. Egbert's store they met, and Ellen was present.

"Surely," returned Mrs. St. Egbert, calmly, "I told you nothing untrue."

"Did you not inform us that your son had lost one of his eyes?"

"Yes—I believe I did," answered the lady, with a smile. "I told you I saw by my son's letter that he had lost an—eye. If you will look at his sign you will see what I meant. Don't you see—he spells his name now 'V-u-l-c-a-n,' having left out the i. Before going into business he resolved to adopt the English method of spelling the Christian name. He conferred with me, and I advised him to do it. Don't you think it sounds better? or, at any rate, that it looks better?"

"But—but—you surely meant for us to understand differently, for you spoke of his having one eye left."

"Ah—yes—I remember. I said he had one left which he could use. I meant that if he clung to the i, he could have it for use by spelling out his whole name—Saint Egbert. Don't you see?"

The indignant schemer was upon the point of giving vent to some very severe rebuke, but the approach of a third party prevented it—and they separated.

Not many days after this Vulcan St. Egbert visited at the Widow Lawrence's. Julia found it hard to compose herself, but she succeeded in doing it, and at length she conversed freely. The young man was astonished at the thought that now presented itself. Once he had preferred Ellen Varney to this noble, lovely being! But his eyes were open now, and so was his heart; and ere he left the widow's cot that night he held not a thought of love which Julia did not know. She wept, for she could not help it, but her tears were gentle dews, distilled of heaven, giving new life to the once blighted bud, and causing it to blossom as the full rose.

Years have passed since then, and many—many times, has Vulcan St. Egbert blessed the hour that led his heart back to the widow's cot; and now he can truly say, as he holds his wife to his bosom—"Thou art one of a thousand."

And Julia often answers—

"And the rest of the thousand can be easily found by those who can distinguish the false from the real. Noble women are plenty in our land."

He that never suffered extreme adversity, knows not the full extent of his own depravation; and he that has never enjoyed the summit of prosperity, is equally ignorant how far the iniquity of others can go. For our adversity will excite temptations in ourselves, our prosperity in others.

SAMUEL ROGERS'S TABLE TALK.

What a treat it must have been to breakfast with Samuel Rogers, and hear him relate his personal reminiscences of the great men, the warriors, poets, statesmen, artists, actors, and beautiful women of eighty years ago, the most stirring and Augustan of the world's modern history! The memory of his contemporaries has preserved some of his anecdotes, and here are a few of them. They illustrate the social atmosphere that surrounded the poet.

"I saw Garrick act only once—the part of Ranger, in the 'Suspicious Husband.' I remember that there was a great crowd, and that we waited long in a dark passage of the theatre, on our way to the pit. I was then a little boy. My father had promised to take me to see Garrick in Leary, but a fit of the mumps kept me at home. Before his going abroad, Garrick's attraction had much decreased; Sir William Weller Pepys said that the pit was often almost empty. But, on his return to England, people were mad about seeing him; and Sir George Beaumont and several others used frequently to get admission into the pit before the doors were opened to the public, by means of bribing the attendants, who bade them 'be sure, as soon as the crowd rushed in, to pretend to be in a great heat, and to wipe their faces, as if they had just been struggling for entrance.'—"Boddington had a wretchedly bad memory; and in order to improve it, he attended Feinagle's lectures on the Art of Memory. Soon after, somebody asked Boddington the name of the lecturer, and for his life, he could not recollect it."—"John Kemble was often amusing when he had had a good deal of wine. He and two friends were returning to town in an open carriage from the Priory (Lord Abercorn's), where they had dined; and as they were waiting for change at a toll-gate, Kemble, to the amazement of the toll keeper, called out in the tone of Rolla, 'We seek no change; and, least of all, such change as he would bring us.' When Kemble was living at Lausanne, he used to feel rather jealous of Mont Blanc; he disliked to hear people always asking, 'How does Mont Blanc look this morning?'—"I once dined with Curran in the public room of the chief inn at Greenwich, when he talked a great deal, and, as usual, with considerable exaggeration. Speaking of something which he would not do on any inducement, he exclaimed, vehemently, 'I would rather be hanged upon twenty gibbets.' 'Don't you think, sir, that one would be enough for you?' said a girl, a stranger, who was sitting at a table next to us. I wish you could have seen Curran's face. He was absolutely confounded—struck dumb."—"Lord Nelson was a remarkably kind-hearted man. I have seen him spin a teetotum with his one hand, a whole evening, for the amusement of some children. I heard him once during dinner utter many bitter complaints (which Lady Hamilton vainly attempted to check) of the way he had been treated at court that forenoon—the queen had not condescended to take the slightest notice of him. In truth, Nelson was hated at court; they were jealous of his fame."

LINES TO AN ABSENT FRIEND.

BY MARY DELL.

'Tis cold without, the snow is drifted round,
The icicles are thick on every tree,
And in my heart a kindred gloom abounds,
For where thou art not winter reigns for me.

How strong the love that binds the heart to heart,
Not like "the fading fancy of the hour,"
It holds us bondmen under sorrow's smart,
In joy or woe obedient to its power.

How prized the memory of kindly deeds,
And friendship's tokens, are they not most dear?
And, when afar, the lonely heart still feeds
On thoughts of what was when our friends were near.

Ah! 'tis a troubled sleep the exile knows,
Broken by dreams, and fancies born of love,
Rough is the mountain, deep the stream that flows,
Whene'er in sleep we chase our heart's lost dove.

We never hear a kind and tender word,
But it will call to mind a friend most dear;
And the sweet echo to a voice once heard,
In every gentle tone we seem to hear.

THE ART OF SLEEPING.

BY THE OLD 'UN.

POOR Sancho Panza has been immeasurably laughed at for his exclamation, "Blessings on the man who first invented sleep!" but we fancy that we shall be able to prove that his expression was perfectly correct, and that the pursuit of sleep under difficulties is an art and science, requiring talent and cultivation for success. But this we cannot well do without resorting to our old trick of story-telling.

Some dozen years since, while sojourning at Williamsburg, we went one glorious summer evening to Niblo's Garden to witness a French vaudeville company from New Orleans. The weather was as fine as a night at Naples; the moon rose without a cloud; the air was tropical, and suggestive of the necessity of white pantaloons and vest. The play was a very attractive one, and the performances long—extending, in fact, into the morning. When the "school was dismissed," the weather had become threatening; but not, as we thought, immediately betokening a storm; so we set out to foot it down Grand Street to the ferry. About half way down, a sudden thunder storm, accompanied by a perfect deluge of rain, broke over the devoted streets. An awning and a doorway afforded us temporary shelter till there was a lull in the peltings of the pitiless storm.

Between drops, as it were, we finally made our way to the ferry-house, where no lantern was displayed, and where two ruffianly proprietors of a leaky boat assured us that their craft—they, themselves, looked in the dim light very much like river-pirates—was the only conveyance for crossing the stream, and offered to ferry us over for the modest sum of ten dollars. Liking neither the men nor their terms, we concluded to take lodgings at some hotel in the city; but in all Grand Street, and in all Broadway, there was none open. The "All Nations," which we occasionally patronized, because it commanded a pleasant view of Trinity churchyard, was hermetically sealed, and though we used up our walking-stick, and a cane we borrowed of a benevolent watchman, in seeking to make an impression on the auditorium of the porter, we were compelled to relinquish the attempt. Wet, tired, sleepy, the pleasant prospect before us was that of walking the streets till morning. Diving down a by-street, a light in a window attracted us, and we entered a low-browed room, with a sanded floor, and benches ranged around it; a sort of parcel eating-house, parcel bar-room and parcel variety store. We were compelled to seek its shelter, uninviting as it was, by the rain, which descended in furious torrents just as we reached the door. The proprietor of the establishment, a venerable individual in a green baize jacket, sold at his counter liquors of all kinds, and cigars of every villanous flavor, Coney Island clams, Blue Point oysters, cakes, marbles, candy, knitting needles, ice cream, fine-tooth combs, castor oil, soap, sassafras, India rubber, musk-melons, dried codfish and snuff. Selecting from this assortment half a dozen of the least ambiguous cakes, to authorize us to a seat for a few moments, we looked around us.

A seedier set of individuals than those who rested on the surrounding benches our eyes never beheld. They seemed to be clad in the refuse of a Rag Fair; a Parisian chiffonier would have disdained to wear any of their garments. With arms folded, legs crossed, and hats and caps pulled down over their brows, they were all in attitudes of profound repose, with the exception of one foot, which each of these singular figures kept in perpetual motion, up and down, sideways or semicircularly. A sandy-haired waiter, evidently a London cockney, kept perambulating the room like a sentinel, holding a little rafter in his hand. We watched his motions narrowly, and observed that when one of the loafers ceased to agitate his foot, he received a sharp cut from the rattan across the toe, with the admonition of "Wake up, Mr. Ferguson—you can't sleep 'ere!"

One of the wretched men, whose foot did not exhibit the required vitality, even after receiving the admonitory cut, was seized by the collar by the waiter, dragged from his seat, and unceremoniously ejected into the street. This awful example, which created an unwonted disturbance, roused every individual in the room to unusual activity. Each one seemed anxious to prove his wakefulness by coughing, whistling, or scuffling on the floor. The waiter, after grimly surveying the same with a smile of satanic satisfaction, condescended to sit down by us and address us a few words.

"A rum set of customers, mister!" was his opening remark.

"You mean they come here for rum."

"They buys just one glass apiece," said he; "cost's 'em three-pence, and that gives them the freedom of the room—just as your cakes does yourn."

"Ah!"

"But, 'cordin' to the reg'lations of the guv'n'r yonder, ve don't allow no sleepin' on the premises. The werry moment ve detex von hasleep, hout 'e goes—just as hi served that 'ere chap just now. They haint got no other place to sleep in, 'cept the streets, and there the police stirs 'em up continually; so you see they larns 'ow to behave themselves."

"Well, they're all wide awake now," said we.

"Never you think it, mister," said the waiter.

"Ah! they're the downiest, owdaciousset set of scamps you ever see. They've larned to wiggle their feet while they're fast as a top. Long as they keep a teetering their toes, they're safe. Hullo there, old Blue Cap! vake up, or I'll be arter you vith the sharpest kind of a stick."

The admonished individual stirred uneasily, and began to whistle "Dandy Jim."

"That 'ere covey's the downiest of all," said the waiter, half admiringly. "I'm blessed if he haint larned to whistle 'Ginger Blue' ven he's as fast as the Seven Sleepers. But ve've put a stop to 'Ginger Blue,' and now he's larnin' smother tune. Ve 'as to vatch 'im werry narrowly, and ve allers detex 'im by a kinder 'uskiness in the demi-semiquavers. I gets 'alf a dollar a week hextra on account of my musical hear. Hullo! there's a false note! Confound the feller! 'E's hasleep agin. Vake up, Mr. Ferguson!"

Having seen a new chapter of human nature, and the weather having cleared up, we bade adieu to the establishment, and sallied forth once more in pursuit of a lodging. Fortunately, the City Hotel was open.

"Got a spare bed?"

"Yes'ar—cords on 'em."

The way we sunk into that bed—the way we slept—the way we didn't hear the breakfast-gong, and the roar of the imperial city waking up at daybreak—is nobody's business but ours. We never slept sounder, and never, on awaking, and on recalling the scene of the past night, had a more vivid impression of the profundity of Sancho Panza's philosophy.

A REMARKABLE CLIMATE.

The climate of the Khasia mountains, which lie northeast from Calcutta, and are separated by the valley of the Burrampooter River from the Himalaya range, is remarkable for the inordinate fall of rain—the greatest it is said, which has ever been recorded. Mr. Yule, an English gentleman, established the fact that in the single month of August, 1841, there fell 264 inches of rain, or twenty-two feet, of which twelve-and-a-half feet fell in the space of five consecutive days. This astonishing fact is confirmed by two other English travellers, who measured thirty inches of rain in twenty-four hours, and during seven months above five hundred inches. This terrific rain fall is attributed to the abruptness of the mountains which face the Bay of Bengal, and the intervening flat swamps two hundred miles in extent. The district of the excessive rain is extremely limited, and but a few degrees further west rain is said to be almost unknown, and the winter falls of snow to seldom exceed two inches. —Boston Atlas.

AN AMUSING MISTAKE.

A gentleman of Downt was going out in his carriage to make some calls with his wife, when he discovered that he had left his visiting cards. He ordered his footman, recently come into his service, to go to the mantelpiece in his sitting-room, and bring the cards he should see there. The servant did as he was ordered, retained the articles to be used as he was directed, and off started the gentleman, sending in the footman with cards wherever the "not at home" occurred. As these were very numerous, he turned to his servant with the question—"How many cards have you left?" "Well, sir," says the footman, very innocently, "there's the king of spades, the six of hearts and the ace of clubs!" "The deuce!" exclaimed his master. "That's gone," said John.—New York Mirror.

SCHOOL LESSON.

"Napoleon Alexis Dobbs, come up here and say your lesson. What makes boys grow?"

"It is the rain, sir."

"Why do not men grow?"

"Because they carry an umbrella, which keeps off the rain."

"What makes a young man and woman fall in love?"

"Because one of 'em has a heart of steel, and t'other has a heart of flint; and when they come together, they strike fire, and that is love."

"That's right. Now you may go and plague the gals." So says Simon.

MY EDEN HOME.

BY ESTHER B. STRATTON.

Has earth a dearer spot than this?
 A home more bright with happiness?
 More watched a nest?
 Where every object sends a charm
 Of sweet, wild harmonies, that calm
 The soul's unrest?

Where every white-robed image seems,
 Like genii strayed from poetry's dreams,
 To guard from wrong—
 Where every hour the moments bring,
 Slips, like a fly on silver wing,
 Gaily along.

Where every song our birdie tells,
 Like angel-echo, floats and swells
 With hallowed trill—
 And every gift with thought is wove,
 Of him who shares this home of love,
 And shields from ill.

O, earth holds not so blest a home
 As this, where two souls blend in one,
 So truly woven!
 My Eden home! God grant its light
 Be ever holy, ever bright—
 A type of heaven.

THE HUNDRED DOLLAR BILL.

BY ANSON B. CLIFFORD.

MR. JOHN SOMERS was a merchant, doing business in a thriving country village. He had two clerks in his employ, both of them faithful and industrious, but with some difference in minor points of character. Peter White was twenty-two years of age, the child of a now widowed mother, and in his choice of a profession he had only been governed by the desire to yield to his mother and self the surest means of honest support. Walter Sturgis was of the same age, and equally as honest, but he paid more attention to the outward appearance of things, than did his companion. For instance, it galled him to be obliged to put on his frock and overalls, and help pack up pork, potatoes, and so on; while Peter cared not what he did so long as his master required it, and it was honest.

One day Mr. Somers called the two young men into his counting-room and closed the door after them. His countenance looked troubled, and it was some moments before he spoke.

"Boys," he said, at length, "I have been doing a very foolish thing. I have lent my name to those I thought my friends, and they have ruined me. I gave them accommodation notes, and they promised solemnly that these notes should not pass from their hands save to such men as I might accept. Of course I took their notes in exchange. They have now failed and cleared out, and have left my paper in the market to the amount of seven thousand dollars. I may arise again, but I must give up my business. Everything in the store is attached, and I am left utterly powerless to do business now. I have looked over your accounts, and I find that I owe you about a hundred dollars each. Now I have just one hundred dollars in money, and the small piece of land on the side of the hill just back of the town-house. There are four acres of this land, and I have been offered a hundred dollars for it, repeatedly, by those who have land adjoining. I feared this blow, which has come upon me, and I conveyed this land to my brother; so now he can convey it to whom he pleases. Now I wish you would make your choice. If I could pay you both in money I would, but as I cannot, one of you must take this land. What say you? You, Walter, have been with me the longest, and you shall say first."

Walter Sturgis hesitated some moments, and he said:

"I'm sure I don't want the land, unless I could sell it right off."

"Ah, but that wont do," returned Mr. Somers. "If you take the land you must keep it. Were you to sell it, my creditors would say at once that you did it for me, and that I pocketed the money."

"Then I am willing to divide the hundred dollars with Peter, for if I had the land I should do nothing with it."

"O, you need not divide the money, for I can easily raise the hundred dollars on the land. My brother will do that. But I imagined that you would prefer the land, for I knew the soil was good, though quite rocky. However, what say you, Peter?"

"Why, I will take the land," returned Peter, "or I will divide equally with Walter—each of us take half the money and half the land."

"But what should I want with the land?" said Walter. "I could not work on it, I—should hardly like to descend from a clerkship to digging and delving in a blue frock and cow-hide boots."

"Then it is easily settled," rejoined Peter, "for I should prefer the land."

Walter was pleased with this, and before night he had the hundred-dollar bill in his pocket, and Peter had the warrantee deed of the four acres of land upon the hillside. Both the young men belonged in the village, and had always lived there. It was only five miles from the city, and of course many city fashions were prevalent there. It was under the influence of this fashion that Walter Sturgis refused to have anything to do with the land.

Times were dull, and business was slack, even though it was early spring. Peter White's first object, after having got the deed of his land, was to hunt up some kind of work. Had he been a mechanic he might have found some place, but he knew no trade except that of salesman and book-keeping. A whole week he searched in vain for employment, but at the end of that time he found an old farmer who wanted a hand, though he could not afford to pay much. But Peter, finally, and with the advice of Mr. Somers, made an arrangement of this kind: He would work for the old farmer (Mr. Stevens) steadily until the ground was open, and then he should have half the time to devote upon his own land, and in part payment for his services, Stevens was to help about all the ox work that the youth might need. Next Peter went to the hotel, where there was quite a stable, and engaged a hundred loads of manure, the landlord promising to take his pay in produce when harvest time came. So Peter White put on a blue frock and cowhide boots, and went to work for Farmer Stevens.

In the meantime Walter Sturgis had been to the city to try to find a situation in some store, but he came back bootless. He was surprised when he met Peter driving an ox team through the village. At first he could hardly believe his own eyes. Could it be possible that that was Peter White, in that blue frock, and those coarse boots? On the next day a relation from the city came to visit Walter. The two walked out, and during the day Walter saw Peter coming towards them with his team. He was hauling lumber which Mr. Stevens had been getting out during the winter. Walter saw how coarse and humble his quondam clerk-mate looked, and he knew that Peter would hail him if they met; so he caught his companion by the arm and dodged into a by-lane. Peter saw the movement, and he understood it, but he only smiled. By-and-by the snow was all gone from the hillside. The wintry garb was removed from that spot some time before it left other places, for Peter's lot lay on the southern slope of the hill, and thus had all the advantages of the warm sun all day without any of the cold north and east winds. The youth found his land very rocky, but none of them were permanent; so his first move was to get off some of these obstructions, and as Mr. Stevens's land was not yet clear from snow, he was able to give his young workman considerable assistance. They took two yokes of oxen, and two drags, and went at it, and in just five days every rock was at the foot of the slope, and made into a good stone wall. Peter then hauled on his hundred loads of manure, which he had for seventy-five dollars, and part of it he plowed in, and part he saved for top dressing.

Peter now worked early and late, and much of the time he had help. Mr. Stevens was surprised at the richness of the soil, but there was reason for it. At the top of the hill there was a huge ledge, and the rocks which had encumbered the hillside must, at some former period, have come tumbling down from the ledge; and these rocks, laying there for ages, perhaps, and covering nearly half the surface of the ground, had served to keep the soil moist and mellow. The first thing Peter planted, was about a quarter of an acre of water melons. He then got in some early garden sauce—such as potatoes, sweet corn, peas, beans, radishes, cucumbers, tomatoes and so on. And he got his whole piece worked up and planted before Stevens's farm was free from snow. People stopped in the road and gazed upon the hillside in wonder. Why had that spot never been used before? For forty years it had been used as a sheep pasture, the rocks having forbidden all thoughts of cultivating it. But how admirably it was situated for early tilling; and how rich the soil must have been, with sheep running over it so long. An adjoining hill shut off the east winds, and the hill itself gave its back to the chill north.

Peter had planted an acre of corn, an acre of potatoes, and the rest he had divided among all sorts of produce. Then he went to work for Stevens again, and in a few weeks he had more than paid for all the labor he had been obliged to hire on his own land.

In the meantime, again, Walter Sturgis had been looking after employment. His hundred dollars were used up to the last penny, and just then he accepted a place in one of the stores in the village, at a salary of three hundred dollars a year. He still wondered how Peter White could content himself in such business. Peter used to be invited to all the little parties when he was a clerk, but he was not invited now. Walter Sturgis went to these parties, and he was highly edified by them. Also, when Peter was a clerk, there were several young and handsome damsels who loved to bask in the sunlight of his smiles, and one of them he fancied he loved. After he had got his hillside planted, he went to see Cordelia Henderson, and he asked her if she would become his wife at some future period when he was prepared to take such an article to his home. She told him she would think of it and let him know by letter. Three days afterwards he received a letter from her, in which she stated that she could not think of uniting her destinies with a man who could only delve in the earth for a livelihood. Peter shed a few tears over the unexpected note, and then he reasoned on the subject, and finally blessed his fate, for he was sure that such a girl was not what he needed for a wife.

When the first of July came, Peter reckoned up his accounts, and he found that Mr. Stevens was owing him just two dollars, and all he owed in the world was the seventy-five dollars for manure. On the third day of July he carried to the hotel, ten dollars worth of green peas, beans, and radishes; and in three days afterwards he carried to the city twenty-eight dollars worth. Towards the end of the month he had sold one hundred and thirty dollars worth of early potatoes, peas, beans, etc. Then he had early corn enough to bring him fifteen dollars more. Ere long his melons were ripe, a dealer in the city had engaged them all. He had six hundred fair melons for which he received fourteen cents apiece by the lot, making eighty-four dollars for the whole.

During the whole summer, Peter was kept busy in attending to the gathering and selling of the products of his hillside. He helped Mr. Stevens in haying, and about some other matters—enough so that he could have some help when he wanted it. When the last harvesting came, he gathered in seventy-eight bushels of corn, and four hundred bushels of potatoes, besides turnips, squashes, pumpkins, etc., and eighteen bushels of white beans.

On the first day of November, Peter White sat down and reckoned up the proceeds of his land, and he found that the piece had yielded him just five hundred and five dollars, and besides this he had corn, potatoes, beans and vegetables enough for his own consumption. That winter he worked for Mr. Stevens at getting out lumber for twenty-five dollars per month; and when spring came, he was ready to go at his land again.

In the meantime, Walter Stargis had worked a year at a fashionable calling for three hundred dollars, and at the end of the term he was the absolute owner of just two dollars.

"Say, Peter, you aren't going to work on that land of yours another season, are you?" asked Walter, as the two met in the street one evening.

"To be sure I am," was the response.

"But here's Simonds wants a clerk, and I told him I guessed you would be glad to come."

"What will he pay?"

"Three hundred."

"Ah, Walter I can make more than that from my land."

Stargis opened his eyes in astonishment.

"You're joking," he said.

"No, sir. I received five hundred and five dollars in money last season. Seventy-five of that went for manure; but some of that manure is now on hand, as I found the land so rich last year as not to need much over half of it. This season I shall have two hundred dollars worth of strawberries, if nothing happens unusual."

"And you don't have to work any winters to do this?"

"No, four months labor is about all I can lay out to advantage on it."

Walter went to his store, and during the rest of the evening he wondered how it was that some folks had such luck.

During the second season Peter had experience for a guide, and he filled up many gaps that he left open the year before. His strawberries turned out better than he had anticipated, and he made a better arrangement for his melons. And then from all that land whereon he planted his early peas, etc., he obtained a second crop of much value. It was but one hour's drive into the city, and he always obtained the highest prices, for he brought the earliest vegetables in the market.

On the first of the next November he had cleared seven hundred dollars for the season over and above all expenses.

One morning, after the crops were all in, Peter found a man walking about over the land, and as the young man came up the stranger asked him who owned the hillside.

"It is mine, sir," replied Peter.

The man looked about, and then went away, and on the next day he came again with two others. They looked over the place, and they seemed to be dividing it off into small lots. They remained about an hour and then went away. Peter suspected this land was wanted for something. That evening he stopped in at the post-office, and there he heard that a railroad was going to be put through the village as soon as the workmen could be set at it.

On the next morning Peter went out upon his land, and as he reached the upper boundary and turned and looked down, the truth flashed upon him. His hillside had a gentle, easy slope, and the view from any part of it was delightful. A brook ran down through it, from an exhaustless spring up in the ledge, and the locality would be cool and agreeable in summer and warm in winter. At the foot of the hill, to the left, lay a small lake, while the river ran in sight for several miles.

"Of course," soliloquized Peter, "they think this would make beautiful building spots. And wouldn't it? Curious that I never thought of it before. And then when the railroad comes here, people from the city will want their dwellings here. But this land is valuable. It is worth—let me see:—say six hundred dollars a year. I can easily get eight or nine hundred for what I can raise here, and I know that two hundred dollars will pay me a good round price for all the labor I perform on it. And then when my peach trees grow up, and my strawberry beds increase—Ho—it's more valuable to me than it could be to any one else."

When Peter went home, he could not resist the temptation to sit down and calculate how many house lots his land would make; and he found that his hillside would afford fifty building spots, with a good garden to each one. But he didn't think of selling.

Two days afterwards, six men came to look at the land, and after travelling over it, and sticking up some stakes, they went away. That evening Peter went down to the hotel, and the first thing he heard was:

"Aha, Pete, you've missed it."

"How so?" asked Peter.

"Why, how much did you get for your hillside?"

"What do you mean?"

"Haven't you sold it?"

"No, sir."

"Why, there was a man here looking at it a week or so ago, and to-day he came and brought five city merchants with him, and I can take my oath, that each one of them engaged a building lot of him. One of 'em spoke to me about what a lovely spot it was; and I told him nobody would have thought of building there till you got the rocks off. But haven't you sold it, though?"

"No, not an inch of it."

"Why, that man told me he had engaged to pay four hundred dollars for a choice lot of twelve square rods."

"Then he will find his lot somewhere else, I guess, till I sell out."

Some more conversation was held, and then Peter went home. On the following forenoon, the very man who had been the first to come and look at the hillside, called to see Peter, introducing himself as Mr. Anderson.

"Let's see—I believe you own some two or three acres of land, up here on the hillside," he said, very carelessly.

"I own four acres there," replied Peter, very exactly.

"Ah, yes—well; it doesn't make much difference. I didn't notice particularly how much there was. I thought I should like to build there, and if you would sell the land reasonable, I might like to purchase. It would be enough to afford me quite a garden; though I suppose it would cost about as much to till such land as the produce would be worth."

"That would depend upon how you worked it," said Peter, dryly.

"O, yes, I suppose so. But you are willing to sell out, I suppose?"

"Certainly."

The man's eyes began to brighten.

"How much should you want for it?" he asked.

"Well, I don't know. What could you afford to pay?"

"Why, I suppose I could afford to pay a great deal more than it is worth. Rather than not have it I would pay—well, say—two hundred dollars, or two hundred and fifty at the outside."

"I don't think there is much use of our talking, sir."

"But—you paid one hundred, only, if I mistake not."

"I had my choice between one hundred dollars and the land, and I chose the latter. But as you seem to labor in the dark, I will explain to you. In the first place, there is not another spot of land in this section of the country, that possesses the natural advantages which this one does. I can have my early peas and vines up and hooded before my neighbors get their ground plowed; so I have my early sauce in the market ahead of all others, save a few hot-house owners whose plants cannot compare with mine for strength and size. Then my soil is very rich, and yields fifty per cent. more than most other land. Now look at this: During the last season I have realized over eight hundred dollars from this land, and next season I can get much more than that, for my strawberry vines are flourishing finely. There are not any two farms in this town that can possibly be made to realize so much money as my hillside, for you see it is the time of my produce, and not quantity, that does the business. A bushel of my early peas on the twenty-second day of May, are worth ten times as much as my neighbor's bushel on the first of July and August. Two hundred dollars will more than pay me for all my time and trouble in attending to my land; so you see I have this year six hundred dollars interest."

"Then you wouldn't sell for less than six hundred, I suppose?" said Mr. Anderson, carefully.

"Would you sell out a concern that was yielding you a net profit of six hundred dollars a year for that sum, sir?" asked Peter.

"A-hem—well—ah—you put it rather curiously."

"Then I'll put it plainly. You may have the hillside for ten thousand dollars."

Mr. Anderson laughed; but he found that Peter was in earnest, and he commenced to curse and swear. At this, Peter simply turned and left his customer to himself, and he saw nothing more of the speculator.

Two days afterwards, however, three of the merchants came to see our hero, and when they had heard his simple story, they were ready to do justly by him. They went up and examined the spring, which they found to be pure as crystal, and as it was then a dry season they saw that the supply of water could never fail, and all the houses which might be built upon Peter's land could be supplied with running water, even in the very attics of the upper ones.

The merchant first went to the man who owned the land above Peter's, including the ledge and the spring, and he agreed to sell for two hundred dollars. This, to builders, was a great bargain, for the stone of the ledge was excellent granite. Then they called a surveyor and made a plot of the hillside, whereby they found that they could have forty building lots, worth from two hundred and fifty to four hundred dollars each. They hesitated not a moment after the plot was made, but paid Peter his ten thousand dollars cheerfully.

Ere many days after this transaction, Peter White received a very polite note from Cordelia Henderson, asking him to call and see her; but he did not call. He hunted up Mr. Somers and went into business with him, and this very day Somers & White do business in that town, and Walter Sturgis is their book-keeper. And in all the country there is not a prettier spot than the old hillside. The railroad depot is near its foot, and it is occupied by sumptuous dwellings, in which live merchants who do business in the adjacent city.

One thing Peter missed—that he did not reserve a building spot for himself. But his usual good fortune attended him, even here. A wealthy banker had occasion to move to another section of the country, and he sold out his house and garden to Peter, for just one half what the building cost him. So Peter took a wife who loved him when he dug in the earth, and found a home for her and himself upon the old hillside.

And now, reader, where do you think the hillside is? Perhaps you know; for it is a veritable history I have been writing, and the place I have told you about is now one of the most select suburban residences in the country.

FASHIONABLE SOUP.

When I lived in New York, said Tom A., I received a visit from a country cousin, who being a rough hewn, clever sort of fellow, I took some liking to, and as he expected, I invited him to dine with me at the Prescott House. Ed. set at the long splendid table, mouth, ears and eyes wide open, perfectly astonished. When soup was announced, I ordered some of a new "style," which was all the go just then, and, as by some chance we had no napkins, I requested some. Garcon was prompt, and the "hasty plate" was soon before us. No sooner was it on the table, when my friend Ed., with a muttered "by Jimmy, Neddy," suddenly shoved back his chair, and before I could turn round, he was half-way out of the room. I followed as soon as possible, amid the anxious looks of those next us. When I reached the hall, Ed. was there, hat in hand, waiting for me. "What in the world is the matter?" exclaimed I, anxiously. "Tom," said he, his face looking larger and redder, "I can stand to be called green, for I know I aint up to all the kinks, but I swann I wont be called dirty, by the president." "What do you mean?" said I. "Well, Tom, I don't know what you said to that short-haired monkey, in the white round-about, but just after you spoke to him, he comes and sets down a big dish of water right afore me, and then sticks a towel in my face, as much as to say, 'Mr. Brown, you might as well wash yourself afore you eat with this crowd.' And Tom, I believe he is the only man I care about seeing afore I leave this village."

Tom vows he gained four pounds of flesh that week, and never till he forgets his cousin Ed., will he believe "stylish" soup is not fattening.—Springfield Republican.

IVORY.

Few of our lady readers, while they peep so bewitchingly over the tips of their ivory fans, or play their fingers so nimbly and gracefully over the white keys of the piano, are wont to cast a thought towards the manner in which this material is procured, the quantities of which are annually used, and the number of noble animals which are yearly slain for the purpose of supplying the constantly increasing demand. Mr. Dalton, a celebrated Sheffield manufacturer, estimates that the annual consumption of ivory in the town of Sheffield alone is about 180 tons, equal in value to £30,000, and requiring the labor of 500 persons to work it up for trade. The number of tasks to make up this amount of ivory is 45,000; and according to this the number of elephants slaughtered every year for the Sheffield market is 22,500. But supposing some tasks to be cast, and some animals to have died a natural death, it may fairly be estimated that 18,000 are killed for that purpose.—Scientific American.

Ceremonies are different in every country; but true politeness is everywhere the same. Ceremonies, which take up so much of our attention, are only artificial helps which ignorance assumes in order to imitate politeness, which is the result of good sense and good nature.

NIGHT WINDS.

BY HOWARD PUTNAM MOORE.

O, cease your howling, night winds,
Now soft—now loud—now low;
Ye but remind me, night winds,
Of misery and woe,
Existing in some hovel,
Round which ye fiercely blow:
Then cease your howling, night winds,
Now soft—now loud—now low.

O, cease your howling, night winds,
Now soft—now loud—now low;
Ye seem but voices, night winds,
Of misery and woe;
As like tortured demons,
Ye past my window go:
Then cease your howling, night winds,
Now soft—now loud—now low.

GRANDMAMA'S STORY.

A LEGEND OF "THE GREAT SNOW."

BY EVA MILFORD.

"Good evening, grandmama; what do you think of this for a snow-storm? I suspect it must equal even those, which you so often allude to, when you were young."

"Yes, George, it is a violent storm," said grandmama, looking up affectionately at the handsome face of the young man, all glowing with exercise and exposure to the furious wind and driving snow.

"But did you ever see a worse?" persisted George. "This is the third day that it has snowed, more or less, and the streets are almost impassable already. I never knew anything like it."

Ah, I hope you never will know anything like the snow-storm which I once knew—it was the snow-storm which you must have heard old people, like me, refer to as 'the great snow.' O, that was really fearful."

"Where did you live then, grandmama?" said little Ella, softly, hardly liking to disturb her venerable grandparent, whose dim eyes, fixed steadfastly on the fire, seemed to be gazing through it down the dim vista of departed years to the long past youth—youth so little valued in passing, so all-engrossing when gone.

Ella waited a little, and then putting her little white hand into the brown and withered one from which the forgotten knitting-work had fallen, she asked: "Where were you then, grandmama?"

The old lady started a little, and putting her hand upon the shining brown curls of the little girl, said solemnly:

"Child, I was where, had it not been for the exceeding mercy of God, my body had remained until the last trump shall summon the quick and the dead."

"Is it a story, grandmama?" said the child, a little awed by her grandmother's manner, but not quite able to repress the ever-active curiosity of childhood. "Do tell us all about it."

"Yes, do—I admire to hear of those grand old times when there was so much for a man to do in life," said George.

"Very well, dear. Close the shutters, and draw the curtains, and in this favorite firelight hour of ours, I will tell you of my share in 'the great snow.'"

"When your grandfather and I were married, we were both of us young, strong and enterprising; but our whole worldly wealth consisted of five hundred dollars, which my husband had inherited from his father, and a 'setting out' of household linen, clothes, etc., which was all my father, with his small fortune and large family, could afford to give me.

"After many anxious consultations, we all concluded that the best prospect for us was to buy some wild land which the just-organized government offered for sale in what was then the 'far West,' but now is the centre of the populous State of Ohio.

"The bargain was made for two hundred acres of land, and in the spring of 1779 your grandfather set off, with three other young men whom he had engaged for help, to make a clearing and build a log hut. When this was accomplished, he returned and arranged for the transportation of myself and household goods.

"The first day of August was our wedding-day, and on the next we set forth upon our westward journey. Our caravan consisted of a covered wagon drawn by a span of stout horses, which were a present from our two fathers. In this I rode in state, with all the lighter articles closely stowed in behind me. My husband sometimes rode beside me and sometimes walked at the horses' heads, to guide them over the bad places in the rude forest road. Creaking slowly along behind us came an immense wagon, or wain, as we called them then, drawn by four powerful oxen and loaded with all the rest of our worldly possessions. Among these were several bags of meal, two of rye, and one of wheat flour, but this was considered a great dainty and only to be used on great occasions.

"We had also some grain for planting the next spring, and a small supply of tea and sugar for festivals. My husband and the young men with him had already laid in a good supply of bog for the winter from the open glades and intervals of the forest. Our journey was slow and uneventful, but as pleasant to us, perhaps, as the wedding-trips to Saratoga and Niagara, in which young people indulge now-a-days."

"We were many days upon our journey, as you may well imagine, when you consider the distance which we traversed and the slow rate of our progress, and very glad was I when, at the close of a delicious summer day, our tired horses were turned into our own clearing and brought to a halt at the door of our own log cabin. I was charmed with everything which I saw.

"The next day, the wagons were unloaded and the contents placed; and the morning after that, our companions left us with the big wain and one pair of oxen, both of which belonged to the elder of the two men who had accompanied us. And now our life fairly commenced. It was laborious, but very pleasant. My husband was the man and I was the maid, but we had the advantage over other servants in also being our own master and mistresses.

"Before cold weather set in, we had everything about us snug and comfortable. John had built a shed of small trees and bark, close by the house, for the accommodation of our horses and oxen; and we promised ourselves in the spring a nice cow, which would make our housekeeping quite luxurious. The winter proved a very mild and open one, and there was abundance of game all around us, by means of which my husband kept us supplied with fresh meat, and before the next winter we were to raise a pig, the salted meat of which is the backwoodsman's staple in the way of animal food.

"As early in the spring as the frost would allow, my husband commenced farming; getting out the stumps upon the piece of land which had been cleared the preceding summer, ploughing up the rich virgin soil, and then sowing the grain which, in due time, was, with the blessing of God, to bring forth the means of life. The pig and cow were both procured, and we took the best care of them, hoping that they would repay us with their respective products in proportionate abundance. The summer sped happily, although to me somewhat wearily, and on the anniversary of our wedding-day, my first child was born."

"That was our father," exclaimed George.

"No, my dear boy, it was a little girl," said his grandmother, in a tremulous voice.

"I thought papa was your oldest child!" said George, in a surprised voice.

"Little Alice never saw the anniversary of her birth," said the grandmother, mournfully.

"The second winter set in very suddenly, and with a degree of cold almost unprecedented for the season of the year. Our pig had not been killed, or our grain carried to mill, when the snow fell; and that very morning, John came in from the cow shed looking grave, and saying:

"Betsey, I don't think we shall have to kill the hog. I am afraid we shall find it done to our hand, and not much good from it, either."

"I went out to look with him, and we found poor piggy in a sad condition. We never knew what ailed him, but he died the next day, and so ended our hopes of pork for that winter. I could not help sitting down and crying, partly from sorrow at the sufferings of a creature whom I had fed and tended, but more from disappointment and vague despondency.

"'Never mind, Bessie—cheer up, girl,' said my husband, kindly. 'We never wanted for meat last winter, and why should we this?'

"But we soon found that this winter was to be very different from the last. The cold was steady and more and more severe each day. Great quantities of snow fell, and threatened so to cover and destroy all vegetation, that the deer and other game would desert that part of the country and go south in search of food.

"It was in the first part of December that my husband, after waiting a week for some change in the weather, decided that he could no longer put off carrying his grain to mill, as our stock of meal was running low, and we had hardly anything else in the house. We agreed that if the part of the produce which we could spare should sell well, that John should buy a half of a pig to replace the pork of which we had been disappointed.

"The nearest town was twenty miles from us, and there was but one house upon the road thither; so I desired John not to think of coming back the next day, as I knew he would not have the grain ground, and make his purchases, so as to start before afternoon, and I would not have him upon that lonely road after dark. Everything was prepared the night before, that my husband might set off by sunrise.

"I was up very early to prepare breakfast, but in spite of all my efforts, the blinding tears fell so fast, that I could hardly see to perform my customary duties. The horses were harnessed to the great sled, and my husband came to give me a last kiss, and bid me good-by. But at this my fortitude wholly gave way, and clinging about his neck, I begged that if he must go, I might accompany him.

"'Why, Bessie, woman,' said he, 'what's come over you? It's not the first time, by many, that you've been left alone, and why are you so down-hearted now? Besides, my dear girl, though I might take you, it would never do to carry the 'wee bairnie' out in this weather—she would be sure to freeze. Nay, nay, Bessie, don't sob so,' continued he, soothing me with tender caresses; 'it's only two days, and I will be home again for the whole winter.'

"With much difficulty, I drove back the tears and succeeded in smiling gaily, as I bade my kind husband good-by and watched him out of sight; but as I turned again into the house, that terrible presentiment of evil bore me down again, and I cried and sobbed till I was almost sick, and little Alice waking up and missing my usual quick attention, began to cry too. This aroused me; and after taking her up, and dressing and playing with her, I felt more cheerful, and went about my small household duties more contentedly. My cooking was not very extensive, for there was nothing left in the house but a little rye and Indian meal, and a small quantity of molasses; however, I thought there was plenty for three days, and then my husband would be home with a fresh supply.

"This was Wednesday; and as I could not look for John before Friday night, I got out my spinning-wheel and some rolls of wool, and thought I would occupy myself with making some yarn to knit winter stockings for my husband. I was very busy with this during Wednesday and Thursday, but Friday I devoted to cleaning house and putting everything, myself and the baby included, in the nicest trim. I determined to use my last meal in making a good kettle of hasty-pudding, except a little which I reserved for a hoe cake, which was all the variety of which my materials allowed. The morning was very pleasant; but about noon, the clouds began to gather, and as I strained my eyes to pierce the gathering gloom, in hopes of seeing the well known team cross the brow of a hill at some distance from the house, I noticed large flakes of snow slowly dropping from the sullen bosom of the dense clouds.

"'He must be here soon,' said I, as I turned away from the window, more disappointed than I would confess even to myself. The kettle of strabout was made and hung in the corner of the fireplace, the cake was mixed and all ready to spread upon the baking-board at the first jingle of the sleigh bells. Then I undressed the baby, sung her to sleep, and sat down with her in my arms before the fire, determined not to look or listen any longer, but to allow myself to be taken by surprise, when the traveller should at length arrive. I sat there perhaps half an hour, when I heard feet beneath the window.

"'Ah,' thought I, 'the rogue has taken off the bells and driven up to the barn, and now is going to steal in and surprise me.' So I waited a moment in glad anticipation, but as nothing more came of it, I got up softly, laid the baby in her little cradle, and went to the window to look out. I first glanced at the barn, but to my surprise, no sign of sleigh or horses was there—only the fast filling track I had made that morning in going out to feed the cattle.

"I went to the door, and opened it; closely following the click of the latch, I heard a low, deep growl, and looking hastily out, I saw the ungainly figure of an enormous bear skulking off into the woods. I was not much frightened, for during my life in that lonely place, I had seen and heard a great deal of these wild animals; but as I hastily closed and bolted the door, a terrible feeling of loneliness came over me, and I murmured to myself: 'If he should not come!'

"I sat by the fire till the hands of the old silver watch my husband had left with me pointed to nine o'clock; then, after one long wistful gaze through our solitary window, which showed me nothing but the fast falling snow, I put away the untasted supper, covered the embers of the cheerful fire I had prepared for the traveller, and went sadly to bed.

"The snow fell steadily all night, so that it was only with considerable effort I reached the barn and fed the cattle the next morning. There was here stowed up a small quantity of dry wood for kindlings. I brought in as much of this as I could carry, not without once losing my footing and letting my load fall into the rapidly deepening snow. I at last collected it again and staggered forward into the house, so exhausted that throwing my wood upon the floor, I sunk down beside it unable for some moments to make the least exertion.

"That day passed slowly and sadly enough, although I would believe that John must arrive before night. But day grew dusk, and dusk grew dark, and still nothing was to be seen but the ever-falling snow. I went to bed utterly dejected and despondent, and after some time, fell into an uneasy sleep. In the middle of the night I waked suddenly, and going to the window, looked despairingly forth. Still fell the unwearied snow, and I could see that it was level with the window-sill. As I looked, the idea occurred to me: 'If the snow continues, I shall be quite unable to reach the barn to-morrow morning, and those poor dumb beasts must starve in the midst of plenty.'

"I lay down again, but I could not sleep. I arose, put on some of my husband's clothes, for I knew that in female attire my plan would be quite impracticable. I put on a large pair of boots over all, lighted the lantern, and taking the snow-shovel in my hand, opened the door with much difficulty. A wall of snow rising to half the height of the door was before me. Setting down the lantern, I applied myself to the shovel, and at last succeeded in partially clearing a small space around the door, for I knew if I stepped directly into this bank, it would fall in and render it impossible for me to close the door behind me. But seizing my lantern in one hand, and my shovel in the other, I set bravely forth.

"I must have been more than half an hour in traversing the few rods between the house and the barn. Arrived at the latter, I hung my lantern on a nail in the log wall, and proceeded to shovel away, the snow sufficiently to open the barn door, which of course opened outward. I had noticed before dark that by the course of the wind, the snow was drifted away from this particular spot, and it was principally on the strength of this observation that I had ventured upon my present undertaking. I found, however, enough of an obstacle to demand all and more of my feeble strength, and several times I was about to abandon my task as hopeless and return to the house while yet my strength sufficed so to do. But thoughts of poor Crummie and Star and Spot starving only a few feet from their stock of provisions, inspired me with new vigor, and I at last succeeded in forcing the door back sufficiently to admit me.

"I did not lose a moment in resting, although every limb trembled with fatigue, for I feared if I delayed, the fast falling snow would obliterate the result of my labors and make it as hard to shut the great door as it had been to open it. So untying, as fast as my numb fingers would allow, the ropes with which the three beasts were tied, I left them, knowing they would soon find the way to the haymow themselves. Coming out, I succeeded with some effort in closing the door, which indeed was very necessary, for as I paused for a moment before plunging again into the drift, I heard far off in the forest the wailing howl of the bear, and with a shudder at the thought of my unprotected situation, I made frantic efforts to reach the shelter of the house. At last, breathless and exhausted, I burst open rather than unlatched the door of our little dwelling, and falling prostrate upon the floor, gave relief to my overstrained faculties of body and mind in a passionate flood of tears.

"Morning came, but brought no relief. Still fell the snow, and the wind shrieked around the hut. I felt it necessary to eat, not only for my own support, but for that of my little Alice, who depended entirely on me for food. My little stock of provisions could not last more than twenty-four hours longer, and what was then to be done? My brain reeled with the idea, and I clutched my baby to my breast in mad despair.

"The snow fell all that day, and before night it had risen to the top of my little window. After that, my recollections are all indistinct. I remember eating the last piece of my hoe cake—of trying in vain to give food to my baby—of watching her blue eyes grow dim and close—and I put my last fuel on the fire, and pressed close to it, with my child in my arms. Then I laid her in her little cradle and covered her with all the clothing I could collect, and kept muttering to myself, 'she sleeps—my baby sleeps—how sound she sleeps,' till the fire went out, and I crept shivering to bed; and as I closed my eyes, the wolves howled wildly outside the house.

"When I returned to consciousness, I lay for some time with my eyes closed. A low murmur of voices reached my ear, but I was incapable of thinking about them. Soon I was conscious of a pleasant warmth creeping through my limbs, and at last I languidly opened my eyes and saw my own dear husband leaning over me. As I looked up, he gave a quick start, and then sinking on his knees by the bed, he buried his face in the clothes and his sobs shook his frame. But this did not last long; springing up, he took some blankets, which had been heating by the fire, and enveloped me; then returning to the fireplace, he brought a basin of broth and fed me as one would an infant.

"Much revived, I lay after this perfectly still, with my eyes closed, and I suppose John thought I slept, for he stole away on tiptoe, and I heard heard him whispering with some one in the room. Suddenly a recollection flashed across my mind, then another and another, until the past all stood out plain and bright.

"'John,' I murmured very faintly, but he heard me, and was beside me in a moment; 'John,' I whispered, 'the baby—where is she?'

"My husband was silent a moment, and then answered softly: 'The baby is safe, Bessie—safe and happy—now shut your eyes and sleep, and when you wake, we will talk more.'

"I obeyed him, for neither mind nor body was yet strong enough to bear more exertion, and so I slept till night, and through the night and far into the next day. When I awoke, the house was very still, and beside my bed sat a kind, motherly looking woman, whom I remembered having seen at the house of our ten-mile off neighbor. My husband had engaged her to come and take care of me till I should be strong again. As soon as she saw I was awake, she went to the fire and returned with another cup of broth. This strengthened me so that I began to talk quite fast, asking what was the matter, and why I lay there so feeble, and where was Alice.

"Bless the dear creature," said my nurse, with her checked apron to her eyes, "I can't tell her and kill her, too, though I expect it will come nigh about as hard to him as to her."

"Stepping to the door, she summoned my husband, who soon stood by my bedside, with a look of joy at my recovery struggling in his face with an expression of sadness at the thought of what I had to bear.

"Fixing my eyes on his, I gasped out: 'John, where is our child?'

"Bessie, it is well with the child."

"He said no more, nor did I, but laying his head upon my pillow, we mingled our tears.

"Some days passed before I was able to hear the story of John's adventures. Then he told me that he reached town safely, effected his business to his satisfaction, and was four or five miles on his return home, when he was startled by seeing an immense bear cross the road a little before him. Having his gun and knife with him, he determined to carry the bear home as a trophy. Jumping from the sled, he tied his horses and pursued the bear, who was in full retreat; a ball from the rifle, however, served to stop him, and he now turned upon his assailant. My husband retreated a little to re-load, but before he could do so, the bear was upon him, and a severe conflict ensued, in which, although John was the victor, he received some severe wounds, and his left arm was so mangled, that, as the bear at last fell dead, my husband fell beside him, fainting with loss of blood. When he became conscious, he found himself in an Indian lodge, surrounded by dusky forms all entirely new to him. They soon made him understand that their intentions were friendly, as he found his wounds carefully bound up with healing preparations. He was, however, too weak to move for that day or the next, but on the third day he asked by signs for his horses. The Indian, in whose lodge he found himself, assented by a nod, and gave some brief command in a guttural Indian dialect to a couple of young men, who, leaving the lodge, soon brought the horses from some rude shelter at hand, where they had been cared for.

"As my husband spoke not a word of Indian, and his hosts as little English, it was impossible for them to relate how he had come there, but the natural supposition was, that finding a bloody hunter and a dead bear lying near the sleigh and horses, the old Indian had surmised the facts and taken the paleface to his lodge to cure him.

"Expressing his thanks by signs, my husband offered some trifling presents to the squaws and young men of the lodge, and as much shot and powder as he could spare, to the old Indian, making at the same time signs of farewell. But the master of the lodge smiled, and shaking his head, gave my husband to understand that he would find it impossible to make way through the snow alone, but that he and two of his young men would accompany and assist him; and long before they reached the highway, some three miles distant from the wigwam, my husband became sensible that without their help, he could not have found his way through the almost impassable drifts and banks in his path—so that, although they left the lodge early in the morning, it was long after dark when they reached the cabin of our ten-mile neighbor. Here both horses and men were entertained with true backwoods hospitality, and at dawn the three Indians took a silent leave of their host.

"My husband would willingly have done the same, but on examination of the poor horses who had served him so nobly the day before, he found them quite unfit for use during that day at least, and this fact, added to the great loss of blood he had recently suffered, compelled him to remain for the day and night quietly in the house of our kind neighbor. Fortunate was it for him, in these circumstances, that he had no anticipation of the terrible reality—the low state of our larder being quite unknown to him.

"As early as possible on Wednesday morning, my husband left the cabin of the hospitable settler, accompanied by Mr. Simpson himself and his two stout, broad-shouldered sons; but with the utmost exertions of all four, it was nearly dark before they penetrated the lonely hut where our little Alice slept so sound, and where I lay wrapped in a slumber which, but for the timely succor, had been indeed my last."

"And now, my dear George," said grand-mama, after a pause, "you will not wonder at my not calling this the heaviest snow-storm which I ever saw."

Neither George nor Ella spoke, and the little circle sat silent and thoughtful, till the opening of the front door and the stamping of feet announced that papa had come, and that the dreamy, brooding firelight must give way to the joyous, cheering blaze of the solar.

THE CHIEFTAIN'S FAREWELL.

BY WOODLEY READ.

"The moon is sinking slowly, love,
Adown the western sky,
But stars are beaming brightly, love,
As beams thy dark blue eye.
The soft south wind is roaming now
Among the orange bowers,
And swiftly, silently away
Doth pass the midnight hours.

"And when the first, faint light of morn
Shall make the hill-tops bright,
I must away, and with the sun
My bark be out of sight.
But weep not, love, for soon again
I will return to thee,
And nevermore afar I'll roam,
Across the deep blue sea.

"Then fare thee well, my love, my own,
My friends await but me,
And I, their chief, must not be late;
I must away from thee.
Farewell to thee;" Into his bark
He stepped with conscious pride;
It swiftly bounded o'er the wave,
Upon the swelling tide.

And many moons had rose and set,
And many days passed on;
She waited for his safe return—
Yet still he did not come.
Ah, true he said he nevermore
Would cross the ocean wave!
Upon its coral beds below,
They all have found a grave.

Yet on the shore there wanders still,
A form that once was fair,
With moaning words, and wailing sobs,
And torn, dishevelled hair.
She gazed sadly o'er the waste,
And sighs "why comes he not?
The nymphs of ocean stole my lord,
And I am all forgot."

MASKS AND FACES.

A toy-shop window, full of what boys call "false faces," is to us a very suggestive spectacle. We love to linger over those shining countenances of varnished papier mache. They carry us back into the past, and aid our imagination in conjuring up those scenes in which masks have played so conspicuous a part. We are in Athens, in the high and palmy period of her drama, when the voice of fate spoke through the rigid mask of the tragedian, in "deep and hollow tones." The scene changes—a vast multitude is gathered before a dark scaffold to behold a fellow-creature die the cruel death of the sword. The executioner, the hated and hooted agent of the law's vengeance, wears a black mask that adds by its mystery to the terrors of his direful occupation. The sword falls—the head rolls in the ensanguined dust—but no one in that vast multitude knows whose hand has dealt the fatal blow—the grim, black mask baffles every attempt at identification.

Glance with us into that dismal cell into which the light of heaven casts the grim checkerwork of iron bars in portentous shadow—bars which fence the captive from liberty forever. And who is that captive? Vainly you inquire. An iron mask, never unlocked, conceals the features of the prisoner of state, and presents to history a strange problem for solution. That mask may, and probably does, hide the features of the twin brother of a reigning monarch. Shift the scene again. Who is that masked lady sitting beside a cavalier, and draining with her the wine cup to its very dregs? It is Margaret of Burgundy, revelling in the Tour de Neale at Paris. A few moments of reckless enjoyment, and the cavalier, the favorite and victim of a demon in human shape, will be floating a corpse in the turbid midnight waters of the Seine. And what have we here? 'Tis the chamber of poisons. A woman—the Marchioness de Brinvilliers, and her accomplice, the Chevalier de St. Croix, their faces shielded by glass masks, are concocting those fatal compounds, the fumes of which are death, and which are destined to destroy the lives of those they hate, or whose property they covet. For St. Croix, the breaking of his mask will prove his death-warrant—while the marchioness is reserved for torture and the scaffold.

Away to Italy! In the shadow of a Venetian palace lurk two men, with sword in hand, watching for a victim. They are bravoës, who murder for hire. Their faces are covered with masks. A sound of music, a blaze of light, and we stand in the centre of the great opera house at Paris, in the height of the joyous carnival. In the whirling waltz, in the demoniac gallopade, three thousand men and women are dancing, as if life depended on agility. But every face wears an impenetrable mask, and you ask in vain who are your associates in that lunatic revel. Thus genius, justice, crime, assassination, illicit pleasure and revelry are associated with the history of the mask. In the first century ladies wore them to shield their complexion from the sun, and wind, and dust, as they took their pleasure on horseback and in chariots.

These artificial faces have been abandoned in our time; but has masquerading gone out of fashion? By no means; only we substitute false expressions for false faces. Yonder is a countenance beaming with benignity, wearing such a look as "Limners give To the beloved apostle."

Surely that gentleman is made of earth's finest porcelain clay. By no means; he is a miser—an oppressor of the poor—a hard-hearted, selfish egotist. But here is a face that cannot deceive. It is a woman's face—lovely, smiling, smooth—unfurrowed by a single wrinkle. Sure, that face must be the sign of a happy heart. You are mistaken, friend. It is the mask that conceals the agonies of blighted affection, of ruined hopes, of secret household cares. And there goes another, and another, and another, and another. They all wear masks. They have learned that saddest of social sciences—the art of concealment—to hide what they are, to appear what they are not. In the good old times, masks concealed faces—now faces conceal hearts. Could every one wear his natural expression, we should be astonished at the revelations that would meet us on all sides. Let us cherish those frank and natural faces, in which the eye of experience detects no artifice—they far outnumber, we are happy to believe, the masqueraders in the carnival of life.

“DON'T WORRY.”

This is the first thing an editor should get by heart. If Mr. Slocum threatens to withdraw his patronage because you criticised Prof. Drawl's lecture on the onion question—don't worry, but tell him to go ahead and do it.

If Mr. Bullion writes you an insulting letter, saying that if you don't stop writing about the Middleton Railroad, he will ruin you with a lawsuit—don't worry, but dare him to try it on.

If Mr. Smith threatens to “cave your head in,” because you mention that “his son Bob” was sent to the Tombs for pelting a street lamp with brickbats—don't worry, but tell him that you so love the law, you dine on a salad made of red tape and sealing wax.

Again we say never worry. If you do, you are no more calculated for an editor than a Quaker is for marine hornpipes.—Trumpet.

PRINTERS AS EDITORS.

The Albany Journal, says: “Printers—if men of capacity—generally make the best editors, for the reason that they are educated to their profession. The first and most illustrious example was Benjamin Franklin. Joseph Gales and Edwin Croswell, two of the most influential editors in America, if not born in printing offices, were sons of newspaper editors, and learned their alphabet ‘at case.’ The late Col. Stone served a regular apprenticeship in the office of the Cooperstown Federalist.”

The name of the architect who builds castles in the air, is To-morrow; and Hope lays the foundation.

MOZART.

At the first general rehearsal of “Don Juan,” two amusing episodes occurred. Signora Bondini, who sang the part of Zerlina, was always at fault in the finale of the first act, where she has to call out for help. She either did not scream in the right place or else not loud enough; this might easily have produced confusion in the music, and, considering the importance of the situation, have given the piece, in a dramatic point of view, a blow from which it might not have recovered. Mozart impatiently stepped on to the stage, caused the last bars of the minute to be repeated, and at the instant Zerlina's voice should be heard behind the scenes, seized the lady so tightly by the waist that she cried out this time in good earnest. “Brava! Donella! that is the way you must scream,” said our hero. On coming to the churchyard scene, he stopped the rehearsal, as one of the trombonists who had to accompany the commander's song, Di rider finituri, made a mistake.

The passage was repeated two or three times, and, on each occasion, the same mistake occurred. The composer then left his place, and, going to the incorrigible trombonist, explained how he wished the passage to be played. The musician answered rather drily: “It is impossible to play it so, and I am not going to learn how to do it from you.” “Heaven forbid that I should attempt to teach you the trombone, my friend,” replied Mozart, laughing. He then asked for pen, ink and paper, and added two oboes, two clarionets, and two bassoons to the accompaniment, at the same time altering the impossible passage for the trombone.—Musical Echo.

A LEARNED RASCAL.

A Greek, named Constantine Simonides, has been hauled up at Leipsic, Germany, for endeavoring to pass off forged documents as original Greek manuscripts of the most ancient dates. He was detected, among other proofs of forgery, by the fact that his text contained the emendations of modern German scholars. The cause of his arrest was the sale of a work which professed to be the first three books of a certain Ouranias, who wrote on the sovereigns of Egypt and Ethiopia, the kings of Caria, Lybia, etc. The forgeries were very well executed, but the rogue slipped upon one or two points. It appears that the fabrication of ancient manuscripts is quite as much of a trade in Europe as the manufacture of old masters.—Albion.

THE HALIBUT FISHERY.

About fifty sail of fine clipper schooners of eighty tons burthen, from the port of Gloucester, are now prosecuting the halibut fishery on George's Banks. They are manned by a hardy, daring crew of about twelve men to each vessel, who will be absent from home about three weeks. So far this spring they have had good luck on the Banks; but the risk they run is very great, and the money obtained in the business hardly pays the expenses. These schooners being in the bay and on the coast during heavy weather, are a great benefit to the strange mariner, oftentimes piloting them safely into port. Our government should grant to each one large bounty.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

READY FOR THE WORST.

There is no more golden maxim than that which bids us "in peace to prepare for war." No one in this enlightened age disputes the blessings of peace; none but a ruffian loves war for the sake of war; and all classes unite in the wish that all national disputes might be settled by diplomacy, without resort to arms. But, alas! human nature will be human nature. No matter how pacific a nation may be, no matter on what brotherly principles its intercourse with foreign countries may be conducted, it may, in any year of its existence, be forced into a state of war. Therefore every nation, while cultivating the arts of peace, should also cultivate the arts of war, and make a thorough system of national defence the foundation of its legislative action.

Now, the United States, with a sufficiently large army for a nucleus, with hundreds of thousands of well drilled volunteers ready to fly to arms whenever danger threatens, are lamentably deficient as to a navy, and as to our coast defences. With a mercantile marine greater than that of any nation in the world, our navy is inadequate to cope with that of England or France. We have got all the material for the finest navy in the world; but still, with an enormous line of coast on two oceans, and a chain of lakes, and with a world of merchant ships to protect, we are terribly tardy in the matter of building, equipping and manning a respectable fleet. It is the boast of Englishmen that "Britannia needs no bulwarks,

No towers along the steep,
Her march is o'er the mountain wave,
Her home is on the deep."

But where are our "floating bulwarks?"—where are our "wooden walls?" The entire navy of the United States, were it mustered beside the entire navy of England, would exhibit a woful disparity. Now we have no idea, and no wish, that Congress should create as large a navy as that of Great Britain; but we ought to have one a little more commensurate with the greatness of our nation and the interests we have at stake. "Two years ago," says the New Orleans Crescent City, "Congress ordered the construction of six war steamers. The arguments used on the occasion demonstrated our wretched inferiority as a naval power, while they proved that, with a single exception, we had the largest marine of any nation upon earth! It was also proved, in case of a sudden collision with any great naval government, we would be comparatively helpless to defend ourselves, and that we would have first to build a navy before we could hope to cope on anything like equal terms with our enemies on the ocean." There should be no delay in attending to this matter; no "penny wise and pound foolish" policy on the part of our representatives. The nation will sustain them in liberal appropriations for a formidable navy.

Then, too, our coast defences ought to be looked to. The great powers of Europe possess formidable means of annoyance, and are troubled with few scruples about using them. There are only, perhaps, two cities on our Atlantic seaboard, adequately defended—Boston and New York. Pennsylvania has already demanded additional seaboard defences, and Louisiana also requires them. On the land our provisions for meeting a foe are ample; but it is not on the land that any enemy, after the experience of the past, will dare to throw down the gauntlet; the sea and the seaboard would be their field of action, and there we must be prepared to meet them. Since a state of preparation is the best security against foreign aggression, we can well afford to expend "millions for defence."

LADIES' QUARRELS.—The Duke of Roquelaure was told one day that two ladies had quarrelled. "Have they called each other ugly?" asked the duke. "No, sir." "Very good—then I shall be able to reconcile them."

THINK OF IT.—Preserve the numbers of our Magazine from month to month, and when the year is complete they will bind up in a charming miscellaneous volume.

SHOW.—The Parisian shopkeeper's whole stock in trade is often displayed in his window. This gives the streets a gay appearance.

A NEW NAME.—A French general the other day spoke of editors as composing the "aristocracy of the inkstand."

KINGS AND PLAYERS.

When the Yankees settle in any place they establish newspapers; the advent of the British is signalized by the laying out of race-courses; and the French, passionately attached to the theatre, carry their players with them. In the Crimea, the British got up races and steeple-chases; while the French Zouaves erected a little theatre and played vaudevilles for the amusement of their comrades. When Napoleon the First began to aspire to the part of Cæsar, and saw his future glory dawning on his mortal vision, he said one day to his friend Talma, the great French tragedian, "You shall one day play before a whole pit full of kings." At Erfurt, on the 28th of September, 1811, "Cinna" was actually played before the Emperor Napoleon, the Emperor Alexander, and the king of Saxony. "Britannicus" was represented on the following day. The assembly was increased by Prince William of Prussia, Duke William of Bavaria, and Prince Leopold of Coburg, who married the Princess Charlotte of England. On the evening of the 2d of October, Napoleon received Goethe, and "Mithridates" was played. On the third day came "Philoctetes," when, on the occurrence of the line,

"A great man's friendship is the gift of gods,"

Alexander offered Napoleon his hand. In the second act the king of Wurtemberg made his appearance and took his seat. On the 4th, the king and queen of Westphalia were added to the royal company, and finally the king of Bavaria and the Prince Primate. After the close of the sixth night's performance, Napoleon said to the leading actor: "Talma, my friend, I have redeemed at Erfurt the promise I made at Paris—you have played to a pit full of kings."

Talma was Napoleon's friend at the most discouraging period of his life, and the great emperor never forgot his obligation to the great actor. The emperor was passionately fond of the tragic stage, and loved to declaim passages from his favorite dramatic authors. He took a French company with him to Moscow when he invaded Russia. After the retreat, the troupe passed three months in Stockholm, and Mlle. George, now a wrinkled, poverty-stricken old woman, then a brilliant beauty and actress, undertook to convey a letter from Bernadotte to Jerome Napoleon, king of Westphalia. She had with her also a casket, containing a hundred thousand dollars' worth of diamonds. She travelled in a carriage, and rode night and day. Suddenly one midnight, with loud hurrahs, a cloud of Cossacks surrounded the carriage. The door was opened, and a young Russian officer presented himself. Mlle. George appealed to his gallantry, and the horde of enemies became a friendly escort, which did not desert the ambassador until she had reached the next station. She faithfully accomplished her mission.

The late Czar Nicholas was a great patron of French actors and actresses, and particularly the distinguished Mlle. Rachel, the greatest of them all. If peace is declared between France and Russia, the players of Paris will have cause to bless the event; for St. Petersburg is a great mart for their talents. The French stage will flourish as long as the French nation exists.

HENRY J. FINN.

On one occasion this excellent actor was called before the curtain at Baltimore, when he addressed the audience as follows: "Ladies and gentlemen—I feel persuaded more than ever that I have 'had a call,' and as you have done me the honor to call me out, it must be considered, I suppose, an affair of honor. According to the modern laws of honor, a man is called out for the purpose of giving satisfaction; but why should you call me out, when I trust I have already given you satisfaction? Ladies and gentlemen, accept my sincere thanks for your attention, and the compliment which your calling pays to my calling; and allow me to say, that, although circumstances have compelled me to-night to bawl to few, I hope it may not be long before I shall return to bawl to more (Baltimore)."

SECRETS OF HEALTH.—The four ordinary secrets of human life are—early rising, exercise, personal cleanliness, and the rising from table with the stomach unoppressed. There may be sorrows in spite of these, but they will be less with them, and nobody can be truly comfortable without them.

ATROCIOUS.—It was the New Orleans Picayune that said an old maid eyes a single gentleman with the same feelings that we look at a street dog in dogdays, as if to say "wonder if he intends to bite?"

REMARKABLE.—An exchange paper, in giving an account of a sentence of death passed upon a criminal, remarks, "he appeared to feel unpleasantly." We should rather think he did.

SPECIMEN NUMBERS.—We cheerfully send specimen numbers of Ballou's Pictorial to all who desire to see it.

ARISTOCRACY.

Mr. Jarvis, in his second series of "Parisian Sights," has some thoughtful and suggestive remarks on aristocracy, European and American, which are well worthy of consideration. He shows that aristocracy in the old world is easily defined, its position being distinctly marked. "England," he says, for instance, "has given birth to aristocrats of whom humanity has reason to be proud—aristocrats by education and personal interest, but men from the higher motives of reason and humanity. However much we are compelled to admire the results of rank, wealth, refinement and education concentrated upon a few, like the diamond polished by its own dust, yet the system that perpetuates and makes hereditary these distinctions, is none the less to be deplored." In this country the constitution ignores all inborn distinction between man and man, and hence aristocracy, as a system, has no chance to take root.

Yet we hear of American aristocracy—of this or that American being called an aristocrat. "Each obviously attributes it to a neighbor, and shrinks from it himself as a plague spot." Aristocracy in America, if it means anything, means the difference which exists between any individual and the mass of his countrymen. If a man were to revive in himself a fondness for the old miscalled science of astrology, and were to study the stars with the idea of investigating their influence upon human destinies, he would be called an aristocrat. If a man, from timidity or inability to take part in public affairs, holds himself aloof from primary political meetings, caucuses and conventions, though he may be the humblest of the humble, he is branded as an aristocrat. If he has succeeded in amassing a few thousands of dollars more than his neighbors, though he may make the best use of his means, he is an aristocrat.

"Individuals," says Mr. Jarvis, "should discard the false meaning attached to the word (aristocracy) in the United States, and if, in their heads, as it really does, the word aristocracy implies but a superior standard of manners, education or position to their own, strive for it; not with the feeling that Haman viewed Mordecai, but with the consciousness of self-respect and desire of improvement, the birthright of every American, which, if properly sustained, makes him at once a fit companion for princes, and a bright and shining example of the virtue of democratic institutions in forming a man. Such is the character of the only intervention in the affairs of their fellow-men worthy of the genius of American citizens."

FRANCE AND THE UNITED STATES.

We noticed, the other day, a paragraph in the Paris Constitutionnel, intimating that, in the event of a war between England and the United States, France would take a hand in the game, as an ally of the former. This we do not believe. It is doubtless policy on the part of the French journals to hint at such help while the peace negotiations with Russia are going on, as a soothing to the irritated feelings of Great Britain at being forced into a peace before having had an opportunity of displaying that tremendous power of which she is so constantly boasting. But Louis Napoleon does not wish for war; and least of all with the United States of North America. He is too sagacious not to know that the ultimate result of it would be the triumph of the stars and stripes—and he knows, too, that the deepest sympathies exist between the French and American people, and the former would not tacitly endure the burthen of a war with their ancient friends and allies, for the sake of their ancient enemies, the English. "The empire!" Louis Napoleon declared, "is peace!" The war with Russia has trained his troops and shown their power, and that is enough for France at present. He will rather be disposed to make England listen to reason than to aid her belligerent designs.

A WEDDING RIDE.

Horses were scarce in the Plymouth colony during the first years of the settlement, and substitutes therefore became necessary. When John Alden was married—and he was a great man in his day—he put a ring in his bull's nose, covered his back with a piece of broadcloth, mounted him and rode to the wedding. His bride rode home in the same manner, John Alden leading the animal by the nose. The gentleman who led, and the lady who rode, were the ancestors of some of the first families in the country, including members of Congress, heads of colleges, and two Presidents of the United States.

VERY PROPER.—The forts on the Atlantic seaboard of this country are being put in a condition of active usefulness. The way to prevent war is to be prepared for it.

CHEAP LIVING.—One can live like a prince in Florence for one hundred and twenty dollars a month—the blessing of fleas and beggars being thrown in gratuitously.

SURPRISE PARTIES.—These unique entertainments are becoming quite the vogue in and about Boston.

OLD MAIDS.

If we acquiesce in the sentence of excommunication which society presses upon old bachelors, those half-scissor members of the community, who persist in pursuing lives of single blessedness, in spite of a plethora of marriageable maidens to pick and choose from, we must protest against the practice of heaping ridicule upon the class of single ladies. It is vulgar, it is unjust, it is unmanly. It is a popular fallacy, rife among men, to attribute the maiden state of many ladies to the worst of motives—to malevolence, to coldness of heart, and to downright hatred of what we term, with most undemocratic and unchristian pride, the nobler sex. Many maiden ladies—old maids, if you please; there ought to be no implied reproach in the term—are so from neglect. But neglect does not argue demerit.

"Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its sweetness on the desert air."

The judgment of man in matrimonial matters is not so very infallible. He is as often caught by the artificial brilliancy of a flirt, by the audacious challenge of a belle, by the clink of the almighty dollar, or the prestige of an aristocratic name, as by unobtrusive worth, by simple manners, by a true heart and modest beauty. In the very matter of beauty itself, the eye is often deceived. The belle of a season is often belle only in name, and far less lovely than her neglected sister, who is condemned to sit among the wall flowers, while the idol of the hour is whirling in the waltz.

"The ridicule which is often poured forth on unmarried women of a certain age," says a sensible writer, "is very odious, and perfectly uncalled for. The smile of contempt may be reserved far more justly for those women who, instead of being respectable and useful old maids, have married without love, and without any prospect of happiness, merely to escape the odium of a name. These spinsters, about whom, in flippant moments, we say flippant things, are many of them among the most true-hearted and self-denying of their sex. Their lives have been heroic poems, full of musical rhythm and lofty actions; and, could we read their secret history, we should find that, in many instances, they retained their single state, not because they had never met with wooers, but because the troth they had plighted in youth was sacred even unto death, or because, in the spirit of Christian martyrs, they had resolved, for a great purpose, to make a life-long sacrifice. We allow frankly that the single woman has not—if we dare use such a term—such a chance of happiness as the woman who, as the cheerful 'house-mother,' has an affectionate husband at her side, and a number of olive-branches springing up around her. But then the law of compensation may be distinctly traced in every position of life. If there are many joys, they are certain to be attended by a multiplicity of sorrows; and if the sphere is more contracted, and joy is like a stranger-guest, and pays only angels' visits, then the path is less formidable, the struggle less severe, the haven more easily won.

"The vocation of the single woman is one of disinterestedness and self-denial. It is for her to visit the sick, to relieve the poor, to scatter good deeds from her on all sides, which, like the seed of the husbandman, may spring up and produce an abundant fruitage. It is for her to devise plans of usefulness, and to see them carried out; she must find her home in the hearts of the suffering and sorrowful, her family in the children who have experienced her kindness, and who look up to her for sympathy. It depends on the character of the single woman, and not on her position, whether she meet with a friendly greeting among her circle of acquaintances, and real love from those who know her best, and stand in close relationship with her."

We have seen so many true heroines, so many self-sacrificing martyrs, so many gentle ministering angels in the ranks of ancient maidenhood, the traditional record of the world's benefactors is so full of such, that we have come to regard old maids with reverence and respect. For one malignant retailer of scandal and promoter of domestic strife, we have found twenty pure-minded and gentle women, who would rather cast oil upon the troubled waters of life than add to their disturbance by a breath. Let us then leave the ridicule of old maids to sinful old bachelors, to profane playwrights, and to the daubers and inditers of penny valentines, who, by the way, ought to be indicted themselves. The age is too enlightened to accept as gospel the traditional prejudices of the past.

EASILY OBTAINED.—ANY POST-MASTER, OR OTHER INDIVIDUAL, WHO WILL EXPEND A FEW HOURS IN OBTAINING EIGHT SUBSCRIBERS FOR OUR DOLLAR MONTHLY, CAN RECEIVE IT GRATIS FOR ONE YEAR HIMSELF.

THE REASON.—Some one attributing the distress of Ireland to absenteeism, Sydney Smith remarked that "the misery of the Irish arose not from absent-tee-ism, but from absent-dinner-ism."

BINDING.—Binding in all its varieties, and at the lowest prices, neatly executed at this office.

EDITORS AT HOME AND ABROAD.

While, in this country, the editorial profession is duly honored, and it is quite a feather in a man's cap to be known as belonging to the "press-gang," in England it would appear that the profession is not held in very high repute. It is not a passport to office. One might as well have the bar-sinister in his shield, as to confess that he wields the pen and scissors. It is perhaps in consequence of this condition of things that the names of the editors of English papers are generally suppressed. The editor is almost invariably an impersonality. Anonymous editorship has its advantages and disadvantages. Where the writer is known, a personal prejudice frequently prevents his articles from exercising a due influence. His opinions, in themselves, may be perfectly sound, his arguments perfectly logical; but if he has formerly entertained different views, they lose their force, and his articles are not judged by themselves, but by their author. An editor writes more freely and easily when he writes anonymously. But then he is apt to be betrayed into more bitterness, more ferocity, perhaps, than if he were personally responsible.

Mr. Galliardet once remarked of the American press: "There was a time, perhaps, when the prejudices of the old British aristocracy had extended over the young republic, its revolted daughter; there was a time, perhaps, when the American press was ranked in the number of the secondary conditions of social life, when its writers were only penny-a-liners, a kind of unworthy and mercenary laborers in the field of thought. But these times have already nearly disappeared, and will soon disappear entirely. The press, too, has had its revolution of '75 in America, and has by degrees obtained esteem and influence by its talent and dignity."

In France, from the revolution of 1830 to that of 1848, the press was acknowledged to be a power in the realm; editorial talent was a universal passport to society, to court favor, to senatorial honors and to fortune. But Louis Napoleon has crushed the press; all the editors of France are now but the servile echoes of the views of one man. Editorial independence is visited with fine, imprisonment, and the ruin of the journal which dares utter any truths unpalatable to the sovereign. Thus, with all the wit, learning and eloquence of the Frenchmen, the French papers are excessively vapid and stupid. The sense of degradation deadens even essays on art, literature and science, which are the only topics free for discussion, so universally petrifying to all intellectual effort is political despotism. Give us a free press or none at all.

BALL THE ARTIST.

A notice we saw the other day of this excellent man and artist, who is now hard at work in his studio at Florence, Italy, recalled to our mind an adventure of his, which occurred when Kimball occupied our present publication hall with his museum. Ball had a room in the building, and sometimes volunteered to lock up the outer door, after all the performances had been concluded, and carry home the key to Mr. Kimball. Late one night he was wending his way to the South-End, with the huge brass door key firmly clenched in his right hand beneath his cloak. Somewhere near the Boylston Market he saw a gentleman approaching, whom he mistook for the "enterprising proprietor." Jumping at the opportunity of getting rid of his cumbersome charge, he extended the formidable instrument. To his surprise, the stranger halted, as if he had been shot, and exclaimed: "For God's sake, spare my life! I'm a married man, with a family! Here's my money, but spare my life, good Mr. Highwayman!" And the stranger, dashing a wallet at his feet, turned and fled precipitately. Our hero, one of the gentlest men in the world, horror-struck at being mistaken for a robber, and having not the slightest ambition to figure as a Paul Clifford in the eyes of the midnight guardians of the city's peace and honor, turned and fled in an opposite direction, and gaining his lodgings at a "two-forty lick," locked himself into the room, and passed a wretched night. The next day he walked the city like a spectre, fearing to meet at every corner a hand-bill, headed "Highway Robbery," and offering a reward for the detection of the criminal. But nothing came of it, and thereafter he never presented a brass-barrelled door key to a stranger.

A RECOMMENDATION.—On the English translation of the card of a French inn, between Boulogne and Abbeville, these words are printed: "The wines are of that quality they will leave you nothing to hope for."

A BANK CHECK.—Soon after the battle of Leipsic, a wit observed, "that Napoleon must be in funds, for he had received a check on the bank of the Elbe."

MATHEMATICAL.—Mr. Sheutz of Stockholm, has invented a calculating machine which solves the knottiest problems.

BACK NUMBERS.—We can still supply the back numbers of our Dollar Monthly to January 1st, 1856.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT FROM EUROPE!

There are some snobs who receive every item of court gossip from Europe with the liveliest delight. We commend to these quidnuncs the following important facts: Miss Smead, a very beautiful young lady, was much admired and petted by Louis Napoleon, before that worthy and immaculate gentleman married the fair Eugenie. The fair Eugenie, who had heard of these attentions, vented her post-nuptial spite by refusing to invite Miss Smead to any of the imperial parties. Miss Smead resented the slight, and between the two ladies subsisted, and subsists, the same feelings of affection which animated the breasts of the two Kilkenny cats of yore: Lately the emperor and empress attended a soiree at Lord Cowley's. As the fair Eugenie passed through a room where Miss Smead and other ladies were seated, all rose to salute her, according to etiquette, except the implacable Miss Smead. Burning with wrath, the empress swept into the next room. Soon afterwards, Louis Napoleon re-appeared, and finding Miss Smead engaged in conversation with a gentleman, pushed in between them, and turned his back on the offending and offended lady. Wasn't that a glorious revenge for a crowned head? Can any one now dispute the title of Louis Napoleon, emperor of France by the grace of muskets, to be the "first gentleman of Europe."

MEDICAL ITEMS.—Inoculation is said to be a preventive of pleuro-pneumonia.—Alum has been used successfully by Dr. Riddore in the treatment of bronchial catarrh.—It is said that lard is an infallible antidote to the poison of strychnine.—In England they are about to employ mesmerism to cure insanity.—A medical school existed in connection with Columbia College, New York, as early as 1760.

A LONG WAY BETWEEN.—The distance between Boston and New Orleans is greater than the distance between London and St. Petersburg; and the Pacific coast is as far from New York as the latter is from Bremen. Have our British friends any adequate idea of the size of the country they talk about swallowing?

A NEW LOAN.—"I say, Josh," shouted a Brighton drover to a crony, the other day, "these pesky sheep wont start in this weather—lend us a bark of your dog, will you?"

VALUATION.—The assessed value of the city of Hartford, Ct., for 1856, is $20,560,720, which is an increase of $1,306,587 over last year.

MILLS'S STATUE OF JACKSON.

At the recent inauguration of the equestrian statue of Jackson, at New Orleans, Clark Mills, the sculptor, made the following remarks with regard to his work: "General Jackson is here represented as he appeared on the morning of the 8th of January, forty-one years ago. He has advanced to the centre of the line in the act of review: the lines have come to present arms as a salute to their commander, who is acknowledging it by raising his chapeau, according to the military etiquette of that day. His restive horse, anticipating the next move, attempts to dash down the line; the bridle hand of the dauntless hero being turned under, shows that he is restraining the horse, whose open mouth and curved neck indicate that the animal is feeling the bit. I have thought this explanation necessary, as there are many critics who profess not to understand the conception of the artist."

TRAFFIC IN CHINESE CHILDREN.—It is asserted that a hidden traffic has been pursued for years in China, of selling and shipping female children to the Spanish and Portuguese, as well as the English possessions. They are purchased at about $3 each, and are therefore profitable to the dealer.

CANNEL COAL IN IOWA.—The Mount Pleasant Observer states that a fine bed of cannel coal has been discovered a few miles south of Salem. The vein is, at the opening, four feet and a-half thick. The coal is equal to Kentucky cannel coal, being set on fire by the blaze of a candle, and burning up, leaving but few ashes.

A JACK OF ALL TRADES.—Bernini, a celebrated Florentine sculptor, about the middle of the seventeenth century, erected a theatre, painted the scenes, made all the machinery and decorations, wrote an opera, composed the music, and took part in the performance.

BRAHAM.—John Braham, the distinguished English vocalist, died recently in London, at the age of eighty-two. He was well known in this country, which he visited professionally. For nearly seventy years he sang in public.

JEWELRY.—The French people say "he who wears gold chains visible to the naked eye, cameos, rings or trinkets, is an enriched boor, a juggler, a vender of quack medicines, or an Italian prince."

GERMAN THEATRICALS.—The Germans are a theatre loving people, as is evinced by the fact that there are one hundred and sixty-five established theatres in that country.

Foreign Miscellany.

Mr. Du Pre died in the Queen's Bench prison, London, on the 6th ult., after an incarceration of forty-five years for debt.

Rev. Rowland Williams has been dismissed by the Bishop of Llandaff from his office of chaplain, for publishing a work on rational godliness.

Jullien is having a musical crystal palace built for him in Surrey gardens—in which he is to give monster concerts.

A blind man in Devonshire, England, has actually been a surveyor and planner of roads; his ear guiding him as to distance as accurately as the eye to others.

Roger, "the greatest tenor in the world," has been performing his original character, "Jean of Leyden," in the Prophet, with Tedesco in the role of Fides, at L'Academie in Paris.

There are at present in Germany 165 theatres, employing about 6000 actors, dancers and vocalists, and 9000 choristers and musicians of the orchestra.

At a quarry in Holyhead, England, a few days since, sixty thousand tons of stone were loosened by a single blast. Six tons of powder were used on the occasion.

France means to obtain possession of Tangier in Morocco. It is in sight of Gibraltar, which would not be worth much to the English with Tangier in possession of the French.

Several of the diligences running in the neighborhood of Lyons, in France, are trying the experiment of using for their lights portable gas, which is placed in a cylinder beneath the driver's seat.

There are 70,000 gipsies in Wallachia; and their emancipation has been decided upon in a council by a vote of eleven voices against ten. Their proprietors will receive from the state an indemnification.

In the course of the last two or three years, the periodical press of the East has greatly increased in importance. As many as twelve journals and four reviews are now published at Constantinople.

Princess Augusta Bonaparte, daughter of Prince Charles Bonaparte was lately married to her cousin, Prince Gabrielli, at the Chapel of the Tuilleries, in Paris. The Emperor and Empress were present.

The British Government has instituted a new order of merit, styled the "Victoria cross," and is to be given only to members of the Army or Navy who distinguish themselves by individual acts of bravery in the face of an enemy.

The Musee d'Artilerie, Paris, has just added to its collection the pocket-book of Prince Menschikoff, taken at the battle of the Alma, and one of the Jacobi infernal machines, fished up in the Baltic by the French sailors.

The banking institution of London shows larger profits than our own. The London and Westminster Bank (the leading joint stock institution) has recently declared a dividend equivalent to 16 per cent. per annum, viz: 5 per cent. regular dividend and bonus of 5 per cent. for the past year.

Stockholm is to be fortified by land and sea; including the valley of Maslar.

Great energy is manifested in Russia in advancing railways.

Catharine Hayes, it is said, loses twenty-seven thousand dollars by the failure of Messrs. Saunders & Brennan, of San Francisco.

There are in Russia six thousand miles of telegraph wires, all of which are continually used for official despatches.

Lady Morgan is collecting out of her diaries and extensive correspondence, materials for a full account of her "Life and Times."

The emperor of Austria has ordered the construction of three screw steamers of war, which are to be completed in the present year.

Upwards of 10,000 fish, reared by the artificial process, which has been so successful, have been turned out into the waters of the river Dee.

A letter from Corfu states that the last crop of olives in that island has been so ravaged by the worm that two-thirds of it has been destroyed.

At the last sitting of the Imperial Academy of Sciences at St. Petersburg, Lieut. Maury was elected corresponding member in the section of geography.

At a recent oratorio in London, when Jenny Lind sung the principal soprano part, the chorus and orchestra consisted of more than six hundred performers!

Piedmont has, within the last six years, constructed 700 kilometres, or nearly 150 English miles, of railways, the receipts of which in 1855 amounted to 10,297,758*fr.*

During last year, in Silesia, 811 Roman Catholics enrolled their names on the Protestant registers. A similar increase of Protestants in that province has been going on for years past.

An arrangement has, it is said, been entered into between thirty-two brokers and capitalists of Paris and London, to participate in common in great industrial and commercial undertakings.

Iron shipbuilding is making rapid progress on the Tyne and other rivers in the north of England, and promises in a few years to produce a revolution in the carrying trade of the country.

The price of tallow in Russia has risen to an astounding degree—over two dollars a pound. The Russians it will be remembered, eat tallow as Americans eat pumpkin pie or apple sauce, and use it extensively in cooking.

Herr Ander, the tenor singer so popular at Vienna, generally reported to be the first tenor in Germany, who appeared two or three seasons ago at our Royal Italian opera, died the other day at Vienna. He was buried with state and honor.

Mr. Malcolmson, of Portland, Waterford, the eminent steamship proprietor, is about to place a line of screw steamers between Liverpool and New York, touching at Queenstown on the outward and home voyages.

Pipes of gutta percha are, to a great extent, superseding the use of lead pipes for conveying water in London. Being free from poisonous deposits and the attacks of frost, they are much preferred. Pipes of vulcanized India rubber are used to some extent.

Record of the Times.

The total population of Alabama is 836,192.

The total population of Louisiana is 575,922, of which 299,626 are whites.

The railroad system of Illinois has doubled its population in five years.

Since 1852, twelve steamships have been lost at sea, and 1250 persons perished.

The governor-general of Canada says the reciprocity system works well.

The Delawares believe their guardian spirit to be a great eagle—not a golden eagle though.

The "way to make butter come" is to pay for it and have it sent by railroad.

Green peas were hardly known in 1550, though the Romans had a dish which was very much sought after, composed of boiled or fried gray peas.

According to the American Baptist Almanac for the current year, there are in the United States 6475 ordained Baptist ministers.

The Leipzig Missionary Society are building a missionary house for the training of young men, who are to labor among the heathen.

When a man leaves his place of business, he should leave the cares and annoyances of the traffic with his goods.

Miss Bremer has written a new story, and the sheets are already in the hands of Mary Howitt for translation.

It is stated in "Howell's Familiar Letters" that a ship was built in England, in 1635, 127 feet long, and 46 feet 6 inches in breadth, and was called the "Sovereign of the Seas."

The most important item of information to be found in Miss Murray's book, is the fact that chowder is a "praiseworthy preparation, enabling you to eat soup and fish at one time."

The best teas, it is said, never find their way out of China. The finest quality of black tea is the scented Liang-sing, and is worth in China $2 50 per pound.

J. G. Percival, by many regarded as the first of American poets, is now State Geologist in Wisconsin, where the settlers call him "old rock smasher."

R. R. Coxe, a planter in good circumstances residing in Marshall county, Tenn., recently killed his wife in a fit of insanity, and afterwards killed himself.

The officers of the New York Juvenile Asylum have sent seventy-five children and twenty-five adults to Illinois, there to be engaged in agriculture or other useful occupations.

During the time since the Worcester Lunatic Hospital has been in operation (twenty-three years), thirty-nine of its patients were made such by disappointed ambition. "Ambition should be made of sterner stuff."

We read in a Liverpool paper of a man arrested for stealing gas—a novel complaint. He made a connection with the supply pipe in the street used by a former tenant, and didn't notify the gas company to set a metre.

The folks at New Orleans are about to erect a Clay monument of bronze.

The rings of the planet Saturn will be visible during all this year.

Col. Rawlinson discovered the body of Nebuchadnezzar at Babylon, by his cud.

At Peking there is a lodging-house for the poor called the "House of Hen Feathers."

The United States are manufacturing a musket that beats the Minie, at Springfield.

The State of Texas has given Col. Crockett's widow a league of land.

It is said that gambling is carried on to an enormous extent in Washington.

California will be able to export this year 150,000 barrels of flour.

A company at Limerick will soon manufacture brandy from beet root. That beats all.

The Danish government allow post-masters to confiscate all non-registered money-letters.

The late J. M. Field had his life insured at St. Louis for $3000.

There are 221 schools, 804 teachers, and 26,170 school children in California.

All men are born soldiers because they have drums in their ears.

It is fifty years since Frederick Tudor, Esq. first despatched the brig Favorite from Boston with an entire cargo of ice for St. Pierre.

From April, 1854, to May, 1855, one hundred and eight new post-offices were established in Iowa. This fact shows how the West grows.

One thousand young cows, with calves, were recently sold at Los Angeles, California, for $15,000.

A law has passed both houses of the Kentucky legislature which prohibits billiards, ten-pin alleys, etc.

A German writer says that the people of the United States can burst more steam boilers and chew more tobacco than any other five nations on the globe.

It is said that the Misses Fox have realized a fortune by snapping the joints of their big toes, which the gullable public mistook for spiritual rappings.

A witty doctor says that tight-lacing is a public benefit, inasmuch as it kills off all the foolish girls, and leaves the wise ones to grow to be women.

Some of our cotemporaries are discussing the question, which is the safest seat in case of railroad collision? We should choose one about one hundred miles from the railroad.

Dickens, speaking of a debtor's prison, says: "It was evident from the general tone that they had come to regard insolvency as the normal state of mankind, and the payment of debts as a disease that occasionally broke out!"

Returns from the Indian agencies in Texas show that the State contains 20,000 Camanches and Kioways, 3000 Arrickarees, 300 Wacoos, Towacanoes and Keechies, 550 Libans, 400 Mescaleros, 960 Wichitas, Apacees, Caddoes and other tribes, to numbers not estimated.

Merry Making.

What burns to keep a secret? Sealing-wax to be sure.

What word may be pronounced quicker by adding a syllable to it? Quick.

When did Absalom sleep with five in a bed? When he slept with his four-fathers.

"Sending coals to Newcastle"—The voyage of a cane (Kane) to the North pole.

Why is an island like the letter T? Because it is in the middle of wa-ter.

Why is a spendthrift's purse like a thunder-cloud? Because it is continually a light-ning.

When is a farmer very maternal? When he cradles his grain.

Nursery Truism.—Too many nurses spoil the "broth of a boy."

One of the teeth of a biting frost was recently picked up in the town of Hull.

One of our leading phrenologists has gone north, to examine the head of navigation.

Why is a kiss like creation? Because it is made of nothing, and yet it is something.

A wag says that Dr. Kane tried to get to the pole to deposit his vote, but the iceberg faction prevented him.

A little glutton of a boy said he should like to live in Scotland, because he had heard it was the land o' cakes.

Why does an agreeable person having left a party become very vapory? Because he is mist (missed).

There are none perfect in this world. It is said that even Wall Street Brokers have their little failings.

The story of a man who had a nose so large that he couldn't blow it without the use of gun-powder, is said to be a hoax.

When the mind is diseased, it is frequently not healing a man wants so much as fresh soul-ing. Medical cobblers please notice.

Often the scene at the playhouse, which beggars description, plays the same trick with the manager?

"Miss Brown, aint you afear'd that your boy will get drowned, goin' in swimmin' so much?" "Well, Miss Smith, I shouldn't wonder, for he's just rogue enough for that."

The man who hung himself in an axletree with a cord of wood, has been cut down with a sharp-set appetite, by the fast man who tired down a wagon wheel.

"My dear," said an affectionate spouse to her husband, "am I not your only treasure?" "O yes," was the cool reply, "and I would willingly lay you up in heaven."

The gas went out at one of the churches not long since, just as the congregation were singing the opening hymn, from which cause it was finished in short metre.

Upon the marriage of one of her companions, a little girl about eleven years of age, of the same school, said to her parents, "Why, don't you think Amelia is married, and she hasn't gone through fractions yet!"

Cats are said to be musical, because their interior consists of fiddle-strings.

Quack doctors are considered "drivers" of the "last stage" of disease.

A man frequently admits that he was wrong, but a woman, never—she was "only mistaken."

When is a nutmeg like a prison window? Ans.—When it is grated.

An earthquake is termed a "tall specimen of ague" in California.

"My mine to me a kingdom is," as the California gold-digger said.

Why is an ailing deer like a depressed man? Ans.—Because he is a hart sick (heart-sick.)

Why is the letter S a friend of the Maine Liquor Law? Ans.—Because it turns wine into swine.

Punch thinks the abolition of the corn laws the most important cereal work ever given to the public.

When is the marriage ceremony decidedly fishy? Ans.—When the bride receives her ring (her-ring.)

"Mother," said a little boy, "I'm tired of this pug nose; it's growing pugger and pugger every day."

Carrying coals from the grocery in a carpet bag, may be very genteel, but it is bad for the lining.

Sir Isaac Newton was never married. Guess he thought more of Saturn's ring than he did of Hymen's.

"Mr. Smith, be particular to have my coat well wadded." "Never mind," said Smith, "wadded or not, it will stand a charge."

One of the Irish newspapers contains an advertisement announcing as lost, a cloth cloak, belonging to a gentleman lined with blue.

The unfortunate wretch who wrote the tail of a comet, has obtained employment in copying the example of a sum in arithmetic.

An exchange paper says, "Hicks is engaged on a head of Longfellow." Is "Hicks" a barber or a sculptor?

An editor out West says: "If we have offended any man in the short but brilliant course of our career, let him send us in a new hat, and say nothing about it." Very cool.

It has been observed that frequenters of concerts who are in the habit of beating time with their feet and kicking up a dust, are presumed to be ignorant of the repeal of the "stamp act."

A distinguished literary tourist was once found in a paroxysm of tears over the supposed tomb of Washington, at Mount Vernon, but it turned out to be only the ice house!

There are two things a modest man should never undertake: to borrow money or study law. A third thing: never to "beg a brother of the earth to give him leave to toil," as the poet forcibly expresses it.

Zelim was the first of the Ottomans who shaved his beard. One of his bashaws asked him why he altered the customs of his predecessors? He answered: "Because you bashaws may not lead me by the beard as you did them."

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.—No. 6.

BOSTON, JUNE, 1856.

WHOLE No. 18.

GRACE ARRINGTON.

BY MRS. MARY MAYNARD.

"FOR shame, sir—for shame! thus to murmur at Heaven's decrees, thus to receive its precious gifts!" And good old Dr. Davis looked the indignation he felt at his companion.

The two gentlemen were in the library of Mr. Arrington's handsome country house; the speaker standing with his hands behind him, and a very unusual flush of anger on his fine face, while Mr. Arrington sat at his table with his face buried in his folded arms, resting on his desk. The family physician had just announced the birth of a daughter; news received by the disappointed father, first with angry unbelief, and afterwards with hopeless despair.

He was a tall, stern looking man, bearing the marks of fierce passions on his countenance, with deep sunken eyes and knitted brow. Few men would have presumed to address words of reproach to him, but Dr. Davis was a privileged friend, and for the sake of the gentle young wife and mother would run far greater risks. His fearless, open manner was his greatest safeguard; and in his wildest fits of passion, Mr. Arrington would come down under the plain spoken reproaches and shocked look of the good man.

"How can I calmly listen to the crushing of my last hope, the destruction of my cherished plans?" was the father's answer to the doctor's last words. "There is nothing now to prevent my hated cousin's becoming our uncle's heir, while I, with all my debts, am to be burdened with the care of a sickly wife and two wretched girls; curses on the fate!" And he ground his teeth in helpless rage, and again buried his face in his hands.

Finding that in his present mood, all remonstrances were useless, the doctor quietly left the room and sought the chamber of the young mother. At the door he found the eldest daughter, a child of two years, pleading to be taken to her mother.

Taking her from her nurse, he entered the room, and Mrs. Arrington, prepared for any unkindness on her husband's part, evinced no surprise at his absence, and merely shed a few quiet tears over her little girls.

She was a very young and beautiful woman, but care and sorrow had stolen the roses from her fair cheeks, and given sad looks to the once sparkling eyes. The beloved and only child of doting parents, she had seen little of care, and less of unkindness, until, won by the polished manners and fair exterior of Mr. Arrington, she had become his bride. But ere the first week of her strange new life had passed, the poor girl saw her mistake, and soon learned to tremble at the frown of him she had believed perfection, and to whose keeping she had entrusted her life's happiness.

Mr. Arrington was jealous and overbearing, proud of the beauty of his wife, yet fearful that others should see and admire her; fond of society, yet frequently sacrificing his dearest friend to his arbitrary disposition. His grandfather—old Philip Arrington—had bequeathed handsome fortunes to his three remaining children, all that had been spared to him from a large family. At the time of their father's death, Philip and John, the two oldest, were of the respective ages of twenty and twenty-two years, while Herbert, the youngest, was scarcely five.

Philip never married; and as years passed on, and he acquired a large practice as a lawyer, he gradually improved the property left him by his father, and at the time my story commences was counted one of the richest men in B-shire. John, the second son, married as soon as he became of age; lived an useless, extravagant life; broke his wife's heart with neglect and coldness, and died, leaving one son (Mr. Arrington) to fight and struggle his way through the world.

With extravagant tastes and great worldly pride, young John Arrington found himself at twenty-one with little more to gratify them than the very moderate fortune secured to him by his mother's marriage settlements. For ten years he contrived to live on this, each year, however, sinking deeper in debt, when finding that things could not continue so much longer, he bethought himself of taking a rich wife. In this last resort to retrieve his embarrassed condition, he proved exceedingly fortunate; and the fair young girl he won with false professions and pretended devotion, brought him both wealth and beauty for her dower.

His uncle, Herbert Arrington, now about thirty-eight years of age, had been married nearly five years, and his son, at the time little Eveline was born, was four years old. To account for John Arrington's dislike of this boy, we shall have to go back a few years to the early days of the old bachelor Philip.

In his youth, Philip Arrington had passionately loved a young girl whom his father disapproved of. Determined that he should not marry her, Mr. Arrington and her father made a match between her and a young man, far inferior in every respect to Philip. For two years young Arrington shunned all female society, but at the end of that time was accidentally thrown into the company of a beautiful young lady, lovely, fascinating and accomplished, but poor. For a time his suit prospered, and even progressed so far that the wedding day was fixed, when Philip found a rival in the shape of an old friend of Miss Smith's father.

It is true he was something over fifty, wore a wig, and in complexion rather too nearly resembled an orange; but what mattered that, when he could keep a carriage, a score of servants, and wear a diamond ring worth more money than Miss Smith had ever seen in her life? He was pleased with Miss Smith the first time he saw her, and rather wished young Arrington would not occupy so much of her attention. The next time he called, Miss Smith was alone; the lady was agreeable, the gentleman fascinated; she sung and played a sentimental song to amuse him, and he made her a formal offer of his hand and fortune. The lady hastily threw into one scale Philip, his love, his good looks, and his pretty cottage home—in the other, her saffron-faced admirer, a coach, and a splendid city mansion, with dresses and jewels innumerable. Need we say which preponderated?

The end of it was that Miss Smith learned to hate her lord and master ere she had been many months a wife; finding, to her sorrow, that even golden fetters are distressing; while Philip cursed all women as jilts and deceivers, and applied himself to his profession with redoubled ardor. He removed from the scenes of his unfortunate attachments, bought a comfortable house, secured the services of a trustworthy old lady for housekeeper, and set seriously about making money.

And he did make money, and everything he undertook brought him in money; and the more money he got the more he wanted; and at the time his nephew, John, married, he was immensely rich. Very little correspondence had been kept up between the brothers; but when Philip heard that another of the hated sex had been brought into the family, he suddenly felt a curiosity to see his brother's and nephew's wives.

His visit did not afford him much satisfaction, as, to all outward appearances, both couples were in the enjoyment of great happiness—Herbert and his wife being really attached to each other, while John had too much pride to allow his uncle to witness any unpleasantness in his house. As there was nothing to find fault with in the selection either kinsman had made, and the two families were on good terms, his malice invented a device whereby to destroy their future comfort. He announced his intention of bequeathing his vast property to the youngest male Arrington alive at his decease.

To this new whim Herbert paid but little attention; partly because his rapidly increasing fortune promised to be more than sufficient for the wants of his family, and partly because he suspected the real motive that had induced his eccentric brother to give publicity to an intention so likely to cause dissension. But on John Arrington the effect was all that his uncle could have wished in his most malicious humor.

Until the birth of Eveline, he contented himself with anticipating the blessing a son would be, and having convinced himself that such a thing as disappointment was not to be thought of, was even kinder to his poor young wife than heretofore. But all his ill temper returned when he found that so far his young cousin was the heir; and he hated him for it, although not quite without love for his own first-born.

Herbert's family meanwhile was increased by the addition of two little girls, and a few months before the commencement of our story, by still another son. But John Arrington's hopes were once more raised to the pinnacle of expectation; and so great a hold had this one idea taken on his mind, that he could better have listened to the announcement of the loss of wife, child, and every friend he had, than be told that his wishes were again crossed. He viewed it as an actual wrong, and in that spirit reproached the Providence that had so afflicted him.

From the hour of her birth, Grace Arrington knew nothing of the blessing of a father's love. It was not until she was several weeks old that her father ever saw her, and then the meeting was accidental. Since his last disappointment, he had even withdrawn the affection he once bestowed on little Eveline; and her mother almost feared to trust her darlings from her sight, so great was her terror that her husband might, in his passion, commit some dreadful act.

Soon after the birth of his youngest child, Mr. Arrington went to London, and his wife was suffered to drag out a weary existence alone with her children and servants, the latter being creatures of the master, and having more authority in the house than their mistresses. It was while Mr. Arrington was away, and when Grace was two months old, that Herbert resolved to pay a visit to his poor niece and her neglected little ones. He was much attached to her, and felt deeply for the children forsaken by their father, and seemingly so friendless.

On arriving at their home, he had considerable difficulty in gaining admittance, so strict were Mr. Arrington's orders against all visitors in his absence. But his uncle was not a man easily repulsed when doing what he considered his duty, and he felt that he ought to take some interest in the fate of his young kinswoman and her children. He found her but the shadow of her former self, pale, sick and dispirited, her beauty faded, her once bright hopes crushed. She warmly welcomed him, and after spending several pleasant hours in conversation and inquiries, Herbert rose to leave, when she spoke of the request she had to make.

"Anything, anything that I can do for you, my dear child," was her uncle's warm answer.

"It is a serious request, but I have long thought of your coming—long waited for an opportunity to make it. I shall not long be here. Nay! don't try to deceive me; look there." And drawing up the sleeve of her loose dress, she held up an arm and hand round which there was scarcely an appearance of flesh, the long fingers looking like those of a skeleton.

She smiled faintly as Herbert, pale and sorrowful, raised the transparent hand to his lips.

"I cannot long stay here; and uncle, when I am gone, will you take my poor babes—my little fatherless girls? Your wife is kind and good, and in her my children will find a mother, in you a father. Will you promise me this, and bid me rest in peace?"

Earnestly Herbert promised to fulfil her request, to adopt her children, and in all respects bring them up as his own. There was but one reservation. "If their father will consent."

"Only too willingly. To him they are a burden and a cause of grief." And her tears fell fast as she spoke the sad words.

Herbert bade her farewell, kissed the little ones, and left the house. As he journeyed homeward, he meditated on the melancholy fate of this once beautiful and happy girl, so undeservedly brought on by the cruel conduct of her husband and the malicious contrivance of his own brother, and he felt rejoiced that he had in some measure atoned by making the requested promise. When informed of what had passed, Mrs. Herbert Arrington was equally pleased, and her warm heart was deeply touched at the affecting picture her husband drew of the scene he had witnessed.

That night, when she sat beside him in their comfortable parlor, their little ones gathered round them, and all happy and rejoicing in their love, large tears rolled down the fond mother's cheek, and she bent over her baby-boy to hide her emotion. But Herbert knew that his tender-hearted young wife was thinking of another whose lot was, O, how different from her own! whose sorrows were soothed by no husband's kindness, whose babes felt no father's caress.

He looked on his little twin girls—two little delicate blossoms, scarcely seeming for this world,—and in his heart he wondered how a father could ever become so unnatural as to cast off his helpless offspring. He looked on his wife, as she sat with her infant in her arms, in all her bloom of health and contentment; and he thought of that other, her superior in beauty, in accomplishments, in all domestic graces that charm and delight a husband; and his astonishment and pity increased. How blindly had

John Arrington sacrificed his own happiness and that of his wife; how wantonly had he crushed her young life; how shamefully betrayed her trust. On all these wrongs did Herbert ponder, and his heart was sad and troubled for another's woes; but the day was soon to come when he should have sorrows of his own to mourn over.

Six months after his visit to his nephew's wife, Herbert laid his three youngest children in the grave. The little boy went first—the pet, the baby, they all wept when he was taken from them. But soon one merry little girl was laid beside her brother; and when the dark shadows fell over the face of the other, and he knew that she also was gone, Herbert wept like a woman.

To bear this heavy affliction, the mother seemed the strongest, and when all was over, and she could no longer minister to the wants of her lost ones, no longer touch the little hands, press the soft cheek, or bend down to listen to sweet, low voices murmuring fond words, she yielded not to unavailing sorrow. Of her children she had been fond, exceedingly fond; but for her husband, words are weak to express the entire, the engrossing love, she felt for him. Even her little ones were dearer on that account; and now her own sorrow was forgotten in her anxiety to assuage his bitter grief, to pour balm into that wounded heart. Not even in the first days of their marriage had she been so kind, so thoughtful, so affectionate; and Herbert was at last roused from his sorrow, by observing the sad changes care and anxiety were making in his beloved wife.

He, in his turn, now became the comforter; and so in time they learned to think and speak calmly of their trial. Their oldest child was still spared to them, and the parents rejoiced in his bright promise for the future, and were happy, although a sigh would rise, or a tear fall, as some memento of the lost ones recalled their sorrow.

A year passed away, and Herbert was suddenly summoned to the death-bed of his niece. He instantly obeyed the call, and hastened to the house he had not entered since the day when he had contrasted the misery of its inmates with the happiness of his own. His feelings were of the most distressing character, and he was little prepared to meet his nephew, whose joyful countenance appeared so out of place. The secret was soon told—the mother was dying; but the father had his wish, and a son had at last gladdened the heart of John Arrington.

Astonished at the coolness with which Herbert listened to this latter news, he could not refrain from inquiring if he "recollected how that affected the prospects of his son," and was only reminded of his mistake when he saw the contemptuous glance his uncle bestowed upon him, and heard his command to "lead him instantly to the bedside of his dying wife."

There were but few words passed between the uncle and niece; and in less than half an hour after his arrival, she had left sorrow, despair and anguish; and before him lay a cold pale face, whose smile reminded him of the innocents he had lost. John Arrington did not feign a grief he did not feel, nor did he offer the slightest objection to his wife's wishes in regard to the little girls. He thanked his uncle for relieving him of such a charge, gave him all the dresses, jewelry and furniture that had belonged to their mother, and promised never to interfere in anything pertaining to their future lives, giving them solely to him.

Herbert bore them home carefully and tenderly, and gave them into the loving, motherly arms held out to receive them; and both wept as they looked on these treasures, motherless, and cast out from a father's love; and both thought on the little girls that had once graced their own fireside, and welcomed these forlorn ones to replace them.

For several days Mrs. Arrington could not realize that such happiness was hers, and she would gaze for hours on the little faces so fondly turned to her own, or creep softly to their little bed, to make sure that she had them still. But when she saw that to her husband they were each day becoming dearer, that they had taken the place in his heart once occupied by their own, that he had resumed his cheerfulness, and could be merry with the gayest among their evening gathering, she blessed them in the fulness of her heart, and poured out on them the boundless treasures of a mother's love.

We must now pass over fifteen years, during which time but few changes took place in the circumstances of any of our friends, the Arrington family. Philip was more miserly, more ill natured, and hated women more cordially than ever. He was now nearly seventy-four years of age. Herbert and his wife were but little changed; affairs had prospered with them, and they looked cheerful and happy.

Their son—young Herbert—was a fine young man of two-and-twenty, the pride and joy of his parents, and the delight of his cousins. Eveline and Grace were still with their kind friends, and none could have supposed that they were other than the daughters of the house. Loving and beloved, they knew not the want of a parent's kindness ; for in their treatment of her children, Herbert and his wife faithfully performed their promise to the mother.

John Arrington and his young son still resided at the house where his wife had died ; but they had few servants, and the establishment was reduced to the lowest scale. To indulge his darling and spoiled child, the doting father made the greatest sacrifices of his comfort and convenience, and deprived himself of luxuries made absolutely necessary by custom and habit. But John Arrington was a changed man. His whole thought and hope was centered on the possession of his brother's splendid fortune, and his whole care and devotion on the object by which it was to be obtained. On this son he lavished the fondest affection ; and the haughty and imperious man, before whom his gentle wife was wont to tremble in terror, was now the slave of a wilful, obstinate boy.

To such a pitch had young Philip's authority reached, that the few attendants they were obliged to keep always gave the preference to the son's commands, even if in opposition to their master's.

It annoyed John Arrington that his son was not known to be the heir to his uncle ; that in the eyes of others, this object of his fond hopes was no other than a common youth. He at last wrote to his uncle, reminding him of his promise, and asking him to acknowledge Philip as the inheritor of his property.

The answer was short and unsatisfactory ; the old man merely reminded him that he was not dead yet, that his will did not go into effect until that event should happen, and that there might yet be a score of young Arringtons born ere he left the world. As a characteristic finish, he begged permission to inform him that young Herbert was now a man, and in all probability would soon marry.

Since the birth of his own son, Mr. Arrington had lost that ill feeling towards his cousin that he once indulged ; but now his animosity returned with double force, and he dreaded to hear his name spoken, lest it should be accompanied with ill tidings.

It was at this unlucky time that a letter arrived from his uncle Herbert, announcing the approaching marriage of Eveline and young Herbert. The writer thought it his duty to announce the news to her father, but merely as a matter of form, not dreaming that he would object to so favorable an alliance for his daughter.

Words cannot express Mr. Arrington's feelings on perusing this letter ; but when the first emotions of rage and annoyance were over, he wrote an answer little in accordance with their expectations. He insisted on all such ideas being immediately given up, on pain of the instant removal of his daughter ; and gave more than sufficient reason to delay the marriage in the coarse terms in which he spoke of the young man. To his daughter he wrote a fierce, angry denunciation of her wilful and presumptuous intention, threatening to instantly take her from those who, he said, were teaching her to forget her parent, and act in disobedience to his wishes.

To the young couple, these letters brought sadness and sorrow ; but Herbert tried the effect of an appeal to his feelings, and also reminded him of the promise given at the time the girls came under his charge. But remonstrances and appeals were alike vain, and Herbert and Eveline were obliged to give up all bright prospects for the present, trusting to him to make some favorable change in their affairs.

It was about this time, and only a few days after receiving his nephew's letter, that Philip Arrington, the old and tottering man, the woman hater, the miser, gave up all his lifetime resolutions, and married. In some law suit he had accidentally become acquainted with a widow lady, by the name of Brown. It happened that Mrs. Brown's evidence was of great use to the old lawyer, and he had several times called at her house. During these visits he had been struck with the beauty of Mrs. Brown's young daughter ; all his prejudices melted away, and he made her an offer of his hand. It was of course refused, and then the old man commenced a series of attacks on the widow's property that at last left her dependent on him for a home. He had calculated well on the success of his manoeuvres, and when the alternative came, that the widow should leave her home, or Maria become his wife, he was not surprised that the tender, loving girl should sacrifice herself for her mother's sake.

They were married very privately, and few even of his most intimate acquaintances were aware of the fact. Her mother was suffered to remain in her home, with a very trifling sum to maintain her ; and the old miser's establishment was the same as ever, save that a sweet, sunny face, and a graceful figure, flitted through the old dark rooms like a prisoned angel. The old housekeeper, jealous of the young wife, strove to render her lot as uncomfortable as possible ; and the poor girl was often inclined to think that better had she braved the worst, and supported her mother with her labor, than thus have doomed herself to certain misery. Of course, Philip did not inform his brother and nephew of this change in his affairs, wishing to avoid all comments on his inconsistency, and also to give them an unpleasant surprise, should it be possible to maintain the secret until his death.

Not satisfied with the prohibition he had given to his daughter's marriage, John Arrington paid a visit to his long neglected children, and had the happiness of finding that his cousin, disappointed of obtaining Eveline's hand, was on the eve of a journey to the continent. He was astonished at the improvement a few years had made in his children, and much struck with the loveliness of Grace, who was a very little girl when he last saw her. Instead of a pale, sickly looking child, he beheld a beautiful young girl, whose slender form and happy, childlike movements filled him with admiration. He watched her attentively as she flitted through the room, now hastening to perform some kind office for her she called mother, and anon flying to the side of her adopted father to bespeak his sympathy for some destitute protegee of her own. The father's heart swelled with bitter feelings as he witnessed the marks of affection his children bestowed on others, and reflected that all this love he had flung away.

It was impossible for Eveline to disguise her sorrow at the approaching departure of young Herbert, and equally impossible for her to receive her father with even a show of fondness, while suffering from his cruel caprice. The tearful eyes and pale cheeks of the sorrowful girl more than once inclined him to revoke his unjust commands, but the thought of another ever taking the place of his darling son, quickly drove such relents from his heart.

Mr. Arrington returned home; Herbert and Eveline parted with their troth-plight unbroken, and their faith unchanged; and Grace was obliged to comfort her dear friends for the loss of their son, and cheer her sister with hopes of better days. All unconscious of the passion so fatal to Eveline's peace, she felt the deepest compassion for her misery, and viewed with sad surprise the crushing grief that at times overwhelmed her. She could understand her aunt's quiet sadness, and her uncle's reveries, and knew how to cheer the one and to dissipate the other; but her sister's passionate distress frightened her, and she mentally resolved to shun the dangers of love. She could not imagine that any stranger would ever usurp the place now occupied in her heart by her adopted parents, or that any home would ever seem so pleasant as the one where her happy young years had been spent. To her, the deceitful passion, with all its train of hopes and fears, and sentimental longings, and mysterious sympathies, was a sealed book, and she felt little inclination to penetrate the hidden secret.

Eveline and Grace Arrington were as unlike in their dispositions as in looks, and few would have thought they were so near a relationship to each other, to judge by the difference in all their thoughts, habits and actions.

Eveline was like her father—a tall, stately figure, perfect features, and at times a proudly flashing eye, gave an idea of haughtiness rather repelling on a first acquaintance; but she possessed rare virtues, and, thanks to the careful training of her youth, her faults were few and not conspicuous. From earliest childhood she had loved her cousin, and been beloved in return; and having no inducement to flirt with others, it was for Herbert, and for him alone, that the dark eyes sent forth joyous flashes, the raven tresses were disposed in the most bewitching manner, and the most becoming robes were donned. To others, Eveline was coldly polite, or proudly indifferent; and, when displeased, could speak sharp cutting words, too bitter to be easily forgotten or forgiven. It was this peculiarity that had caused her to be more feared than loved by those on whom she did not condescend to bestow her affection; but Herbert and Grace had no cause to complain of lack of kindness; on them she bestowed an intensity of love, and they seemed to occupy her whole heart.

But far different was the disposition of the lovely Grace. Too kind and tender to inflict pain herself, she invariably sought to heal the wounds her sister caused, and rarely failed in administering a balm for injured feelings; for who could stand the bewitching eloquence of one so good, so beautiful, and so full of sympathy for all trouble? Little wonder was it then, that with her attractions, Grace Arrington was the object of numerous attentions, or that her adopted parents at times feared that another would soon rob them of their pet daughter. But Grace received the offerings to her charms with the most childish simplicity, and would gaily repeat to her mother the fine compliments bestowed on her by her friends, as she indiscriminately termed her acquaintances of both sexes. If jested with on the score of her lovers, she would shake back her bright curls, and with a merry light in her blue eyes, and her lips wreathed in smiles, deny the charge, again and again declaring that she knew not the meaning of the word love.

"Why, Grace!" her mother would exclaim, "what a little deceiver you must be!" while the father would look up from his reading with a look of pretended reproach on his countenance.

"O, mama! I don't mean that," Grace would exclaim, putting her arms fondly round her neck; "but that love that makes people sigh and weep, and look pale." And she would glance across the room at her sister, who, lost in a reverie, was unconscious of the conversation.

But Grace was to see the day when she also should "sigh and weep, and look pale;" when she should learn the difference between love, the master passion, and that fond affection she bore to her relations.

Soon after Herbert's departure, their list of visitors had been increased by the arrival at home of a Major Bradford, a distant cousin of the Arrington family, and an old school chum of Herbert Arrington, senior. He had been on foreign service for many years, and on his return to England, hastened to renew the old friendship with his cousin.

As the major's regiment was quartered not far from his cousin's home, he soon formed the habit of spending a portion of each day in the society of the beautiful young girls who adorned it; and they, in return, were pleased with a friend who united the many agreeable and interesting qualities of their new acquaintance.

Major Bradford was handsome, rich, and fifty-one. In early life he had formed one or two attachments, but his peculiar life had prevented his ever becoming very deeply attached to any lady. As he advanced in life he gave up all thought of forming an alliance, and though many would have rejoiced in being the choice of the handsome major, he contented himself with a uniform friendliness of manner to all ladies.

On Eveline and her sister he bestowed an unusual share of attention—partly on account of their sad history, and partly because he found them superior to the generality of young ladies. He was particularly pleased with Grace, but at first the preference was not mutual—the gay girl professing herself afraid of one who had seen so much of life; so she was rather shy of him at first. But as month after month passed on, and the agreeable major still continued his visits, a great change was perceptible in the looks and manners of Grace; she no longer moved through the house with sweet songs on her lips, and appeared very sad at times. But her color brightened, and her eye sparkled, as the hour drew near when the major usually called, and when duty prevented his appearance, would sigh and look pale, and even give way to a few secret tears.

That their darling was much changed, the parents were painfully assured, and they also came to a correct conclusion in regard to the cause;

but as to whom the person was, they were at fault. They both supposed it to be a young man, who had always been one of Grace's most ardent admirers, and were satisfied with her choice.

Mrs. Arrington and Eveline were going out one morning to pay some visits, and after vainly coaxing Grace (who pleaded a headache) to accompany them, insisted on her resting in her darkened room until their return; but scarcely were they out of sight, when she rose from her couch, and proceeded to arrange her hair and dress with unusual pains. She then descended to the parlor, and seating herself at the instrument, commenced practising a beautiful and difficult piece of music, lent to her by the major.

She had succeeded in conquering the difficulties, and was playing with animation and spirit, when startled by the sound of a step she looked round, and the major was beside her. With a start and a blush she half rose from her seat, but recovering herself welcomed him, began to talk about the music, and requested him to explain some parts that still puzzled her a little. The conversation soon became animated, and she forgot her first awkwardness at having to receive him alone. The major strove to be entertaining, the more as he saw how happy his young companion was in his society; and after prolonging his stay to an unusual length, took his leave, with the conviction, that of all charming young women, Grace was the most bewitching.

That night, long after Eveline had slumbered, did Grace sit at her window and muse on the events of the day; and at the same hour the major was alone in his room, his head resting on his hand, and his eyes fixed vacantly on the fire burning cheerily in the grate. And as he gazed, a golden-haired vision seemed to rise at his side, and loving blue eyes were turned inquiringly to his own; and he again heard a sweet voice ask gentle questions, and again watched little white hands and slender fingers fly over the keys.

"What folly!" exclaimed the major, hastily rising. "Such a mere child, and at this time of life, too!" And he sought to banish his musings in slumber; but again he saw that bright vision, heard that sweet voice, and again felt the touch of those soft hands. With the morning came recollection and resolution, and he again said, "What folly!"

It was almost a year after Philip Arrington had written his nephew the letter mentioned before, when the news came that the old man was dead—news only too welcome to the expectant nephew and his son. As the brother and nephew were requested to attend the funeral ceremony, and be present at the reading of the will, they lost no time in journeying into B—shire, and arrived in time to join the few mourners that attended the old miser to his last resting-place.

On returning to his late home, an elderly gentleman—a lawyer, and an intimate acquaintance of the deceased—produced the will and proceeded to break the seals. Ere he opened it, however, he looked round on the group of anxious faces, and with a grim smile, said “he supposed all present were familiar with the intentions of the deceased in relation to the disposal of his fortune?” Murmurs of “yes” sounded through the room, and John Arrington drew a long breath, as if oppressed with some evil foreboding. The old lawyer then proceeded to read the will, which was very brief, merely mentioning small legacies to his brother and his son; and his nephew, John Arrington and his son; and bequeathing the bulk of his fortune to the “youngest of the name of Arrington.” When it was finished, the old man carefully folded up the parchment, and interrupting the congratulations all present were showering on young Philip, who stood proudly beside his father, he gravely asked them if they would like to see the heir.

Each one looked at the other in astonishment; but John Arrington exclaimed in despairing accents, “By heavens! I knew there was some treachery!” and sank, pale and fainting, into a chair, while every eye was turned to the opening door, and beheld with wonder the entrance of a fair and delicate looking girl, bearing an infant in her arms.

The truth soon flashed on every one present. The old man had married, intending to disappoint the hopes of his relations by leaving his property to his wife; but Providence had sent him a little son, who of course became the heir. Shortly after the child's birth, death called the old man away.

To John Arrington this unexpected shock proved fatal; he barely lived to reach his home; but while speech and reason lasted, he ceased not to impress on his uncle his wishes respecting his children. After the father's death, Herbert was speedily summoned home, the prohibition to his alliance with Eveline having been removed, and with joyful haste obeyed the welcome mandate; and on his arrival preparations were made for a speedy celebration of their marriage.

The clouds were removed from the brow of the young betrothed; but as her sister grew happier, so did Grace lose her gaiety, and at length excited the serious fears of her friends by her altered looks. But since that happy day, when she had received Major Bradford alone, poor Grace had suffered all the misery of uncertainty and disappointment, arising from the strange alteration in her friend's manner, and the unusual coolness with which he treated her. He no longer appeared to take any interest in her music, no longer offered to accompany her in her visits of charity to the neighboring cottages, and so seldom addressed her in conversation that she at last ceased to address him, and a coldness gradually grew up between them. In vain she tried to recollect some word or act of hers that might have given offence; in vain she strove to banish him from her mind; and all unused to care and anxiety, she daily grew paler.

It was now that the young man, before alluded to, solicited Mr. Arrington's permission for the honor of his daughter's hand, but at the same time acknowledged he had not received very flattering encouragement from the lady. Pleased with this opportunity of discovering her sentiments, Mr. Arrington volunteered to plead his cause with Grace, and dismissed the young gentleman with a heart full of hope. He kept his word, and used every argument to induce her to listen favorably to his suit, but without success, and she at last reproached him with wishing to get rid of her.

“My child, that is not like yourself,” was his gentle answer. “You know I only study your happiness, and I think it can be best promoted by a union with one so worthy in every respect as this young man. But I will urge you no more, and only ask if there is any hope that you may change your mind?”

“No—never! Give him no reason to think I can ever look favorably on his suit, for that is impossible.”

“Grace, my poor child, there is some mystery here; and you could not speak so decidedly were you not aware that another possessed your heart. Why will you not place confidence in my age and experience, and let me know the secret of all your sorrow?”

“I will tell all, father,” the young girl passionately exclaimed. “I do love another; but he knows it not, and my love is not returned.”

That evening Major Bradford announced his intention of soon leaving England. “He had lived so long abroad that his native land had become distasteful to him.”

Scarcely had the words escaped his lips, when Grace, who had been seated beside her father, leaned against his shoulder, and with a low moan fainted away. The heat of the room had overpowered her, they all said; but as Mr. Arrington bore her to her chamber, he knew differently, and in his own mind resolved to make an effort to save her from despair.

That night, when the major left, his friend accompanied him, and with all due regard for Grace's delicacy, made known his suspicions. Words cannot describe the delight of Major Bradford at this unlooked-for happiness, and he even feared to indulge in the hope that it was true, lest disappointment should be his lot.

"I cannot realize it yet," he said to his friend at parting, "after struggling so long with feelings that I imagined were hopeless, to hear that my own blindness hindered my happiness."

There was soon a great improvement in the health and spirits of Grace Arrington. Blessed with a return of affection, she resumed her accustomed gaiety, spreading light around her.

Major Bradford was devoted in his attentions to his young betrothed; and if at times a fear crossed his mind when he remembered the disparity of their ages, the consciousness of possessing her innocent and confiding heart banished his vague uneasiness. He gratified her by taking all possible interest in the bridal preparations, and not even young Herbert could play the lover with a better grace than did the accomplished major, whose tenderness kept a perpetual watch over the happiness of his bride.

At last there was a double wedding in Mr. Arrington's beautiful parlor, and the house was filled with gay guests; and Mrs. Arrington vainly tried to keep back her tears, as she listened to the words that gave her darling to another. And then the parting came, and Mr. Arrington took the young girl in his arms, and invoking a blessing on her head, gave her to her husband, who led her to the carriage, and in a few moments she was whirled away from the scenes of her youth.

But Major Bradford had provided a splendid home for his lovely young bride, and Grace found herself surrounded with all the luxuries that wealth can procure, and which his long residence abroad had rendered necessary to her husband's comfort.

Herbert and Eveline made their home with their parents, and the old couple lived long to enjoy the happiness of their children, and died surrounded by them and their grand-children. Philip Arrington's young widow was rewarded for her self-sacrifice by having a comfortable home to give her mother in her old age; and a few years after that painful period in her life, married a highly respectable man, and had the happiness of seeing her son grow up a very different character from his father. John Arrington's son, after the death of his father, refused to own his relations, and went to London. Here he lived a short life of dissipation, and died in solitary poverty ere he reached twenty years.

THE VEILED PICTURE.

A story is told of two artist lovers, both of whom sought the hand of a noted painter's daughter. And the question, which of the two should possess himself of the prize so earnestly coveted by both, having come finally to the father, he promised to give his child to the one that could paint the best. So each strove for the maiden, with the highest skill his genius could command. One painted a picture of fruit, and displayed it to the father's inspection in a beautiful grove, where gay birds sang sweetly among the foliage, and all nature rejoiced in the luxuriance of bountiful life. Presently the birds came down to the canvass of the young painter, and attempted to eat the fruit he had pictured there. In his surprise and joy at the young artist's skill, the father declared that no one could triumph over that.

Soon, however, the second lover came with his picture, and it was veiled.

"Take the veil from your painting," said the old man.

"I leave that to you," said the young artist with simplicity.

The father of the young and lovely maiden then approached the veiled picture, and attempted to uncover it. But imagine his astonishment, when, as he attempted to take off the veil, he found the veil itself to be a picture! We need not say who was the lucky lover; for if the artist, who deceived the birds by skill in painting fruit, manifested great powers of art, he who could so veil his canvass with the pencil as to deceive a skilful master, was surely the greatest artist.—N. Y. Atlas.

A MATRIMONIAL LOTTERY.

A young lady, residing in the arrondissement of Poitiers, France, has conceived the idea of putting herself up in a lottery. There are to be 300 tickets, 1000 francs each, and to the fortunate winner she will give herself and the 800,000 francs as dowry. The lady has attached some prudent conditions to the tickets. She will only sell them to persons whom she may think will suit her, and to ascertain that point, exacts a half hour's conversation with each applicant. There is no limit of age imposed, and more than one ticket may be taken by one person. The lottery will be drawn on the 25th of November next, at the Mayor's office of the town where she resides. A number of Englishmen have already become purchasers, and others are flocking in from all quarters.—London Examiner.

SOCIETY IN ST. PETERSBURGH.

In no place is fashion so observed as in this capital; this shows how unripe our development is; our way of dressing is foreign to us. In Europe, people merely dress; we always are in costume, and therefore we are afraid of the sleeves being too large, or the collar being too narrow. In Paris, people fear nothing but being dressed without taste; in London, they fear nothing but catching a cold; in Italy everybody goes as he likes. But was one to exhibit the lion of the Newsky promenade at St. Petersburg, those battalions all alike in their fast buttoned coats, an Englishman would believe them to be a division of policemen.—Herzen's Siberia.

HOPE ON.

BY M. J. LOVERING.

View not the past with sorrow,
 O, banish all regret—
 Hope whispers on the morrow,
 "We may be happy yet."
 Thank God for every blessing,
 Pray for his care in need;
 That goodly gift possessing,
 Thou wilt be blest indeed.

In every life there is a scene
 Of bitter grief to all,
 And oft doth memory's darts, I ween,
 Those fearful scenes recall.
 But though our early life was clouded
 By cares we can't forget,
 Let each bitter thought be shrouded,
 And we may be happy yet.

THE SURVEYOR.

BY GIDDINGS H. BALLOU.

THE hot summer sun beat down on the Albany road on one day in the year 1777, as a tired and dusty traveller turned his feet to Deacon Hawley's red farm-house, just beyond the western slope of the Green Mountains. Lifting the latch with the assurance of one used to the simple and hospitable country ways, he inquired of those within if he might be provided with some refreshment in the shape of a bowl of bread and milk, or any other eatable which might be at hand.

He had travelled far, he said, and finding it getting about noon, and being tired and hungry, he had made bold to stop at the first dwelling he met with.

"Certainly, friend, certainly," replied the honest deacon, who had just come in from the field with his son Nathan. "Sit down and make yourself at home. We're just about taking a smack ourselves, and if you'll step into the back room with us presently, and help clear the table, we shall be very glad of your assistance. Rather dusty travellin', hey?"

"Quite. It's worse than anything I've seen this summer," replied the stranger, as he followed his host into the adjoining room.

"Wife, sir," said the deacon, waving his hand towards a rather comely-looking dame. "Niece Emma, Mr. — ah, what may I call your name, sir?"

"I call my name Lewis," replied the stranger.

"Ah, yes, Lewis. Wife, just put on a bowl with some milk. Let me help you, sir, to some of the meat. No relation to any of the Lewises around here, are you?"

"No, sir. I came from ten miles this side of Burlington."

"Ah, long way that. Any news going on at the lakes?"

"Not much, when I left. Our people were not gaining ground much there."

"No, no. It is a hard match for our raw soldiers, against that army of Burgoyne's, all in fine discipline, with plenty of material, and no lack of king's money to back them. Nathan, Nathan, you and your old father must not sneak at home much longer, now that affairs are getting to the pinch. Well, there are our names on the list, and when they want us, our old queen's arms are ready."

Young Lewis (for the stranger could not have been more than twenty-one) nodded his head in assent to the patriotic sentiment, and applied himself to the viands, in the discussion of which he was not so much absorbed as to be insensible to the presence of the female portion of the family. He was a gallant, quick eyed young fellow, with a sunburnt cheek, and a frank, prepossessing countenance. Such an one is never wanting in sympathy with the fair sex, wheresoever its representatives be found, or however scanty be the personal attractions which they may chance to possess. But neither Dame Hawley nor her niece was deficient in this respect, making due allowance for the touch of age on the features of the elder. The niece sat opposite to Lewis at the table, and he could not, if he had chosen, have avoided turning his eyes frequently upon her. He thought that never in his life had he met a more innocent and charming countenance. Nay, he might even have impaired his appetite for the food before him, had he not, taking warning from a rising blush, made his eyes if not his mind more attentive to the play of his knife and fork. He therefore copied as closely as he might, the example of the deacon and Nathan, and had tolerably satisfied the cravings of his appetite by the time that the others were ready to draw from the table.

"Going south, friend?" inquired his host, as they rose together.

"No, sir," was the answer. "At least, no great distance. I am on surveying business, connected with the New York dispute. We Vermonters, having just declared our independence of York State, are about running the boundary line, and I am going to operate in the lower part of the State. I sent a few instruments before me, and expected to meet one of my assistants at the village back. However, he failed me, and I did not think it worth my while to wait."

"I should think the York assembly might know by this time how the matter is likely to end," observed the deacon. "They're making trouble without any use; and at this time above all things. Why, there was Squire Briggs, who lives at Brandridge just across the line, came to me awhile ago, and wanted to get me to take a warrant as a York justice of peace. The varmint! I saw what his game was, right off. Squire, says I, I'll—wal, I did come nigh saying what I should be rather sorry for. But I sent him away with a flea in his ear."

Once started on the subject, the good deacon displayed considerable warmth of feeling. He dilated on charters, territorial government, and popular rights, interposing a brief essay on the history of the Hampshire grants. Lewis rendered all the attention he was able to bestow, while Emma, as she busied herself in removing the dishes, regarded her uncle with admiration as being a paragon of historic and juridical knowledge. Meanwhile the "yes sirs," and "no sirs," of Lewis, were applied a little at random, from the fact that his thoughts centered to the liquid blue eyes of the niece, rather than to the weather-stained brow of the farmer.

"Sorry you are going," said the good natured deacon, as Lewis rose to take leave. "If you are going to be about here, as you say, just drop in and see us. We don't fall in with much company here, especially now, when so many of our people are over yonder looking after Burgoyne. So come as often as you can."

And Lewis did come, once and again. His employment detained him for some two or three weeks in the neighborhood, and within that time he found frequent opportunity to visit the deacon's family, into whose favor he much ingratiated himself. From this partiality, however, we must except Nathan, who regarded Lewis with most decided coolness. The secret of his dislike lay in the fact that he possessed a most decided regard for his fair cousin, and feared, with good reason, the intrusion of the young surveyor. And his jealous watchfulness presently found sufficient to poison his own peace, and to force on his notice the growing attachment between Emma and Lewis. With the latter he had more than once endeavored to frame a quarrel, but without success, till one evening, after Lewis had left the house, young Hawley who met him on the roadside, remarked in a sneering manner, that for a peaceful surveyor he seemed to know a deal about camp matters and military evolutions; at least, if one were to judge by his conversation.

"I daresay," he continued, "that you think we raw bushwhackers will take down all you say for gospel."

"What do you mean by that?" said Lewis, flushing red at the rude tone of the speaker.

"Mean?" retorted the other, impetuously. "Why, that we have had enough of your high-bred airs. I, for one, am not going to 'whoa' and 'gee' with your counterfeit pretensions any longer. There's some foxy trick or other about you; who knows that you are not a tory spy, or something equally bad?"

Lewis, in his surprise and anger at this unexpected address, made a step forward, as if with the intention of instantly repaying the insult.

"Hands off, my lad!" exclaimed Hawley, throwing himself into an attitude of defence. "Bullying won't go down with me."

The other made no reply, but biting his lips till the blood came, turned away, followed by a low laugh from Nathan.

"I rather guess I've put his nose out of joint for awhile," said the young farmer, looking with a sullen smile on the receding figure of Lewis.

Whatever might have been the cause, the latter did not appear at the deacon's, where his absence caused repeated remark. Nathan anxiously observed the fact that Emma evidently missed the visits of the young surveyor, and had lost much of her accustomed cheerfulness in consequence. By all the arts and assiduities which he could bring, he endeavored to recommend himself in place of the absent gallant. But his efforts were all in vain. At last his patience gave way to despair.

"Why is it," he said to her one day when they were alone, "why is it that you treat me with such coldness? Why is it that you pay no regard to the affection which you know I entertain for you? Is it because you love this stranger, who came, with a smooth, and most likely a lying tongue, no one really knows from whence, or on what business? I believe that he and his stories are alike false and deceitful. Do not then despise my honest love, and cling to the remembrance of one, who is, very like, a counterfeit, and who, at any rate, seems little inclined to present himself again before those who may chance to detect his real character. Do you know that I fancy him to be a British or tory spy, or something of the sort? Doubtless he is well enough pleased to amuse himself on his travels by playing with the affections of a trustful country-girl like yourself."

Emma seized her cousin's hand, and bursting into tears, rested her head on his shoulder.

"Nathan," she said, "you wrong me, cruelly wrong me. I do not despise you, nor am I ungrateful for your kind offices. But I cannot give you the love which I acknowledge that I entertain for another. He loves me. Do not be harsh, I pray you, in your thoughts of me, or in your surmises with regard to him. I own that there is a mystery about him. He has hinted as much to me, and in a manner which showed that he himself was opposed to the necessity of concealment. He told me, when we parted, that it would be long before we should meet again, very probably not till the close of the war. I fear that your surmises are in some part true. Yet do not be unjust. Honorable men have disguised themselves as spies ere now, and at all events I cannot believe he is a dishonorable man. Rely upon it, if even in arms against our cause, he surely entertains no ill design against us. But he knows as well as yourself, that I would never marry an enemy to my country. Do not then be unkind to me, Nathan, nor take advantage of what I have told you. I will love you as a sister would, and let that suffice, since I can go no further in my regard."

"Say no more, Emma," replied her cousin. "I see it is vain to reason with you. I will take no unfair advantage, though I wish that the day had never shone which brought his unlucky visage to our house."

The summer passed on, and the routine of the farm was scarce interrupted by the sound of the distant war. But about the middle of August, and past noonday, a horseman galloped up to the field near the roadside in which the deacon and his son were at work. The rider took off his three cornered hat, and waving it, shouted:

"Deacon, the time has come. Stark has ordered out all the militia, every one that can carry a gun. The British and Hessians are marching towards Bennington. To camp then, to camp!"

So saying he dashed off to spread the alarm which before midnight had flown a hundred miles. In less than half an hour, the deacon and Nathan were on their way towards the encampment which Stark had formed not far from Bennington village. On their arrival they were immediately assigned their places, and on the following morn were under march to meet the enemy. They fell in with advanced parties of the latter, consisting for the most part of Indian auxiliaries, and sharp skirmishes continued during the rest of the day, resulting much to the discouragement of these unstable savages. The next day a storm of rain poured down, and both armies remained inactive for the greater part. But the morrow arrived, the eventful moment when Stark, in the pithy and homely speech which has made his name immortal, nerved his rude levies to the fatal charge. The word was given, and with a single cheer the motley colored ranks swept steadily but with accelerating speed, on the entrenchments of the enemy. The deadly cannon swept through them, but not a heart wavered. Once more, and with a wild huzza, the mountain men pouring over the breast-work, grappled with their foes. The contest was a desperate one. Farmer Hawley and his son were separated from each other at the commencement, and in the hand-to-hand struggle which ensued, the former was closely pressed, and would certainly have fallen by the bayonet of a Hessian, had not the deadly thrust been warded off by the sword of an English officer.

"Lewis!" exclaimed the deacon, as his musket fairly dropped from his hand in amazement. At this moment Nathan rushed up.

"Take that, you traitorous spy," he shouted, discharging his piece at Lewis. His bullet passed through the cap of the latter as he bore back with the troops whom he vainly sought to rally. He was seen to wave his hand with a gesture of deprecation, while an expression of pain flitted across his stained features.

"Hold, Nathan!" said the old deacon, laying his hand on his son's arm. "Whatever be his deserts, remember that to him I owe my life. Harm him not."

Nathan's eyes shone with a fierce sparkle, and shaking his clenched hand towards the retreating foe: "Let him go then," he said, "for this once. But the next time we meet, we will not part so easily. I wonder how Emma will be pleased to find that her favorite has turned out to be nothing more nor less than a British spy!"

The bravery and discipline of the enemy were excited to the utmost against the impetuous valor of the mountain militia, but in two hours from the commencement of the battle, the regulars were forced to fly. They were pursued by the Americans, who, scorning the restraint of their commanders, sped onward in hasty disorder and were thus near offering the enemy an opportunity to retrieve their misfortune, since Colonel Breyman, with a large reinforcement from Burgoyne's army, was rapidly approaching the scene of action. The fugitives gained fresh hope, and rallied to renew the fight. But at this critical moment, when victory seemed ready to desert the mountain king, the sound of life and drum approached from the eastward. The first files of Warner's long-expected New Hampshire regiment appear in the distance, hurrying to share the efforts of their fellow-patriots. They march on to anticipate the enemy. The scattered soldiery regain their ranks and hasten forward. The battle commences again with redoubled violence; but at sunset all is over. The fame of Bennington is sealed afresh, and one more advantage gained towards the assurance of American freedom.

Years passed before English foot again touched the mountain soil. The larum of war ceased from the land, and the soldier laid by the destroying sword for the peaceful scythe and plough. Yet time and death remained at work. A virulent epidemic carried off the worthy deacon and his wife in the midst of a hale and well spent life. The property passed into the hands of Nathan without provision for the young niece. The deacon had intended to make a will which should ensure her a fit maintenance, but had deferred the fulfilment of his intention till he was strack down by sudden death. Emma, left destitute, took refuge in the cottage of an aged relative, and, by persevering toil, gained a scanty maintenance. She was deaf to the wishes of Nathan, to be his wife. Her steady discouragement of his advances made him gloomy and morose; and Emma, besides the griefs she had already experienced, felt an added pain in encountering his vindictive glances.

One evening on the anniversary of the Bennington battle, a stranger alighted from his horse at the door of the village inn. His dress was scrupulously plain, but there was something in his appearance that impressed the chance beholders with the sense of superior station. On entering the public room and inquiring for the host, Lewis (for it was he) was informed that the landlord was absent but would soon wait on him.

Having given his horse in charge, Lewis was shown into a private apartment. Soon steps approached, the door opened, and Nathan Hawley stood before his astonished guest. He hardly entered the room ere he recoiled, and his countenance, agitated by a hateful recognition, became overspread with a ghastly pallor; Lewis instantly sprang forward with outstretched hands to detain him.

"Stay, Nathan," he said, "and listen to me. I never harmed you knowingly. If I have crossed your path in love, or caused you suffering, know that I, too, have suffered, have endured suspense, fear and doubting. Of what is past I now say nothing. Fortune has buffeted me sorely since I was in arms against you; but at last she has looked on me with favor. I have recently become Lord March by the death of a previous heir. I have seized the first opportunity to return to a spot I have never forgotten, for the purpose of putting to proof the hopes I never ceased to entertain, whatever may be the foundation on which I have rested them. Let us not be enemies, I pray you. Suffer me to claim you as a friend, a brother."

For a moment Nathan did not answer. The veins in his forehead swelled, his lips quivered with struggling emotions.

"You have conquered me," he said, at last. "But it is through her that you conquer. She loves you still; but she is dying by inches. I, for one, had supposed you but trifled with her affections. Perhaps she, herself, began to fear the same. But I will say no more. Go, bid her live and be happy, even though it be at the expense of my own happiness."

"You are a noble fellow," said Lord March; "and there is many a fair one who would gladly repair your disappointment. Mark me well, Nathan, when I tell you that it will not be long before you will find a mate by whom my words will be proved true. But I must hasten to find her, in search of whom I came. Many thanks for inspiring me with the belief that I am not yet forgotten!"

We will not describe the meeting of the long separated lovers, tempered in its gladness by some saddening memories on either side. But joy is a medicine more potent than all the drugs of science, and in a few weeks, Lord March bore away to English halls a blushing New-England bride. A year later her husband received a long letter from Nathan, announcing his marriage with one of her own schoolmates, a lovely and amiable girl.

EXTRAVAGANCE OF TURKISH LADIES.

Life in the harem would be insupportable were it not for the stimulants of luxury and dress; and the extravagance of the favorites of the seraglio in particular is proverbial. A correspondent writing from Constantinople says: "These ladies have at length run up such terrible long bills, that the Sultan has just caused all the creditors to be called together, and their accounts examined. The charges of the dealers being judged too high, as is usual, both in the East and elsewhere, the merchants were obliged to consent to a deduction of ten per cent. on their accounts; and this point being satisfactorily settled, the Sultan has engaged to pay up the amount (no less than fifty-four millions of piasters), in monthly instalments, out of his private purse. But to think of a company of women, secluded from the rest of the world, and with nothing better to do than to run up bills for silks, gauzes, cashmeres, jewels, sweetmeats, and cosmetics, to the tune of fifty-four millions of piasters, equal to ($4,320,000)!"—New York Mirror.

Mary Howitt, in the Athenaeum, states that she has received information from a Swedish gentleman, Mr. Charles E. Sodling, living in Brazil, that would lead to the supposition of there being traces of ancient Scandinavians in South America before the days of Columbus and the Spanish and Portuguese invaders.

FLOWERS.

BY MATURIN M. BALLOU.

Sweet letters of the angel tongue,
 I've loved ye long and well,
 And never have failed in your fragrance sweet
 To find some secret spell,—
 A charm that has bound me with witching power,
 For mine is the old belief,
 That midst your sweets, and midst your bloom,
 There's a soul in every leaf!

Illumined words from God's own hand,
 How fast my pulses beat,
 As each quick sense in rapture comes,
 Your varied sweets to greet
 Alone and in silence, I love you best,
 For mine is the old belief,
 That midst your sweets, and midst your bloom,
 There's a soul in every leaf!

Ye are prophets sent to this heedless world,
 The skeptic's heart to teach—
 And 'tis well to read your lore aright,
 And mark the creed ye preach.
 I never could pass ye careless by,
 For mine is the old belief,
 That midst your sweets, and midst your bloom,
 There's a soul in every leaf!

THE CRAZY ENGINEER.

FROM THE REPORT OF A PRUSSIAN CONDUCTOR.

BY HORACE B. STANIFORD.

MY train left Danzig in the morning, generally at eight o'clock, but once a week we had to wait for the arrival of the steamer from Stockholm. It was on the morning of the steamer's arrival that I came down from my hotel and found that my engineer had been so seriously injured that he could not run. One of the railway carriages had run over him and broken one of his legs. I went immediately to the engine house to obtain another engineer, for I knew there were three or four in reserve there; but I was disappointed. I inquired for Westphal, and was informed that he had gone to Steegen to see his mother. Gondolpho had been sent on to Königsberg on that road. But where was Mayne? He had leave of absence for two days, and had gone, no one knew whither.

Here was a fix. I heard the puffing of the steamer in the Neufahrwasser, and the passengers would be on hand in fifteen minutes. I ran to the guard and asked them if they knew where there was an engineer. But they did not. I then went to the firemen, and asked if any one of them felt competent to run the engine to Bromberg. Not one of them dared attempt it.

The distance was nearly one hundred miles. What was to be done?

The steamer came to her wharf, and those who were going on by rail came flocking to the station. They had eaten breakfast on board the boat, and were all ready for a fresh start. The baggage was checked and registered; the tickets bought; the different carriages pointed out to the various classes of passengers, and the passengers themselves seated. The train was in readiness in the long station house, and the engine was steaming and puffing away impatiently in the distant firing-house.

It was past nine o'clock.

"Come—why don't we start?" growled an old fat Swede, who had been watching me narrowly for the last fifteen minutes.

And upon this there was a general chorus of anxious inquiry, which soon settled into downright murmuring. At this juncture, some one touched me on the elbow. I turned and saw a stranger standing by my side. I expected he was going to remonstrate with me for my backwardness. In fact, I began to have strong temptations to pull off my uniform, for every anxious eye was fixed upon the glaring badges which marked me as the chief official of the train.

However—this stranger was a middle-aged man, tall and stout, with a face expressive of great energy and intelligence. His eye was black and brilliant—so brilliant that I could not, for the soul of me, gaze steadily into it; and his lips, which were very thin, seemed more like polished marble than like human flesh. His dress was of black throughout, and not only fitted with exact nicety, but was scrupulously clean and neat.

"You want an engineer, I understand," he said, in a low, cautious tone, at the same time gazing quietly about him, as though he wanted no one else to hear what he said.

"I do," I replied. "My train is all ready, and we have no engineer within twenty miles of here."

"Well, sir—I am going to Bromberg—I must go,—and if you can find none other I will run the engine for you."

"Ha!" I uttered, "are you an engineer?"

"I am, sir—one of the oldest in the country; and I am now on my way to Berlin to make arrangements for a great improvement I have invented in the application of steam to locomotion. My name is Martin Kroler. If you wish I will run you as far as Bromberg; and I will show you running that is running."

Was I not fortunate? I determined to accept the man's offer at once, and so I told him. He received my answer with a nod and smile, and then proposed to go and get the engine. I went with him to the house, where we found the iron horse in charge of the fireman, and all ready for the start. Kroller got upon the platform, and I followed him. I had never seen a man betray such peculiar aptness amid the machinery than he did. He let on the steam in an instant, but yet with care and judgment, and he backed up to the baggage carriage with the most exact nicety. I had seen enough to assure me that he was thoroughly acquainted with the business, and I felt composed once more. I gave the engine up to my new man, and then hastened away to the office. The word was passed for all passengers to take their seats, and soon afterwards I waved my hand to the engineer. There was a puff—a groaning of the heavy axetrees—a trembling of the building—and the train was in motion. I leaped upon the platform of the guard carriage, and in a few moments more the station house was behind us.

In less than an hour we reached Dirschau, where we took up the passengers that had come in on the Konigsberg railway. Here I went forward and asked Kroller how he liked the engine. He replied that he liked it much.

"But," he added, with a strange sparkling of the eyes, "wait until you get my improvement, and then you shall see travelling. By the soul of the Virgin Mother, sir, I could run an engine of my construction to the moon in four-and-twenty hours!"

I smiled at what I thought his quaint enthusiasm, and then went back to my station. As soon as the Konigsberg passengers were all on board, and their baggage-crate attached, we started on again.

As soon as all matters had been attended to connected with the new accession of passengers, I went into the guard-carriage and sat down. An early train from Konigsberg had been through two hours before, so we only had one more stopping-place before reaching Bromberg, and that was at Little Oasue, where we took the western mail.

"How we go!" uttered one of the guard, some fifteen minutes after we had left Dirschau.

"The new engineer is trying the speed," I returned, not yet holding any fear.

But ere long, I began to be fearful that he was running a little too fast. The carriages began to sway to and fro, and I could hear the exclamations of fear from the passengers.

"Good heavens!" cried one of the guard, coming in at that moment, "what is that fellow doing? Look, sir, and see how we are going!"

I looked out at the window and found that we were dashing along at a speed never before travelled on that road. Posts, fences, rocks, and trees, flew by in one undistinguishable mass, and the carriage now swayed fearfully. I started to my feet, and met a passenger on the platform. He was one of our chief owners of the road, and was just on his way to Berlin. He was pale and excited.

"Sir," he gasped, "is Martin Kroller on the engine?"

"Yes," I told him.

"Holy Virgin! Didn't you know him?"

"Know him?" I repeated, somewhat puzzled.

"What do you mean? He told me his name was Kroller, and that he was an engineer. We had no one to run the engine, and—"

"You took him!" interrupted the man. "Good heavens, sir, he is as crazy as a man can be! He turned his brain over a new plan for applying steam power. I saw him at the station, but I did not then recognize him, as I was in a hurry. Just now one of the passengers told me that your engineers were all gone this morning, and that you found one who was a stranger to you. Then I knew that the man whom I had seen, was Martin Kroller! He has escaped from the hospital at Stettin. You must get him off some how."

The whole fearful truth was now open to me. The speed of the train was increasing at each moment, and I knew that a few miles more per hour would surely launch us all into destruction. I called to the guard, and then made my way forward as quickly as possible. I reached the after platform of the tender, and there stood Kroller, upon the engine-board, his hat and coat off; his long black hair floating wildly in the wind; his shirt unbuttoned at the throat; his sleeves rolled up; with a pistol in his teeth, and thus glaring upon the fireman who lay motionless upon the fuel. The furnace was stuffed till the very latch of the door was red hot, and the whole engine was quivering and swaying as though it would shiver in pieces!

"Kroller! Kroller!" I cried, at the top of my voice.

The crazy engineer started, and caught the pistol in his hand. Oh! how those great black eyes glared, and how ghastly and frightful the face looked!

"Ha! ha! ha!" he yelled, demoniacally, glaring upon me like a roused lion. "They swore I could not make it! But see! see! See my power! See my new engine! I made it! I made it!—and they were jealous of me. I made it, and when 'twas done they stole it from me! But I've found it. For years I've been wandering in search of my great engine—and they swore it was not made! But I've found it! I knew it when I saw it this morning at Danzig—and I was determined to have it. And I've got it! Ho! ho! ho!—we're off to the moon, I say! By the Virgin Mother we'll be in the moon in four-and-twenty hours!—Down! down, villain! If you move I'll shoot you!"

This last was spoken to the poor fireman who at that moment attempted to rise; and the frightened man sank back again.

"Here's Little Oseue right ahead!" cried one of the guard.

But even as he spoke, the buildings were at hand. A sickening sensation settled upon my heart, for I supposed we were gone now. The houses flew by like lightning—I knew if the officers here had turned the switch as usual, we should be hurled into eternity in one fearful crash! I saw a flash—it was another engine—I closed my eyes—but still we thundered on. The officers had seen our speed, and knowing that we could not haul up at that distance, they had changed the switch, so that we kept on.

But there was sure death ahead if we did not stop. Only fifteen miles ahead was the town of Schwetz, on the Vistula, and at the entrance, near the bank of the river, was a short curve in the road! At the rate we were now going we should be there in a few minutes, for each minute carried us over a mile! The shrieks of the passengers now arose above the crash of the rails, and more terrific than all else, arose the demoniac yells of the mad engineer.

"Merciful Heaven!" gasped the guardman, "there's not a moment of time to lose. Schwetz is close by! If you dare not go, I'll go myself! But hold!" he added. "Let's shoot him!"

At that moment a tall, stout German student came over to the platform where we stood, and he saw that the madman had his heavy pistol aimed at us. He grasped a heavy stick of wood from the tender, and with a steadiness of nerve which I could not have commanded, he hurled it with such force and precision, that he knocked the pistol from the maniac's grasp. I saw the movement, and on the instant that the pistol fell I sprang forward, and the German followed me. I grasped the man by the arm, but—I should have been a mere infant in his mad power had I been alone. He would have hurled me from the platform, had not the student at that moment struck him upon the head with a stick of wood which he had caught as he came over the tender.

Kroller settled down like a dead man, and on the next instant, I shut off the steam, and opened the safety-valve. As the freed steam shrieked and howled in its escape, the speed of the train began to decrease, and in a few moments more, the danger was passed; and as I settled back, entirely overcome by the wild emotions that had raged within me, we began to turn the curve by the river; and before I was fairly recovered the fireman had stopped the train in the station house at Schwetz!

Martin Kroller, still insensible, was taken from the platform, and as we carried him into the guard-room, one of the guard recognized him, and told us that he had been there about two weeks before.

"He came," said the guard, "and swore that an engine, which stood near here, was his. He said it was one he had made to go to the moon in, and that it had been stolen from him. We sent for more help to arrest him, and he fled."

"Well," I replied, with a shudder, "I wish he had approached me in the same way. But he was more cautious at Danzig."

At Schwetz we found an engineer to run the engine to Bromberg; and having taken out the western mail, for the next northern train to take along, we saw that Kroller would be properly attended to, and then started on.

The rest of the trip we run in safety, though I could see that the passengers were not wholly at ease, and would not be until they were entirely clear of the railway. A heavy purse was made up by them for the German student, and he accepted it with much gratitude,—and I was glad of it, for the current of their gratitude to him may have prevented a far different current which might have been poured upon my head for having engaged a madman to run a railway train.

But this is not the end. Martin Kroller remained insensible from the effects of that blow upon the head, nearly two weeks, and when he recovered from that, he was sound in mind again. His insanity was all gone. I saw him about three weeks afterwards, but he had no recollection of me. He remembered nothing of the past year—not even his mad freak on my engine.

But I remembered it, and I remember it still; and people need never fear that I shall ever be imposed upon again by a crazy engineer!

In Chambers' Journal we find allusion made to a process described by Dr. Roberts, an eminent Scotch surgeon, for cauterizing the dental nerve and stopping teeth without pain, by means of a wire applied to the patient's tooth perfectly cold, and afterwards instantaneously heated to the required degree by a small electric battery.

LINES TO AN AGED FRIEND.

~~~~~
 BY DORA DEAN.
 ~~~~~

May Heaven bless thy hoary head,
 For every silver hair
 But tells us of some blessing shed,
 Some solace lent despair.

And Heaven will bless thine open hand
 That giveth to the poor,
 That ne'er hath let a suppliant stand
 Unheeded at thy door.

May every wish that rises up,
 Within thy heart be gained;
 And brimming full be life's last cup,
 Earth's highest joys attained;

Until the time that thou must go
 To render thine account
 Of all thy stewardship below,
 How great so'er the amount.

Then may the God who blest thee here,
 Pronounce thy work "well done,"
 And bid thee enter in his joys,
 Thou good and faithful one;

Where thou mayest listen to his voice,
 And by his throne sit down,
 With every heart thou'lt made rejoice,
 A bright star in thy crown.

 THE STROLLER'S CHILD.

~~~~~
 BY RICHARD CRANSHAW.
 ~~~~~

A BLEAK and desolate night in mid-winter. Around a roaring fire in one of the old-fashioned country inns existing in the villages and small market-towns that appear upon the map of England, something like an eruption upon its surface, a party of men and women were gathered, basking in the grateful warmth.

As far as outward appearance was concerned, the group was not an attractive one. The women were in but a sorry state of wardrobe, and their attenuated, jaded appearance, and the sad, careworn expression of their countenances, spoke of scanty, hardly-earned fare, and laborious, wearisome travel. The men had the air of shabby gentility, so much more painful to behold than the unmistakable marks of downright poverty; the dingy strip of shirt collar, and the total invisibility of shirt; the pantaloons strapped tightly down upon boots or shoes, the occupants of which were impatient of restraint, and made strenuous efforts for freedom; the coat of texture so sadly thin for weather such as this, and the hat so badly battered, though at the same time so carefully brushed.

They were a company of strolling players, who designed to exhibit at the place at which they were at present stopping, upon the coming morrow, and as their bills expressed it, "present to the enlightened inhabitants of the town of M—— the choicest gems of the drama; vivid illustrations of the works of the immortal bard; careful selections from the humorists of the past and present age; chaste Terpsichorean displays, and in short all the powerful resources at the command of a numerous, talented and versatile company, collected together at an expense almost overwhelming, and totally beyond the bounds of belief!"

The numerous, talented and versatile company, were at this moment occupied in various acts scarcely suggestive of their talents and abilities. Some of the women had young and helpless children gathered in the folds of their thin and faded shawls, and were hushing them into slumber. The men generally had pipes in their mouths, from which they were seldom drawn, except now and anon to apply a pewter pot to their lips, and derive refreshment therefrom. Two or three tired children, whose faces seen in their waking hours bore traces of deep thought and grave precocity, had rolled themselves up in front of the cheerful blaze, and were sunk in profound sleep. No, the group could not honestly be said to be an attractive one.

A timid, hesitating knock was heard at the door.

"Some more of you, I suppose," growled the landlord. Unlike most landlords, God be praised, his heart felt no compassion for the wayfarer whose hand was empty, and whose step was wearisome and slow.

"We are all here, I think." This was in a mild voice from a little seedy man, with a red nose and blinking eye. "Let me see," counting them over. "Heavy, light com., low com., walking gent., and terry com. man." Expressive of the gentlemen engaged for leading characters, the light comedian, low comedian, walking gentleman, or young lover generally in difficulties of a pecuniary nature, and the individual whose appearance usually signaled the point at which a "terrible combat" would be likely to ensue. "Heavy woman, juvenile lady, chambermaid, singing and dancing lady," continued he. "No, our party, Mr. Bullocke, are, I believe, all here."

Mr. Bullocke therefore advanced, and opening the door, gave admittance, first, to a furious blast of wind and rain, and next, to the tottering footsteps of a woman, with a child whose grasp was fixed hard upon her tattered dress. The philanthropic Bullchoke saw at a glance that the case was not admissible of an argument, and at once recommended the application of the stranger to the workhouse, not over a mile distant from thence. The stranger had, on entering the door, leaned heavily up against the post at its side, and now stood with wild staring eyes regarding him fixedly.

"Come, we've nothing for you—you must go. It's cold; I want to shut the door."

No answer from the wanderer. The child clutching at her dress, and gazing fearfully at the stern countenance of the man.

"Bundle, I say! Off with you, or I must have you taken care of by those who will put you under lock and key for the night." And so speaking he took hold of the woman by the arm, and made a movement to push her forth. She fell heavily upon the floor, and lay there with her eyes still fixed, and with her limbs stiffening, and her black hair streaming wildly over her half-covered bosom.

"Drunk," said Mr. Bullchoke, with expressive brevity.

"Dead!" whispered the strollers, male and female, who had gathered around her poor body as it lay upon the sanded floor, and now stood regarding it with pity and compassionate sorrow.

"Dead!" shrieked the child, as she threw herself upon her knees beside the pallid form. "O no, no, no, not dead! Look up, mama, and tell Nelly that you are so tired with our weary walk that you cannot stand any longer. She will speak to Nelly, soon. See, her breath is returning!" They thought so, too, at first, but it was the last sigh as it was breathed before the spirit flittered to eternity. The child, with the cold hand grasped in both of her tiny ones, unheeding of the strange faces gathered around her, still looked anxiously upon the countenance of the dead, and vainly asked but for one glance of recognition. The truth came upon her at last, and she sank with a convulsive sob upon the cold bosom of her dead mother.

And these poor fellow-wayfarers, with the tears rolling down their cheeks, feelingly sympathized with the unhappy woman who had fallen down dead in their midst, and each and all resolved that the child, since it knew of no friend in the wide, wide world to whom it could look for protection, should find in them, as far as their poor means went, both friendship and relief, and a hearty share of their own scant fare, so long as they had it to be offered. So they softly drew her away from the inanimate object extended upon the floor, and while the men passed her tenderly from one to another's arms, and made rude but gentle attempts to soothe her, the women, laying aside their own sleeping little ones, made all the necessary preparations for the last sad rites of the stranger, who slept the sleep that knows no earthly breaking.

Mr. Bullchoke, since the matter was laid upon his hands in such a way that there was no help for it, arranged the whole affair with great sagacity, and very much of a business-like manner. In the twinkling of an eye, so to speak, was the body laid away in the loft of the stable, there to await the coroner's inquest upon the morrow, for as the worthy man said, "she might have died of some infectious disease, who knows? and it's allers best to be on the safe side, you know."

"She looks as though she had died from the effects of a broken heart, more belike," said, rather indignantly, one of the women, who, it was apparent, appreciated not the various excellences of Mr. Bullchoke's character.

"A broken fiddlestick!" retorted that amiable individual. Thereupon he entered upon a philosophic dissertation upon broken hearts in general, satisfactorily proving beyond the shadow of doubt, that it was only such vagabonds as these, that prated of such chimerical and delusive articles, and that for his own part, he should like to know what was going to break his heart, for one? But none are blinder than those who will not see, and it was evident that the efforts made were entirely thrown away upon these stubborn and unconvincible listeners.

They had all gathered once more around the roaring fire, and the poor little addition to their circle was tenderly cared for, while with a delicacy not common to the world, but frequently to be met with in these children of adversity, they forbore to question, unwilling to touch the chords of misery already stretched to their utmost tension, within the little desolate one's heart. The children, now wide awake, and with the every-day gravity once more upon their old-fashioned faces, looked volumes of commiseration for her. The mothers, entirely forgetful of their own offspring, made comforting tenders of maternal care and kindness; while as to the men, they really outdid each other in their efforts for her welfare. Mr. Gribble, the "heavy ruffian," laid aside the gruff voice with which he was usually accustomed to converse, conceiving it to be professionally suggestive of his peculiar line of business, and now addressed her in tones calculated to soothe and allay her childish grief, while Mr. Sladd, the gentleman with the mild voice and uncertain eye, mentioned above, made mute offers of his bread and cheese, his pewter pot, and finally his pocket-handkerchief, in the hope that one or the other of them might prove beneficial or serviceable to her. But the child, gathered to the bosom of the young lady who usually supported the persecuted heroine, was indifferent to all, and now sobbed herself to sleep, rocked to and fro amid profound and pitying silence on the part of these poor strolling people, and felt that with these kindly faces she had at least found a safety and a home. And now gazing upon this group assembled around the old inn fire, we take back the assertion, and pronounce truthfully and feelingly that it has now indeed become almost an attractive one.

Some seven years back, in the parlor of a neat and cheerful looking cottage a young and pretty woman is seated, engaged, partly in working upon some little article of childish apparel, and ever and anon casting expectant glances from the little cottage window, down the garden path, and as far as she can view along the street of the little quiet suburb, which then hovered on the outer edge of the great maelstrom of London, but which has, years ago since then, become swallowed up in the relentless whirl.

There was a shadow upon her face, and as she continued to gaze and sew, it grew deeper and deeper, until it amounted almost to a look of agony. The clouds of evening were fast settling upon the sky, and as they descended they seemed to throw their darkening reflection heavily and grimly upon that pensive countenance, and to add still greater weight to the burden already laying upon her heart. At length the tiny garment on which her fingers had been so busily employed but now, slowly dropped from her hands, and tremblingly did they clasp themselves together, while a tear started and rolled unchecked adown her pale young cheek. Still the expected one came not, and at last, with a heavy sigh, she buried her face within her hands, and gave free vent to the tears that were struggling for an overflow.

Darkness settled upon the surface of the heavens. A step at last was heard, and in another moment she was clasped closely to the bosom of the person who had just entered, and lay thereon like a tired child upon its mother's loving breast.

Slowly he led her to a seat, and seating himself beside her, with her hand still grasped in one of his, while his arm pressed her closely to him, in the darkness of the little room, with silence and gloom hovering around them, thus he spoke :

"Amy, arouse yourself to hear what I have to tell you. Darling, be prepared for even worse than the worst which we have anticipated. Rest thy head here safely on thy husband's breast, and know that in him alone, henceforward, must be thine earthly hope and stay." This, in a broken, agitated voice. A pause; the silence disturbed only by the sobs that came bursting from her lips.

"My father then refuses to listen to the entreaties of his only child for forgiveness?"

"Nerve yourself, my Amy; it is something worse—more terrible than that, which you have to hear from my lips."

"Something worse? O, keep it not from me, let me hear it! You went to my father, and you told him all? That we had striven and struggled so as not to be indebted to his bounty, but that all resources having one by one totally failed, absolute necessity has driven us to implore aid from his hands. You did this?"

"I did; nay more, I did what my pride rebelled madly against, and for the sake of my helpless wife, and of my unborn babe, I went down to that hard-hearted man upon my bended knees, asked him, with tears in my eyes, for the boon I craved. And now must I reveal to you the terrible truth. Tell me, my Amy, as you rest here upon my heart in the dead silence and darkness that envelopes us round, tell me that your love is deep and unchanging as the decrees of destiny, for I dread to hear, that what I reveal may dash it from its strong hold, and lose it from its object, ay, forever!"

"O, Edward, what mean you? Something that will weaken your hold upon my love! Are you not the father of my child? Nothing can ever weaken your hold upon that love! Through life and until death have I sworn beside the altar it shall last, and trustingly and truthfully do I say so still!"

He pressed her closer to him, and went on hurriedly. "I bore all that he said to me, upbraiding me for having stolen you from him, and calling me beggar, wretch and penniless outcast. I bore all that. I listened calmly while he heaped reproaches upon my down bowed head; I returned it not, when in his madness and fury he approached and struck me—ay, Amy, struck me as I knelt before him! I bore even that! But when, raising his arms aloft, he ejaculated a fearful imprecation on your head, and called down a father's curse to blight you on your pathway, from this time forth, forever, endurance could go no further. I seized him in my grasp, and like a feather I hurled him to the ground, with the unholy adjuration trembling upon his lips!"

His voice as he spoke had sunk into a whisper, with the intensity of his feelings, and he slowly dropped from her side down upon his knees at her feet, and there knelt, waiting for the sounds that might arise from her lips, to know that she could love him even now. She had told him so before, and now came again the same hallowed assurance, in the repeated words: "Are you not the father of my child?"

Then welcome sorrow, welcome misery, and poverty, and gloom, and sad forebodings—welcome all! he still possessed her love!

It was now that their trials were to begin. Many and hard had they been before, but never until now had they known what it really was to want. They had to learn what it was to suffer even for the want of bread. They had to bear the thought that their child would raise its little wasted hands and ask support for the life that they had given to it. They had to battle with that tyrant, Adversity, who crushes with relentless hand the helpless and the friendless, and smiles as he gazes on the most terrible miseries of the world.

Years rolled on. To them they were fraught with undeviating misfortune. Those who have known the ease of competence, and have step by step descended to the terrible gulf of penury, and whose former life has needed not the aid of toil to give them their foothold in the world, only these know what that man had to struggle against. Only these can find within their hearts excuses and pity for him, when, hopeless misery staring him in the face, and with the wasting forms of those he loved best in the world before him, he dared the brand of shame and crime, and to save their lives, periled his own immortal soul!

He committed forgery, was detected, and sentenced to transportation for the remainder of his life. In those days it would seem that human hearts were hardened to the utmost, for justice then knew little of the attributes of godlike mercy.

* * * * *

Far out at sea with the blue vault of heaven reflecting itself in gorgeous colors upon the bosom of the great deep, a human soul is struggling for its freedom. The rippling dash of the waves against the vessel's side is the solemn music that floats upon the soft breeze, and chants a requiem for the departed spirit's rest!

* * * * *

Amid the wrestling of the fierce north blast with the icy whirlwind that fills the wintry sky, a woman with a little child, totters towards the light that she has seen dimly gleaming through the darkness of the night, and musters up her fainting energies to reach the refuge, before her fading senses take their leave of her forever.

Nelly, the child of the wanderer, has in ten years more grown up into a delicate, almost spiritual beauty, and as the years have passed away, she has by degrees shown promises of abilities far beyond the mediocre standard of her poor protectors. Under the united tuition of Messrs Sludd and Gribble, she has become possessed of a tolerable good education, and has so advanced in the profession, that her name, coupled with the euphonious title of the "Star of the Isle" (a poetic fancy of Mr. Sludd's), has attraction sufficient to fill the canvass tenement in which her talents are usually brought into play, to its utmost capacity.

Of the bewildering effect of her manifold charms, some idea may be formed from various instances of eccentric behaviour on the part of her admirers. The stout and elderly mayor of a provincial town, a bachelor, announced, to the utter astonishment and confusion of his friends and relatives, his solemn determination of entering upon a theatrical career; and, it is supposed, was only prevented from carrying out this wild intention, through rumors which by some means reached his ears, of procuring him a strait waistcoat, and a lodgment in the asylum for the insane.

Young men who had formerly led peaceful lives, became of bloodthirsty and revengeful natures, and cast glances of hatred upon suitors who received more apparent encouragement at the hands of the object of contention, than fell to their own share. Old men conducted themselves in a manner to draw down the displeasure of beholders, and utterly refused to be dissuaded from their insensate behaviour. They caught severe colds from serenading her bed-room windows with hoarse brass bands engaged for the purpose, and paid unheard of prices for choice bouquets to cast at the enslaver's feet.

With all this adulation, one would confidently expect that poor little Nelly's head would in course of time become completely turned; but though she smiled with her own kind blue eyes upon them one and all, they read in her smiles the utter hopelessness of their passion, and the little impression made upon that heart by their idolatry. And yet it was a very tender heart.

In passing through a certain town that little heart was destined to know a more tumultuous beating than had ever sounded before through its delicate fibres. Love had woke within it.

He was as handsome as human nature in its model could well be, and with the graces of his form, possessed the soul-speaking eye and the rich voice, which seems formed to utter the soft language of love in all the sweetness of its poetry. And for her was that voice tuned to its most melodious music, and for her did that eye dilate and glow, as alone can it glow when it has been touched by the Promethean fire of love. But she knew not as she listened, that the story he told was one that had been oft rehearsed before, and that others had listened and believed as well as she, many and many a time ere that. She thought her love was treasured up in his heart, as she treasured his, a gem of priceless worth within her own; nor dreamed she that he but amused himself with the toy which he would carelessly cast aside when he became wearied of it. A lovely night in the soft summer of the year saw their parting; for but a short time, as he assured her, kissing away the tears that would flow from the sadness of her heart. Did he know he perjured himself when he promised that confiding girl to join her on the attainment of his minority in a few short months, and then forever take her to his heart and home, his honored and his treasured wife? Perhaps he weighed not his words, nor thought of their being registered with solemnity by the stern hand of the great recorder.

"A letter for our Nelly," Mr. Sludd handed it to her. "A very square and formal-looking letter;" Mr. Sludd said he thought so, "but then," as he added, "you know, my dear, that all the offers made to you by these old stupid are generally stiff and formal, very much as though you were a job to be contracted for, you know," and Mr. Sludd, the mild, gave utterance to a suitably mild chuckle, at what he considered quite a felicitous expression. But how the laugh died on his lips as he looked in her face.

"Nelly, dear Nelly, what is it, my poor child?"

"Read that, Sludd, read that," she had but voice to murmur, before she fell into his arms, pale as death, and hid her face upon his shoulder.

"What can it be?" He laid her upon a sofa, and then searched every pocket, in his bewilderment, for the spectacles which rested unconsciously upon his nose. At length he read that ominous letter, and saw his own loved, almost worshipped child coarsely addressed as a vagabond and a stroller, and a wrathful command that she cease her designs upon the peace of a highly respectable family, and hold no further communication with the scion of its stock. Then came a few cold lines in another hand, that with its brief sentences finished the sum of cruelty, and filled her cup of misery high above its overflowing. She knew that hand full well, and first it was difficult to take in the full meaning; but at length she could understand it but too well; and as the blow descended relentlessly and crushingly upon her, she sank helplessly down beneath it, and the world before her was from that time forth a weary and desolate void.

Time rolled on, and more transparent grew that pale young cheek, while the soft blue eye glowed with an unnatural lustre, that made her spiritual beauty more ethereal than before. Her protectors saw that she pined away before their eyes day by day, and yet they none of them knew of the cause, save only the simple old man, who loved her as though she were his own, and in his gentle, foolish way, showed it by every means in his power. Sludd was her only confidant; poor Sludd of the red nose and blinking eye.

"Sludd, what ails our child?" Mr. Gribble put the question in his usual growling base, but there was real concern expressed in those deep notes.

"She is—she is not well," came the answer, in broken tones.

"A doctor, then," suggested the other.

"It is no ailment of the body, I fear," said Sludd, sadly; "he could not 'minister to a mind diseased.'"

Poor anxious Sludd! He had watched her when she knew not that any eye was upon her, and had seen her when she drew a little locket from her bosom, and gazing thereon with tears trembling upon her eyelids, kissed the semblance of the idol she had created in the shrine of her pure young soul. In the stillness of night, his was the dark figure that crouched down beside her door, and listened with an aching heart to the sobs that came from the lonely one within that room. His the form that paused beneath her window and watched the midnight lamp, till the dawning light of day no longer left it visible.

"She is dying, Gribble, she is dying; and I, that for her would lay my worthless existence willingly down, so she but lived to thank my memory, can but look on and know that each day draws her nearer to eternity!" And feebly he wiped the moisture from his eyes, while even the immovable Gribble coughed to clear the huskiness that was rising in his throat.

Yes, there was now no longer doubt about it—she was dying; their Nelly, their adopted one, the idol of all, was dying!

Around a little bed, placed so that the soft summer wind lifted her golden tresses from her brow, and fanned her pale cheek with its loving breath, the strollers were gathered, watching with anxious faces the fleeting moments of their Nelly, their own Nelly, who was dying. Sludd was there, with his ruddy face now white as the pallid one whose little hand was clasped within his own, which trembled as it held it. Gribble was seated at the foot of the bed, and having contained his feelings as long as he could, was now hiding his rough face upon the coverlet and actually sobbing like a woman. More children with old-fashioned faces had sprung up, since the night when Nelly found a home, and these were gazing upon her, with looks of commiseration quite aged and time-worn. The women were seated, some of them upon the floor, and with their babes clasped up to their breasts, were rocking themselves to and fro in their sorrow.

The silence was suddenly disturbed by a great clattering and noise of carriage wheels and prancing horses. At any other time this unusual noise might have attracted attention, but now no one paid the slightest heed, nor made a movement towards the window. Even the children, lost in thought, were destitute of curiosity. A few moments elapsed and the door was softly opened, with the request that Mr. Sludd would go down stairs. He was gone some ten minutes, and then re-appeared, leading by the hand an elderly, pompous-looking stranger. All faces were turned in surprise towards him as he was led towards the bed by Mr. Sludd.

"There, sir, look upon her, and behold your handiwork!" Sludd said this, not in a tone of anger, for his poor heart was too full for that, and besides, here on the confines of the world of futurity was not the place for it to be shown.

"God bless me! you did not tell me of this," said the stranger, in tones of sorrow and remorse.

"No, sir, I told you not of it. Nor even now shall I add one word to the upbraidings that must echo through your own heart, as they mutely speak out from that dying young face. Take your last look upon the child whose life you have blasted, and begone!"

All was silent a moment; at length the stranger spoke.

"To say that I deeply regret having addressed her some time since, in a way that now seems unfeeling, but which then was actuated solely by the welfare of my son, would be but feebly to express all that I feel; but ere it is too late I must proceed to unfold the motive that really brought me to be a witness of this painful scene. In my capacity as legal adviser of a wealthy family, I was called upon to indite the will of a gentleman who was in the last stages of existence, hurried towards his end by the remembrance of his former cruelty to his only child who had married contrary to his wishes. He furnished me with clues to ascertain if his grandchild was in existence, and if so apprise her of his demise and the fact that she was left sole heiress to his fortune. For years I was unsuccessful, and it was not until but lately that I have been enabled to find any traces of her. At length I have succeeded, and the grandchild of my client is now before me; the roses upon those cheeks assure me that she will yet live many and happy years to enjoy the prosperity which has fallen so unexpectedly to her lot."

There were roses upon her marble cheeks, but they were the hectic hues of excitement, not of health—the brilliant glow of the spark of life before it went out in everlasting darkness!

"And I am sole possessor of this wealth? I can do with it as seems fit and seemly to me?" she asked, with eagerness giving strength to her weak tones.

"You can," he asserted.

"Then thank Heaven that you arrived before it was too late! Here, in the presence of those whose hearts were inspired with pity and compassion for the orphan and the friendless—whose hands were stretched out to aid, when all the world seemed to have turned its face from the homeless child, do I now, with my last breath, bequeath all of this fortune to be divided equally among them, and may the blessing of the orphan and the outcast rest on them with its possession."

It was soon done, and the dying girl smiled a smile of contented peace, as she affixed the signature to the deed drawn up by the lawyer.

"Bear to him my forgiveness, and tell him from the dying, that the solemn vows he makes on earth are surely registered in heaven, and also bid him beware of how he heedlessly gives them utterance, or breaks them wantonly when they are made." She sank slowly back. The soft summer wind lifted anew the golden tresses, and bore the music of the trees upon the gentle air. She asked to be raised up. They raised her.

"Sludd, kiss me, and say farewell to me, but only for a little time, for I know that we shall meet again." If gentleness of heart and kindly good will to man have but associations with the angels, they would meet again. He approached and touched her lips reverently, as though he were venturing to approach very near to the confines of the land of seraphs. The group asked one and all to imprint the same farewell upon her cheek, and then stood in a circle around the little cot, watching for the wafting away.

"Mother! father!" the lips moved to utter, but the words died away, and the child of the stroller was no more an orphan! The summer wind lifted the golden tresses unheeded, and the music of the trees wafted to and fro, was nature's hymn chanted for the departure of a human soul.

Love may exist without jealousy, although this is rare; but jealousy may exist without love, and this is common.

PLEASANT MEMORIES.

BY WILLIAM LEIGHTON.

We walked beside the river,
That flowed, a silver tide,
But thought not of the river
The fair one by my side.

Her hand in mine was resting,
Her heart throbbed close to mine;
Her heart, where mine was kneeling,
Like pilgrim at the shrine.

Then first I broke the silence,
With whisper faint and low,
"See, love, how brightly onward
The silver stream doth flow;

Its murmur speaks of joyance,
As soft its ripple plays;
It sings in nature's language
A song to nature's praise;

The while, that stream I liken
To young affection's dream,
So bright existence dawneth,
So bright young life doth seem."

And while I spoke, she whispered
In accents soft and low,
"Dear love," she faintly murmured,
"Will 't not be always so?"

LOVE AND DUELLING.

BY MERIVALE MAYNARD.

"WHO is that beautiful girl conversing with the old gentleman in black?" inquired Lieutenant Wallace of his friend, Captain Denison, as they stood in one of the deep windows of the ball room, and passed remarks on the assembled company.

"Which one?" asked his friend, looking in an opposite direction. "Do you mean the one in white satin?"

"No, no. Look this way, Denison. There, she's turning away now to speak to Captain S—."

"O, you mean Adeline Hill, that haughty looking beauty, with the pearls in her hair. Yes, she's very lovely; but beware of her, Wallace."

"Why beware?" asked the young man, with an appearance of interest.

"Because she is as cold as ice, utterly indifferent to love, and has already broken innumerable hearts." And Captain Denison smiled as he looked on the countenance of his friend, so animated and handsome, and inwardly wondered if any one would reject his love.

"Will you introduce me, Denison?" asked Wallace.

"O, certainly; but of course I am not responsible for consequences; and if you will not take my advice, you must abide by them."

"Thank you, both for your kindness and advice. I am very impatient to become acquainted with Miss Hill."

There was an unusual flush on Adeline Hill's fair cheek, as the handsome young officer bowed before her. Perhaps it was occasioned by the half smile on Captain Denison's face, or by the almost reverential manner of the young stranger, or by some thought of her own; but whatever was the cause, there was a perceptible confusion in the manner of the usually self-possessed beauty.

Lieutenant Wallace, after asking her to dance, and finding that she had already half a dozen engagements, hastened to improve the time until her hand should be claimed, and commenced an animated conversation, in which she joined with a spirit and intelligence that completely charmed him, and finished the conquest her beauty had begun. He felt half inclined to be angry with the gentleman who came to lead her away, but was rewarded by seeing the change in her countenance—a change that did not say much for her liking for her partner. The winning charm, the sweet smile, the bright glance, were all gone; and she rose from her seat stately and reserved, the very impersonation of haughtiness.

Lieutenant Wallace, usually the gayest of the gay, was this evening the saddest man in the ball room. His brother officers, in whose honor the ball was given by the aristocracy of the good city of H—, were talking, dancing, laughing and flirting with the ladies, and he alone sat silent and companionless.

He glanced round the room in search of Denison, and soon saw him in deep conversation with the lady in "white satin," whom he had referred to when answering Wallace's question. They sat in the shadow of the heavy velvet window draperies, and screened from general observation; but Wallace could not help seeing his friend take her hand and bouquet in his own, and after selecting one of the choicest buds, press it to his lips and place it in his bosom.

Thinking that he had played the spy long enough, he rose and went towards the end of the room where Miss Hill had again joined the dancers with a new partner. He watched her as she moved gracefully to the music, her light and snowy drapery flowing round her like a cloud, her beautiful figure displayed to perfection by her dress, the heavy braids of her hair looking blacker from contact with the pearls woven in with the jetty tresses. There were murmurs of admiration from the gentlemen, and envious looks from the ladies, while she, the observed of all, seemed unconscious that any eye was beholding her, and performed her part in the dance with all imaginable ease and indifference.

His friends jested Wallace on his unusual dullness, and many fair ladies sighed as they looked on the handsome lieutenant, apparently so indifferent to their charms. But a change came over him when Miss Hill, having fulfilled her previous engagements, honored him with her hand. They both seemed animated with the very spirit of music and motion, and both looked their best, and evidently enjoyed themselves.

Wallace was a good dancer, and with such a partner he acquitted himself to perfection. All eyes were turned on the handsome couple; and when he led her to her seat, Captain Denison whispered some complimentary words in his ear, that if he did not value, at least helped to make him feel satisfied with himself.

The hours passed swiftly away. Adeline refused to dance any more, pleading fatigue; and as she seemed inclined to converse, Wallace had the happiness of sitting by her side, listening to her, and being listened to in return. Several others joined them at times; for Adeline Hill was the acknowledged belle of the room, and could not be allowed to withdraw so easily. But Lieutenant Wallace kept his place by her side, was introduced to the lady and her husband, under whose care she had come, had the pleasure of wrapping a rich cashmere round the loveliest shoulders in the world, handed her into the carriage, and went home to dream that an angel in a gauze dress, decorated with pearls, was waltzing him up to the clouds.

There was a great change in Lieut. Charles Wallace after that eventful night of the ball. He had never joined deeply in the dissipation of the officers of the different regiments garrisoned at H—; but now he shunned the wine cup and the dice, hitherto resorted to in the absence of other employment. He had but little love for such dangerous pleasures; but in a city like H—, there was little else to employ leisure hours, and Charles Wallace had no mother nor sister to speak a warning word, no friend to advise with him, save Denison; and he was only too ready to do as others did. But now there was a motive for making a change. During his conversation with Miss Hill, she had unconsciously expressed her dislike of the manner in which so many spent valuable time, and without intending it, had showed him the danger of following the example of dissipated companions. On several occasions he had half decided on quitting his wild young friends, especially when a scene would occur at the mess table, from the over-indulgence of his brother officers; but now he resolved—and with him to resolve, was to act.

He gradually withdrew himself from the society of the wild ones, and in spite of all persuasions—for he was a general favorite, and could not be allowed to escape without an effort to detain him—resolutely refused to drink or play.

But if he sacrificed something that was not to his taste, he gained what to him was an unspeakable privilege. Not a day passed that he did not make some excuse for seeing Adeline Hill; and from her kind reception, and the cordial greeting bestowed on him by her guardian and his wife (for, like himself, she was an orphan), he felt himself a welcome guest at their beautiful mansion.

For some time he was at a loss to understand Denison's caution; for Adeline, so far from appearing cold and heartless, was sensibility itself. But he at last discovered the secret. She was heiress to a very large property, and had unfortunately imbibed the notion that the admiration and attention so lavishly bestowed on her, was merely in honor of her wealth—an idea that had been strengthened by several very annoying circumstances.

Although very young, she had been besieged by numerous suitors, and having tried the experiment of confidentially acquainting them that in reality she was penniless; and having the mortification to see them immediately withdraw their attentions, she hastily concluded that her money, and not herself, was the object of attraction. Acting on this, she had determined to allow no one to insult her with what she was convinced were heartless professions. Hence the common impression that she was a cold coquette, winning hearts to cast them away.

As long as her acquaintances were contented with mere acquaintanceship, she was kind and sociable; but on the least hint of a wish for a nearer connection, all her smiles were gone, and she treated the unfortunate aspirant for her hand with the most chilling coldness, or as one who had offered her an insult. She liked Lieutenant Wallace from the first hour she passed in his society; and as they became better acquainted so did she find more and more to admire in the young officer. There was a candor, a fearless openness about him, that attracted one used to the fulsome adulation of weaker minds, as she had been. In their conversations, if he did not agree with her, he said so, even at the risk of wounding her self-love; and Adeline, delighted at finding some one bold enough to contradict her, learned to respect her handsome friend, and felt an interest in him quite unusual for her.

As Lieutenant Wallace was poor, having little more than his pay, he had not the remotest intention of "making love" to Miss Hill, thinking himself highly privileged in being honored with her friendship. This very poverty made him proud, and she, finding that he did not presume on her kindness, and possibly a little piqued at his behaviour, so different from others, gave herself no trouble to maintain a distance, and treated him with a sisterly frankness, dangerous to the peace of mind of both. Her guardian, Mr. Foster, was an elderly man, averse to all trouble and annoyance; and though much attached to his beautiful young ward, would have rejoiced to see her suitably married, as in that case his responsibility would end. He soon became attached to the agreeable society of young Wallace, and rejoiced at the intimacy existing between him and Adeline, as, in his opinion, his poverty was nothing, her large fortune being amply sufficient for both. His wife, a good hearted, mild old lady, was exactly of the same mind, and frequently repeated to her husband what a good thing it would be if Miss Hill would marry that "dear young man," and share her large fortune with him.

The "dear young man" would no doubt have been grateful for their kind wishes, but it is not so certain that those wishes would have been fulfilled if they had not had wisdom enough to keep them to themselves. As it was, Charles and Adeline continued friends, and were gradually becoming something nearer.

The good citizens of H—— were unbounded in their hospitalities to the officers, and never was there known a gayer season than the one in which my story commences. Evening parties, assemblies, and private balls, varied by sleighing and skating excursions, occupied the time and thoughts of the belles of H——, and their almost equally volatile friends in scarlet and gold. In all places, and at all times, was Lieutenant Wallace to be found at the side of Adeline Hill.

At the numerous parties they attended that winter, he was always her first partner, and as early as they could, none could ever be before him. If the weather and fine roads tempted them to get up a sleighing party, in vain the gentlemen called at unreasonably early hours in order to secure Miss Hill's company. She was "sorry for their disappointment," "highly honored by their preference," but "had already promised to accompany a friend."

Among the many officers who that winter honored the belles of H—— with their particular attention was a Captain Powell. He was by no means a favorite, either among his companions or the young civilians of the city; but being a wealthy man, young and passably handsome, was much admired by the generality of the ladies. He had taken a dislike to Lieutenant Wallace at their first meeting, and after failing in his endeavors to entice him into the habits he himself loved, had commenced a series of attacks on his conduct and behaviour, exceedingly annoying to a man of Wallace's sensitive feelings.

Captain Powell had made several attempts to ingratiate himself with Miss Hill, but had met with such decided repulses that he gave it up, and consequently he was doubly enraged at witnessing her open preference of one he had stigmatized as both "poor and mean." He never let an opportunity pass without saying some cutting thing to hurt the lieutenant's feelings; but happily Charles possessed admirable self-command, and even when smarting under some biting jest or keen ridicule, would calmly answer his opponent, generally turning the laugh against him.

Powell was as much disliked by his companions as Wallace was beloved, and there was scarcely one who would not take the latter's part, so that the captain generally failed in his attempts. But one day he allowed his passion to pass all bounds, and Charles was made to suffer for his ill deeds. A number of the citizens had decided on having a sleighing party, and as it was to be the greatest affair of the season, a general invitation was given to the officers of the garrison. As the weather had not been favorable, it was not decided upon until the very day before the one appointed, consequently there was but little time.

As soon as it was known, Captain Powell hastened to Mr. Foster's and requested the pleasure of Miss Hill's company on the morrow. His entrance disturbed a very pleasant reverie she was indulging in, principally relating to a long conversation she had had with Charles Wallace a few hours previous. She was not pleased at the interruption, and still less at the intruder. She listened to his request with astonishment, and refused it with more than her usual haughtiness; for Captain Powell was the especial object of her dislike. He left her, almost smothered with suppressed passion, and vowed to have revenge both on her and Wallace.

That evening, at the mess table, he took occasion to contradict something Charles said. He, knowing Powell's disposition, forbore to take notice of it, which only enraged him the more. He began to use insulting language, and when Charles good-naturedly laughed, and said he would not quarrel about such a trifle, actually foamed at the mouth with rage, called him a "mean, cowardly villain," and threw his glass of wine in his face.

There was something awful in the expression of young Wallace's countenance, as he calmly applied his handkerchief to his face and removed the wine stains. The buzzing conversation, the jokes and laughter that always surround a mess table, were instantly hushed, and all sat speechless and thunderstruck. Even Powell himself felt shocked as he met the glance of the other, and looked on the deathly features, the white lips quivering with emotion, and the convulsive movements of the clenched fingers.

The momentary silence was broken by loud exclamations of "shame! shame!" and as Wallace rose to leave the table a dozen friends crowded round him. When the doors closed behind them, he leaned heavily against Captain Denison and another, gasping for breath, as one does who rises from the water; and it was with difficulty they could convey him to his rooms.

There was a sad party collected that evening in Lieutenant Wallace's sitting-room, come to talk over the unpleasant events of the last few hours. Charles was now composed and ready to listen to his friend's advice. That there was but one alternative for him he had been aware from the moment he could think at all, and it was to make arrangements for a meeting with Powell that his friends had come to him. He was conscientiously opposed to duelling. He had always said and believed that it was wrong; and he well remembered, when a boy, witnessing the agony of his mother when her husband was brought home to her dead and disfigured, murdered by the hand of his dearest friend. And now should he break through all the resolutions of a lifetime, and not only fight but send a challenge? The thought was distraction.

But on the other hand his honor was at stake; he had been openly insulted by one who made no secret of his dislike, and before all his brother officers. He dared not think of Adeline; for he remembered a conversation they had once held on the subject, and her words came back to his memory with thrilling clearness, "I care not what the cause, the man that kills another in a duel is a murderer." But no alternative seemed to offer, and when his friends (who knowing his peculiar opinions on the subject, were fearful he would not fight) came, they found him busily engaged in writing letters.

Captain Denison, a fine, warm-hearted fellow, and deeply attached to Charles, could scarcely control his emotion as he listened to the plans of his friend, and promised to obey his injunctions. Duelling was forbidden among the officers; but such an open insult could not be expected to pass unnoticed, and their superiors, very considerately, took no notice of the unusual stir among the friends of both parties. Of course no one mentioned it to them, and Charles as earnestly requested that everything should go on the following day as if nothing unusual had occurred.

According to appointment, his beautiful sleigh was at Mr. Foster's door some half hour before the others arrived, and he was shown into the pleasant room where Miss Hill received her particular friends. Very lovely she looked as she rose from an elegant lounge and came forward to meet him. She wore a rich crimson cashmere, which he had one day, in a shopping excursion, assisted her to choose; in her belt was a choice flower—part of a bouquet he had bought the day previous, now standing in a vase beside her; while on the lounge lay a book he had lent her, and which she had been reading before he came.

As these evidences of her partiality for himself met his eye, he shuddered to think that this was perhaps their last meeting; and so strange was the look he bent on her, and so forcible the clasp with which he held her hand, that she uttered an exclamation of surprise and pain, and attempted to free herself from him. He recovered his self-possession instantly, apologized for his rudeness, led her to her seat, and taking his place beside her, commenced speaking about the book he had taken up. He talked cheerfully and well; but there was something strange in his manner, something forced and unnatural, and Adeline felt almost rejoiced when the sound of the bells announced the arrival of the others.

They soon started; but the excursion that had promised so much pleasure to both proved a failure. Charles was alternately sad and cheerful, and in the struggle to appear easy and careless, conducted himself so strangely that Adeline was seriously annoyed. To make matters worse, he gradually turned the conversation on duelling, hoping that some opportunity might present itself for explaining his position; but his companion, not in the best humor, spoke more harshly than ever on the subject.

On his attempting to palliate the conduct of those situated as he was, she stopped him by saying there was no excuse for any one's taking another's life in that manner, and she would discard her dearest friend for being concerned in one. He then gave up the attempt as useless, and left her that night with the distressing conviction that it was their last meeting. He found Captain Denison and two others at his rooms when he returned, and learned that all was arranged for an early meeting on the morrow.

Captain Powell could not find an officer willing to be his second, so great was their disgust at his conduct, and he had secured the services of a young gentleman, an officer in the engineer department. Denison and he had settled everything, the former having offered his services as second to Charles.

It was quite late when they parted, Denison charging his friend to retire immediately and try to sleep off his excitement, but as soon as they withdrew, he sat down and wrote a long letter to Adeline Hill. He then threw himself on the sofa, and had not rested an hour when he was roused by the entrance of Denison and the surgeon, both looking the worse for the night's excitement and anxiety. There remained but little to do after they came. Denison promised to deliver his letter, as he wished Adeline to receive it whether he should fall or not; he also gave him some directions concerning the disposal of his effects in case of the worst.

"Powell is an excellent shot; you must fire instantly, and give him no advantage," was the advice of his friend, who felt rather surprised at Charles's strange smile in return.

The time came for them to start; Charles spoke and moved like one in a dream. Mechanically he went down and entered the carriage in waiting for them; he made no answer to the questions of his friends; and it was not until they passed Mr. Foster's residence, and he looked once more to Adeline's home, that he displayed any emotion. Then Captain Denison, who was attentively watching him, saw his eyes fill with tears, and he leaned back in the carriage, apparently overcome with his feelings.

Captain Powell and his friends made their appearance on the ground soon after the others arrived. The preliminaries were speedily arranged, and the parties took their places. Every trace of emotion had now left Charles Wallace, and he faced his adversary with a deliberate coolness that gave hope to Captain Denison, whose fears had hitherto prevailed. As he left his side he once more whispered "fire quickly," and moved to his place.

At the word, both discharged their pistols—Captain Powell at his opponent, Lieutenant Wallace in the air. For an instant all stood motionless, and then Charles staggered and fell to the ground, and almost as soon, Denison and the surgeon were beside him. A hasty examination served to convince them that he was not fatally injured, and bearing him to the carriage, they drove off with all speed.

Captain Powell and his servant followed, and an hour after, nothing remained to show the morning's work, save a few melting footsteps in the snow. As soon as Captain Denison could leave his friend, he hastened to call on Miss Hill and acquaint her with what had happened, at the same time deliver the letter.

At the door he met Mr. Gray, Captain Powell's second, and knowing that he was intimate with the Fosters, and the friend of Powell, he feared for the success of his mission. The event proved that his fears were not groundless; for Miss Hill received him with cool politeness, refused to listen to his account of the unfortunate duel, which she said had already been described to her by Mr. Gray, and also to accept Charles's letter.

"After such an open display of his principles, Lieutenant Wallace could not expect her to any longer acknowledge him as a friend; and as he knew her opinion of duelling and duellists, it was quite unnecessary for her to read his letter." And with a haughty bow she left the room, and Denison returned to his friend.

Charles Wallace might have been spared a severe illness, brought on by his anxiety, could he have seen Adeline Hill that morning, after the departure of the messengers, prostrate on her couch, sobbing and weeping in an agony of despair. One moment starting up, resolved to forget him—the next burying her face in the pillows, and calling on his name with the fondest accents of affection. Her distress was hopeless; for in the hour that she discarded him, did Adeline discover that she loved Charles Wallace.

Charles recovered very slowly, and before he was able to attend to his duties, Adeline had left H— on a visit to some relations in Canada. The duel had been a nine days wonder among the gossips, and then forgotten; and when Charles once more joined his friends in the daily routine of garrison life, they had almost ceased to speak or think of what had caused him so much sorrow.

Captain Powell and his regiment had been sent away on a foreign station, and ere many months passed, Charles and his friends were ordered to Canada. Before leaving, he called on Mr. Foster, and in talking over the events of the past six months, had the mortification to learn that Adeline had received a false account of the duel and its cause. At first this annoyed him, but after consideration showed the folly of indulging hopes concerning one who had so decidedly rejected him, and he resolved for the future to banish her from his mind. In leaving H—, he hoped also to leave all remembrance of his hopeless passion, and in the new scenes and new companions he was about to meet, forget her who had so bewitched him.

Captain Denison, still his intimate friend, used every endeavor to banish the 'gloom from his young companion's brow, and at last had the satisfaction of seeing him resume his old cheerfulness. They both looked forward to the removal with pleasure, for Denison's flirtation had wearied him, and he also longed for a change. He had once before been quartered at Fort M—, and aroused Charles's curiosity by his description of the kindness and hospitality of the people, the beauty of the scenery, and the delightful hunting.

"Dancing and making love are all very well once in a while, Charley my boy; but if you want an amusement that wont weary, take your gun and plunge into the depths of a Canadian forest—there's never ending excitement for you."

"I have serious fears that I should get tired, if I didn't get weary," was the laughing answer. "This barrack life is not apt to improve our powers of endurance."

"O, that's all nonsense! I'll introduce you to a friend of mine, who, twenty years ago, looked fit for nothing but measuring satin ribbons behind a counter, or escorting old ladies to church. He had the whitest hand, the smallest foot, and the softest voice of any man in his regiment. Of course it was before my time; but old Robinson, of the Fifth, told me he always wore white kid gloves—he said slept in them, but I did not believe that,—took an hour every day to arrange his hair, only ate meat once a week, and was altogether as great a puppy as ever scented a pocket handkerchief. Well, three years ago, when I was in Canada, I accidentally became acquainted with this same dandy, no longer a dandy, but one of the most indefatigable old hunters I ever met. I fancy it was sometime since he had seen a glove, from the looks of his hands, and I can bear witness to the strength of his muscles, as my fingers tingled for an hour after his welcoming grip. He no longer sported French boots and silk stockings, but their place was supplied by raw hide moccasins and gaiters; and I rather think his taste for animal food had improved since Robinson knew him, as he ate half cooked buffalo steaks with a decided relish. Altogether, I thought forest life had done much for him, and I was still more of that opinion after seeing his handsome wife and blooming daughter, then a girl of fourteen. You have no idea how happy the old fellow was; and as he had no son, he was training his girl to hunt and fish, skate on the river, or drive 'Highflyer,' as the case might be. Ah, I've no doubt she's a splendid woman by this time. I quite long to see her."

And Captain Denison resumed his cigar, and his friend fell into a reverie, in which a "splendid woman" certainly had a share; but one whose accomplishments did not include hunting and fishing.

He knew that Adeline was in Canada, and perhaps there was some lingering hope that accident might throw them together, that all might be explained, that they might yet be friends. Be it as it may, it was welcome news for him when the transport arrived, and he bade adieu to H— without one regret.

The ladies were all sorry when that "dear, delightful Captain Denison" went away; but united in abusing Charles as an exceedingly proud, reserved young man, not at all agreeable, and "not so very handsome after all." Old Mr. Foster told his wife, confidentially, that he was "sorry Adeline had not returned before Charles went away; but perhaps it was all for the best." And the good lady very mildly replied, "Very likely, my dear."

Charles was even more delighted with his new home than his friend had anticipated, and soon learned to enjoy the wild sports of the forest. He became a prime favorite with old Major Edwards, and rivalled Denison in the good opinion of his wife and daughter.

The latter, a beautiful girl of seventeen, scrupled not to display her delight at the acquisition to their society, and soon made herself so agreeable to Charles, that he actually wondered at himself, having deemed it impossible ever to take pleasure in woman's society again. But Olive Edwards was a new specimen of "femininity" to him, and he became deeply interested in the young girl, who appeared equally at home in the parlor or the forest, whose life was so strange a mingling of the polished and the barbarous.

One day he would call at the major's, and find Olive quietly seated beside her mother, surrounded by all the paraphernalia of a lady's work-table, their pretty fingers busy on some delicate piece of embroidery; herself attired in the most bewitching of muslin morning dresses, just short enough to display an exquisitely shaped foot in the neatest of little slippers. Heavy, golden curls fell round her shoulders, and the whole picture was one of faultless loveliness. The next day he would be electrified to see her dash up the steep ascent to Fort M—, putting the old major to his fastest speed to keep up with her and her spirited horse.

But if Charles admired her in her gentle beauty at home, Captain Denison worshipped her in the wild woods, when, urging Highflyer to a gallop, she would distance the best horseman among them, and laugh heartily at them when the race was done. It soon became evident that Denison and she were twin spirits, and there were no bounds to their venturesome frolics and daring freaks. Even the major at last remonstrated with them for running such risks; but something the captain told him appeared to have a soothing effect, and from that time they were permitted to follow their own inclinations.

These inclinations generally led them to a boating excursion on the lake, when the wind blew a gale; a gallop over a dangerous part of a neighboring mountain, called "The Rocky Pass;" or a furious drive along the worst piece of road in the country, with a pair of untrained "beauties," as Olive called them.

Charles had one day accompanied them to a town, some five miles distant, on business for the major. On arriving, they stopped at the hotel, and Denison volunteering to perform the errand, Charles and Olive alighted, gave their horses to the man in attendance, and entered the house.

Olive was in high spirits this day, and entered the hall laughing merrily, her plumed hat in her hand, her beautiful bright curls hanging in disorder to the waist of her green cloth riding habit, and leaning on the arm of her companion. The latter was gazing into the beautiful eyes, so full of glee, that were raised to his, when advancing footsteps caused him to look up, and he found himself face to face with Adeline Hill, escorted by a tall, handsome young man. Both started, colored violently, bowed, and passed on—Adeline and her companion to the carriage in waiting for them, Charles and the astonished Olive to the parlor.

"Is it possible that you know that beautiful Miss Hill?" was her first question after the door was closed on them. "Why did you not tell me that before?"

"I had no idea that she was in this part of the country; but are you acquainted with her?"

"No—I have never been introduced to her; she has not been here long, and is only making a visit at Colonel Gage's. She is so good and beautiful, that all who have the pleasure of her acquaintance say Arthur Gage has the prospect of being the 'blessed one among men.'"

"Is that the gentleman we just now met with her?" inquired Charles, conscious that his voice was not quite steady, and feeling a rather unpleasant sensation at the evident meaning of her last words.

"Yes, and isn't he a splendid fellow? You ought to see him on horseback; there is not a better rider in the country." And Olive launched out into rapturous praises of her favorite amusement, all unconscious that her companion was lost in recollections of past scenes and by-gone days.

It was only a few days after this rencontre, that Charles met Arthur Gage, and predisposed as he had been to dislike him, he could not help coming to the conclusion that Olive was not far wrong when she called him a splendid fellow. To an exceedingly handsome person, he united the most fascinating manners, and Charles insensibly found himself on terms of intimacy with the man he had almost determined to hate. For some time he resisted all Arthur's invitations to return his visits, but at last came one not to be refused without absolute rudeness. Colonel Gage gave a large party, a farewell compliment to Miss Hill, and of course all the officers and neighboring gentry were invited.

Although Charles had hitherto refused to meet Adeline, he did not regret the necessity that compelled him now to do so, and looked forward to the evening with pleasure. As for Denison and Olive, they, as usual, went into extremes, and could think and speak of nothing else.

In a dull place like Fort M—, a ball is hailed by young military men as a delightful variety to the usual monotony of their lives, and the first, of course, is the most anxiously looked for. The wealth and acknowledged hospitality of Colonel Gage, joined to the beauty of his two daughters, and the manifold attractions of his fair guest, combined to make this a most interesting occasion to the young gentlemen.

The day at last arrived, and Charles almost repented that he had subjected himself to the trial of seeing Adeline, the object of another's attentions, another's promised bride. He envied Denison's gay light-heartedness, and felt almost inclined to quarrel with him for anticipating so much pleasure and ridiculing his own gloomy looks.

The day passed slowly, and owing to his feverish impatience, very unhappily; and he felt inclined to wish that some accident might happen to prevent his attending this dreaded party. But like all other days it came to an end, and according to appointment, they called to escort Olive and her mother—the major declaring that his dancing days were over, and parties were a bore. Charles thought of Denison's description of the days when the old gentleman wore kid gloves and French boots ; smiled at the contrast he now presented, handed Mrs. Edwards into the carriage, and the party were soon on their way.

On arriving at the colonel's, Charles felt a nervous dread of meeting Adeline, but it wore off under the cordial kindness of their welcome, and owing to the large number assembled, he did not see her for some time. He found himself at last in the quadrille, with Emily Gage for a partner, and Arthur and Adeline opposite. He felt his heart beat loudly, as in a few moments her hand rested in his, and he longed to detain it in a loving clasp ; but she steadily avoided meeting his eye, and he could form no idea of her sensations. She looked very lovely, somewhat paler and thinner than when he last beheld her ; but with beauty unchanged and grace unsurpassed.

He had scarcely met Denison all the evening ; but when another dance was forming, Charles saw him lead Adeline up, and unable to resist the temptation of once more holding her hand, he obtained Olive for a partner, and once more they stood opposite.

When the dance was finished, Denison drew his partner's hand within his arm, and led her to a seat at the farthest end of the room, while, our hero, astonished and a little annoyed to see them apparently on such good terms, devoted himself to Olive, who was in the happiest state of mind. But if he was surprised at seeing Adeline and Denison on such friendly terms, he was still more so at beholding Arthur Gage paying the most devoted attention to a delicate young girl in mourning. She appeared to be on very intimate terms with the Misses Gage, and after dancing once with Miss Hill, Arthur scarcely left her side again.

She did not dance, and in answer to Charles's questions, Olive told him that she was the daughter of a French gentleman, who had lately lost his wife. Olive herself appeared puzzled at the appearance of things, but Charles shrewdly thought she was in a fair way of becoming enlightened, when he saw the cool manner in which she received Denison, after Miss Hill had again joined the dancers.

After half an hour's conversation with the old colonel, during which he had not been unmindful of what was going on around him, Charles watched his opportunity, and making his way to where Adeline stood beside her last partner, with a low bow, asked the honor of her hand in the waltz then commencing. She merely bowed an answer, and in another moment they were in the dizzy circle, gradually increasing until all the best dancers in the room were with them.

Charles, with his arm round Adeline's slender waist, her hand close clasped in his own, and her color changing beneath his gaze, felt as though he wished they might continue in that position for an indefinite length of time. But ere they had twice made the circuit of the room, he felt his partner's form tremble in his clasp ; her steps no longer kept time to the music, even under the guiding impulse of his own ; and as he reached an open door he suddenly left the whirling ring ; the rest passed on. Some other couples left at the same time, others took their places, and in the momentary confusion, Charles left the room unnoticed. He crossed the entry, pushed open the first door he came to, and led his half fainting partner to a seat.

On a little marble table stood a filter with glasses, and pouring out some of the pure cold contents, he gave it to her with a trembling hand, only surpassed by her own in its agitation. After seeing the color return to her cheek, and her whole appearance denote that she was recovering from her momentary faintness, Charles walked to the other end of the room.

Long he stood, apparently absorbed in contemplation of the portrait of Colonel Gage's great grandmother, an exceedingly plain likeness of an excessively plain woman. It was but poor evidence of his good taste, that he preferred looking at that old time worn representation of one devoid of attractions, to conversing with his companion, a youthful maiden, adorned with every charm and grace, beautiful and accomplished.

When he at last turned round, she was standing in the deep bay window, the heavy drapery drawn aside, and a flood of moonlight streaming in on the carpet, rendering superfluous the wax lights on the mantel.

With a slow, determined step, Charles crossed the room and stood by her side. She neither moved nor spoke ; but when he, determined to end all uncertainty, took her hands in his own, and bent a searching gaze on her countenance, as if to read there the emotions within, she trembled so violently that he was obliged once more to sustain her from falling.

"Adeline, will you in pity end this wretched, this horrible uncertainty ? You know not the misery you have inflicted by punishing me for doing what I could not avoid. I have tried in vain to drive you from my thoughts ; but this night's meeting has destroyed my better resolutions, and I determined not to leave without speaking to you alone."

"I am not worthy of your friendship, Lieutenant Wallace ; but if you will forgive my pride and ill temper, that has so long made us strangers to each other, we may yet be friends. I never knew until to-night how deeply I had wronged you."

"Is this true, Adeline? And has Denison really explained that unfortunate affair?" and the speaker's handsome countenance was radiant with joyful hope.

"He has explained enough to show me how wrongly my silly vanity has tempted me to act, and what a brave, noble heart my folly has grieved."

"Adeline," and the speaker's voice grew husky with suppressed emotion, and he released her from the supporting arm hitherto thrown around her, "your words have made me very happy; without your friendship I must be wretched; but forgive me if I presume on your kindness to tell you that it were better for my peace that those words had never been spoken, that we had still remained as strangers, than to regain your friendship, to find my love increased tenfold, and then to see you the bride of another! I feel there is a wide difference between us; that you can choose among the highest and wealthiest in the land, while I can offer neither riches nor station. But Adeline, if you love another, even in this hour of our reconciliation, we must part."

He stopped, as if unable to speak farther on so painful a subject, and turned to the window to hide his emotion.

"Charles, listen to me one instant," and Adeline's little hand was laid on his shoulder, and her tearful eyes raised to his face. "I love no other, never have loved another, and I have long doubted the truth of love; but I believe in your sincerity, and if you can take me with all my faults and imperfections, I will strive to atone for all my unkindness."

One year from the night of the party, Charles Wallace and his lady were again the guests of Colonel Gage. It was to witness the marriage of Arthur and the young French orphan, who had for several months resided with them.

THIEVES AMONG THE MONKEYS.

In the accomplishment of bad purposes, thieves often display a degree of industry and ingenuity which, if exercised in a more worthy cause, would earn for them an honest, comfortable livelihood. The Italian organ-grinders of London have devised a new plan of theft, in which monkeys, trained for the purpose, assist. The monkey, having plenty of length of cord, is allowed to enter the windows of an unoccupied dining or drawing room, and immediately returns, bringing to his master such articles of property from there, as he is able to carry. The master receives and conceals them about his person, and makes off with his booty.—Post.

CURIOUS DYING SCENES.

According to Fielding, Jonathan Wild picked the pocket of the ordinary while he was exhorting him in the cart, and went out of the world with the parson's corkscrew and thumb bottle in his hand. Petronius, who was master of the ceremonies and inventor of pleasures at the court of Nero, when he saw that elegant indulgence was giving place to coarse debauchery, perceived at once that his term of favor had arrived, and it was time to die. He resolved, therefore, to anticipate the tyrant, and disrobe death of his paraphernalia of terror. Accordingly, he entered a warm bath, and opened his veins, composed verses, jested with his familiar associates, and died off by insensible degrees. Democritus, the laughing philosopher, disliking the inconveniences and infirmities of a protracted old age, made up his mind to die on a certain day; but to oblige his sister, he postponed his departure until the feasts of Ceres were over. He supported nature on a pot of honey to the appointed hour, and then expired by arrangement. Jerome Cardan, a celebrated Italian physician, starved himself gradually, and calculated with such mathematical nicety, as to hit the very day and hour foretold. When Rabelais was dying, the cardinal sent a page to inquire how he was. Rabelais joked with the envoy until he found his strength declining, and his last moments approach. He then said: "Tell his eminence the state in which you left me. I am going to inquire into a great possibility. He is in a snug nest; let him stay there as long as he can. Draw the curtain; the farce is over." When the famous Count de Grammont was reported to be in extremity, the King Louis XIV., being told of his total want of religious feeling, which shocked him not a little, sent the Marquis de Dangeau to beg of him, for the credit of the court, to die like a good Christian. He was scarcely able to speak, but turning round to his countess, who had always been remarkable for her piety, he said, with a smile: "Countess, take care, or Dangeau will flch from you the credit of my conversion."—Winchester Democrat.

DUMB SHOW.

Lord Seaforth, who was born deaf and dumb, was to dine one day with Lord Melville. Just before the time of the company's arrival, Lady Melville sent into the drawing-room a lady of her acquaintance, who could talk with her fingers to dumb people, that she might receive Lord Seaforth. Presently Lord Guilford entered the room; and the lady, taking him for Lord Seaforth, began to ply her fingers very nimbly. Lord Guilford did the same; and they had been carrying on a conversation in this manner for about ten minutes, when Lady Melville joined them. Her female friend immediately said: "Well, I have been talking away to this dumb man." "Dumb!" cried Lord Guilford; "bless me, I thought you were dumb." I told this story (which is perfectly true) to Matthews; and he said that he could make excellent use of it at one of his evening entertainments; but I know not if ever he did.—Rogers's Table Talk.

Positiveness is one of the most certain marks of a weak judgment.

THE MAIDEN'S SONG.

BY THOMAS PATTER, JR.

O, I'll have my home where the sea-birds roam,
Near the foaming, stormy sea,
Where the craggy peaks on the breastwork seek,
Nearer heaven's high throne to be;
In the spiral winds of the rocky glens
My lover shall come to me—
And I'll shield his form from the raging storm,
'Neath some branching shady tree.

When the storm is o'er on the rock-bound shore,
And the slumbering waves at rest
When the bright sun smiles on the distant isles, Asleep on their mother's breast—
Then together we'll sit, where the gay birds flit, Carolling their richest lays—
And we'll talk of love, like a gentle dove,
In its cooling, winning ways.

Thus we'll pass our hours in old Nature's bowers,
And hear every sighing breeze
Re-echo the moan of my chosen home,
As it rustles the leafy trees.
O, give then to me my home of the sea,
By the overhanging rocks;
There let me die to the whirlwind's sigh,
Which the shrill-toned sea-bird mocks.

THE ODALISQUE:

—OR,—

THE CARCANET OF PEARLS

BY M. V. ST. LEON.

WHAT melodious murmurs! What silvery laughter! One would certainly imagine that beyond that gilded lattice was an aviary filled with beautiful birds, whose rustling plumage and delicious twitterings fill the air with soft sounds. Perhaps it is so; let us peep through the screen into the adjoining court. On a marble pavement are heaped cushions of the richest silks, and on little stands scattered about, lie piles of luscious fruits, ruby, golden and purple. In the centre, a fountain falls in musical tinklings to its basin below. The square was enclosed by slender pillars supporting a light cornice and domelike roof; graceful trees of various foliage, planted outside, drooped their branches into the pavilion; and brilliant-feathered warblers swung in gilded hoops suspended from the boughs, while others less tame were imprisoned in cages attached to the columns, that were wreathed with jasmines.

Reclining on the divans were groups of lovely females, chatting, laughing, and idly playing on various instruments, teasing their grim guards, whose sour, black faces formed a contrast to the gay tormentors, and resembling in their rainbow draperies, and restless activity, a bed of tulips swayed by the wind.

Conspicuous among this throng were two groups, which from the superior beauty and rich attire of the principal figures, appeared to hold a higher station than any others; the foremost one consisted of three persons—a haughty, handsome, but unintellectual looking woman, with a slender form and oval face that would have been apathetic, had not glittering, beadlike, black eyes given life to a complexion whose pale, ivory tint was preserved by careful seclusion from wind and sunshine. Decked in all the gorgeous drapery of Eastern magnificence, she lolled gracefully back on her manifold cushions, amusing herself by presenting her finger for a favorite parrot, that sat balancing on its perch, to peck at. Beside her, in rather a more upright position, reclined a plump, brilliantly fair Kathayan, whose large, sleepy eyes were shadowed by brows and lashes only equalled in their jetty hues by the silken locks that escaped from a little lace turban, festooned with filagree butterflies. She was listening to the conversation between the first mentioned lady, and a sharp, disagreeable-looking female, whose features and costume indicated her to be an Armenian. From the low tone in which they spoke, and the frequent glances covertly cast at the second group, it would appear there was some connection between its members and the subject they were discussing.

This circle, containing also three persons, was totally different from every one of its neighbors. Beneath the drooping clusters of a luxuriant grape-vine, sat a young girl of about eighteen, with no traces of Asiatic origin in shape or feature. There was a transparency in her roseate complexion, and the light of a cultivated intellect in her brilliant blue eyes; her delicately-formed mouth was expressive of an impetuous nature, and her animated countenance and graceful buoyancy of motion presented a strong contrast to the sluggish indolence of Eastern women generally.

Beside her, sipping a cup of coffee, was another young girl, Zaidee, a Persian, about the same age, whose pleasing and refined countenance was also full of life and intelligence. A middle-aged woman, evidently the nurse of the former, was fanning her mistress with an expression of affection and respect.

The lady first mentioned is the Sultana Zorayda, and the second her prime favorite Katinka. Neama, the Armenian, is a slave of the princess, and as treacherous at heart, as her manner is flattering. The young girl, Leila, although from India, bears little resemblance to the dusky inhabitants of that country; but Alawi, the nurse, has the Hindoo features. Both have been inmates of the seraglio only four weeks, and Zaidee the Persian even less time. Short as this period has been, however, it has proved sufficient to rouse the jealousy of the Lady Zorayda, who having heard the conclusion of Neama's account, dismissed her, and in a low, agitated tone, thus addressed Katinka:

"You see how matters progress! Truly this is a fine state of things—I, who am as slender as the holy maidens of Yagrenat, as graceful as a Bayadere, and but five years ago was surnamed 'the wonder of the age' for beauty—was I not esteemed too precious a jewel for the slave bazaar, and brought at once to the sultan by my captors? Since then, I have certainly improved—and can I not sing, besides, and play the kilar? Are not my eyes as black as the spot on the Alrus, while those of the stranger are of a color never celebrated by our poets? Yet this rose-and-lily compound no sooner comes, than our lord and master has no eyes and ears for any one else—and all, so far as I can discover, because some learned mollah has given her the education of a musty scribe, and the girl herself dares say and do things no other woman in her senses would think to enact, and live. Adlah be praised, however! There can be but one sultana; and though the Odalisque may reign in the heart of the commander of the faithful, in the harem her will is secondary to mine."

As the Lady Zorayda paused to regain her breath, the favorite ventured to suggest:

"Then why not use your power to rid yourself of one whose presence is hateful to you?"

"Are you a fool, Katinka? Do you not know she is a novelty as yet, and that were Mahmoud to lose her now, all my influence, if he should suspect me, would avail nothing to prevent my being thrown into the Bosphorus? I am not so weary of life; but even should I escape suspicion, and such a doom, he would be inconsolable forever. No—wait awhile, and perhaps I may find some fresh beauty to lure him from her; then is my time to strike. Engrossed by another, he will not heed her fate, and when tired of her successor, the sultan will return to my feet once more. What do you think of this scheme, little one?" inquired the princess, with a self-satisfied air.

The simple Katinka replied: "Truly I am astonished at your wisdom. What a head it takes for a sultana! I am very sure I shall never be one."

"Sincerely, I do not think you ever will!" exclaimed Zorayda, with a laugh, as she patted her companion's cheek. Then rising, and gathering her shawl together, she retired with Katinka to her own apartments, to indulge in a chibouak and siesta.

As Zorayda had said, at the age of sixteen her beauty had induced Mahmoud to make her his sultana; and possessing a mind whose native powers were much stronger than any other inmate of the harem, the proud Circassian had never found a rival until now. Two months previous to the opening of the scene just narrated, the vizier, who was slightly in disgrace with his master, had seen Leila in the slave market, and hoping to regain favor by making a magnificent present, he had bought her and humbly requested the sultan to accept the offering. Struck by the exceeding loveliness of the young girl, Mahmoud readily forgave his minister, and in the society of one so different from any he had ever seen of her sex, almost forgot the existence of Zorayda.

The afternoon sun was gilding the minarets of the City of the Sultans, and the waves of the Bosphorus, that glided by the walls of the seraglio, were dancing in the mellow light, and bearing on their surface numberless crafts, containing figures in all the various costumes of the Levant. On a divan at one of the latticed casements of the palace sat Leila, gazing forth upon the scene with a pre-occupied expression, while Alawi was plaiting the rich masses of unbound golden hair with jewels.

Scarcely was the task completed, when an officer of the royal household announced the approach of the sultan, and in another moment Mahmoud himself entered. Motioning the attendants to retire, he seated himself by the side of Leila and inquired after her health.

"The body may be well when the mind suffers," replied the young girl, in the most musical of voices; "of which do you ask?"

"Still pining for the humble state you are rescued from?" exclaimed Mahmoud, half pleadingly.

"The bird, though prisoned in a gilded cage, cannot forget its former delicious freedom," answered Leila, sadly, yet with a touch of enthusiasm at the images called up by the idea of liberty.

"Why can I not win your love, so that all desire to leave me may vanish?" exclaimed the sultan, eagerly. "Surely your heart is in the keeping of some one more fortunate than I."

"I am my own keeper," replied Leila, somewhat proudly; "but listen to a story I have to tell you, and then, perhaps, you will cease to wonder at my indifference to the splendor with which you surround me. I am not of the same race as the childish, apathetic inmates of your harem; a quicker, nobler blood is in my veins, and a proud impatience of restraint that belongs to another nation—it is the Anglo Saxon.”

“Are you not from India?” inquired the sultan, in surprise.

“It is not my birthplace, I believe—at least, I am of English parents. Seventeen years ago, Alawi, my nurse, then in Calcutta, was engaged by a British officer, whose regiment was ordered to another part of the country, to attend upon his wife and infant daughter during the voyage. When nearly arrived at the place of destination, a terrible storm arose, and the vessel was shipwrecked. Alawi, who had been lashed to a spar, was washed on shore with me in her arms; but although several bodies were found, my father and mother were not among them.

“Alawi knew not what to do, as there were no English residents in the place to whom she could tell my birth, and she entered the service of a rajah's wife, retaining the privilege of keeping me with her. Years passed on, and I arrived at my sixteenth year, when the young prince, the rajah's only son, slightly my senior, and whose playmate I had always been, became attached to me, and declared I should be his wife. His mother did not intend that honor for the foster-child of her ayah, and hated me from that hour; while I, having long ago been told what Alawi knew of my history, was not at all desirous of the connection. I had received a superior education from a mollah or scribe in the employ of the rajah, and who had once lived in Calcutta long enough to know considerable of English people and customs, and my dearest hope was, that some day a fortunate chance would restore me to my country people, if not to my relatives. Judge, then, of my distress, on learning that I was to be sold to a slave merchant, and carried to Constantinople. But, with the faithful Alawi who insisted on sharing my fortunes, I resigned myself to the hands of fate. Our voyage was prosperous; but immediately on landing, I was conveyed to a dwelling, where I was treated with an attention to which I was little accustomed, and furnished with a host of articles of the use of which I was totally ignorant. From thence I was brought hither, where I pine for my lost freedom, and unfettered liberty of speech and action.”

“Cannot anything reconcile you to the position of the sultan's favorite? Methinks it is not so unenviable as to excite much compassion,” said Mahmoud, with slight sarcasm.

“Does my lord fancy the glittering jewels and costly garments, in which he is pleased to deck me—the splendid apartments and parade of attendants, with which he is pleased to surround me—or a place in his harem, with the privilege of listening to the meaningless chatter of its inmates, occasionally fanning him to sleep, or singing to him when he is disposed to listen, offer me the slightest temptation? Does he imagine they afford the shadow of a compensation for the power to roam free as the air, untrammelled by the commands of a master?” And the indignant Leila turned away with flushed cheeks, and the air of a princess.

Mahmoud had never been braved thus before, and admiration mingled with his impatience, as he replied:

“Bestow your love on me, and you shall be my sultana, you shall rule me; a palace shall be built for you on some beautiful spot, sufficiently secluded to permit a wide range, and singers, dancers, and even learned mollahs shall be at your command.”

“Do not suppose, O defender of the faithful, that my highest idea of enjoyment consists in continual wandering, or that singers, dancers and scribes are my chief desires in life; besides, how am I to become sultana, when the Lady Zorayda fills that position?”

“One word from you, and the Lady Zorayda fills no position at all, unless it be a sack in the Bosphorus!” exclaimed the monarch, carried away by a desire to possess an object apparently unattainable.

“Heaven forbid!” cried Leila, recoiling from her companion in horror; “I would never even look upon you again, if your soul was stained with the murder of a fellow-mortal. But if Allah should see fit to remove the sultana, I would never share a heart with others. No! If my lord would indeed make me his grateful friend, he will help me to find my relations, if I have any, and restore me to them,” said Leila, with tearful earnestness that moved Mahmoud more than he chose to acknowledge; and rising to avoid a further pleading, he summoned his attendants and retired.

Passing along by the sultana's apartments, Mahmoud heard the sound of a lute, and entering an ante-room, signified his intent to visit her. Just having finished an elaborate toilet, the lady did not need to make any delay; but not wishing to appear eager for the royal presence, after the long neglect she had experienced, full five minutes were allowed to pass before the signal for admission was given. Lifting the curtain, Mahmoud entered a magnificent apartment, and beheld Zorayda seated in indolent repose on a divan, and beside her the favorite Katinka. Casting a languid glance upward, the haughty beauty bade her visitor welcome, and seating himself on a rich carpet at the feet of both ladies, and resting his arm on the divan, while the attendant presented a lighted chibouk, the sultan said :

"Did I not hear singing a short time since?"

"My lord says right—his humble slave was amusing herself with a new song," replied Zorayda.

Mahmoud felt the contrast between this servile emptiness and the piquant frankness of Leila's manner very forcibly, but requesting a repetition of the music, he applied himself to the beloved nargileh which Leila would not admit in her apartment. The ballad was tolerably lengthy, and before it was concluded, the empty little head of Katinka was nodding in sleep.

Quite appeased by the praise bestowed on her performance, and the consideration of a visit exclusively on her account, Zorayda grew gracious. But envy and rage filled her heart when the sultan observed that Leila was as impatient of restraint as ever, and he feared she would begin to droop.

"A wild, strange being—it is my opinion that she despises the palace, its inmates, and even the owner of it," replied the artful woman, watching the effect of her words.

The sultan recollected her fearless speeches to him, and reflected that she might not have kept her pretty irreverence for his especial benefit. Mahmoud's pride took alarm, and stroking his beard, he exclaimed :

"Inshallah ! Does the girl laugh at us ? I think so truly, since we receive no thanks for the many favors conferred upon her, and our endeavors for her happiness meet only with complaints and discontent."

"Has she indeed been bold enough to equal herself with our lord and master the sultan, and presume on favors from one whose glance alone exalts the fortunate one above all her sex ?" exclaimed Zorayda, in well counterfeited astonishment and horror.

"Such shall not long be the case," was the ominous reply.

"May the sultan live forever ! If so insignificant a being as I might hope to speak and live, I should say that a sack, or the bowstring were fitting punishment for the slave, only that it would be too much of an honor to be the subject of even such a command, from the descendant of even such a prophet."

By that sudden revulsion of feeling to which all are liable, caused perhaps by this abject flattery, or the contrast between Zorayda's contemptible delight in mischief and her rival's generous magnanimity, and it may be, discovering in the lady's unguarded manner at the prospect of success her malignant jealousy towards Leila, Mahmoud began to doubt if the young girl was capable of gratifying her vanity at his expense ; and indignant at the thought of being led by Zorayda, he turned suddenly upon her, and exclaimed, in a voice of thunder :

"Peace, idle creature ! I ask not counsel of women. Know that to her whom you thus eagerly seek to degrade, you owe your life !" And in his anger, the sultan briefly detailed his offer of making Leila sultana, which she declined to accept at the expense of another.

Throughout the whole Zorayda sat motionless in amazement, and concluding his reproof with a severe frown, Mahmoud left the now wide awake Katinka, who was sobbing in affright, to comfort her trembling mistress, who perceived her mistake in terror, fearing lest the conversation might reach Leila, and excite her to revenge. So little could she comprehend a great soul.

The next day, Neama entered Leila's chamber, and kneeling before her, presented a richly enamelled jewel-case. Lifting the lid, she drew forth a splendid necklace of pearls, and said :

"The Lady Zorayda desires your acceptance of this trifle, and begs you will wear it for her sake. She also hopes you will permit her to visit you to-day, and commence a friendship too long delayed."

Surprised at this unexpected act, and the request that followed it, Leila replied that she would be happy to receive the sultana, thinking to obtain from her an explanation that she did not consider proper to ask of the servant.

In a few hours, therefore, Zorayda came, and further astonished Leila by saluting her on both cheeks, and kissing her hands. At last she discovered that the sultana had heard she had saved her life, and remorse and gratitude prompted this demonstration.

"Surely you attach too much importance to so slight a thing. A few words that cost me no effort to speak, and were forgotten the next moment—of what value are they ?"

Every syllable added to the humiliation of Zorayda, and Leila continued :

"Besides, our friendship needs no present to cement it. I cannot deprive you of so costly and beautiful a jewel—allow me to return it ;" and she took the casket from a stand.

"Do not add to my mortification by insult," cried Zorayda. "If you will not accept my offering, I will never see it again;" and she made a passionate gesture.

Perceiving a refusal would wound and offend, Leila thanked her companion, who added :

"Complete my happiness, and let me clasp it around your neck."

The Odalisque bent her graceful head, and the sultana clasped the rich ornament on the snowy, swanlike throat, and urging Leila to visit her, Zorayda presently departed with Neama. Calling Zaidee to admire the gift, her friend expressed much delight that kindness had subdued her enemy.

Still the sultan continued to visit Leila, and offer every inducement to attach her to himself and her present condition, pleased and surprised to find that Zorayda warmly seconded his endeavors. It was of no avail, and losing the cheerful spirit of hope that had so long sustained her, the young girl began to droop. The color deserted her cheek by degrees, and the brilliancy fled from her eyes. Zaidee, exceedingly attached to her, devoted herself to the amusement of her friend; but a loss of health soon followed this depression of mind, and the songs and stories with which the fair Persian attempted to divert her, failed to accomplish any change.

Zorayda often visited Leila, who became daily more fragile, and shed tears over her with that excess of altered feeling so characteristic of her wild race, and insisted that Neama, who was an excellent nurse, should try her skill on the lovely patient, who, although she disliked the Armenian greatly, consented to please her friend, in spite of Zaidee's and Alawi's protest to the contrary.

As her debility increased, Leila ceased to pay the same attention to dress as formerly, and Zorayda's necklace, which was the last of her jewelry to be laid aside, was finally consigned to its casket. As Neama closed the lid, she said :

"I am afraid the Lady Zorayda will be much grieved to miss this from your neck; she does not imagine you so feeble—besides, she prized this ornament above all her others."

"I will insist upon returning it, then," replied Leila, sorry to have retained it so long.

"Then my mistress would certainly think you were going to leave us immediately."

Leila was perplexed, dreading to give pain, yet unwilling to keep her friend's favorite jewel, when Zaidee suggested a scheme to remedy both troubles. This was to order another necklace precisely similar, and present it to the sultana. The plan was highly approved, and Zaidee was about to give directions to a slave, when Neama observed that her mistress had often wished the ruby in the clasp had been an opal, and Leila requested the Persian to order the alteration.

In a week, the ornaments were brought from the jeweller's. But Leila had sunk into a state of inaction and lethargy, that prevented her receiving any pleasure from the nice execution of her command. Zorayda, on the contrary, was delighted with her present, and especially admired the Indian fire opal, that contrasted so beautifully with the milky pearls, and wondered at her friend's indifference. Zaidee, however, was seriously alarmed at this state of apathy, which appeared more discouraging to her than the previous wasting away, and exerted all her influence even to annoying Leila, in endeavors to make her take exercise and shake off this sluggishness.

About this time, the sultana also became indisposed, and instead of listening to the advice of Neama that she would remain quiet, and gain strength, she persisted in making frequent excursions into the country to a palace which Mahmoud had given her, hiding her increasing pallor and loss of health by rich dress, cosmetics, and reckless gaiety, and eagerly striving to win back the heart of the sultan.

Leila, who under the affectionate care of Zaidee was slowly recovering her former looks and spirits, saw but little of the princess, when one morning the seraglio was electrified with the news that the Lady Zorayda was dead. Scarcely believing the report, Leila hastened to the chamber of the sultana, and was admitted by Neama, whose countenance confirmed the rumor. On a couch lay the inanimate form of Zorayda, in the rich garments she had last put on, and around her neck the carcanet of jewels; but her countenance was swollen and livid, while a dark purple line under the necklace explained the cause of this bloated appearance—Zorayda had died of poison!

Zaidee, who had followed her friend, took her by the hand and led her away from the melancholy scene; but no sooner were they alone, than the Persian buried her face on Leila's shoulder, and burst into tears. Much surprised, Leila earnestly inquired the cause of this sudden and inexplicable grief, since the sultana was not so great a favorite as to occasion it. Zaidee, after a great deal of urging, confessed that when the Lady Zorayda had presented the necklace with so much apparent friendship, she had suspected a sinister design; but about the time when a duplicate was ordered from the jeweller, she had satisfied herself that her suspicions were correct, and Neama's desire that an opal might be substituted for a ruby in the new necklace, she believed to proceed from fear lest, by a mistake, they might be changed.

But adding to Leila's instructions, the Persian had directed that an opal should be inserted in the clasp of the ornament sent as a pattern, and a ruby in the other. The ruse succeeded, and Zaidee, who had hoped that when the sultana became ill, the fatal toy would be laid aside, on account of its oppressive weight, saw with dismay that its becoming richness prevented this wish from being realized; feeling guilty of murder every day, yet fearing to reveal the secret to Leila on account of giving a shock to her feeble health, and certain that to inform Mahmoud would only hasten the sultana's doom, Zaidee was in great perplexity, when the sudden death of Zorayda, accelerated by her late anxiety and dissipation, made the poor girl so wretched that she could no longer bear the burden of silence.

Leila embraced the devoted friend to whom she owed her life, and felt the justice of the awful retribution, although she lamented it. Her chief anxiety now was, lest the sultan should urge her to fill the station that no insurmountable obstacle now prevented her accepting. But to her astonishment, on his next visit, Mahmoud, in a dejected tone, inquired if she had any memento of her parents, and she eagerly produced a small locket containing hair, and a fine cambric handkerchief with a crest and initials nearly faded out by time, which had been about her neck at the time of the shipwreck.

In a few days, Mahmoud again came, and this time announced that the articles had been sent to the British ambassador, who had recognized the crest at once, and was acquainted with the family. As Leila supposed, her parents had perished, but her uncle, who was now the head of the house, was living in England, and had often lamented that his brother's infant daughter was not spared to him, to have been loved and cherished for her father's sake. As the ambassador was about returning to his country, his wife proposed taking Leila with them, and the sultan had come to bid the young girl farewell.

"You have raised my standard of right and justice, you have elevated my mind, and taught me the delight of having a true friend," said the sultan, in a mournful tone. "In fine, you have fitted me to enjoy the society of rational beings, only to leave me now to the idle prating of the idiots by whom I am surrounded."

"Bring them to your own level," replied

Leila, with enthusiasm. "But let me tell you that there is one in your palace who will love you for yourself alone, who is beautiful, and capable of being made a companion for any one. It is Zaidee, who came after my arrival, and I do not think you have scarcely seen her; in her, you will find a friend, and I leave her to you as a trust from me. Prove yourself as worthy of the fair Persian, as she will be faithful to you."

Taking Leila by both hands, Mahmoud gazed long and sadly at her bright face, radiant with happiness at the prospect of joining her kindred, and at length, with a deep sigh, turned quickly away and left her. This farewell pained Leila, but trusting to time and Zaidee to console him, she made the necessary preparations for departure.

The last evening spent by the young girls was full of sorrow, but Leila charged her pupil not to forget the beautiful precepts of the wise mollah, which had proved so serviceable to the orphan, and promising to send tidings of her future lot, they separated. In England, Leila found a delightful home, and ere long had the satisfaction of knowing that all her wishes in regard to Mahmoud and Zaidee were fulfilled, and every day she thanked the wise Providence that had made the carcanet of pearls an instrument of working good from evil.

KING OF THE CANNIBAL ISLANDS.

This terrible potentate, who has recently been called to an account for some of his iniquities by the U. S. sloop-of-war John Adams, seems to be a ferocious fellow. It is said he has eaten of the flesh of more than three hundred human beings, and is the greatest murderer and cannibal that ever existed. His name is Tue Vita, king of Fegee. It is charged that the English missionaries have encouraged him in his outrages. When called on board the John Adams, he begged for his life, and promised for the future to respect the lives and property of Americans. It is to be hoped that a provision was made in the treaty that he should respect their bodies also. —Boston Post.

A NATION WITHOUT A LANGUAGE.

The Swiss, being descended from French, Italian and German refugees, have no distinctive language of their own. Four languages, Italian, German, Retien and French, are spoken by different portions of the nation, and three of them, German, French and Italian are declared by law to be the national languages. German is spoken by 70 per cent. of the people; French by 23 per cent.; Italian by 5 per cent.; and Retien by 2 per cent. Of this population, about three-fifths are Protestant, and two-fifths Catholic. —Tribune.

Falsehood is never so successful as when she baits her hook with truth, and no opinions so fatally mislead as those not wholly wrong.

A FRIEND IN NEED.

BY MRS. R. T. ELDERIDGE.

The summer flowers had paled, and drooped, and died,
 And autumn brought new loveliness for me;
 At times my wayward heart seemed sorely tried,
 Earth's chastened sunlight held no charms for me,
 And bitter thoughts stole o'er me when alone,
 I mused o'er joys once fondly called my own.

"Father," I cried, when none were nigh to hear,
 "Look down in mercy on thy wayward child;
 That this fair earth may once again seem dear,
 O, let me feel the sunlight of thy smile."
 A low voice whispered softly unto me—
 "Mortal, as is thy day thy strength shall be."

Then baby voices, soft and strangely low,
 Fell like sweet music on my yearning heart;
 Fond smiles that cheered my spirit long ago,
 Remembered, loved, and shrined of life a part!
 Dear memory, backward on thy golden wing,
 To my lone heart lest darling treasures bring.

And soon there came a friend to cheer my life,
 Of gentle mien—of low and feeble tread,
 For she had felt the hand of care and strife,
 And she had mourned o'er pleasures long since fled.
 With throbbing heart I hailed her to my bower,
 As children welcome spring's first fragrant flower.

I doubted not her sad and gentle smile,
 Though I had learned to doubt in years gone by;
 She seemed as artless as a little child,
 A chastened lovelight lingered in her eye;
 Pride yielded 'neath the sunshine of her smile,
 My pent up feelings gushed forth free and wild.

On rapid wings the autumn hours sped on,
 And winter came with sunbeams wan and pale;
 Love's holy light still kept my spirit warm,
 I scarcely heeded sunshine, hail, or rain;
 My friend in need was ever lingering near,
 Soothing each doubt, and calming each wild fear.

Father, if every frail and suffering child
 Would lean on thee when called life's ills to bear,
 Thou'lt ne'er withhold from them thy pitying smile,
 For thou wilt soothe each heart that's worn with care.
 Lead me, dear Shepherd, wheresoe'er I go,
 Through pastures where pure, living waters flow!

MOUSAN THE MISER.

BY DR. J. V. O. SMITH.

IN the time of Sultan Mahmoud the Second, there resided at the southern extremity of Pera, the Frank quarter of Constantinople, a little round-shouldered man named Sacton Mousan. He had a sprinkling of Armenian blood coursing through his veins, but how 't got there he was never exactly informed, nor did he care to ascertain, since he much preferred to be considered a genuine Turk, to being suspected to be a hybrid.

Although Mousan apparently smoked as much Syrian tobacco from the first call of the muezzin to morning prayers till sunset, as his neighbors, he found opportunity of gathering more from observation from sunrise to sundown, than any half dozen of his neighbors. It was a governing maxim with Mousan, that idleness brought no profit. This was a discovery made in early life, by observing that people who were continually counting their beads, and saying "Allah, Allah mac shan," without using their fingers in some regular employment, never became rich.

Sacton Mousan had no inheritance but poverty. "If that had any marketable value, then," said he, "I should have been worth as much as the Capudan Pasha. However, poverty would not buy kabobs at the cook shop, nor pay the sultan's taxes when the collector passed through the district. So Sacton Mousan determined very early in the commencement of life, to deal in realities. Gold could be seen as well as felt.

"Poverty also," exclaimed Diafar, the cobbler, who had a stall next door, in the course of their conversations on the ways of the Gionars, "can be seen and felt, too; but one inspires energy, and when seen, commands respect, while the latter gives first the blues and then the very blackness of despair."

When people are disposed to be argumentative, there are plenty of topics to expend breath upon. It was so with Diafar. He wanted to talk most of the time, or at least, he had something to say as often as he took the pipe stem from his lips. Mousan was sufficiently civil to be neighborly; still he had an inward conviction that it would not pay. "For," said he to himself, a hundred times over, "money can enter a harem, poverty can't squeeze into a caravansera."

"Money, ay, money, is power: it will move hearts or mountains; it is a magic wand in a fairy's hand; it's a panacea for trouble; it's a friend in need; it's a polyglot, speaking all languages; it's a sword to command the faithful; a lever to remove obstacles. Money could be exchanged for a pashalic; it can build a palace and stock it with houris. I will have money—yes money, money—money is power."

Thus soliloquized and thus cogitated Mousan the miser, yet he had not a para, nor a way of raising a piaster, which is five times more.

Mousan had not smoked up to his six and twentieth year with both eyes shut. No, he examined the Frangees, as they passed by the doorway where he generally sat, observing the art of the tight garments, strangling cravats and boots too small for their infidel feet. "Poor devils," he frequently whispered to himself, for there are some sentiments it will not answer to give to the wind in Stamboul, even though uttered in the language of the Koran. "Poor devils!" and there was no one harmed in thinking of them, and sympathising in their unhappy destiny. After taking another whiff, the imitation amber mouth piece was withdrawn, and while the smoke, like the turn of a corkcrew, was twisting its way towards the zenith, he would still repeat, for the fortieth time, "poor devils," as group after group were ascending the steep avenue from Tophana, near the great fire tower. "You can get money, but no share in the Paradise of the Prophet."

Somebody may have the vulgar curiosity to know how a smoking philosopher of this calibre could have existed in the thickets of Constantinople twenty-six years, without having moved a finger to better his condition. How do a million of dogs subsist in the same great city? There is a problem for the wise ones. Nobody knows, but it is generally believed they have a poor living, as they depend principally upon charity. A man is worth more than a dog—who knows but he may have kabobs from that source? At the well Zem-zen, whoever is thirsty may quench his thirst without thanking anybody. Mousan might have gone there, had he a desire.

Not knowing how Mousan was fed or clothed, no further speculations are needed on that point. Those who choose may reflect upon that theme for themselves.

"How do those vile unbelievers obtain so much cash?" This was another in the series of undertone questions propounded and answered by the same suppressed voice. "If I inquire," said Mousan, "possibly the secret may be revealed. It costs nothing to make the experiment."

Next morning, while at his usual post between the lintels of a rickety door, squatted on the threshold, watching the ascending smoke from the pipe bowl just as he had done from the beginning, a respectable old man in plain garments of civilization, with long white locks floating over a high coat collar, and in small clothes, came along deliberately, without seeming to be startled at the beautiful housings of the Tefterdar's Arabian steed, then being led by an Albanian groom, or the huge aroba, rumbling onward towards the sweet waters of Europe, filled with Circassians from the palace of Murad Pasha, the chief of police.

This amazed Mousan. "He must be stupid, as some of the Christians are said to be in their own country, not to raise his optics even for a single look," thought Mousan.

Withdrawing the pipe from the deep furrow in the under lip where it rested steadily, and following the old Giourar a few rods, he came up in a modest manner, saluting him in the name of the prophet. "May a hundred moons shine on your bald head," said Mousan, respectfully, salaaming as he pronounced the benediction, with an ease and grace befitting a master of ceremonies. Neither surprised nor alarmed, the old gentleman stopped, and, with a courtesy characteristic of a well bred stranger, heard what Mousan was pleased to repeat.

"May you have a hundred sons to strengthen your house," said Mousan, "and all your daughters be the delight of pashas with three tails, O, happy howadjii," again spoke Mousan, with additional salaams.

"Pardon me, for so it is written in the book of books, the wise shall forbear and teach the ignorant. Jews, the accursed race, gather gold and silver under circumstances both oppressive, and to the short-sightedness of your slave, unrighteous; but by the decrees of Allah, who can avert, the Armenian becomes a banker to the sultan, with the privilege of appearing in front of a mosque which he despises, in a scarlet fez and tarbousch. The Greeks gather pearls, amber, precious stones, and buy majasmes, the eating of which makes the fairest ladies sigh for them; but here am I, who never avenged a fly, with nothing but my wits. Tell me then, reverend gray beard, how to become rich."

"Is that all you require?" said the man in small clothes. "Procure a wife; he that hath a good one hath a great treasure," and on he walked, leaving Mousan in a brown study.

That afternoon Mousan strolled through the bazaar, hoping to discover cheap slaves on sale, fully resolved to purchase on credit, as he had no money. On the way he saw a yellow slipper, with a long turn-up toe, lying under the window of a magnificent house. The panes of glass, as customary in all cities inhabited by the faithful, were admirably secured by gilded bars.

On close inspection, a note was found forced up into the extremity of the shoe. He turned the corner, and read on satin paper, these lines:

"Whoever finds this, will find something worth having, by standing under the middle window of the third story, in the alley, at the ninth hour this night; may the prophet's cloak cover the believer who ventures on the expedition."

"Mashallah!" said Mousan, audibly; "nothing venture nothing have, say the Giourars."

Punctually at the moment he was on the ground, occasionally looking upward, because it was natural to conjecture that blessings would come down from above if they came at all. He was not long kept in suspense—slowly, a dark body began to descend. "Should it be a mill-stone," said Mousan, "and the cord breaks, the sultan will lose a subject." In another instant it reached the pavement. With proper caution Mousan gave it a rigid scrutiny before laying a finger too near the lion's mouth, if lion it should be. To his delight, it proved to be a splendid cloak, lined with ermine. "Very well—there is nothing bad in that," thought the receiver. In another moment, down came another equally huge mass. "Another cloak, perhaps," was in his mind. It was not a cloak; no, it was something with a beating heart. Mousan untied the cord, and in doing so felt a terrible throbbing.

Again he said to himself, "If this is a man, the sooner he is disposed of, the quicker I shall be relieved of a burden."

No chronicle has explained how he ascertained that the second installment was a woman.

"Mousan," was whispered in his great ear, "I trust all to you. Conceal me in your box at Pera."

There was no alternative. If he had run, why, the patrols would have arrested him; the dogs would have howled, and the woman have been sent to the bottom of the Bosphorus, the next day, in a red bag.

Like two friends away they sped to his quarter in Pera. He had no light. However, they groped through the door, and Mousan told her to occupy the further corner, while he kept on the lookout in front. As soon as the sun was up, he was in raptures with the gazelle eyes, the blushing cheeks, the raven locks, the henna stained nails, the gorgeous dress, the diamond bracelets and the noble figure and divine gracefulness of his charge. "Lucky dog am I," he was continually repeating; "a wife free of all cost."

At the eleventh hour, the sun having darted his bright rays into the dome of the holy mosque of Achmet the Slayer, heralds were everywhere offering rewards for the sultan's daughter, the beautiful Sameri el Yatan, or the Peacock's Eye. She had been promised to a favorite of her exacting father. By suppressing a rebellion in Albania, he had immensely gratified the disposer of heads, who, to encourage others with an expectation of gaining what he would not have to give, another princess, the Peacock's Eye was designed to be the recompense of his bravery.

Sameri, through the lattice that barricaded her windows, saw a sprightly youth daily practising horsemanship, whom she looked upon till she was miserable, on those days when the young man omitted the customary exercise.

Of course she could not know who he was, or where he could be found. She was resolved to make a bold effort to find him, on hearing the announcement made the very day on which her slaves let her down from the window, that she had been bestowed on the Albanian victor.

Women are more courageous than the rougher sex. When dangers thicken, and where their affections are concerned, men sink into utter insignificance in comparison with the fertile expedients they promptly devise.

After hearing the herald and the promised reward, she was fearful of being betrayed, having discovered by what she saw and heard, of the poverty of her protector. Her energy of character never forsook her; not a nerve refused its office.

"Mousan," she said, for he had told her all about himself, and how he wanted to be rich, "find the young horseman, which you may easily accomplish by going to the place of exercise. Bring him here, but without declaring the object, or betraying me. Be faithful, and you shall be rich."

Precisely as directed, the horseman was at the accustomed exercise. Mousan approached him in the name of the prophet. "Born of happiness—come with me that you may learn a lesson to teach to others."

Surprised as he might be with a salutation so odd from a shabby fellow like him, the young man said, "nothing venture nothing have," and followed. He made his horse fast to a post near the house of the dancing dervishes, and then kept close on the footsteps of Mousan to his door.

The Peacock's Eye thrilled with emotion. He was more marble-like than he had been before. He fell on his knees, a position a Mussulman never takes, except in one of the postures of prayer. "Princess!—who can you be but the princess? All Stamboul is in commotion. The guns at the arsenal are proclaiming the sultan's grief at the loss of his daughter, and messengers are threading their way round about, proclaiming that the princess has been borne away by the angels on the wings of the clouds. To me she was betrothed! You are the fair Sameri el Yatan. I am Schakmet Pasha." She swooned in his arms! Mousan stood looking on, half petrified with fear, but somewhat vexed with himself for having brought in a rival. "Matters are coming to a climax," he mumbled to himself. "This is not getting a wife after all, scot free; but what is to be done? If I drive him out, the Peacock's Eye will have no eye for me. Certainly they love one another."

While these reflections were running through his mind, Schakmet gave directions how to proceed: "Go to the palace of his majesty the sui-tan, and ask what shall be the reward of him who restores the Peacock's Eye."

Difficulties were many and vexations before the question reached the kishlaragha; but it did, and was carried forward to the apartment of the concealed. Said the sultan through the stentorian lungs of the same black messenger: "Whoever returns the princess, shall be the Tefterdar of the royal household. His salary shall be a million piasters per month. He shall be quartered at the royal kiosk at the north of Scutari, and have a roast fowl on Friday, from the kitchen of his master."

Mousan's head swam with visions of delight. Being tremendous hungry, the idea of a roast fowl seemed to have a visible form, dancing just before his eyes, all the way back to his locked up prizes. With a royal guard, himself adorned with a blue scarf and a chain of gold dangling from his neck to the saddle knob, the procession wended onward to the palace. They arrived safely at the gate of felicity, which opened upon its brassen hinges and permitted the princess and Schakmet to enter, and then closed again as though moved by an invisible power.

Just as he had been promised, all the conditions were fully and perfectly realized. He sat on a silken divan at the entrance of the treasury department, with the high sounding distinction of Tefterdar or treasurer. With such means at his disposal, "now," said Mousan, "I will have a wife to my liking."

Besides visiting the slave market in person, servants were directed to ransack not only the public bazars, but all the private establishments of the Jew brokers, for something rare and extraordinary in the line of female beauty.

"Anybody may find an ugly woman. It would be ridiculous in me, with ample means, to purchase a homely commodity, therefore my wife shall be handsome." Word was brought that a beauty of the rarest character was to be had, unsight unseen, for the sum he received for one month's wages in the treasury. At this he cried out in dignified rage, striking an open Koran with his jewelled fist, "It is too much. I would not give that for the Princess Sameri el Yatan!"

Before the words had died in the air, a door opened in the wall, and the princess herself stood before him. "Then you would not part with a month's wages for the daughter of the sultan?" Abashed, his head fell upon his breast.

"Schakmet Pasha died in battle. His last message to me, and my royal father sanctioned it, was this: 'Be the loving wife of our deliverer, Sacton Mousan the treasurer.' I sent the message, and fixed the price to try your heart.

Money has destroyed the good intentions that were honorable to you in poverty. You will never see my face again."

While bewildered with his rash folly, a slave announced a successor to the Tefterdar, who squandered all his property, and Sacton Mousan returned to the old doorway in Pera, as poor as he left it. Those who passed by, as long as he lived, used to point him out to strangers, saying, "There sits Mousan the miser, who preferred money to a good wife, and therefore lost a great treasure."

A REVOLUTIONARY INCIDENT.

During the retreat from the city of New York, on the 16th of September, 1776, Greene, at the head of a small detachment, was riding up the middle road, towards Harlem Heights where the American army was to unite. An artillery carriage, without the gun, came rapidly along the road, when Greene ordered the driver to stop.

"Where is your piece of cannon?" said Greene, sternly.

"Please you, general, the British were so close behind me, that I thought it best to leave the gun, to save myself, the men and horses."

"Face right about?" said Greene, "or I will run you through!" drawing his sword at the same time. The man could do nothing but obey.

"Now, gentlemen," he continued, "let us recover the gun."

They rode back as fast as possible, found the cannon, a brass six-pounder, placed it on its carriage, and in the face of the British troops, then advancing, successfully escaped. This shows, in a measure, the decision of character of Greene. —Morning Star.

WELL SAID.

The Indian, in his native condition, is no fool, as the following anecdote related by a Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Republican attests:—We met Col. Sam Stambourg to-day in the rotunda of the capitol, and while we were looking at the carved representations over the doorways of the rotunda, the veteran Indian agent told us that in 1830, with a delegation of the Menominee Indians, he visited the capitol, and explained the nature and design of the stone groups in the rotunda, when the chief, "Grizzly Bear," turned to the eastern doorway, over which there is a representation of the landing of the Pilgrims, and said, "There, Ingen give white man corn;" and to the north, representing Penn's treaty, "There, Ingen give um land;" and to the west, where Pocahontas is seen saving the life of Captain Smith, "There, Ingen save um life;" and lastly to the south, where the hardy pioneer, Daniel Boone, is seen plunging his knife into the heart of one red man, while his foot is planted on the dead body of another, "And there, white man kill Ingen."

Look not mournfully into the past—it cannot return; wisely improve the present—it is thine; go forth to meet the shadowy future without fear, and with a manly heart.

MY HOME.

BY MRS. MARY J. KESSELMER.

I love it, I love it, my beautiful home,
Where the birds in the springtime so cheerily come,
From the wild mocking-bird to the soft cooing dove,
They sing round my home in friendship and love.
I love it, I love it for the many sweet hours
Spent at my home, mid its jessamine bowers.

I love it, I love it, the bright evergreen
That grow round my home, they're the loveliest seen—
The dark holly-bush, the bright cedar tree,
The wild brier-rose, are all dear to me.
I love it, I love it, the many sweet hours,
Spent at my home, with its birds, trees and flowers.

I love it, I love it, and long may I see
The wren build its nest in the old oak tree:
Or list to the mocking-bird warbling his lay,
Or else to the lark at the ope of the day,
Who as upward and onward his course is to fly,
Tells his sweet matin song to the Maker on high.

Yes, I love them, I love them, those scenes so dear,
And oft to my eye springs the unbidden tear,
As I think on my home and the friends I loved there,
Who used with my joys and sorrows to share;
Should I live but to see thee, ne'er again will I roam,
Until I leave thee forever, my childhood's sweet home.

THE LOVER'S LEAP.

BY MAURICE SILLINGSBY.

THERE is perhaps no part of England so rich in legends and well preserved traditions, handed down orally from generation to generation among the inhabitants, as Derbyshire. Derbyshire is justly celebrated for its picturesque scenery, the fine country-seat of the Duke of Devonshire, and its almost inexhaustible stores of limestone. For miles around, from this point, you may see the bright blaze of the numberless lime kilns, shooting up their innumerable sparks, which come dancing down again through all the long night, and through all the long year—for ages, perhaps, and so incessantly, too, that it might almost seem a positive necessity to continue on in the same way for an incalculable period of time.

There are many anecdotes in circulation among the peasantry, relating to the present duke, one of which I will take the liberty to relate as prefatory to the "Lover's Leap," it being not only characteristic of an Englishman, but also of the great duke himself, whose immense wealth, magnificent style of living, and munificent liberality, have extended his well-earned reputation across the water.

It chanced one day that a poor coal-carrier, as he was carting coal in sacks to the kilns in Cawver, discovered the mouth of one sack to have loosened suddenly, and removing it from the back of the ass, he commenced gathering up the scattered fragments, which no sooner had he accomplished, than he found it impossible to restore it to its place again. Noticing just then a large, powerful looking man walking leisurely along the road, with his hands behind him, he cried out, lustily: "This way! this way, man, and gi'e us a ha'penny's lift, will ye?"

The stranger, roused from his reverie by the call, and entirely content to humor the whim of the carrier, came briskly forward and laid hold of the other end of the sack. Being unused to this kind of exercise, his hands slipped off two or three times before he succeeded in restoring his end, the awkwardness of which the carrier took the liberty to censure roundly, all of which was taken by the stranger with perfect equanimity and good humor. After they were through, the stranger desired to know why he did not purchase a horse and cart, which would certainly be much more profitable than carrying it in sacks.

"It is as much as I can do," answered the carrier, bluntly, "to feed my two asses, much more to buy a horse and cart, which would cost me full twenty guineas."

"You should apply to the duke," responded the stranger; "he is said to be very liberal with those who are deserving."

"I say the duke," cried the other, making a cabalistic sign with his thumb against his nose, and a perpendicular elevation of his four fingers, which seemed to say: "That's a pretty good joke, now, but you don't think I'm so ignorant as to be caught in that trap?"

The stranger, who had observed him narrowly, here asked if he doubted the duke's goodness.

"No, I don't say that," said the carrier, "for I think the duke is a good fellow, if you only have a spare guinea or two."

"Why, what do you mean by that?" inquired the stranger, reddening.

"Well, it is just this much, flat," said the carrier. "If I have a guinea for the per. ar, I can see the duke; but if I haven't the guinea, I am turned away—I can't see him."

"Do you mean I am to understand this as the truth?" demanded the other, sternly.

"Why, bless your soul, man," responded the carrier, laughing, "haven't I been there myself and been refused, and don't I know a round dozen that could tell you the same story, if you would take the trouble?"

"Never mind," said the other, changing his come to one of cheerful encouragement, "you pay the duke a visit to-morrow, and I think he will give you an audience."

The carrier shook his head dubiously.

"It's no use! I wouldn't give a rusty farthing for all my chances of seeing him!"

"But you shall see him!" cried the stranger, vehemently; "for I am stopping with the duke myself, and I will bespeak an audience for you. When you call at the porter's lodge, inquire for me—Maxwell." And with this he turned and walked vigorously away.

The next day, the carrier presented himself at the duke's palace and inquired for Maxwell. Without asking a word as to perquisites, the porter conducted him straight to the usher, who in turn led him into the grand reception-room, where the duke was sitting attired in a magnificent court dress. In a moment, the carrier recognized in the duke's features his quondam friend and co-laborer of the preceding day, and without offering a word, he fell on his knees before him in an attitude of supplication.

"Arise, my honest friend!" said the duke, coming forward. "There is no occasion for this! You have no cause to fear me."

And with this he rang a bell, which was speedily answered by a handsome page in sky-blue pants and a crimson jacket.

"Bid the porter come to me!" said the duke.

The page retired, and a moment after the porter entered.

"Now, my good friend," said the duke, turning to the carrier, "state to this man what you did to me yesterday."

The porter, who now recognized the carrier as one of those applicants whom he had turned away on a former occasion, began to look extremely crest-fallen.

"Speak up, man," said the duke; "you have nothing to fear!"

Thus assured, the carrier went on and related all, and much more than he had on the day preceding. The porter succeeded in stammering out some sort of an excuse, but was speedily frowned into silence by the duke. After he had concluded his story, the duke turned to the porter, and said: "Now, sir, your stay here depends on your making a clean breast of it."

The poor fellow broke down and acknowledged everything. He said he had only thought of the money; the consequence had never occurred to him, but he would be sure and mend in the future.

Said the duke: "The consequence is trifling to you, for you have made your office in my household that of a sinecure; but to me the result is of immense moment. Here, for years, have I not been pleased to style myself the patron of the poor, only to awaken now and discover that those alone who possessed the means to bribe my domestics, and consequently did not need it, have been the sole recipients of my bounty. I shall look to it in the future. If I did by you as I almost feel it my duty to do, I should forthwith discharge you from my service forever. I might crush you, but what benefit to me, or what benefit to the poor whom your cupidity has defrauded, would result from it? The mission of a wise man is to create instead of destroying, to support instead of pulling down; and by my forbearance in the present instance, I trust I shall not only punish for past offences, but shall encourage to better deeds in the future. You may go, now, and see that you have in readiness, against this poor man's coming, a horse and cart suitable for his business." And with this injunction, he waved the stricken culprit from his presence.

After he was gone, the duke turned to the carrier and said: "Now, my honest friend, do you longer doubt the duke's willingness to assist the deserving?"

The carrier would have embraced the man, had not the conventional shadow of a dukedom stood between them. As it was, he drew his coarse sleeve across his eyes, and dislodged some drops of moisture that had gathered there.

"You will come every year and tell me how you get on?" said the duke, as the carrier made his last awkward bow at the door of the audience-chamber.

No man in England is perhaps so idolized by the peasantry as the Duke of Devonshire. He is the patron of all harmless sports and recreations. He is the presiding genius of the May-day and harvest festivals, on which occasions the jocund feast in the open air, and many other primitive customs are revived.

Chatsworth Hall, the Duke of Devonshire's palace, is situated on a side hill, and surrounded and made up of almost everything of imaginable splendor—gardens, terraces, obeliskal sculpture, parks, conservatories, fountains with dripping naiads, and the waters sparkling and dancing among the pendant branches of the willows. There is also the royal nursery, where a great many of the sovereigns of England have each planted a tree.

The duke is now an old man, and resides most of the time here. Strangers may know when the duke is at home by the Union Jack, which is to be seen floating from one of the towers. It is said that in early life the duke was much addicted to the "turf," being for a long time the leading feature and principal supporter of the "Chesterfield Races." But of late years he has exhibited a more serious turn; has taken much interest in church affairs, in promoting the interests of the poor, and generally in improving the condition of the peasantry around him. In 1846, the interior of the old Chesterfield church was remodelled by order of the duke, and free pews were placed in it. Chesterfield is about twelve miles from Chatsworth, and there are many legends and superstitions connected with this church. The steeple is built in a twisted, zigzag form, so that in standing in any position beneath, it looks as though it were about to topple down upon you. Near the altar is to be seen the breast bone of a cow, said to have been endowed with an inexhaustible udder, till one day a malicious old witch conceived the diabolical notion of milking it dry through a sieve, which no sooner had she accomplished, than the creature dropped down dead at her feet. The people, who looked upon the cow as an especial gift from heaven, were so indignant at the foul doings of the witch that they forthwith strung her up to the church steeple, when lo! the very steeple itself becoming curious to know upon which side they had hung so infamous a character, stooped over to look, which is one explanation of its present twisted appearance. Another is that a peasant girl came there one day of such wondrous beauty, that the steeple could not resist nodding at her, which is quite as likely to be true as the other, though certainly a high compliment to the young lady's charms.

About a mile from the village of Cawver, on the road to the duke's residence, is a colossal limestone rock, facing on the road, and rising perpendicularly to a height of ninety feet. It is known to the peasantry around by the title of "The Lover's Leap," and is the subject of a curious old legend. As the story runs, a young lord who had come up from London to attend the races at Chesterfield, discovered one day at the fair a peasant girl of such rare beauty that he instantly fell in love with her, and forthwith ordered his servant to follow her on her return, and inform him where she resided as soon as he had fully ascertained.

About midnight, the servant returned, and gave information that she was the daughter of a small farmer residing in Cawver. How to make her acquaintance, the patrician young lord was at a loss to decide; so he recalled his servant, who had a most excellent head at plotting, and laid the case before him.

"If your lordship goes there on purpose to see her," said the fellow, scratching his head, "the girl will take affright, and then the old folks will take affright; so the next thing—whip—off they'll go and hide up somewhere, your honor, and you'll not get a sight of 'em. You must go to work sort of natural like, and everything must be done just as if it were accident."

"And what plan would you suggest?" said his lordship.

"Why, I'll tell you, your honor," answered the servant. "You must get into the farmhouse by accident, that is as though it was all unexpected to you, and any other house would do just as well. And now I will tell you how I would do it, if I was you. Now supposing I was you, and you was I—that is, my servant, your honor—you see?" said the fellow, laying the tips of his two fore-fingers together emphatically. "I mount my horse, and you being my servant, you mount likewise, and we start off on the road to Cawver. When we get in sight of the farm-house, I point it out to you—no, you point it out to me—no, that's not it—I—no, you—that's it—you are my servant—now I have it—you point it out, and I clap spurs to my horse, and away I go rearing and plunging as though I hadn't the least control over the brute, and when I arrive opposite the house, I am thrown violently to the ground and severely injured. Then you come riding up with the greatest alarm, spring from your horse and cry out lustily for help. Then, as is quite natural, all the inmates will come rushing out to assist me—no, no! you!—to assist you in helping me into the house. You know something of surgery, and when I am put safely to bed, you can dress my wounds and for a day or two shake your head ominously to all questions, as though I was in the most imminent peril—ha, ha! And then I'll begin to mend. Or, vice versa!"

"Capital!" said his lordship. "We will attempt your stratagem to-morrow."

Accordingly, the young lord, accompanied by his servant, sallied forth on horseback the very next morning in the direction of Cawver. When they came in sight of the house, his lordship's horse began to rear and plunge, and by the time they arrived opposite, he was thrown with much force to the ground. The servant came up, and dismounting with a great look of trepidation, hallooed loudly for help. The next moment the door opened, and out ran the farmer, his wife, and their peerless daughter, whose name, if I mistake not, proved to be Elfrida. They were all extremely sorry that such a mishap should have befallen his lordship, at which his lordship smiled faintly; and then at the urgent solicitations of the daughter, who seemed at first sight to have conceived a violent regard for him, the farmer, with the assistance of the servant, speedily bore his lordship into the house, where he was soon after installed in a nice little room, in a nice little bed, with a nice little patchwork counterpane. For the two following days the servant, who by previous arrangement had acted in the capacity both of nurse and surgeon to his lordship, looked very grave and ominous, and though he steadily affirmed that his master was now quite comfortable, and like to get well, he did not forget to mention yet more frequently that he had had a most wonderful escape of it.

On the third day, he desired Elfrida to sit by his master while he rode over to Chesterfield to transact some business for his lordship. Accordingly, with a fluttering heart, poor Elfrida stole into the invalid's chamber, and seated herself demurely in a vacant chair. His lordship, who feigned to have just awakened from sleep, soon succeeded in engaging her in conversation, which was kept up without flagging till the servant returned from Chesterfield.

All night long the handsome form of the young lord figured wonderfully in the dreams of Elfrida. She fancied they were wandering together through flowery meads and up mountain paths, and every now and then his lordship would fall on his knees before her, and declare his love in the most ardent and persuasive language. At length they approached a little church embowered among trees—a sort of fairy-like grotto, such as the imagination alone pictures—and were met at the porch by an aged rector with an abundance of long white beard which reached quite to his girdle. When they entered the church, they found a bridal party assembled, composed of lords and ladies in rich attire, each holding a wreath of evergreen, interwoven with every description of pastoral flower, and all united in singing one of those sweet bridal hymns, still extant among the peasantry. After they were through, the rector came forward and placed the hand of Elfrida in that of his lordship. Then there was a prolonged shout which seemed to shake the roof of the old church. After the noise had subsided, the rector, in the most musical tones she had ever listened to, repeated the marriage ritual, which in a twinkling transformed the beautiful peasant into the young lord's wife. Then came a second prolonged shout, louder and more deafening than the first, which had the virtue to bring the walls of the church about their ears with a crash, when she awoke.

Day after day, Elfrida continued to sit by his lordship, till such time as the slight scratch on his elbow would permit of his hobbling about on a crutch, which his considerate servant had been thoughtful enough to procure for him. But his intentions, instead of being honorable, as might be expected of a great lord, are to be regarded as exceedingly wicked and infamous. Suffice it to say that poor Elfrida, after a little while, fell a victim to the wiles of her cunning lover. He soon tired of his prize, and his next aim was to furnish a suitable pretext for deserting her. How to do this, he hardly knew. He disliked encouraging a hope which he felt could never be realized. His heart was not yet hardly corrupt enough to suffer him to go up to London with fair promises on his tongue, while the black lie still rested on his soul. He loved Elfrida, but then he was sensible that his rich and powerful father would never give his sanction to an alliance of this description. So one day when they were seated together, he says to Elfrida:

"O, woe is me! O, cruel fate that I had not been born a peasant instead of a lord! Then there would have been no obstacle between us; no one to say unto me, 'do thou so!' I should have been more content with thee, my love, than the most fortunate king on earth with his pampered mistress, or his royal consort. I should have been far more happy, if you will believe me. Then might I have turned the glebe and scattered the grain, and gathered an abundance of everything which the simple wants of nature require. I should have been ignorant of the world; my ambition would have led to rustic sports and simple athletic exercises; my highest aspirations would have been low; and all the glitter and gewgaw, the whirl and excitement and false views of everything, as received through the medium of artificial life, would have been to me a sealed book. But now I am a slave—a slave to parental authority; from birth and education a slave to public opinion; a slave to hereditary titles, lust, and pampered pride. I cannot break the chain. It was forged by Satan for the first among my ancestors, and has descended to me unbroken. It comes down to me with my titles and hereditary honors. I love you, dearest Elfrida; but should I be so reckless as to marry one in your humble walks of life, however good or beautiful or worthy, my father would from that moment disinherit me forever. Then indeed should I be more an object of pity, in my ignorance of what even the most unlettered hind may know, than the meanest pauper that ever felt the weight and authority of a beadle's nod. No, dearest Elfrida, I can see no way at present of fulfilling my promise to you, without rendering us both the most wretched and miserable of created beings."

When his lordship concluded his harangue, poor Elfrida answered him through her tears, as follows :

"It would be selfish in me, my lord, to ask of you so great a sacrifice. But could you be happy in the society of one who loves you, with the comforts of life without its luxuries—one who would sacrifice everything in her power to minister to your ease and convenience—such a home have we to offer you, in case your father should think proper to withdraw from you his countenance."

"I see," answered his lordship, petulantly, "for the sake of being the wife of an impoverished lord, you would attire yourself in rags and subsist on air; but would you promise all this, were I a peasant, and as humble as yourself?"

"Were you a peasant, my lord," answered Elfrida, gently, "you would never have missed what you never experienced."

"True," responded his lordship, with a sarcastic smile. "Your love for the man is of that transitory quality which measures itself in accordance with the honor which his station confers. I may be rich to-day and poor to-morrow, but whatever fortune betide, I am none the less a lord—a peer of the realm. The opulence of a name has dazzled your simple heart, Elfrida. You do not love me for myself alone—of this am I convinced!"

"O, no," cried Elfrida, weeping, "you must not, you shall not be convinced of so great a falsehood! O, my lord, I have not the language to express to you the full measure of my sincerity—my love—my devotion!"

"True love," answered his lordship, "is ever at a loss for words. You should give me more convincing proof of it."

"Alas, alas! how shall I ever be able to give you more convincing proof than I have already?" cried the poor girl, in despairing tones. "O, my lord, have pity on me, and give me some test whereby I may show you the strength of my love, and dissolve forever this terrible doubt. I care not what you bid me do, so that I can do it. Anything—anything, my lord, to break this harrowing suspense."

"Well, my brave girl," said his lordship, smiling, "I have a test for you which shall fully satisfy my doubts, and make you in every way worthy of my love and esteem."

"O, name it—name it!" cried Elfrida, throwing her white arms around the neck of her imperious lover.

"I fancy you will not be so impatient," answered his lordship, "when you come to learn the condition I am about to impose."

Elfrida gazed into her lover's face with an earnest look of inquiry.

"You see the great limestone rock yonder?" said his lordship, pointing in the direction of Chatsworth. "Now you shall ascend to the summit of that rock, Elfrida, and leap down into my arms. I will stand below you in the Cawver road, and catch you as you descend."

For a moment the poor girl was stupified with surprise.

"Will you undertake it now?" said his lordship, laughing; "or will you wait and take into consideration the risk?"

"No!" said Elfrida, with a sudden look of determination. "If you require a sacrifice to prove the strength and sincerity of a peasant girl's love, you shall have it within the hour."

"Shall I lead the way?" said his lordship, with an incredulous smile; "or will you first advise with your friends?"

"No!" answered Elfrida, proudly. "He who seeks his own destruction needs no adviser. I am ready!"

His lordship, thinking it all farce, concluded there would be no harm in carrying the joke a little further; so he caught up his hat and led the way. When they reached the foot of the ascent, they separated, his lordship passing into the Cawver road, which was of solid limestone and as white almost as chalk; while Elfrida toiled wearily up the side of the huge mountain of rock, till she arrived at the summit, which was quite level, and covered an area of several yards.

Shortly after his lordship had taken up his position in the road, he saw the maiden approach and kneel down on the very verge of the rock. Still he considered the entire transaction in the light of a farce, and thinking she would expect him to call out to her to desist ere long, he only laughed to himself and remained silent. In a few minutes, Elfrida arose from her kneeling posture, and gazing down at her lover, for a moment, with a look of unutterable affection, she retreated back till she was lost to view.

"She has acted her part pretty well," thought his lordship, "and is doubtless somewhat disappointed to think—"

Before he could conclude his reflection, the poor girl came bounding forward, her silken hair floating in the wind, and her white hands clasped firmly together. In vain his lordship called on her to desist; in vain, in his frenzy, he strove to wave her back; but useless were all his endeavors. The next instant, she sprang from the terrible height into the open space above him. Sick at heart, and dizzy with emotion, he sank to the ground, and closed his eyes during that one moment of awful suspense. The next moment, he felt a pair of soft arms encircling his neck, and opening his eyes with a sudden expression of surprise, he beheld Elfrida kneeling before him, radiant with the sublimity of love and beauty, and perfectly unharmed.

At first, he could hardly credit his senses. Such an exhibition of love and devotion he had never dreamed of witnessing. How she could have escaped from instant destruction, seemed to him almost a miracle; and he resolved that nothing should prevent him from doing justice to one so worthy of his regard. Accordingly, with the approbation of Elfrida's parents, they were privately married soon after this, and sometime subsequently, on the death of his father, the young lord made public his marriage with Elfrida, and removed with her to London.

The secret of her wonderful escape is no doubt owing to the fact of the air having gathered under her skirts with such force of resistance as to partially buoy her up. The peasants look upon it as a miraculous interposition, rendered for the ostensible purpose of making her a great lady. The rock rises about centre ways in what is now called "Stony Middleton;" and just at the foot of it ("The Mountain," it is sometimes called), stands a little wayside inn, in front of which, creaking on its rusty hinges, is the sign of "The Lover's Leap," painted in large gilt letters.

AN ENGLISH BLUNDER.

Some of the English bulls are quite as amusing as those of their Hibernian neighbors. As Mrs. Gibbon, a popular actress at Liverpool, was about to dress for Jane Shore, her attendant came to inform her that a woman had called to ask for two box orders as she and her daughter had walked four miles to see the play.

"Does she know me?" asked the actress.

"Not a bit," was the reply.

"Very odd. Has the woman got her faculties about her?" asked Mrs. Gibbon.

"I think she has, ma'am," said the dresser, "for I see she has something tied up in her pocket handkerchief."

That "beats Bunnagher entirely."—Wit and Wisdom.

DEBTS OF OUR CITIES.—The city of New York owes $14,000,000; Philadelphia, $10,000,000; New Orleans, $8,000,000; Boston, $7,000,000; Baltimore, $5,000,000; Cincinnati, over $2,000,000; St. Louis, over $2,000,000; Portland, Me., over $2,000,000; Mobile, $1,500,000; Charleston, near $2,000,000; and San Francisco, $1,500,000.

TO KATE.

BY SAMUEL E. ACHESON.

O, brighter far than the dark blue sea,
Are the eyes that beam with love for me;
O, sweeter far than the wild bird's song,
Is the voice that murmurs "Love, stay not long!"
O, purer far than earth's purest snows,
Is the bosom with love that for me now glows,
And dearer than all in earth or air
Are the lips that for me now move in prayer.

O, earnest and fond are the thoughts that rise
From her pure soul to heaven's bright skies;
O, soft is the hand as the softest down
Which to mine in love's chain shall soon be bound,
And dear is the heart which to mine shall be clasped,
There to be cherished while life shall last,
And heard shall my voice be early and late,
Asking a blessing on "my own dear Kate."

A GREAT COUNTRY.

There is a prevalent impression in these diggings that the United States is a "great country," and people abroad are beginning to admit that there is some foundation for our bragging about its extent and importance. Very few persons, however—except those old fogies who muddle their heads over statistics,—are aware how great it is. The figures, however, are startling in their significance. R. S. Elliott, Esq., of St. Louis, lately lectured in our Representatives' Hall on this subject, and we propose to gather from his address some facts which will open the eyes of many of our readers.

The Northwest, including Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, and the territory of Minnesota, lying on some of the largest lakes and rivers in the world, embraces one hundred and fifty-six millions of acres—nearly twice the area of Queen Victoria's kingdom of Great Britain, and capable of being divided into thirty-one States as large as Massachusetts, with a surplus of land about large enough for another "Little Rhody."

The Central West embraces Ohio, Indiana and Illinois. Fifty-five years ago there were not fifty-five thousand people in all that region, except the original owners of the soil, who have given way to the superior races, and now there are five millions of inhabitants. The census of 1860 will give them a population nearly double that of the "Old Thirteen," when those colonies went into the war of Independence. Their actual valuation is not less than two thousand five hundred millions of dollars! More than one-fourth of all the railroads in the United States are in Ohio, Indiana and Illinois.

The city of Chicago is instanced as a prodigy of rapid growth. In 1840 she had 4600 people; in 1855 she had nearly 85,000. St. Louis has also made a marvellous progress—marvellous to us “wise men of the East,” but not surprising to the wise men of the West. The total receipts of grain at Chicago for the past year were 30,486,593 bushels. The city of Cincinnati, in the heart of the great Ohio valley, is the centre of a system of her own. The Ohio valley—by which we mean the area drained by the tributaries of the Ohio River—is one of the most fertile on the globe. It is also rich in mineral wealth—coal and iron. A project is now in agitation to make a slackwater steamboat canal of the Ohio River its entire length (a thousand miles), and the thing will be done. Manufacturing industry has already reached an almost wonderful extent and perfection in Cincinnati, considering that she is not yet threescore and ten years old. We may therefore expect Cincinnati to grow in the future almost as greatly as in the past. Louisville, Ky., with a population of 85,000, is one of the richest cities in the Union.

The Far West includes Missouri and Kansas. Here we have a territory about fifteen times as large as the State of Massachusetts. In Missouri, according to the report of Professor Swallow, the State geologist, the great coal field of the State covers an area of 26,000 square miles (more than three times the area of Massachusetts) of inexhaustible beds of coal! South of the Missouri River, extending from the Mississippi to the western line of the State, there is a metalliferous region, covering an area of at least twenty thousand square miles, with mines of iron, lead, copper, cobalt and nickel—the most valuable of the metals,—and having also the best flint sand for glass, and the best porcelain clay, yet discovered in the United States. And this immense district of metallic resources has the advantage of a soil more than sufficient to feed all the miners that can ever be employed in it, if they swarm as thickly as the miners in Cornwall, or the Hartz Mountains! The population of Missouri in 1850 was 682,044. It is now not less than 850,000, and her valuation is $180,000,000. Her population would have been much greater, but for the exodus to Oregon and California. The people are adventurous and enterprising, and some of their best men are now on the Pacific.

But we know not where to stop in describing the greatness and importance of the region west of the Alleghany range of mountains. The future of this region is indeed damning, and particularly interesting to us of the Atlantic seaboard, when we reflect that our prosperity is intimately linked with the fortunes of the Great West, and that there is an inexhaustible market for our manufactures, and an inexhaustible supply of minerals and agricultural productions for our consumption.

A TRUE HERO.

The world is deaf, dumb and blind to its truest heroes, while it lavishes laurels on sham greatness. But whenever an act of heroic daring occurs, it is the duty of the press to sound its praises. Let not, therefore, the name of JOHN T. HASKINS be forgotten. He was the engineer in charge of a passenger train on the Rochester and Niagara Falls Railroad, and he saved one hundred and fifty passengers from destruction or mutilation by his nerve and presence of mind. He was running rapidly upon an embankment, when a flange of one of his wheels flew off, and his practised eye warned him that the alight divergence of the head of the locomotive foretold the immediate precipitation of the machine down the precipice. It occurred to him that if he could break the coupling of the cars, he could carry the passengers through the crisis unharmed. The idea and the execution were with him almost simultaneous. He twitched open the throttle valve to its full extent, and suddenly gave the pistons a full head of steam. The engine bounded forward frantically, snapped the couplings, and rolled down the embankment, while the train shot safely forward on the rails, and was stopped by the breaks. It is pleasant to add that the engineer, though severely wounded by the fall of the locomotive, was not fatally injured. With the dignity of true heroism he refused a present of money which the grateful passengers tendered him, saying that he had simply done his duty, and that the safety of the passengers was his sufficient reward. He is truly what the Germans call a “golden man.”

It is such deeds as his that excite our highest admiration. The pilot clinging to the wheel while his boat is in flames; the heroic girl launching the life-boat to the rescue of the wretched mariners; the angel abandoning the luxuries of rank to breathe the pestilential air of the Crimean hospitals—these are figures that live in our gallery of heroic men and women. And there are not so few of them as the world imagines. Their deeds are not recorded here, but elsewhere there is a record that embalms their deeds, and an angel voice to chant their praises in a better world.

PROVERB.—The man who speaks much does not always tell the truth.

SPRING.

BY MRS. E. T. EMERTON.

Bright, beauteous Spring! I hail thee with a greeting
 Less rapturous than in childhood's sunny days;
 Thy radiant charms, though hallowed, seem more fleeting;
 My eyes are tear-dimmed while I sing thy praise.
 Young, tender violets fill the air with fragrance,
 Sweet emblems of a modest maiden's worth,
 And bird-songs cheer me with their low, glad cadence,
 Leading my thoughts beyond this sin-stained earth.

And even the caged canary now is singing
 A gladder measure, low, and sweet, and clear;
 Young children half-blown buds and flowers are bringing,
 To tempt the captive bird. Bright Spring is here.
 Sweet, trembling warbler, could the King of kings
 Bear thee aloft toward the unshadowed skies,
 Then wouldst thou sing of joy dear freedom brings,
 Though many a captive in his bondage dies!

Bright sunbeams on the streamlet now are resting,
 Wooing the lily-buds to open their leaves;
 Within their watery home they share the blessing
 A Father's hand round every floweret weaves.
 Now lightly sailing down the crystal river,
 A pleasure-boat bears on a merry train,
 The white sails in the soft breeze gently quiver;
 O, happy childhood! all unknown to pain!

Sweet, balmy Spring! I'll strive to feel thy gladness,
 For thou wert ever dear unto my heart;
 A pitying Father gently soothes my sadness,
 And heaven seems nearer whilst my teardrops start;
 Cool saphyre kiss my brow with fond devotion,
 No traitorous sting lurks in the soothing kiss!
 My heart is bounding with a glad emotion,
 And I am yielding to a rapturous bliss.

Now dear ones from the angel-land are near me,
 Soft, dimpled hands are resting on my brow;
 Come, ye bright seraphs, every morn to cheer me,
 For Spring's young flower-buds open with beauty now;
 And I am dreaming of fair flowers in heaven,
 Made vernal by a Father's smile of love:
 I'll shrine earth's flowers till earthly ties are riven,
 Till fadeless garlands crown my brow above.

THE MERCHANT'S APPRENTICE:

—OR,—

NO SALARY THE FIRST YEAR.

BY SYLVANUS COBB, JR.

MR. BENJAMIN GOODWIN took his eldest son to the great city, for he had obtained, as he thought, an excellent place for his boy. It was a situation in the store of Mr. Andrew Phelps. Mr. Phelps was one of the heaviest merchants in the city; a dealer in cloths of all kinds, descriptions, qualities, and quantities. He had no partner, for he was one of those exact, nervous men, who want no second party in the way. It was near noon when Mr. Goodwin entered the merchant's counting-room, leading his boy by the hand.

Gilbert Goodwin was fourteen years of age, rather small, but with energy of mind and body sufficient to make up for it. His brow was high and open; his eyes of a mild, yet deep, dark blue, and his features all made up for truth and goodness. His father was a farmer, honest and poor, who had given his son a good education, and who now wished his further education to be of a practical kind. A friend had once advised him to make a merchant of the boy—it was the village school-master,—and the advice came not as flattery, but as the result of a careful consideration of the boy's qualities. By the assistance of other friends, this opportunity had been found.

"I have brought my son, Mr. Phelps, as we had arranged, and I am sure you will find him punctual and faithful."

"Ah—master Gilbert—ahem—yes—I like his looks. Hope he will prove all you wish."

As the merchant thus spoke in a matter-of-fact sort of way, he smiled kindly upon the boy, and then turning to the parent he resumed.

"Have you found a boarding place for him yet?"

"Yes, sir, he will board with his uncle, my wife's brother, sir."

"Ah, that is fortunate. This great city is a bad place for boys without friends."

"Of course, sir," added Mr. Goodwin. "And yet I hope you will overlook his affairs a little."

"Certainly, what I can. But of course you are aware that I shall see little of him when he is out of the store."

Mr. Goodwin said "of course," and there was a silence of some moments. The parent gazed down upon the floor a little while, and finally he said:

"There has been nothing said yet, Mr. Phelps about the pay."

"Pay!" repeated the merchant.

"Yes, sir, what pay are you willing to allow my son for his services?"

"Ah," said Mr. Phelps, with a bland smile, "I see you are unacquainted with our customs. We never pay anything the first year."

"Not pay?" uttered Mr. Goodwin, somewhat surprised. "But I am to pay Gilbert's board, myself, and I thought of course you would allow him something for pocket-money."

"No, we never pay anything the first year. If you were going to send your son to an academy, or a college, you would not expect the teachers to pay him for his studying?"

"No, sir."

"Just so it is here. We look upon an apprentice here as a mercantile scholar, and for the first year he can be of little real benefit to us, though he is all the while reaping valuable knowledge to himself. Why, there are at this moment fifty youngsters whose wealthy parents would be glad to get them into the birth you have secured for your boy."

"Then you pay nothing?" said the parent, rather sadly.

"Not the first year. That is our rule. We will teach him all we can, and at the end of that time we shall retain him, if he is faithful and worthy, and pay him something."

If that was the custom, of course Mr. Goodwin could make no objections, though he was much disappointed. But he had labored hard to secure the place for his son, and he would not give it up now. He had strained his slender means to the utmost in doing what he had already taken upon himself, and he could do no more.

"Never mind, my son," the parent said, when he and his child were alone. "You have clothes enough to last you through the year, and you can get along without much more. Here is one dollar—it is all that I have over and above what I must use to get home with—that will find you in spending money for some time. But mind and be honest, my boy. Come home to me when you please, come in rags and filth, if it may be, but come with your truth and honor safe and untarnished."

The boy wiped a tear from his eye as he gave the promise, and the father felt assured. It was arranged that Gilbert should have two vacations during the year, of a week each; one in the Spring, and the other at Thanksgiving, and then the parent left.

On the following morning Gilbert Goodwin entered the store to commence his duties. He gazed around upon the wilderness of cloth, and wondered where the people were who should buy all this; but he was disturbed in his reverie by a spruce young clerk, who showed him where the watering-pot and broom were, and then informed him that his first duty in the morning was, to sprinkle and sweep the floor. So at it the boy went, and when this was done he was set at work carrying bundles of cloth up stairs, where a man was piling them away.

And so Gilbert's mercantile scholarship was commenced. For awhile he was homesick, but the men at the store only laughed at him, and ere long he got rid of the feeling. A month passed away, and at the end of that time his dollar was spent. He had broken it first to purchase a pocket-knife, which he could not well do without. That took half of it. Then he had attended a scientific lecture, for which he paid half of what was left, and the rest had dwindled away, until now he was without a penny. But he bore up for awhile. He saw that the boys in the neighboring stores had money to spend, but then he thought they had rich fathers. He knew that his father had nothing to spare. He knew that the generous parent had already burdened himself with more than he was really able to bear with comfort to himself; so he would not send to him. And yet it was unpleasant to be without money; to be in that great city, where there was so much for amusement and profit, without even a penny with which to purchase a moment of enjoyment, or a drop of extra comfort. No boy could be more faithful than was Gilbert in the store. The clerks and salesmen all loved him, and Mr. Phelps often congratulated himself upon having obtained so excellent an apprentice. He worked early and late—and he worked hard—performed more of real physical labor than any one else in the store, if we except the stout Irish porter.

Four months passed away, and then Mr. Goodwin came to the city to see his son. Gilbert possessed a keen, discriminating mind, and he knew that if he made complaint of his penury, his father would be unhappy; so he said nothing of it, but only professed to be very much pleased with his situation; and the parent shed tears of joy, when he heard the wealthy merchant praise his son.

"Is your dollar gone, Gilbert?" the father asked, before he started for home.

"Yes," said the boy, with a faint smile.

"Then I must give you another, for I suppose you need a little. Has Mr. Phelps given you anything?"

"No, sir. And I will not ask him, for I know his rule."

"That's right, my son. But take this. I wish I could make it more."

And so did Gilbert wish, but not for the world would he have said so. He too deeply appreciated all his father was doing for him to complain.

Mr. Goodwin returned home, and Gilbert once more had a little money; but it lasted not long. A dollar was a small sum for such a place. A portion of it he expended for a few small articles which he absolutely needed; then he attended a concert with his uncle's folks, and ere long his pocket was again empty. His position was now more unpleasant than before. There were a thousand simple things for which he wanted a little money. His little, bright-eyed cousins teased him for some slight tokens, and his older cousins wondered why he didn't attend any of the concerts and lectures.

One evening, after the store was closed, Gilbert stood upon the iron steps with the key in his hand—for he was now entrusted with that important implement—when he was joined by a lad named Baker, who held the same position in the adjoining store that Gilbert did in Mr. Phelps's.

"Say, Gil, going to the concert to-night?" asked Baker.

"No—I can't."

"Can't? Why not?"

"Why, to tell you the plain truth, Jim, I haven't got the money."

"Pooh! Come along. I'll pay the scot."

"But I don't wish to run in debt, Jim, for I may never pay you."

"Pay me? Who talked about paying? If I offer to pay, that's enough. Come along. It'll be a glorious concert."

"But I must go home and get some supper."

"No, go with me and get supper."

But Gilbert could not go without letting his aunt know, so Baker walked round that way with him. Then they went to the restaurant; here Baker paid for the supper. He had several bank-notes, and poor Gilbert gazed upon them with longing looks. O, if he could only have a little money. Say one dollar a week, or one dollar in two weeks, how much happier he could feel. As soon as they had eaten supper they went to the concert room, and Gilbert was charmed with the sweet music he heard. He fancied it had a noble influence upon him, and that it awoke more generous impulses in his soul. But alas! How can a man, or a youth, be over-generous, with an empty pocket always?

From this time, James Baker was Gilbert's firm friend, as the world goes. The latter told all his secrets to Jim, and in return he heard all his friend's.

"Say, Gil, how is it you never have any money?" Baker asked, as they were together one evening in front of the store after having locked up.

"Why," returned Gilbert with some hesitation, "to tell you the plain truth, my father is too poor. He has done enough for me now—more than he can well afford. He has never asked me to work on his farm, but he has sent me to school, and now he is paying my board while I learn to be a merchant. But my father is good, if he is poor."

"Of course he is," warmly replied Baker. "That's where you find your good hearts, among the poor. But don't you make the store pay you for taking care of it?"

"No, Mr. Phelps pays nothing the first year."

"Why, are you in earnest, Gil? Haven't you ever got any money for your hard work?"

"No, not a penny. Two dollars is all the money I have had since I have been here, and those my father gave me."

"Well, you're a meral improbability, a regular anomaly. Why, I make the store pay me something. Mind you—I don't call it stealing, for it isn't. My master receives the benefit of all my work, and I am entitled to something in return. He is rich, while I am poor. My hard work turns money into his till; and shall I dig and delve and lug my life away for nothing? No. When I want a little money, I take it. Did I take enough to squander, and waste, and gamble away, as some do, I should call it stealing; but I don't. Yet I must have something. How do you suppose our masters think we live without money? They don't think so; if they do they must be natural born fools. That's all I've got to say about it."

"But how do you do it?" asked Gilbert, tremulously.

"How? Why, sometimes I help myself to a few handkerchiefs which I sell; and sometimes I take a gentle peep at the drawer."

When Gilbert Goodwin went to his bed that night, there was a demon with him. The tempter had come! For a long time there had been a shadowy, misty form hovering about him, but not until now had it taken palpable shape. He allowed himself to reason on the subject, but not yet was his mind made up. On the following day he met young Baker again, and he learned that all the apprentices on the street did the same thing.

A week passed on, and during all that time Gilbert gave the tempter a home in his bosom. He daily pondered upon the amount of physical labor he performed. He saw all the others with money, and he wondered if any one could possibly get along without that circulating commodity. Finally the evil hour came. The constant companionship of young Baker had had its influence, and the shaft had struck its mark. A bright-eyed, lovely girl had asked Gilbert to carry her to an evening's entertainment. The boy loved that girl—loved her with the whole ardor of his youthful soul—and he could not refuse her. At noon he was left alone in the store. Several people came in—mostly tailors—and bought goods, paying the cash. Gilbert did not stop to consider—the spell was upon him—and he kept back a two-dollar bill. That afternoon he suffered much. He dared not look the clerks in the face, though he was sure that some of them did the same thing. In the evening, he accompanied his fair companion to the entertainment, and though he tried to be happy, yet he could not.

That night the boy slept, and while he slept he dreamed. His father and mother came to him all pale and sad, and told him he had disgraced them forever. "O, my boy, my own, loved boy, thou hast lost thy truth and honor forever!" So groaned the father. The sleeper started up, and for a moment he felt relieved when he found that he only dreamed; but quickly came the truth upon him—the truth of the day before, the terrible certainty of his theft—and he groaned in the agony of a bowed and contrite heart. He started up from his bed and paced the floor. It was one long hour ere he stopped, and then he had resolved upon what course he would pursue. He remembered the oft repeated words of his father: "A sin concealed is a second sin committed." It was hard for him to make up his mind to the resolution he had taken, but when once the word had passed his lips, his soul was fixed.

On the following morning he entered the store as usual, and his duties were performed silently and sadly. The clerks asked him if he was sick, but he told them no. Towards the middle of the forenoon Mr. Phelps came in, and entered his counting-room. Gilbert watched him until he was alone, and then he moved towards the place. His heart beat wildly, and his face was pale as death, but he did not hesitate. He entered the counting-room and sank into a chair.

"Gilbert, what is the matter?" uttered the merchant, kindly.

The boy collected all his energies, and in a low, painful tone he answered:

"I have come to tell you that I can remain here no longer, sir. I—I—"

"What? Going to leave me?" uttered the merchant, in surprise, as the boy hesitated. "No, no, Gilbert. If you are sick, you shall have a good physician. I can't lose you now."

"Hear me, sir," resumed the boy, somewhat emboldened by his master's kind tone, but yet speaking in great pain. "O, I must tell you all, and I trust in your generous soul for pardon. But I cannot stay here. Listen, sir, and blame me as you will, but believe me not yet lost. My father is poor, too poor to keep me here. I have learned the ways of the city, and I have longed for some of those innocent, healthy amusements which I have seen my companions enjoying. For long weeks together, I have been without a penny in my pocket, and at such times I have felt much shame in view of my extreme poverty.

My father has given me two dollars—one when he left me here, and one when he came to visit me. But what was that? Nearly all of it went for small articles which I absolutely needed. Lectures, concerts, and various other places of healthy entertainment, were visited by my companions, but I could not go. At length the fatal knowledge was mine, that others of my station had money for such things; money which they took from their employers without leave. I pondered upon it long and deeply; and in pondering I was lost. Yesterday I took—two—dollars—"

Here the poor boy burst into tears, but the merchant said not a word. In a few moments Gilbert resumed:

"You know the worst now. I took it, and a part of it I used last night—but, O, I want no more such hours of agony as I have passed since that time. Here is a dollar and a half, sir. Take it—and when I get home I will send you the rest. O, let me go, for I cannot stay where temptation haunts me. Away in the solitude of my father's farm, I shall not want the money I cannot have. You may tell me that I have had experience—but alas, that experience only tells me that while I remain here the tempter must be with me. I would not long for what I cannot possess. While I have wants and desires, the wish must be present to gratify them. Let me go, sir; but O, tell not my shame."

The boy stopped and bowed his head. The merchant gazed upon him awhile in silence, and during that time a variety of shades passed over his countenance.

"Gilbert," he said at length, in a low, kind tone, "you must not leave me. For a few moments I will forget the difference in our stations, and speak as plainly as you have spoken. I have been in the wrong, I freely confess. I should have known that temptation was thrown in your way—a temptation which should not be cast in the way of any person—much less in the way of an inexperienced youth. Since you have been so nobly frank, I will be equally so. Forgive me for the situation in which I placed you, and the past shall be forgotten. Until this moment I never thought seriously of this subject—I never before realized how direct was the temptation thus placed before the apprentices of our houses. But I see it all now. I know that to the boy who has no money, the presence of both money and costly amusement must be too fearful a temptation for ordinary youths. But you shall not leave me. From this moment I shall trust you implicitly—and I shall love you for your noble disposition and fine sense of honor. I shall not fear to trust you henceforth, for you shall have pecuniary recompense somewhat commensurate with the labor you perform. I have often blessed the hour that brought you to my store, for I have seen in you a valuable assistant, and if I have ever held a lingering doubt of your strict integrity I shall hold it no more, for it requires more strength of moral purpose to acknowledge, unasked, a crime, than it does to refrain from committing one. Never again will I accept the labor of any person without paying him for it, and then if he is dishonest no blame can attach to me. You will not leave me, Gilbert?"

The boy gazed up into his employer's face, but for awhile tears and sobs choked his utterance. Mr. Phelps drew him to his side, and laying his hand upon the youth's head, he resumed:

"If I blame you for this momentary departure from strict honesty, the love I bear you for your noble confession vastly more than wipes it all away. Henceforth you shall have enough for your wants, and when the year is up we will make an arrangement which can but please you. What say you—will you stay?"

"If—if—I only knew that you would never abhor me for this—"

"Stop, Gilbert—I have spoken to you the truth, and you need have no fear. I will pay you three dollars a week for your own instruction and amusement, and when you want clothes or other matters of like necessity, if you will speak to me you shall have them. All of the past is forgotten, save your many virtues, and henceforth I know you only for what you shall prove."

Gilbert tried in vain to tell his gratitude, but the merchant saw it all, and with tears in his own eyes he blessed the boy, and then bade him go about his work.

The year passed away, and then another boy came to take Gilbert's place, for the latter took his station in the counting-room. But the new boy came not as boys had come before. The merchant promised to pay him so much per week, enough for all practical purposes—and then he felt that he should not be responsible for the boy's honesty.

At the age of seventeen Gilbert Goodwin took the place of one of the assistant book-keepers, and at the age of nineteen he took his place at the head of the counting-room, for to an aptness at figures and an untiring application to his duty, he added a strength of moral integrity, which made his services almost invaluable.

And now he has grown up to be a man, and the bright-eyed girl who was so intimately connected with that one dark hour of his life has been his wife for several years. He is still in the house of Mr. Phelps, and occupies the position of business partner, the old merchant having given up work, and now trusting all to his youthful associate. Gilbert Goodwin has seen many young men fall, and he has often shuddered in view of the wide road of temptation which is open to so many more; and he has made it one of the rules of his life, that he will have no persons in his employ to whom he cannot afford to pay a sum sufficient to remove them from inevitable temptation.

A MODEL PRIME MINISTER.

It is related of the Duke of Newcastle, who was Secretary of State for the Southern provinces (including the American colonies), during the French and Indian war, that he was profoundly ignorant of geography. Indeed, he was a regular ignoramus. When one of his secretaries hinted the necessity of some defence for Annapolis, he replied with his evasive, liasing hum: "Annapolis, Annapolis! O yes, Annapolis must be defended; where is Annapolis?" On another occasion at the beginning of the war, he was thrown into a great fright by the story that 30,000 French had marched from Arcadia to Cape Breton. "Where did they find transports?" was asked. "Transports!" cried he, "I tell you they marched by land." "By land to the island of Cape Breton?" "What, is Cape Breton an island? Are you sure of that?" And away he posted, with an "Egad, I'll go directly and tell the king that Cape Breton is an island."—Boston Journal.

ANOTHER JONAH.

A clergyman in South Carolina was preaching on the disobedience of Jonah, when commanded to go and preach to the Ninevites. After expatiating on the consequences of disobedience to the divine commands, he exclaimed in a voice that passed through the congregation like an electric shock, "And are there any Jonahs here?" A negro present, whose name was Jonah, thinking himself called on, immediately arose, and turning up his white eye to the preacher, with the broadest grin and best bow, answered:

"Here be one, massa."

COULDN'T DO IT.

Blitz had a bright little fellow on the stand to assist him in his "experiments."

"Sir," said the signor, "do you think I could put the twenty-five cent piece, which the lady holds, into your coat pocket?"

"No," said the boy, confidently.

"Think not?"

"I know you couldn't," said the little fellow, with great firmness.

"Why not?"

"'Cause the pocket is all torn out!"

No government can flourish where the manners and morals of the people are corrupted.

MOONLIGHT HOURS.

We met—'twas on a summer's eve,
 When all was calm and still;
 The fair young moon her silvery light
 Shone far o'er vale and hill.
 We wandered by the murmuring stream,
 Where the rippling waters glide;
 Earth seemed too fair, too beautiful,
 For sorrow to betide.

The light-winged, rosy hours flew fast
 Along the moon-lit shore;
 Soon came the time to say farewell—
 Farewell to meet no more.
 And sadness wreathed the low-toned words
 Of parting by the main;
 Yet o'er the heart there stole a hope,
 That friends might meet again.

But all is dark and lonely now,
 Along the sandèd shore;
 No more we wander by the waves,
 As in the times of yore.
 And far away mid sunny scenes,
 I rove o'er life's blue sea;
 Yet memory turns to moonlight hours,
 And all it loved with thee.

D. D. M.

THE WONDERFUL HOUSEMAID.

BY MRS. CAROLINE A. SOULE.

"I'LL bet I know somebody that's a great deal handsomer than she," exclaimed little Nell Summers in a lively tone, as she tossed her building blocks into a basket, pell-mell, and climbed into the lap of her uncle Herbert. "Miss Kate Odell can't begin to be as beautiful as our Ellen."

"And who is 'our Ellen'?" asked Mr. Lincoln, as he toyed with the child's sunny curls; "and how came little Miss Nell to know what her mother and I were talking about? We thought you were too busy with your fairy castles to listen to us."

"And if I was busy, couldn't I hear? It takes eyes and hands to build castles, not ears—don't you know that, Mr. Uncle?"

"If I didn't, I do now;" and he roguishly pinched the small snowy ones that lay hidden behind the long ringlets. "But tell me, little niece, where and who is that beautiful creature that rivals the belle of the season in charms, according to you?"

"Why, it's Ellen, our Ellen, and she's up stairs, I suppose."

"But who's Ellen, and what does she here?"

"Why, Ellen's the maid, and she sweeps and dusts and lays the table, and waits on it, too, and does everything that maids always do, and a great deal besides, for mama never has to think any more, and George and I don't have to cry over our lessons."

"A wonderful maid, indeed," said Uncle Herbert, in an incredulous tone; "I fancy Miss Odell wouldn't be scared if she knew who her beautiful rival was. But how came she here?"

"Why, mama hired her, as she does all her maids, and unless she gets married, we shall always have her, for I know she'll never do anything bad."

"A paragon, truly—this Ellen; pray explain, mama;" and Mr. Lincoln turned to his sister.

"I cannot," said she. "I can only corroborate what Nell has told you. Ellen is a maid who has lived with me a fortnight only, and yet in that time has won my heart completely. In person—but as you stop to tea, you will see her, and you can judge yourself if she does not rival and fairly, too, with the brilliant belle of the winter. In manners, she is a perfect lady; she has, too, exquisite taste and a tact in the management of household affairs that I never saw equalled—"

"Tell him how sweetly she sings," interrupted the little daughter. "She sings me to sleep every night, and I always feel, when I shut my eyes, as if I were going right up to heaven!"

"Bravo, Nell! A very angel of a housemaid she must be. I long to see her;" and he laughed in that peculiar tone which seems to say, "you're telling me but a humbug story."

"You'll laugh the other side of your mouth," said Nell, earnestly, "won't he, mama, when he comes to see her?"

"I shouldn't wonder," answered her mother, gaily; "indeed, if he had not as good as owned that he had lost his heart to Miss Odell, I shouldn't care to give so young and enthusiastic a man a glimpse of my pretty maid. But list, I hear her gentle tread."

The door of the sitting-room was opened, and there glided into the room, with a step light as a fairy's, a young, slender but exquisitely graceful female. The single glance which Herbert directed towards her, as she entered, filled his soul with a wondrous vision, for beauty sat enthroned upon every feature of the blushing face. The fair oval forehead, the soft dark eye with its long drooping lashes, the delicately chiselled nose, the rose-tinted cheeks, the full scarlet lips, each items of loveliness, were blended in so perfect and complete a union, that one felt, as he gazed upon the countenance, as does the florist, when he plucks a half-blown moss rose—Heaven might have made it more beauteous still, but this suffices.

There was a little embarrassment visible in her attitude, as she found herself unexpectedly in the presence of company, but only for an instant did she yield to it. Recovering herself hastily, she said to Mrs. Summers :

"Did you decide, ma'am, to have tea an hour earlier than usual?"

It was a simple question, but the accents thrilled the young man's heart, and he thought to himself, if there be so much music in her voice when she speaks only as a servant to her mistress, how heavenly it might be in a lover's ear; and from that time he did not wonder at little Nell's remark about her songs of lullaby.

"We did, Ellen, and you may lay the cloth at once. My brother will stop with us."

Intuitively delicate, Herbert seemed all the while busy with his little niece, and did not once look towards the beautiful domestic during the moments that elapsed ere the tea was ready, yet he stole many a furtive glance at her through the golden curls of his little playmate, and when she glided from the room, he felt as though the sunshine was driven from his path.

"Isn't she more beautiful than Miss Odell, say, uncle?" whispered Nell, as the door closed on her. "Didn't I tell the truth when I said I knew somebody that was handsomer than she?"

"Indeed you did," said Mr. Lincoln, earnestly. "She is nearly perfect."

"I wish you could see her with her hair curled, uncle. Once or twice, when we were up stairs alone, she has let me take out her comb, and such long silky ringlets as I made by just twisting it over my fingers—O, I don't believe you ever saw any so beautiful in all your life! I teased her to wear it so all the time, but she shook her head and combed them up into braids again, and said curls and housemaids didn't look well together; and when I asked why not, she said I'd know when I grew older, and then two or three great tears stood in her eyes, and I do believe, uncle, she cries some nights all the time, for her eyes look so red some mornings. Aint it too bad that such a handsome girl should have to be a maid?"

"Yes, by my soul it is," said the young man, warmly. "Do tell me, sister, her story. There must be some romance in it. She has not been a menial all her life."

"What I know, I can tell in a few words, Herbert. When Bessie, my last maid, gave notice of leaving, she said she could recommend a substitute, and I, not being very well, thought I would sooner trust her than run the risk of 'going day after day to the intelligence office. She said a young girl who, with her widowed mother, lived on the same floor with some of her friends, had applied to her for aid in obtaining a situation as maid, and she thought, from what she had seen and knew of her, she would suit me exactly. I was somewhat startled when I saw her, for though Bessie had told me how beautiful and ladylike she was, I was not prepared for the vision that met me, and, to tell the truth, in a most unbusiness and unhousekeeperly way, I engaged her at once, without inquiring as to her abilities or her recommendations. She won my heart at sight, and she has won my head since, for she is not only thorough in the performance of her duties, but executes them with a taste and judgment I have never seen excelled by any matron. If the day is cloudy, when you enter the parlor you will find that she has so disposed the window-hangings, that the most will be made of the sunlight; if it is sunny, she will so arrange them that a gentle twilight seems to shadow you. She is indeed a perfect artist in the arrangement of everything, studying and combining effect and comfort. I feel with you that her lot has not always been so lowly, but there is a certain respect she inspires in one, that forbids close questioning. I incline to the opinion that she and her mother have been sorely pinched for means, and that finding needlework an inadequate compensation, she has chosen to work out, as by that means, while she earns more a week, she saves her board from out their scanty income and has time to rest. But here is papa and herself with the tea."

As soon as they were fairly seated, and the cups had been passed, Mrs. Summers turned gently to the maid, as she waited beside her chair, and said, in a low tone, "we shall need nothing more at present." Quietly, but with visible pleasure, she withdrew; and as the door closed on her, Herbert exclaimed:

"Thank you, sister, for sending her away. I could not have borne to see so ladylike a creature wait upon me. It seemed clownish in me to sit for a moment while she was standing. In good sooth, if I had so fair a maid, I should be democratic enough to ask her to eat with me."

"And thus wound her self-respect. No, brother, she has chosen for some good reason her menial lot, and I can see would prefer to be so regarded. All I can do, till I can further win her confidence, is to make her duties as little galling as possible. But come, sip some of her delicious tea. It will give you inspiration to compliment Miss Odell to-night."

"Miss Odell go to—France!" said the young man, hastily. "A painted doll—good for balls and parties, but no fitter for life in the realities than Nell's waxen baby!"

"He's beginning to laugh the other side of his mouth, isn't he, mama?" exclaimed the little girl. "I knew he'd love Ellen best."

Herbert blushed, and Mrs. Summers adroitly changed the conversation. The housemaid was not alluded to again till an hour after tea had passed, when George, the eldest of the family, a bright but somewhat capricious boy of twelve, rushed into the sitting-room, exclaiming eagerly:

"Mayn't Ellen stay in to-night, mama, and go out to-morrow evening?"

"Certainly, if she chooses, my son."

"But she don't choose, and that's the trouble. I want her to stay and she says she can't, because her mother will be so anxious about her."

"But why do you wish her to stay, George? You certainly have no command of her or her time. Pray, what do you want she should do?"

"Why, I want her to show me how to do those horrible hard sums way in the back part of the arithmetic, and I want her to tell me how to conjugate that awful irregular French verb, aller—I wish it would aller into France where it belongs—and I want her to hear my Latin and—"

"Turn into a school-ma'am, after toiling as maid all day. No, George, no—I have been very grateful to Ellen for the assistance she has shown you in your studies, but I cannot allow her leisure hours to be so sorely invaded," interrupted his mother, while her brother held up both hands in much amazement; for, to tell the truth, since he had seen the maid, he was prepared to believe everything wonderful of her, and would not have been surprised to hear that she knew as many tongues as Burritt himself.

"Verily," said he, gaily, "this passes all—a housemaid, and hear your Latin lessons! What else does she know?"

"Everything," said George, earnestly. "She can talk French better than monsieur, and la belle Italian tongue—O, how sweet it is to hear her read and sing it! I tell you, Uncle Herbert, she knows the most of any woman I ever saw, and if you was a knight of olden times, you'd do battle for her beauty and rescue her from the slavery of that old despot, poverty;" and the boy's eyes flashed and he drew himself proudly up, as though he would have grown a man that moment and shown his prowess.

"Bravo, George!" exclaimed his uncle. "She needs no more valiant knight than her youthful page promises to be. Should your right arm ever be wounded in the defence of your queen of beauty, advise me of it, and I'll rush to the rescue." The words were lightly spoken, but there was a meaning deeper and more divine involved in them than the speaker would have then cared to own even to himself.

The boy went to his lonely lessons, the front door closed on Ellen, little Nell was snug in the snowy couch whither the maid had borne her with kisses and music tones, and then Mr. and Mrs. Summers and the brother went forth to the brilliant ball-room. But with all its light, splendor and gaiety, it had no fascinations for Uncle Herbert. His thoughts were with that beautiful girl who had come so like an angel to the household of his sister, and when at an early hour he withdrew, and gaining his couch, threw himself upon it, it was only to dream of tournaments and visored knights and queens of beauty, and the loveliest of them all, and the one that ever crowned his brow with the unfading laurel, wore the same peerless face as did Ellen the housemaid. * * * * *

Mrs. Summers had rightly conjectured the reason why one so gifted had become a menial, though not for many weeks did she learn the whole story. It was briefly this: The father of Ellen, Mr. Seymour, had been a prosperous merchant in a neighboring city. Wedded to a lovely woman, wealth flowing in upon him with a heavy current, a beautiful child to sport on his hearthstone, life for some years glided by like a airy dream. All the riches of his own and his young wife's heart were lavished upon Ellen, and as she grew up lovelier in person than even her infancy had promised, so she grew beautiful in mind and soul, the idol of the family altar.

She was in her eighteenth year when the first blow struck them—the long and fearful illness of the husband and father. A mere wreck of himself, physically and mentally, he was at length pronounced convalescent, though perfect health, the physician said, could only be bartered for in a sunnier clime.

They sailed at once for Italy. A year had been passed in that beautiful land, a delicious and exhilarating one to them all, for the step of the invalid had grown steadier each moment, his eye wore its wonted brightness, his cheeks their glow, and the pride of mind sat again enthroned upon the noble brow, when, like a thunderbolt from a cloudless heaven, there fell the second blow. The mercantile house, in which he was head partner, had failed—ay, and failed in such a way that, though innocent as a babe, his name was covered with infamy. It was too much for the spirit, not yet strong. Poverty it could have borne, but disgrace shivered it entirely. He lay for some months in hopeless lunacy, never raving, but only sighing and moaning, growing each day paler and weaker. But he passed not so away. When the last hour of life drew near, his darkened soul was light again, and he tenderly counselled the two dear ones who had hung over him so faithfully, and bade them be of good cheer, for though wealth was gone, the unspotted honor of the husband and father should be yet shown to the world. Then commending them to the All-Father, with a hand clasped by each, their sweet voices blended in holy hymns, he passed away. A grave was hollowed out for him on classic ground, and the snowy marble wreathed with affection's chaplets a few times, and then sadly the mourners turned away, a proud ship bearing them to their native land.

Where were the crowds that had flocked about them, as they left its shores? 'Alas! the widow and her child found none of them. Alone and unaided, they were left to stem the torrent of adversity. Theirs was a trite story. One and another thing they strove to do, but the obloquy that rested on the dead man's grave followed his living darlings, till poverty, in its most cruel sense, pressed heavily upon them.

"Let us go where we are unknown," said Ellen, passionately, yet mournfully, one evening, as after a futile search for employment, she returned to their humble lodgings and buried her weeping face in her mother's bosom. "They will kill me with their cold, proud looks. I'd rather beg my bread of strangers than ask honest employment of these scornful ones, who trample so flendishly upon our sacred griefs."

And they gathered up the remnant of their treasures, and silently and secretly, lest the shame should fly before them, went to a lonely home in the city, where we find them. There they readily procured needlework, and all they could do, for their fingers beautified every garment that passed through their hands. But the song of the shirt was soon the only one they had strength to sing. Night brought no rest to the weary day, and though twenty instead of the "twelve hours" of the Bible were bent in toil, they were famished and frozen.

"Mother," said Ellen one evening, as the chimes of midnight found them still at work, "this is too much for woman. I shall sew no longer."

"But what will you do, darling?" and Mrs. Seymour wept over her pale, thin face; "shall we starve?"

"Mother," there was resolution in the tone now, "mother, I shall hire out as housemaid. Do not attempt to dissuade me, my mind is determined. It is as honorable as this—I shall earn as much, if not more than now; I shall save my board; I shall have my nights for rest."

And she pleaded till she won at last a tearful consent, and entered into the service of Mrs. Summers. * * * * *

His sister's house had always been a second home to Herbert Lincoln, but now it seemed dearer than ever. Their tea-table, in particular, seemed to have a fascination for him, and at the end of a fortnight, he had sipped so many cups of Ellen's fragrant tea, that Mrs. Summers declared she should certainly present him a bill of board. And though in all that time he had not exchanged a dozen sentences with the beautiful maid, it was but too evident she was the magnet that attracted him.

Business now took him out of town, and three weeks elapsed ere he returned. As he was hastening from the depot, turning a corner, he espied, coming as it were to meet him, the fair girl of whom he had dreamed every night of his absence, and beside her, little golden-haired Nell.

"Uncle Herbert," cried the child, and embraced him passionately. O, I'm so glad you've come home. We missed you so much." Then freeing himself from his arms, she said, gracefully, "and here is dear Ellen, too, aint you glad to see her again?"

Ellen blushed, but the young man so courteously extended his hand to her, that she could not refuse it.

"I am happy to see Miss Seymour enjoying this beautiful day," said he, in low, gentle tones, as respectfully as if addressing a queen.

"And I am happy to see Mr. Lincoln looking so well," responded the lady, with a quiet dignity, and she passed along.

"But where are you going, little niece?" said Herbert to Nell, detaining her a moment behind.

"O, to see Grandmama Seymour, she is a sweet lady, too. Ellen took me there once, and it made me so happy, that mother lets me go now whenever she does," and she tripped away.

Herbert passed rapidly to the first corner, then turned and deliberately retraced his steps and followed the two, till he learned the street and the number of Ellen's home.

That night as he carefully examined his bureaux, it occurred to him his supply of linen was quite too deficient, and forthwith he purchased a goodly sized parcel of the raw material, and at an early hour the next day was knocking at the door of the dilapidated house which he had seen Ellen enter. Through vault-like halls and up rickety stair-cases, he wended his way, till he found Mrs. Seymour's room. The beautiful and saintly face of the widowed mother fascinated him as completely as had the daughter's, and with a reverential tone he opened his errand. While she inspected the linen, and made inquiries as to the particular way he would have it made up, his eye glanced eagerly over the room. The exquisite taste of the housemaid was visible everywhere. Geraniums and roses smiled in the winter sunbeams that crept so lovingly into the narrow casement; the white muslin that draped them hung in folds graceful as snow wreaths; pencillings as rich almost as mezzo tints, hung upon the walls; the rockers were cushioned with rose-colored muslin; bits of cloth, gorgeous in hue as autumn leaves, woven into mats, relieved the bare floor of its scanty look; a guitar leaned under the tiny mirror, and a few costly books were scattered in an artist-like way hither and thither, wherever the rambling eye would wish to see pinned some beautiful thing.

"This is Tuesday," said Herbert, "can I have one by Friday?"

"O, yes, sir, and sooner, if you desire it."

"Not sooner, unless you steal hours from the night, and your weary looks seem even now to say that you have done so."

"It is the lot of the seamstress," said the lady, calmly but sadly.

The young man could not trust his voice to reply, and hastened away. In his office he gave way to his feelings: "She, the beloved and the beautiful, toiling in menial service, and that angel-like mother, sewing for her living. It shall be so no longer. Thank God for riches," and he seized his pen and inscribing these words on a slip of paper, "an honest debt due your husband," he enclosed bank-notes for five hundred dollars, and addressing the envelope to Mrs. Seymour of — Street, dropped it into the post-office.

Could he have seen the grateful tears that stole down the widow's cheeks, and heard her soul-touching prayers, as she received it that evening, he would have realized the full force of the text, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

"O, that it were Ellen's evening at home," said she. "Thank Heaven, I may now have her all to myself, again. With this sum in hand, we can be comfortable, without tasking ourselves as severely as heretofore. My beautiful child shall be no longer a menial."

Impatiently she awaited Friday evening, for then Ellen would surely be with her again. But that eve came and went, and she was left alone. A sudden and severe illness had attacked Mrs. Summers, and when Herbert entered her house on the evening of the same day he had sent the generous gift, he found it full of sorrow. The physicians only shook their heads, sadly, when asked if there was any hope, and when the loving ones gazed on the white face of the sick one, and marked the depth and intensity of her agony, they turned away with fainting hearts. And now the full beauty of the housemaid's character was developed. Instinctively, they gave up all to her. She directed the attendants, she soothed little Nell, curbed the wild grief of George, and spoke so sweetly to the mourning husband and brother, that the spirit of faith seemed in their midst. To the sick woman, she was in very truth, a ministering angel. No hand so softly wiped her brow, so tenderly bathed the aching limbs, so gently rubbed the cramped fingers, so deftly smoothed the pillows, so strangely sweetened the healing draught, brought such cool drinks to the hot lips, and such delicious food to the starved palate. Her presence seemed to beautify the sick room. Under her loving ministrations, it assumed a beauty that was almost divine. None knew whether it might be the gate to Paradise or to a brighter life on earth, but all felt that whether the path of the pale one was heavenward or here, it was flower-crowned.

Day after day, and night after night, found the fair nurse beside her patient. Paleness gathered on her cheeks and lips, but the same sweet smile played there; lassitude quivered on her lids, but the same hopeful look beamed from the eye; the limbs trembled with weariness, yet obeyed the faintest whisper from the couch. The physicians looked in wonder that one so delicate held out so long under such heavy tasks, and whispered one to another, "under God, she is the healer."

And when the crisis came, when Mrs. Summers lay there so deathly, that only by pressing a mirror to her lips the fluttering life could be seen at all, when husband, brother, children and friends had stolen softly away, unable longer to restrain their cries, that young girl tarried still, motionless, almost breathless, silent prayers flowing upward.

O, how dear she was to them all, when again she appeared in their midst and said in her own low, sweet music-tones, "You may hope."

"Bless you, bless you, faithful one!" exclaimed Mr. Summers as he wound his arms about her. "Henceforth, you are one of the treasures of our household, the sister of my adoption. Come hither, Nellie and George, and thank her; under Heaven, you owe to her your mother's life." Little wet faces were pressed to hers and passionate kisses brought fresh roses to her cheeks. Then a manly hand, O, how its pressure thrilled her nerves, a manly hand grasped hers and a full rich voice murmured, "Our angel sent by God."

On a bright and glorious morning, in the month of roses, a splendid equipage drove from the city mansion of Mr. Summers. It held a family party, the wife and mother still pale, her convalescence sadly retarded by the fearful illness that had smitten her two idols; George and Nellie, puny, though out of all danger; the lovely Ellen, no longer maid, but cherished angel of hope and love, thin and white, too, with her winter's and spring's nursing; Mr. Summers, his fine face all aglow with chastened joy, and Herbert Lincoln, looking as though a lifetime of happiness was crowded into a moment.

It was the first long drive the physician had permitted the invalids, and they knew not where they were going, or at least none but Herbert.

Ellen had declined going at first. "I have seen my mother so little of late," said she, gently, "I think I must spend the holiday with her."

But they all said no, and promised, if she would go with them then, they would leave her with her mother on their return, and she should stay without limit of time. How lovely she looked, as consenting at length, she came to the carriage in her summer array. Herbert thought he had never gazed on so exquisite a maiden in all his life, and longed with a frenzy he had never felt before, to fold her to his heart; that shrine which had been sacred to her from the first moment of meeting.

"What a lovely home," exclaimed Ellen, as leaving the main road, they branched off into a splendid avenue, lined with graceful elms, and came in sight of a small, but elegant mansion, draped with rose-vines and embowered in rare shrubbery. "I trust it holds happy hearts."

"Yes," said Lincoln, warmly, "that it does, and we will to-day share their joy, for it is here we are to stop." Joyful exclamations burst from them all. It seemed like a beaming of light from fairy-land, that beautiful place, to those senses so long pent up in the chambers of sickness.

They were ushered into a parlor that seemed the abode of the graces, so charmingly were beauty and utility blended. A moment they waited ere the rustling of satin announced the approach of the lady, to whom they were making so unceremonious a visit.

She entered, and in a second Nellie Summers was clasping her round the neck. "Grandmama Seymour, the fairies did come to you, as you told me last week perhaps they would sometime. O, I am so glad."

Mr. and Mrs. Summers stepped forward and grasped her hand; but Herbert and George, where were they? A scream from Nellie announced them. Pale and passionless Ellen lay in their arms. She had not seen her mother, but her eyes had caught sight of a small Greek harp in a pillared niche, her own father's gift and sold by herself when they left that proud city of scorn. Memories so many and sad had unstrung her nerves. Joy seldom kills, though. When awakening from her swoon, she met the tearful eyes of her mother, she felt assured there was some blest mystery to be told. It was all soon explained. Herbert and Mrs. Seymour had become fast friends in the past winter—he had cheered the lonely hours of Ellen's absence—he had learned her story and assured himself that foul wrong had been done her husband. Employing the best counsel in her native city, he bent all his own energies and talents to the cause, and sifted the matter to its very root, and triumphed, too. The fair name came back fairer than ever, and the wealth with it, too; the wretches who had blackened the one and stolen the other, cowardly fleeing, instead of making manly confessions.

"I have to thank Mr. Lincoln for it all," exclaimed Mrs. Seymour at the close of her recital, "and I have to pay him yet," and she glanced archly at him. "Bills should be settled even amongst friends."

Herbert hesitated a moment. Then he knelt beside her. "I have no mother," he said, sadly. "Be as one to me, and I am repaid a thousand times."

She threw back the raven locks that clustered on his noble brow, and imprinted there a calm, sweet kiss. "My son," said she, solemnly, "I adopt you into my love; Ellen, receive a brother." But Ellen was gone. They caught, however, a glimpse of white muslin in the green shrubbery, and she was followed, not by both though; Mrs. Seymour had indeed risen, but a sudden thrilling pulse in her warm heart checked her, and she resumed her seat.

Herbert hastened out and found her under the shadow of an old elm, on a bed of moss, with her lap full of rosebuds. Seating himself beside her, he whispered to her willing ear, long and passionately, his heart's adoration, and with a radiant look of joy, led her back to the house and to her mother's knee.

"As a brother, Ellen will not own me," said he, "but when I asked her if some day, not very far away, she would call me by a dearer name, she was more willing. Our hearts have long been one—bless, mother dear, O bless the union of our lives!"

Take but away the awe of religion, all that fidelity and justice, so necessary to the keeping up of human society, must perish with it.

TO ANNIE W.—A SWEET SINGER.

BY JOSEPH K. PIERCE.

The blithe lark springeth to the morning cloud,
Shrouding his dark wing in the splendid mist;
Yet droppeth to the earth clear, sweet, and loud,
His pleasant carollings o'er hearts that list.

Like as that lark with morning on his breast,
Soareth the light-plumed spirit of thy lay; a
And our upreaching souls are bathed and blest,
And filled with song as with the gush of day.

CURED OF A BAD HABIT.

BY AUSTIN C. BURDICK.

EBEN BOLSTER was a very funny sort of man. He was everybody's uncle, so everybody called him "Uncle Eben." He had seen sixty years of life, and his head was very gray, but few men could do more work in a day than he could, and none could do it better. One fall Uncle Eben wanted a man to help him finish his harvesting, and then go into the woods with him. Jake Sawyer presented himself, and the old man hired him. Jake was a hard-looking man, about forty years of age, and stout and strong.

"Uncle Eben," said Mr. Beals, as the two met in the store one day, "have you hired Jake Sawyer to work for you?"

"I have," replied the old man.

"Well, I gave you credit for more judgment. I thought you knew Jake better."

"I fancy I know him pretty well, or I should not have hired him. He is strong and able; and moreover, his family are suffering."

"Ay, and what makes them suffer? Didn't I hire Jake to help me in haying? and pay him good wages? and how much good did his family get, or I either? He was drunk half the time; and he'll be just so with you. I tell ye, Uncle Eben, you'd better drop him."

"Not yet," returned the old man. "Jake is a good fellow, and knows how to work, and I'm going to try him. I found his family starving."

"And how much better do you suppose they can be while he stays with them? If I had my way, Jake and his family should be sent to the work-house."

"Ah—well, neighbor Beals, you may think that would be the best way; but I am willing to give him a fairer trial. There's a deal of good in him, and perhaps somebody can find it."

"Well, Uncle Eben, mark my words: You'll find it a tougher job than you ever undertook yet, to make anything out of Jake Sawyer."

Uncle Eben smiled, and then taking up his bundles he walked away.

Now Jacob Sawyer for years had been addicted to rather a free use of spirit, but of late he had grown worse and worse. Most of the sober people would have nothing to do with him, and some shunned him as they would a demon. His wife was an excellent woman, and for nearly three years she had supported the family by her own hard labor.

"Now," said Eben, on the morning Jake commenced, "you know what is right, and what is wrong, and I am going to leave it to you to do just as you wish. I believe, Jacob, you have as much good sense as most people, and I have assured my friends that you are just the man I wanted on my place. Now let us commence, and see whether these people who have called me foolish, will not take back their words."

These were simple remarks—just such as any man might make, but they had much effect on Jake. In fact, they were spoken in such a kind tone, that they touched a very tender spot; for Jacob Sawyer had not been so addressed for a long time.

However, the work was commenced. Uncle Eben took every occasion to say a cheering word, and he found that his kindness was appreciated. Never did he intimate that Jake ever made a bad use of spirit, nor did he speak one word about the danger of his so doing. But he often took occasion to speak upon the subject of using alcoholic beverages, and he tried to point out the various evils that resulted therefrom. Five weeks passed away, and during all that time Jake did not touch a drop of spirit. A new order of things had taken place in his home. His wife was happy; his board was well provided for; his children looked better, and his own health had improved. And all this had come from Uncle Eben's peculiar way of managing the case. Had the old man gone at work to bring Jake under some stringent pledge, and expressed a long catalogue of fears relative to his danger, this would not have happened. He had simply received him as though he had been a man, and given him to understand that the fullest confidence was reposed in him.

But Jake was destined to fall. One Saturday evening he went home, and as he saw how cheerful all was about him, he felt very happy. On the next morning he went over to see Bill Longley to make some arrangements for having milk of him. Bill was a great lover of gin, and while Jake was there he took down his decanter to take a drop. He set on a tumbler for Jake. The temptation was strong. The morning was cool and frosty, and the steam of Bill's hot sling smelt like nectar. Jake had not pledged himself to drink no more, and he—he—took "a drop." It tasted finely; and upon one who had been so long without the stimulus, it had considerable effect.

Before Jake left, Mr. Longley asked him if he wouldn't take "another drop." Jake embraced the opportunity, eagerly; and he this time took a very large drop. Before he reached home he was very much elevated, and he resolved to have some more before he had his dinner. He was now in just the state of mind not to care what he did; so he started off for the low groggery, which he knew he should find open, "by the back way." He had sense enough yet left, to go around where he should not meet the church-goers. He found the groggery open as he had expected, and there he purchased a quart of gin. He took a "drop" there, and before he reached home he stopped behind the fence and took another. The consequence was, when he reached his house his steps were very irregular, and his lips thick, and highly furred.

Poor Mrs. Sawyer! She gave one look at her husband, and then sank down with a deep, agonizing groan. At first she could hardly realize that her eyes were in order, but the truth was soon apparent, and she knew that the demon had come back again. She dared not speak—she only sat down and cried. Jake staggered up and put his arms about her neck, and assured her that he was "a-r-r-l right," an assertion which might admit of different applications. She did beg of him that he would give her the bottle which he had, and let her keep it for him until to-morrow, but he was too cunning for that, and as soon as he could get away, he went out to the shed, and having taken another "drop," he hid the bottle in the wood-pile.

Towards the latter part of the afternoon, Uncle Eben Bolster came to see Jake, and found him in the wood-shed, upon a pile of chips, spread out at full length, with the empty bottle clasped in his left hand, while in his right he held the cork. The old man spoke to Jake, but received no answer. Then he pushed and kicked him, but without any better success. After this he took the bottle and smelled the gin. His face showed much sorrow, but yet a close observer could have seen a slight twinkle of the eye which had more than a mere present meaning.

"Ah, sir," sighed the poor wife, as Uncle Eben entered the room where she sat, "you can't see Jacob now."

"No, but I found something that looked very much like him, out here in the wood-shed," returned the old man, in a common-place tone.

"Ah—then you have seen him. O, sir, isn't it dreadful! Only think of it: For the last month and a half how good he has been. What shall I do? O! what shall I do?"

"Why you must wait till the spirit moves. This month and a half of sobriety shows us what he can do. The only trouble is, his remaining appetite. He must have gone somewhere to-day, where he has had it offered to him."

"He's been over to Bill Longley's, sir."

"Ah, that's the trouble. But never mind. Don't go to scolding him. As I said before, it's Jake's appetite that does the mischief; and that appetite wont trouble him only when he happens to have the stuff offered to him. I know he doesn't hanker after it when he is about his work, and I know, too, that he doesn't want it when he is about home, here. So keep up a good heart, and be cheerful to him in the morning. But you must tell him that I want him to be on hand early, for we must go into the woods to-morrow."

Mrs. Sawyer promised, and Uncle Eben took his way homeward. That evening, after it was dark, the old man went over to the same place where Jake had bought his gin, and purchased a gallon of the same miserable, drugged stuff, which he put up in the same jug, that he generally used for carrying water to the field in.

On the following morning Jake was on hand early, but he looked badly, and Uncle Eben knew he felt as badly as he looked. But not a word was said about the affair of the day before.

Jake was asked to eat some breakfast, but he could keep nothing down. His stomach was weak and sick, and the very sight of food was nauseating. As soon as Uncle Eben had finished his meal, he shouldered his axe and started off, carrying the old jug slung upon his axe-helve.

They reached the place, and having set the jug down, and thrown off his coat, the old man set at work. Jake worked about half an hour, and then he laid down his axe, and went to the jug. Removing the stopper and raising it to his lips, he took one swallow—lowered the jug—and after one or two heavings of the sickening stomach, the nauseating stuff came up. Poor Jake was very thirsty—his mouth was literally parched—and he longed for some sweet cold water.

"What's the matter?" asked Uncle Eben, with a twinkle in his deep gray eye.

"I—I—thought you had water in the jug," returned Jake.

"Water?" echoed the old man. "No, no, I thought I'd have something good to-day. We've tried water now for over a month, and seem' as how it made ye sick, I thought I'd try a little good gin. So don't be afraid of it."

Jake looked the old man in the face, but he could only find a sober earnest shade there, and without a word he went back to his work. Another half hour passed, and Jake could stand it no longer. His tongue was hot and dry, his lips parched and his palate burnt with thirst.

"Aren't there no water near here?" he asked.

"None nearer than the house, Jake. But what do you want with water?"

"I'm—I'm—dyin' with thirst."

"Then try the gin. Surely you wouldn't drink such stuff as water, when you can have gin?"

Jake could not live so at any rate. Something must be taken to relieve the agonizing thirst that oppressed him. Of course he could not go to the house, for that would consume nearly all the rest of the forenoon. So he went to the jug, and took a good pull. This draught remained on his stomach, and for a while he felt better; but the feeling could not last long. Gin may serve in a measure to revive the sinking nerves and weakened muscles which have become unstrung by debauch, but it cannot quench thirst.

Another and another pull at the jug served to keep the poor fellow easy for awhile, but ere the hour of noon arrived, he was sick and faint, and his thirst was more raging than ever. Could he only have had some water—a pint of pure icy beverage—the gin might have been bearable; but as it was it made him miserable. At twelve o'clock one of the boys came with the dinner. It consisted of warm meat-hash, and some cold baked beans and warm coffee. Jake seized the coffee-pot and placed it to his lips. He swallowed a full pint of it, but he thought it tasted strange. And well it might, for the old man had mixed a goodly quantity of gin with it—or had caused his wife to do so. Uncle Eben drank a little of the coffee, and praised it highly, and then helped Jake to some of the hash. The latter did not notice that the hash was on two plates; but the old man did. One of the plates had a piece of chip on the edge, which was to signify that there was some gin mixed with the hash in that particular plate; and this, of course, was passed to Jake. He ate some of it, but it tasted strangely. In fact, it only made him sicker, and in a few moments more the hash and coffee which he had taken, came up. The poor man stretched himself out upon the cold ground, and groaned in the agony of pain and sickness. Uncle Eben saw that he could not work any more, and he advised him to go home. Jake embraced the offer eagerly, and soon started off. The old man remained in the woods a couple of hours longer, and then he started. He had gone about half the distance, when he found Jake lying by the side of the path, asleep. The poor fellow had got thus far, but he could go no farther. Every nerve in his body was completely unstrung, and his limbs were powerless. The old man awakened him, and by dint of much labor got him upon his feet, but he could not walk. So Uncle Eben kept on, and when he reached home he sent one of the boys with the ox cart after the sick man.

Jake at length arrived, and was put to bed. He woke up about midnight, and the old thirst was upon him with a fairly frantic power. He arose and felt for the door. He found it, and got it open. Then in the dark he groped his way down stairs to the sink-room, where he knew the water-pail always stood. He found it, and the dipper was in it. He dipped up some, and with trembling hands raised it to his lips. It sent up a strange odor, but in his madness of thirst he swallowed a large quantity of it. O, what nausea! Uncle Eben had emptied the contents of the jug into the water-pail, for he knew that Jake would be at it before morning. The miserable man made a reach for the door, but it was locked, and the key was gone! In a moment more his stomach was empty. He sat down upon the threshold of the inner door, and with both hands clasped upon his diaphragm, he sought relief from his internal agony.

At length Jake got upon his feet, and made a new search for water, but without effect. "Ah! There's always cold tea left in the tea-pot." So for the cupboard he steered, and after tumbling over half a dozen articles of kitchen furniture, he reached the place. He found the tea-pot, and shook it. "Ah, yes, there's something here."

A quick, long draught followed, but—O, misery!—it's gin! Ay, the old man had thought of the tea-pot, too.

Jake found his way back to his bed, and there he lay until morning, and then he got to the well. There was no making gin of this. With a dash the old bucket struck the water, and then Jake drew it up. Cold as ice, and clear as crystal, came the grateful beverage, and with a gasp the thirsty man bent his lips to the brim. O, how nectar-like—how enrapturing that draught! Through every fibre of the system went the grateful influence. Jake drank till he was out of breath, and then he stopped.

"Ha, Jake—thirsty, eh?"

The man turned, and beheld Uncle Eben.

"Don't you want a little gin this morning, Jake?"

"Uncle Eben, don't speak that word again. A-h-h-h-h! If you don't want to make me sick, don't speak it."

"But aren't you afraid cold water'll make you sick?"

"No, sir."

"Ah. Then I'd drink it—I'd drink it, Jake. But I have some gin in the house, and any time when——"

"Stop," cried Jake, with a sickening shudder. "Don't never speak that word again, I tell ye!"

Uncle Eben said no more. That day Jake could not work, but on the next he shouldered his axe and accompanied his employer to the woods. Four weeks afterwards Uncle Eben wished to see how far his prescription would extend its influence, so he got one of his other men to offer Jake a glass of gin in the barn, but with a strict injunction that if he offered to drink it, it was to be cast upon the floor. The old man stationed himself where he could see.

"Jake,—sh! Look here. Don't you want a snifter this morning?"

"What ye got?" Jake asked, looking at the bottle his companion held out.

"Smell of it and see. It's good."

"Ugh!—a-h-h-h-h!" shuddered Jake, making up a terrible face. "Now look here, Tim, I don't want ye never to do that agin. Give me pizen and I'll thank ye; but gin—Ah-h-h-h!"

The cure was complete. Jake Sawyer never drank again.

ANOTHER LAURA BRIDGMAN.

Mr. C. D. Dillaway, of Fall River, Mass., has a daughter who is one of the wonders of the age. She is deaf, dumb and blind, her right limbs are paralyzed, she is confined to her bed, cannot be moved much without being thrown into a fit—yet she will converse fluently with the mute alphabet, writes very legibly with her left hand, reads common writing on a paper or slate, or print (if the book be not too much worn), by passing her fingers over the words. She will also distinguish the different colors of a variegated dress in the same way. She has wrought several pieces of crewel-work that would be a credit to any girl of her age, selecting and arranging all the colors by feeling and using only her hand. She plays draft and backgammon expertly. She knows when any one comes into the room by the jar of the bed (on which she constantly lies), and can in this way distinguish the different members of the family.—Plymouth Rock.

JOHN BULL ON WHISTLES.

As the train from Albany one day was approaching a village station near Rochester, N. Y., the engine gave one of those long, loud, shrieking whistles, in which it sometimes delights, as if in very wantonness of power. "Here we are!" exclaimed a round-faced, easy "John Bull," destined for Rochester, and supposing he had arrived, proceeded to the door of the car to disembark. Finding his mistake, he returned to his seat, exclaiming: "Well—it's really very hoed! I thought they only gave the big whistles at the large towns!"—Rochester Democrat.

REPLY TO "DARK SYBIL"

BY L. ODELL.

You ask me, love, to think of thee,
But O, how useless the request;
Thy memory, dearest, is to me
Of all life's joys the best.

I'll think of thee when shades of even Steal gently o'er the dying day,
And eve lights up the fires of heaven,
As sunlight fades away.

I'll think of thee, when busy care
Like storm-clouds dims my spirit light,
Then thoughts of thee will seem like stars
Of hope beyond the night.

I'll think of thee—I'll think—I'll dream—
My hopes will ever turn to thee—
And each new thought of thee will seem
A glimpse of heaven to me.

THE STROLLING ARTIST.

BY EMMA LINLEY.

COUNT VON HOLSTEIN was dead. Sincere mourners had surrounded his deathbed, for he had been a kind master, and full well his faithful retainers realized their loss. But alas for the ties of kindred! one little helpless daughter, whom it was agony to leave in her infancy to the guardianship of a stranger, was all the strong tie that bound him to earth!

His had been a sad deathbed. He had not triumphed over earthly feeling; he had not gained a trust in the Holy One, which could leave the little one to his care. He had sent for his only other relative, a cousin whom he had not seen since they were boys, and of whose character he knew nothing. The dying man had waited impatiently, during the two days which had elapsed after he was sure his kinsman might have come in answer to his message, and few can imagine how long the sad hours of suspense had seemed to him.

"Ah, if Egbert Von Holstein will but come! if I can but have his solemn promise that he will endeavor ever to be as a faithful father to my little Therese!" he exclaimed again and again.

His impatience availed nothing. Death came, and there was none save the true, loving, but powerless Ursula, the nurse to whose care her dying mother had yielded her a few months before, to receive his last directions concerning the little one.

Two days after, Egbert Von Holstein arrived, and as the faithful vassals looked on the stern, dark-browed man, their hearts misgave them.

He must be the guardian of little Therese, and their master for years to come. Those lowly but true-hearted men had indeed lost their best friend in the late count.

Von Holstein was not wholly void of good feeling; but the world had used him roughly, and he had become very avaricious and, if his dark face did him justice, hard-hearted. Evil thoughts had been presented to him since the death of his cousin; he had been battling with the tempter and his better self had not, as yet, conquered. The vast property of the deceased count would be under his care. Must he still be poor? O, how poverty galled his proud spirit! To be the owner of those vast estates! There was but one little child's life between him and their possession. How wildly his blood thrilled at the thought! The tempter had fairly entered his heart; we would not allow our imaginations to follow him there, to sketch the dark plans he proposed—but would not a knowledge of the presence of such an evil prompter have been a key to the fact that there was an unusual sternness resting on his brow, as he gloomily strode into Holstein Castle?

During the weeks that followed, he stayed and dallied with the tempter! Ah, it was not well for thee, Egbert Von Holstein! Thou shouldst not have wandered over that grand old castle and those noble domains; thou shouldst not have admired those magnificent old paintings and those numerous rare articles of vertu, to have gained strength for the conflict with evil.

One day he had wandered far from the castle, when he chanced to wish for something he had left behind. He retraced his steps with more of rapidity and energy than he had manifested for weeks. He entered the castle by a postern gate, and was passing to his room, when he found the little Therese, asleep and alone. Did not a demon enter that room with him? What whispered to his heart so rapidly: "Now is your time. Some of the retainers saw you just before you turned towards the castle, and no mortal has seen you since. How easy to suffocate that little child! You can do it in an instant; you need leave no mark, and none know of your being in the castle?"

Ah, how rapidly the dark thoughts fly through his brain! See, the brow contracts still more! His hand moves! Can aught save her? Look! the little one smiles in her sleep. She looks a very angel in her innocence and beauty. The stern, over-bending brow softens, and muttering almost audibly, "I will never murder for wealth," the dark man passes on.

There was some good in Von Holstein's heart, and for the time it had conquered. Had he been with the child more, her raw beauty and pretty, winning ways would have taught him to love her, and she would have been safe. But he still avoided her; he could only look upon her as something between him and happiness. He no longer wished her death; it was very possible to place her where she need not interfere with his prospects, and where she might also be happy. It would take a long time to tell of the many half feasible plans that he formed; but at length one was completed.

There was an old castle belonging to the estate, standing many miles away from any human habitation. Here he resolved that she should be brought up. Long and earnestly he debated with himself as to whom he should place there, to take care of her. Strangers to him and to her, who never could tell her aught of herself, in consequence of their own ignorance, he sought for earnestly.

There was really more of kindness in the young man's heart for his sweet little relative than he would have acknowledged to himself. He shrank from taking her from the loving care of Ursula, to place her with strangers. If he could only trust to Ursula and her worthy husband Gottlieb, to keep his secret! He knew them sufficiently well to be sure that if he could induce them to promise the secrecy which he required, they might be trusted; and he saw nothing to prevent his compelling them to do so, since they were but vassals.

He said nothing to them on the subject till the child was lost. Days and weeks were spent in the search for her by the good servants of her late father, apparently aided by Von Holstein. At length, the search was given up as useless, though Egbert directed all to watch every band of gipsies who should hereafter make their appearance, since one had lately left there.

There was nothing to prevent his coming in possession of the vast estates he had coveted. Then, when Ursula was grieving as for an only child, he informed her of its safety, assuring her that both her own and the child's life depended upon her secrecy. She had no choice, for she was wholly in his power. The subject once broached, details were soon settled. Gottlieb, Ursula and the little one were taken to the old castle of Waldenburg, which they found a far pleasanter place than they had dared hope. Indeed, one might readily consent to pass his life, with a chosen companion, away from general society, might he be surrounded by so beautiful a scene as the artist has pictured.

The old castle stands almost on the brink of a high, rosy precipice, and there are several modern buildings joined to the old round, central tower. At the foot of the precipice winds a road, up which Gottlieb and Ursula are now leisurely walking, and gazing about them, that they may become more fully acquainted with the beauties of their unsought home. The count has just left them—preliminaries are all settled, and this is to be their home for an indefinite number of years. It is early morning, and the quiet beauty of the scene is fascinating. As they look on the peaceful lake, with its bright waters and peaceful shadows; on the wild, luxuriant shrubbery and noble trees; and on the distant but beautifully tinted mountains, while the beetling rock above hides from their view their castle home, they cannot regret the change in their prospects. The count has generously fitted up the rooms they wished, to suit their tastes, and selected a suite of rooms, which are to be re-furnished for Therese when she shall be old enough to wish them. Gottlieb has been directed to go to the nearest village, once every three months, to procure necessaries, when he may expect to hear from the count.

No other intercourse are they to have with the world, but they love each other too well to fear unhappiness here. Ursula only mourns that her precious charge must be deprived of the education and society befitting her rank; but reason tells her that for several years she can do as well for the child as the most accomplished teachers, and then, hope whispers that some way will be provided for her further advancement.

Months and years glided on; the little family in the old castle was a very happy one. Gottlieb and Ursula, in their love for each other and their darling little one, felt that they were blest beyond the common lot of mortals; and, if sometimes dark fears as to the future of their loved pet crossed their minds, they were met by a strong trust in the Father of the fatherless. Therese was a beautiful, merry-hearted child; she had never known a sorrow. She recollected no other home, and she certainly could wish for none more beautiful. On the bright days, she never tired of wandering amid the charming scenery which surrounded them, and when gloomy weather kept her in-doors, she delighted in running over the many rooms in the old round building, where she never sought in vain for something to interest her. Four times each year Gottlieb went to the village, and never failed to return with a multitude of luxurious articles from the count. Nor was the education of the child neglected. Ursula had been more the companion than servant of Therese's mother from her early years. She had shared in her lessons to such an extent, with such a determination to learn, that she was far better educated than many who have had all the advantages of high station. How the worthy dame now rejoiced that she had improved those opportunities, for she was morbidly fearful lest her little lady should be without accomplishments.

Therese was blest in her companion; how much she loved those hours, and they were many, when she sat at the side of her good friend, conning some lesson, or learning some new stitch in embroidery, and was rewarded for her diligence by a story of her gentle mother, the Lady Alice. The count allowed Ursula to tell the little one of her mother, but the simple child knew not that she had other name than Lady Alice; and when she inquired of her father, for she read of the relation in her books, she was always met by some evasive reply.

Let us look at the count during this time. Was he happy? Alas, no! He was called rich, he was feted and flattered till he was sick of society, and there was ever the feeling that nothing was rightfully his. He tried to stifle his remorse, by sending multitudes of costly things to Therese; he was ever on the watch for something she might value. Sometimes he tried to form plans for seeming to find her, without having his guilt, in the matter of her disappearance, appear. Could he not pretend to reclaim her from some band of gipsies, and present her to the world? Alas, no! the child, bred under the eye of Ursula, could never pass for a gipsy. Meantime he, too, felt that she must be educated. He had sent her multitudes of books, without much thought as to whether she could use them; but when she was about ten years old, he sought a teacher.

Good fortune threw Margaret Percy under his notice. She was a highly accomplished orphan girl, who was obliged to seek a situation as a governess. He remained unknown to her in engaging her for the lonely situation, and she was carried there by night journeys, so that she was wholly ignorant of the part of the country to which she had been taken.

How the good Ursula rejoiced at the arrival of the gentle Miss Percy, and the nice musical instruments and multitudes of books which followed her! Now there seemed nothing for which to wish! Margaret found her new, quiet and beautiful home admirably suited to her chastened feelings. She soon learned to love her pupil, who was so wholly ignorant on some subjects and so advanced beyond her years on others, with an affection quite sisterly.

One need but note those happy years; every facility for learning was at their disposal, and there were no temptations to negligence. As Therese grew older, she was puzzled to know who might be the kind friend who more than anticipated her every wish; and Margaret, as she thought of the almost princely luxury which surrounded them, shared her curiosity. The unknown hereafter was the subject of many a conversation for the romantic girls, but Ursula preserved a strict silence on the subject. She was not tempted to reveal the secret; her loved child was happier, in her vain imaginings of the noble friend who was ever blessing her, than she could have been with a knowledge of the truth. The count, too, had been so ever generous and noble in his conduct towards them, that she could but view him kindly.

Eight happy years of study glided by, and Margaret wished to return to the world. She felt that she must be almost alone there, but the longer she remained thus secluded, the more danger there was of her friends forgetting her; and she now realized that, though her strongest ties were broken when she left society, there were very many of whom she cherished recollections, and in whose memories she hoped she had retained a place.

Margaret wrote to the unknown, informing him of her wishes, and also that she could be of little more use to his protegee in her studies, as they had advanced together far beyond the point at which she stood when she came to the castle. In the ardor of her romantic feelings, she added a brief paragraph thanking him very earnestly for the very many facilities he had thrown in their path up the hill of science, and asking the blessing of Heaven upon him who had been so generously kind to two orphan girls. Therese added a postscript, expressing her own warm, grateful, enthusiastic feelings.

What a blessing to the count was that letter! It gave him new life, new happiness. He would see the two girls who expressed so much gratitude, and confess to them his whole sin. He would ask but their pity for his miserable life of remorse, and then after reinstating Therese in her rights, he would leave for some distant country. How much happier he was, after making this resolution! and with him to resolve was to do. The same day he started for Waldburg Castle.

He was received with a hearty welcome by the worthy Gottlieb and dame, who saw no traces of his former sternness in his handsome face. They were sure he had not come for evil, and they would have hastened to call the young ladies, who were out walking, had he not requested the privilege of surprising them upon their ramble and introducing himself. He was astonished at finding a young gentleman walking with the girls. He could easily see, before they saw him, that both were slightly embarrassed; and he was almost amused by the quick coming blushes on the beautiful face of Therese.

When he advanced, giving his name and telling them that he had been directed to them by Madam Ursula, their embarrassment increased, for an instant. Margaret immediately regained her composure, and gracefully apologized for their perplexity by telling them that she had met none who could claim the title of gentleman for eight years, while her companion had gained all her ideas of them from books and conversation with her. Therese was re-assured, and the four chatted gaily as they walked to the castle. When there, and Ursula added to the count's self-introduction the fact that he had sent their books, etc., their embarrassment was renewed. They could not express their thanks satisfactorily to themselves; he begged them to cease trying, assuring them that he intended, ere long, to tell them something, which would convince them that they owed him no gratitude.

But it is quite time the young gentleman, whom we, as well as the count, met so unexpectedly, was introduced. He was a young American artist, travelling on foot in Germany, that he might sketch some of the beautiful secluded spots. He congratulated himself upon the sweet scene he had secured to himself this day, and resolved, if it were possible to represent such rare beauty on canvass, that Therese should occupy the foreground of his picture.

How excited the girls were, when they retired that night. Either arrival would have been a great event; but the coming of two such gentlemen at once was almost too much to allow them to retain their sober senses. Day after day, the four rambled among the beautiful scenes to which the girls were such competent guides, in a kind of dreamy happiness which all knew could not be permanent, and which each dreaded to interrupt by referring to the future.

At length, Ernest Holmes, the artist, felt the delicacy of his position too keenly to be longer silent. He spoke to the count of his love for Therese, assuring him that he must leave her, unless he could have his sanction to his suit. He knew their acquaintance had been brief; but to hearts amid the wilds of nature, time ought never to be reckoned in days, and he could give sufficient testimonials of his good character and position in his own land. The count replied that they would join the ladies, as he had something to say to them before considering his proposal.

Then he nobly confessed, to them all, his whole guilt. He did not try to make his sin seem less, but begged earnestly for the forgiveness of Therese. Most willingly she accorded it, assuring him that he had advanced her best interests much further than he could have done by having her educated in the ordinary way. As for the property, there had been, and would be enough for both, and she wished him to take care of it still in his own name. Then Mr. Holmes's proposal was mentioned; but I will not lengthen my story by repeating dialogue. Therese insisted that her vast property should be equally divided between her guardian and herself, and as she was going to America, none of his friends need know of her existence. He refused her offer point blank; he had been tormented long enough by living on another's right. In this, Margaret encouraged him; they had by some means learned their mutual love, spite of an unusual diffidence in the lover. Margaret assured him that the very large salary, which she had found no opportunity to spend, would be a fortune for them in America, whither she proposed their going.

Therese, seeing that her friends would be happier thus, yielded her wishes, though she privately said to her husband that her guardian would have occasion to rejoice that he had so effectually taught her to make magnificent presents.

Von Holstein settled the property in Germany as soon as possible, and then the six, for the reader may be sure that Gottlieb and Ursula were not left behind, came to the United States. The beautiful, accomplished bride of Ernest was warmly welcomed by his friends.

They are now fairly settled in their elegant American homes, and none ever regret the fatherland, though the picture of Waldenburg Castle, with Therese in the foreground, sometimes calls tears to the eyes of Ursula, who proves a notable American housekeeper, relieving her mistress from all care.

DECAY OF THE MIND.—"The failure of the mind in old age, in my opinion," says Sir Benjamin Brook, "is often less the result of natural decay than of disuse. Ambition has ceased to operate; contentment brings indolence, indolence decay of mental power, ennui, and sometimes death. Men have been known to die of disease induced by intellectual vacancy."

THE GIPSEY MAID.

BY FRANK FRANKLOVE.

In the bright dawn of youth,
When the lips utter truth,
Ere the heart hath yet learned deceit,
O would that the hour
Had been fraught with the power
Of retaining me still at thy feet.

Then the wild gipsy maid
Would never have strayed,
And afar o'er the wide world roam—
Through the haunts of mankind,
Ever searching to find
A nook, where the heart feels at home.

But the Romany child
Had a heart dancing wild
To the music that called her away;
And though pleasant was the dream,
By the dashing, bright stream,
Her tent was but pitched for a day.

And when the pale youth,
With his heart full of truth,
And his brain full of thought, seeks the glade,
Does he dream of the night,
In the witching moonlight,
He first met the dark gipsy maid?

PAUL ELLIS'S FORTUNE.

BY MARY L. MEANT.

"I EXPECTED to have a new beau for you this evening, girls, but he has disappointed me," said Mrs. Rivers, as she approached the centre-table, at which were seated several young ladies, who turned with girlish curiosity to ask their hostess for further particulars—all save Miss Agatha Bird, who continued turning over the book of engravings before her, with an air of perfect indifference, yet not losing a syllable of the information Mrs. Rivers proceeded to give respecting the new beau.

"You have all seen the beautiful house lately erected on the next street below, I presume? Well, that is owned by the gentleman in question, Mr. Paul Ellis, a rich old bachelor, who, after travelling half over the world, has come to the determination of settling in our town for the remainder of his life."

"And of finding a wife among us, also, without doubt, poor old man! What a pity, since there is not the smallest chance of his success," broke in roguish little Ida Percival, glancing very demurely at her companion.

"Of course not; who ever heard of a rich old bachelor getting a wife?" resumed Mrs. Rivers. "Yet such is the unaccountable stupidity of the race that they never seem aware of so palpable a fact; and this Mr. Ellis, though in other respects a sensible and intelligent person, is not in this a whit better than his compeers; for he has the temerity to speak of domestic happiness as a blessing which has not hitherto been his, but will, he hope, crown his latter days."

"Infatuated man! he ought to be put in a strait-jacket," exclaimed Ida, again. "Do look up from those wonderfully interesting pictures, Agatha, and favor us with your opinion of this monomaniac."

"What are you all talking about?" queried Agatha, as thus appealed to she raised her eyes from the engravings, and carelessly leaning her head on one hand, turned to Mrs. Rivers. "Really, your friend, though absent, seems to create quite a sensation. But prithes, don't talk of his seeking a wife; if the poor old soul wants a nurse or a housekeeper, why does he not employ them at once?"

"Poor old soul!" repeated Mrs. Rivers, with a merry twinkle of the eye; for she was too shrewd not to see through the well acted indifference. "Why, he is wealthy, Agatha, and young enough—I dare say not over forty at the most."

"Or say thirty-five; rich bachelors are never over thirty-five or forty," said Agatha, drily. "I'll wager, though, this Mr. What's-his-name is not a day under fifty-five or sixty."

"Why, Agatha, have you seen him, or been dreaming of him, that you are so exact as to his age?" broke in Ida, again. "O, depend upon it, girls, Aggy is going to set her cap for the rich old bachelor."

A peal of girlhood's ready laughter followed Ida's words, in the midst of which Agatha replied, tartly, "You must judge me by yourself, Miss Percival," and walked loftily away. Ida regretted the effect of her playful railery, and the conversation was changed.

Soon after the company dispersed, and Agatha Bird, with her grandmother, Mrs. Morley, started homewards, declining Mr. Rivers's escort, "as the distance was short." It was soon evident, however, that Mrs. Morley had a reason for declining, and that her hostess had been speaking to the matrons, as well as to the girls, of her tea party, respecting her new acquaintance; for on reaching the corner of the street, Mrs. Morley said:

"Let us turn down this street, Agatha. It is not going out of our way, and I wish to see the new house they are talking so much about."

"I saw it before it was quite finished, and it did not look like anything extraordinary," said

Agatha, carelessly. "That is it, standing back from the street on the other corner."

"Let us cross over," said Mrs. Morley.

They did so, and a few paces brought them to the new house, round which the moon threw its brightest beams, as if kindly desirous to aid the aged eyes in their scrutinizing survey. It was a double house, its cream-colored walls and green shutters contrasting prettily; and with the beautiful garden surrounding it, it was a cheerful, inviting place, though, as the young lady said, nothing extraordinary, or deserving of praise.

"And very likely," she added, "its owner will turn out not to be so rich after all, though they talk as if he were a millionaire."

"But he may be rich enough without being a millionaire," replied the elderly lady, as having concluded her observation, she resumed her walk. "The place is not a palace, to be sure, but it is quite handsome. I should like to see you mistress of such a house, Aggy; and if Mr. Ellis has an income corresponding with his dwelling, I think he is worth captivating."

The young lady did not say that she also thought so, but her grandmother had no doubt of her concurrence. A few days passed, and nothing was seen of Mr. Ellis.

"Where does he busy himself? One hears of him, but never sees him," said Mrs. Morley to Mrs. Rivers, who was paying her a visit, and, of course, chatting of the rich old bachelor.

"O, he has been too busy in fitting up his house to have time for visiting. But now he has it all nicely furnished, and has a housekeeper and a colored servant; as my husband told him yesterday, his establishment was perfect—there was nothing wanting. 'Yes, he answered, 'there was one thing—that now having adorned the cage, he was waiting for a bird to fly into it.'"

"Conceit is not the smallest of his possessions, I fancy," said Agatha, to whom the eyes of the visitor were turned. But no sooner had she departed, than the grandmother was startled by the sudden exclamation:

"Now, grandma, that is just the thing—Mrs. Rivers has given me an idea."

"What does the child mean?" queried the old lady, in utter bewilderment.

"Never mind till to-morrow, grandma; then you'll see, or rather hear something; trust me to succeed when I choose to try."

In furtherance of her purpose, Miss Agatha, the following afternoon, made up a little parcel of work, and took it to the seamstress, whom she occasionally employed. After giving directions about the sewing, she rose to go, at the same time, remarking:

"Your little Ann does not look well to-day, I think, Mrs. B——. Has she been sick?"

"She can scarce ever be said to be well; she is rather sickly, poor child," replied the mother.

"You confine her too much to the house, probably."

"Perhaps I do; but most of the children about here are so bad I can't bear to have her play with them. So she seldom goes out except of an errand, or when I can spare time to take her out for a walk."

"Suppose you allow her to come with me. I am going some distance, and it will do her good to be out this fine afternoon."

"O, Miss Bird, you are too kind," said the gratified mother; "I'm afraid you would find her troublesome."

"Not the least danger. She looks like a good little girl, and I love to amuse good children."

The overjoyed child was soon made ready; and taking her by the hand, and amusing her with talk suited to her infant years, the young lady led her through several of the principal streets in which she had scarcely ever been before, and she was consequently surprised and delighted with everything that met her view.

"Come in here, Ann," said Agatha, at last pausing at a confectioner's, "I am really hungry, and I dare say so are you."

They entered the store. Agatha ordering ice cream and sponge cakes, tripped up-stairs to the saloon, and took a seat beside a window which commanded a full view of Mr. Ellis's house on the opposite corner. She surveyed it leisurely, and came to the conclusion that it was really handsomer than she had imagined. As she gazed, two gentlemen came out on the portico, and after a little conversation, one took leave, while the other, evidently the master of the house, went in, leaving the hall door open. Agatha's face brightened, as if this was the chance she had been hoping for; and turning to her little companion, who was enjoying the feast, she began:

"Were you ever in this street before, Annie?"

The child replied in the negative.

"Then you will like to look at the beautiful gardens on the other side. When you have eaten your ice cream come to this window, and you can see far up and down the street."

The child gladly obeyed, and her eyes roving delightedly from one lovely spot to another, fixed themselves with a child's joyous admiration on Mr. Ellis's garden. Agatha, who had expected this, listened smilingly to her merry prattle, told her the names of many of the flowers, and stimulated her curiosity till she grew eager to have a closer view.

"Couldn't you go there, Miss Bird? They wouldn't mind you," she said, beseechingly.

"O, I should not like to do that, my little girl. I am not acquainted with the family that lives there. But you don't see the prettiest part of the garden, Ann. Come a little nearer; now look down as far as you can through the trees and bushes; now you see the beauties."

The child uttered an exclamation of rapture; for it was a multiflora, with its countless clusters of delicately tinted blossoms, that met her gaze.

"Ah, if I only had one of the pretty bunches to take home to dear mother!" she exclaimed, wistfully.

"I wish I could get you one, Ann; but it cannot be. Come, let me tie your bonnet; it is time we were going home."

The little girl reluctantly obeyed; but ere she left the room, ran back to the window to take just one more glance at the object that absorbed her thoughts.

"I never thought anything could be so pretty," she said, returning to Agatha, who was waiting at the door.

"It is very beautiful," she replied. "If you will promise to be satisfied, we will cross the street, and pass by the garden, so that you can have a better view of it."

The promise was given with a child's readiness; and Agatha, exulting in the certain success of her scheme, took her by the hand, and they were soon slowly passing in front of the garden, the child peering eagerly over the iron railing, and breaking into a little shout of delight, or holding her breath in the earnestness of her admiration. Agatha indulged her lingering pace, and was not sparing of her own expressions of pleasure in the lovely scene; for a quick glance at the mansion had caught sight of a manly form bending over a newspaper, the sudden rustle of which assured her that the child's gleeful exclamations had been overheard.

"There is the multiflora now in full view, little enthusiast," she said, at length, in her sweetest tones.

The child looked for an instant, then raised her eyes beseechingly.

"I cannot see it well for that tree. If I could only go in and take one good look."

"O, but that would be very rude, my dear," said the lady; but Ann felt the hand that held hers relax its pressure, and she ventured to continue her pleading.

"Just one little minute. I won't go far, nor touch a single thing."

"If I were sure I could trust you."

"O, indeed, indeed I won't."

"Well, for one moment only, you may go," began Agatha, affecting to yield to her entreaties; and the words had scarcely passed her lips, ere the delighted child bounded back to the gate, and hurriedly, though with cautious steps, skipped along a broad winding path till she stood before an arbor overrun with the luxuriant multiflora.

She had scarcely reached it, when a gentleman emerged from the side door of the house, and came toward her.

"Don't be afraid, my little one," he said, in a grave though kindly tone, as she turned to fly. "Did you wish to look at the flowers? You are quite welcome to go all through the garden, if you wish to."

"But the lady will be waiting for me, sir," Agatha heard the child reply, as she glided into the garden, and seemingly unconscious of another's presence, called softly to little Ann.

"Come, my child, your minute would extend to hours in this charming spot, I fear."

"But, Miss Bird, the gentleman said I might stay and—"

"The gentleman!" was repeated in a tone of surprise, but at the moment, Mr. Ellis, who had been partially concealed by a tall evergreen, came forward. The lady started, blushed (of course), and returned his very respectful bow with one of gentle dignity and reserve; then, in a ladylike way, apologized for the intrusion, pleading in extenuation the little creature's eager desire to enter. "It is so difficult to refuse a child any gratification," she added, with a winning smile.

Mr. Ellis made a courteous reply, and turning to Ann, desired her to run about as she pleased, and see all that was to be seen.

"I would rather stay looking at this," she replied, timidly, unwilling to withdraw her gaze from the splendid vine that seemed at every instant more beautiful to her longing eyes.

"Would you like to have one of those pretty clusters?" asked Mr. Ellis, kindly.

"O yes—yes, sir, I would rather have it than anything," she returned, with trembling eagerness, that made him smile somewhat sadly as he promised to give her one ere she left the garden; then bowing courteously to Agatha, begged the privilege of escorting her through the grounds. She assented, and as they slowly moved on, referred to the promise he had made her little protegee.

"The little creature will be overjoyed; for as we were sitting in the ice cream saloon opposite, she saw the multiflora, and wished she could have one of the 'pretty bunches of flowers' to take to her mother. Poor child! in her humble home she has little to amuse or interest her."

And she gave a short sketch of her humble companion in a tone of touching softness. Mr. Ellis's fine eyes expressed his appreciation of her benevolence in bringing the sickly child out for a walk.

"It is truly an angel's work that you have done this day, lady," he said, earnestly. "Not merely in according to this little friendless one an unaccustomed pleasure—though that was in itself an act of rare kindness—but in developing her innate love of the beautiful, you have conferred a lasting, an inestimable pleasure."

Then seeing his companion avert her head, as if modestly unwilling to receive his commendation, he changed the subject to one naturally springing from the scene around, and the pair made the tour of the garden in friendly conversation. Meantime little Ann, having satisfied herself with gazing on the object of her childish admiration, was flitting through the walks, stopping at almost every bush and flower, but not venturing to touch the blooming beauties.

"Come, Annie, your mother will be uneasy about you, I fear," said Agatha, as she reached the gate in her pleasant promenade.

Ann looked timidly at Mr. Ellis, fearful that he had forgotten his promise, but was quickly reassured by being desired to choose whatever cluster she fancied; and was almost wild with delight on receiving along with it several other flowers which she named as her favorites.

"Now, Annie, you must be a good child for a year, after getting so lovely a bouquet," said Agatha, playfully. "But have you not forgotten to thank the kind gentleman?"

Mr. Ellis replied kindly to the child's grateful thanks, and presented to the lady a branch of moss roses and mignonette, which she received with her most fascinating smile, and naively told him he had chosen her favorite flowers.

"Indeed! They are mine, also." And the gentleman's eyes spoke eloquently of the pleasure which this similarity of tastes gave him.

"What splendid oleanders you have, Mr. Ellis!" she said (for he had told her his name), and with a charming mixture of girlish frankness and timidity, she murmured, "I am tempted, since you are so generous of your floral beauties, to beg a few cuttings for my grandma. She is so partial to oleanders, and those she had died in the spring."

The gentleman, as in duty bound, professed that he should feel honored by being allowed to offer anything his poor garden contained; and the lady repeating her acknowledgment, they parted, mutually pleased with the accidental interview.

Miss Agatha conducted her serviceable little companion home, as she had promised, then tripped lightly homeward to rejoice her grandma with full details of her successful stratagem. The old lady's pleasure was only equalled by her surprise.

"It was a wonderfully cute plan, Aggy; you not only got acquainted with the old bachelor by its means, but you have given him the impression that you are exceedingly kind-hearted; and men of his age generally set a great value on that."

"That was one reason why I took Ann; and besides, as she is such a moping thing, and her mother is not acquainted with any of our friends, there is no danger of any tattling about it."

"And so you really like the man, my dear?" inquired the old lady, peering anxiously over her spectacles at her grand-daughter.

"Yes—that is I really like his money, his house and garden," returned Agatha, laughing. "They would reconcile me to a far worse looking person; for this Mr. Ellis is really what might be called handsome, and very gentlemanly in manners and appearance; not so very old, either—as Mrs. Rivers says, probably not over forty. I had prepared myself to see an individual very different from him, and was most agreeably disappointed."

"I am very glad to hear you say so, my dear child," and the old lady looked as satisfied as if the matter were quite settled. "Ah! I was far from foreseeing this when your poor, dear mother left you an orphan to my care. And I have felt very uneasy about you many a time; for you know, Aggy, my small annuity will cease at my death, and the little I have been able to save, would be a poor provision for you. I do hope you and this rich old bachelor will make a match. If he only knows how to follow up the acquaintance thus commenced."

"It was a lucky thought about the oleanders, was it not, grandma?" said Agatha. "There is a chance for him to follow up the acquaintance, if he desires to do so."

"But suppose he should not take advantage of it?"

"I am sure he will. But if he has not sense enough to do so, I must tax my ingenuity to devise some other plan, for I am resolved not to lose this chance—such a one does not often offer."

Could Paul Ellis only have overheard this conversation as he sat at the same hour in his cool, elegantly furnished parlor, looking out upon the fair garden, bathed in sunset dyes, and conjuring up visions of the future as rosy and sweetly beautiful as the scene on which he gazed dreamily! The vague fancies that had been wont to float mistily before his mental vision at that calm, lonely hour, now assumed a tangible form; and in his full, deep tones he unconsciously murmured "Agatha," or "Aggy," till the name that had at first sounded harshly, became sweet and pleasant, because belonging to one who now absorbed his thoughts. He saw again, in imagination, the graceful figure in its light summer dress, gliding by his side through the garden paths, and fancied how it would be were she mistress of the home which to him seemed desolate with all its beauty.

True, she was not beautiful, but that mattered not—she was pretty and ladylike, that was sufficient for him; he had a horror of your beauties, they were apt to be vain and silly. She was past the first bloom of youth, too, that was still another recommendation; for Paul Ellis was not of that class of old bachelors who fall in raptures with sweet sixteen. Though he was not old—his real age fell far short of forty,—he felt that he was no longer a young man, and he required as a wife a woman of mature mind—not a romping or sentimental school girl.

Certainly, Miss Agatha Bird was the very one for him, exactly to his taste in every respect—more than all in the active, though unostentatious, goodness of heart, which, in his estimation, was the crowning grace of womanhood. How touching was that simple act of kindness to the little girl, whom, clean and neat as was her attire, few young ladies would make the companion of their walk. Many will give a calico frock or a loaf of bread to the child of poverty, but few think of procuring for it an hour of innocent pleasure, that will brighten its dreary lot, and animate the drooping heart, which seems heir only to penury and neglect. O, Agatha Bird was indeed a jewel! Happy the man who could win her for his own! Ah! if he could be so fortunate!—if, tormenting doubt, why should it intrude to dispel his pleasing dream?

The next day Agatha was unable to settle herself to any occupation or amusement. She would put a few stitches in her embroidery, then throw it down wearily, saunter up and down the little parlor, pick up a book and glance vacantly through its pages, then stand at the window looking out intently, and finally with a yawn or pant, return to her work-table. Mrs. Morley looked up from her knitting now and then, as if in wonder. At last she spoke:

"A person would imagine you are expecting to see Mr. Ellis this morning."

"If I do not expect him, I at least expect a messenger from him; it is strange he is so tardy in sending."

Mrs. Morley's eyes opened wider with amazement, and she exclaimed:

"You surely do not fancy that he will send an oleander, my dear?"

"I surely do. If he has any sense at all, he will know how to do that; I am quite certain he will."

There was silence for a time, then Agatha, looking back from the window, triumphantly exclaimed:

"Behold the truth of my intuitive perception of his disposition."

The grandmother peeped through the blind, and saw a boy coming up the street with a fine oleander in full bloom.

"How could he have known where to send it?" asked she, dubiously.

"O, I took care to mention your name several times during our conversation, and any one could give him your direction. See! I am right—the boy is coming up the steps. I must open the door myself; for that stupid Peggy would ask a hundred questions."

So saying, she hastened to the street door. The boy was the bearer of a note also to Mrs. Morley, which was perused while he was conveying the plant to its destined position in the garden. It was brief, but courteous in the extreme, begging Mrs. Morley to do the writer the honor of accepting the oleander; and further, requesting the privilege of being allowed to call that evening and pay his respects.

"The old bachelor believes in taking time by the forelock," said Agatha.

"So much the better, my dear," responded the well pleased grandmother; and a favorable answer was returned to the note.

That evening beheld three persons seated in Mrs. Morley's parlor in the happiest frame of mind imaginable. Conversation went on briskly between the old lady and her guest, while Miss Agatha acted the part of a modest, retiring young lady to perfection. When she did speak, her well chosen words and carefully modulated tones increased her power over the already smitten bachelor; and when he departed it needed no seer to foretell that that call would prove the harbinger of many others. It was mid-summer when the acquaintance began. As autumn waned, Agatha impatiently awaited the declaration which she was assured would soon greet her willing ear; and the old dame grew chagrined at the unaccountable delay. As to Paul, every visit to his charmer for the last fortnight had been made with the intention of propounding the important question; but somehow his courage always failed.

At length the decisive period arrived. It was a rainy, blustering November day, and having spent the morning musing in 'his study, he set out, after dinner, to call at Mrs. Morley's. The rain was falling heavily, but that was in his favor, for there would be no interruption from visitors; and Mrs. Morley had told him that in stormy weather she generally kept her room; so he anticipated a lengthy tele-a-tete with Agatha, during which his fate should be decided. Full of these thoughts, he reached the house, and rapped; but no one came to give him admittance. He turned the knob, and finding the door unfastened, let himself in. In doing so, he made more noise than was necessary, in order to announce his entrance, but the heavy rain probably prevented the sound being noticed; for though the back parlor door was partly open, no one came out, and the voices of both ladies were plainly distinguishable. His own name uttered by the younger lady induced him to pause in the entry. They were speaking of him; he would learn how he stood in their estimation ere he committed himself by a proposal. Eagerly he listened for the grandmother's slow reply.

"But, Aggy dear, I sometimes think that we may be mistaken in regard to his intentions. Some men will visit a house year after year merely to pass away their time, though Mr. Ellis does not seem like such a man."

"O, old bachelors are mostly old fools, and I dare say he is no better than the rest," returned Agatha, pettishly.

Could he credit his ears? Was that indeed his gentle, modest, sweet voiced Agatha? Smiling, half bitterly, at the discovery, he stood deliberating whether his wisest course was to depart noiselessly, and send a brief note to explain the abrupt cessation of his visits, when he was startled by Agatha's next words:

"But now tell me, grandma, what better thing can we do with that girl? If she is not the daughter of our Paul Ellis, she is at any rate some connexion of his, and I would not have him know of it for the world; for he is just foolish enough to think of bringing her up as a lady if he were to know about her, and that I should never permit; I am determined she shall never live in my house."

"Very likely," thought Paul; "but what can be this mystery?" and impelled by an irresistible impulse, he moved nearer the room.

"Well, it seems very odd," responded Mrs. Morley; "though to be sure, when I think about it, I seem to remember that Mrs. Lee told me the girl's name was Margaret Ellis, or something like it, when I took her to bring up; but never calling her any other name but Peggy since, I almost forgot that she had any other."

Agatha interrupted the loquacious speaker with fretful impatience.

"I tell you, grandma, there can be no doubt about the name; for when I took her up to the garret, as she persisted that Mr. Ellis must be her father, I asked her for the book she had mentioned; and there, true enough, was written, 'From Paul Ellis to his wife Margaret;' and on the same page, in a woman's hand, was a date—I forget precisely what—as the birthday of 'Margaret, daughter of Paul and Margaret Ellis.' When she goes to sleep to-night I must look over her things, for nothing that bears that name shall she take out of the house; and as for her staying here, it is out of the question."

"Well, my dear, I suppose you must have your own way; and perhaps it is the safest course. So you may write to Mrs. T—— about her. I have no doubt she will be willing to take Peggy; for she will be handy, not only during the voyage, but after they reach California."

"Mrs. T—— leaves next week, does she not?"

"Yes; on Tuesday, she said."

"Then we must keep the young lady within doors in the interim, and once she is gone we may hope to be rid of her forever. For a greater security I shall mark her things with some other name, so that she will have no proof of her assertions regarding Paul Ellis in future."

So saying, Agatha began her note to Mrs. T——, and for a short space no sound was heard, save the rapid gliding of her pen over the paper, and the click of her grandmother's knitting needles. The unsuspected listener meanwhile leaned against the wall, composing himself, ere he should make his presence known. At the name of Margaret Ellis he had turned deadly pale, and a tremor, as of some powerful emotion, shook his frame; but at the close of the colloquy indignation mastered every other feeling, and he was sorely tempted to rush in and overwhelm the pair with well-merited invective. But he restrained himself; and it was with a calm, though still pale countenance, that he at last rapped lightly, and pushing back the door at the same time, revealed himself to the astonished and bewildered ladies. They both started nervously.

"Bless me!" ejaculated the wonder-stricken old dame, while Agatha, recovering her presence of mind, with a polite greeting, drew an arm-chair near the blazing fire.

Declining the proffered seat, Mr. Ellis, in as composed a manner as he could assume, said:

"Ladies, I ought, perhaps, to preface with an apology the confession that I have been a listener to your conversation. There are occasions, however, when nature triumphs over principle and good breeding. As this is one, I deem myself excusable. The child,"—his voice faltered, and his forced calmness gave way, as in a husky whisper, he added, "I must see her."

Mrs. Morley sat gazing upon him, as if suddenly struck dumb. Miss Agatha, overpowered by conflicting emotions, and feeling that her hopes were at an end, covered her mortification by seeming to sink into a deadly swoon.

"I must see the child of whom you have spoken, without delay, Mrs. Morley," repeated Mr. Ellis, maintaining by a violent effort his self-command.

But as well might he expect an answer from an Egyptian mummy as from the astonished woman; and unable to restrain his impatience longer, he darted up the stairway, and untying a cord by which the garret door was fastened, beheld a child crouched upon a small bed in one corner of the gloomy room. On hearing the door open, she buried her head in her lap, so that she did not know who entered; and before speaking to her he cast his eyes around the dreary, unfurnished garret, till espying a worn, though richly bound book lying upon the bed, he took it up, and with nervous fingers turned over its leaves.

It was the volume of which Agatha had spoken; and as his eye fell upon the record, traced in a delicate female hand, he kissed the writing with almost reverential affection, while an expression of mournful tenderness overspread his countenance. Then advancing, he laid his hand gently on the girl's shoulder. She sprang up tremblingly, but on seeing him, surprise banished all other feelings.

"Do you know me, my little girl?" he asked, in a kindly tone.

"No, sir," she answered, regarding him somewhat timidly.

"Come to the window. I want to talk with you a little while."

He led her to the window, near which was a small trunk, on which he sat, and drawing her down beside him, he scanned her features minutely. For a time he was silent from painful emotion.

In truth, she was a pitiable sight. Trembling with cold, her short hair falling forward on her tear-stained face, her eyes swollen and inflamed from long weeping, she presented a mournful picture of childhood, forlorn and distressed.

"What is your name, my child?" at length he inquired.

"Margaret Ellis, sir."

"Where is your father?"

With drooping head, she replied that she did not know.

"How long is it since you last saw him?"

"I never saw him, sir," was the reluctantly spoken answer.

"And your mother?"

The question was put in a tone that seemed to touch the child's heart, and with fast-falling tears, she replied:

"O, sir, my mother has been dead this long, long time!"

"Did you always live in this city?" was the next query.

"No, sir. I only came here with Mrs. Morley. We used to live in G——, and after my mother died, Mrs. Lee took care of me till Mrs. Morley took me to bring up."

"How long ago was that?"

"About four years I heard her say a few weeks ago."

"You go to school, I suppose?"

"O no, sir, I don't get time; for I have all the rough work about the house to do."

"And why are you up here in the cold such a day as this?"

In a frightened whisper—for she had been forbidden to mention the subject—the girl answered that in dusting the front parlor that morning, she had opened a beautiful new book, which she read was presented to Miss Agatha by Paul Ellis. She gave a cry, which Miss Agatha overheard, and on being told that Paul Ellis was her father's name, and that the gentleman who wrote that must be her father, Miss Agatha questioned her sharply, and shut her up in the garret for her impertinence. There she had since remained, cold, hungry and weeping.

A bitter, scornful smile curled Mr. Ellis's lip as he thought of the young lady's tender compassion for "the poor little creature," through whom he had made her acquaintance; but without dwelling on this, he asked the little girl if she had anything belonging to her deceased mother.

She replied that she had, and on his rising from the trunk, she took therefrom a small box, which she placed confidently in his hands. It contained a few trinkets, and a letter bearing his name, which he opened eagerly, and having read the commencement, with a burst of emotion he drew the child to his heart, exclaiming with earnestness:

"My child! my own Margaret's child!—thank God, I have discovered you!"

She clung to him with a tightening grasp; for just then, Mrs. Morley, urged by her incensed grand-daughter, appeared, protesting against this unwarrantable conduct. But Mr. Ellis, subduing his emotion, calmly assured her that words were useless; he had found his daughter in her house and she should depart with him; but as he never intended his child should toil for her daily bread, he would remunerate the lady for her board and clothing. Then Margaret having by his desire donned her old bonnet and shawl, he took her by the hand and descended the stairs, she clinging to him fearfully till he closed the house door behind them. He conducted her into a store close by, and procuring a cab, they were soon driven to the house which Agatha Bird had hoped soon to enter as a bride. Anxious as he was to learn something of the child's history, he would not harrow up her feelings by touching on the subject, but exerted himself to enliven her during the repast which was soon made ready, after which, exhausted by the trouble and excitement of the day, she fell into a deep slumber. But sleep visited not the father that night. Memory's spell was upon him, and he sat musing on the early blighted dreams of love and happiness.

Years before, when finishing his collegiate course at Yale, he wooed and won a fair young girl, an orphan, with no near kindred, to whom his love came as the sunlight of her existence. Their marriage was private; for well he knew his father would not sanction it; but with the rashness of impetuous youth, he took the irrevocable step, trusting for after-pardon. He took board for himself and bride at a neighboring farmer's, until the conclusion of his term, when he resolved to return alone to his father's home, reveal what he had done, and obtain permission to return for his bride. To Margaret, also, this seemed the best course, and buoyed up with anticipations of a speedy reunion, they parted—parted to meet no more on earth.

The very day of Paul's arrival at home, his father accidentally discovered his secret through a brief letter penned by his son to inform his wife of his safe arrival. Mr. Ellis was dismayed for a moment, but his plan was soon formed. He was a man of iron resolution, yet of the most consummate policy; little scrupulous as to the means by which he might obtain his end. That evening as they sat together, and Paul was summoning resolution to reveal his secret marriage, his father spoke of some business affairs in India, which required the presence of a responsible agent, and proposed that his son should be that agent, promising to make over to him the large sums involved, which would render him independent. The crafty father represented that the business would not require more than one or two years, and it was a good opportunity for making money and seeing something of the world, adding in a jocular way, that a friend of his was already thinking of bringing about a match between his daughter and Paul, but that he could never entertain the idea of a youth fresh from college marrying.

After this, Paul could not venture to reveal his marriage, but after much painful reflection, concluded to accept his father's offer. Though he grieved at the thought of leaving his loved Margaret for so long a time, yet with the buoyancy of youth, he imagined it would soon be past, and that then a life of comfort and happiness would be theirs. He wrote to his wife a long and persuasive letter, which his father took care should not reach its destination; and instead thereof she received a few hurriedly written lines, purporting to be from Paul, in which he directed her to set out immediately for G—, in a distant State, and there await his arrival. She was particularly cautioned to inform no one of her intentions on leaving, and not to write to him if he should not reach G— at the time he anticipated, as he would not be at his father's. This letter, which contained a liberal sum of money for her journey, completely deceived poor Margaret, who, intent only in following its directions, started the next day for G—. There the little Margaret was born; and then, after patiently expecting her husband till hope became a mockery, she died, leaving in her daughter's keeping a few trinkets, which she knew, if she ever chanced to meet her father, would be recognized by him as his own gifts; and a letter, in which she touchingly recounted her disappointment, her anxieties, her toils and sufferings.

The feelings of Paul when, on reaching the farm-house to have a parting interview with his wife, he heard of her sudden and unexplained departure, may be imagined. After lingering to the last possible moment in hopes of receiving some message from her, he left with the farmer's wife a letter, and a considerable sum of money, to be given to her if she returned, and with a heavy heart embarked for Calcutta. Several years elapsed ere, having brought affairs to a successful issue, he again beheld his native land. Again he sought New Haven, to renew his inquiries for his lost wife. His former hostess produced a carefully preserved scrap of newspaper, and pointed to one in the list of deaths. "It is her name and age, poor dear!" she said, sorrowfully. The name or date of the paper could not be learned, as the fragment had been brought from New York around some purchase.

His fondest hopes forever blasted, Paul Ellis resumed his wanderings. The sudden death of his father rendered him affluent, and after journeying for years in his own and foreign lands, he finally made his permanent home in the city, in which he was destined to discover the child of his still regretted Margaret. There he was taken for an old bachelor, as he did not think it necessary to recount his unfortunate marriage, save to Agatha Bird, to whom he intended to confide it ere asking her to be his wife.

As for that young lady, her disappointment and chagrin were excessive when she found her confident expectations baffled; but she found some consolation in the money her grandmother received, according to promise, from Mr. Ellis, and in giving out that she declined receiving his addresses when she found he was a widower! Mr. Ellis only smiled on hearing this. Happy in the instruction and companionship of his newly found daughter, he no longer deemed his home lonely or desolate. As the girl grew up, blooming, happy and intelligent, he sometimes indulged himself with a retrospective view of the past, and thankfully recalled the "rainy day," on which, by his apropos visit to Mrs. Morley's, he lost a wife, who would have made his old age anything but happy, and found an affectionate, tender and amiable daughter.

A HEALTHY OCCUPATION.

Some years since a committee was appointed in Paris to investigate the influence on the public health of the stench generated by the workshops of the "Knackers." The occupation of the knackers consists in "the conversion of dead horses to useful purposes" (!). In one establishment, that of Montfaucon, no fewer than from twelve to fourteen thousand horses are disposed of annually, and as a consequence, the air in and about it is constantly charged with effluvia from animal remains in every possible state of decomposition. The committee reported in every examination made of this and similar establishments, that while the atmosphere was most "offensive and disgusting," there were no facts to show that it was unwholesome. On the contrary, it was inferred that this and other callings, which expose to animal effluvia in its utmost intensity, were conducive to health. During the prevalence of an epidemic fever, it was observed that not one case occurred among the great number of workmen in the Montfaucon establishment, and fewer in the neighborhood than in similar localities in other parts of the city.—Foreign Correspondence of Boston Post.

TICONDEROGA.

BY JOHN D. PRESCOTT.

"You'd better take an umbrella," suggested mine host.

"A umbrrell aint never no harm raound here," officiously interposed the hostler.

I looked round me. A glorious October sun was rising above a ridge of the mountain. The morning vapors creeping lazily up the heights, kissed his half hid disk, and dissolved into translucent air. Not a cloud specked the sky. The atmosphere was as mild, and warm as could be expected after a night's embrace of the valley mist. Everything betokened one of those beautiful balmy early-autumn days, in which, I trust, discriminating reader, you delight as much as I. By what species of local divination, mine host and his clodpated ally augured the expediency of an umbrella, I was at a loss to determine. My feelings revolted against insulting such a morning, by sight of the obnoxious article; and so, with a hasty adieu, and a scowl at Jim for his clownish insinuations against the perfectness of God's handiwork, I was driven to the quay.

Were you never on Lake Champlain at early morning, when the fresh sunbeams glancing across the dewy hills pour over one shore a golden flood, and immerse the other in the gloom of night; when the struggling mist crawling slowly upward through the dales, discloses the seasonable cowboy with his silent herd, and when the only sound that breaks the stillness, is the plashing of the water under the steamer's paddles, or the winding of the early breakfast horn, as it echoes among the solitary hills?

Then have you not yet exhausted the resources of your country's poetry. There are no finer views in American scenery, than those which this beautiful lake presents. Its sinuosities render it picturesque, its associations romantic, and its soaring hills invest it with sublimity. There is not a rood of land on either shore, which is not eloquent of revolutionary days. Over these vast undulations, the audacious Stark roved, with his corps of rangers, making impudent reconnoissances, intercepting straggling foes, and betraying a penchant for doing harm, which made that hero an especial object of solicitude to his enemies. These solitudes once echoed with the thrilling strains of bugles, as the glittering pageant which followed the unfortunate Burgoyne hurried splendidly to destruction. It was that army's burial march, and the primeval woods echoed its funeral requiem. Recollections like these come crowding upon the memory, and add the attractiveness of historic interest to the scenes by which you glide. It requires no unusual activity of fancy to array these yet primitive hills in glittering uniforms and glancing bayonets, hear the sharp repercussion of musketry, and conceive flotillas of batteaux gliding noiselessly and mysteriously within the shadows of the impending bluffs.

I was amusing myself in some such imaginings as these, when my ear was greeted by the most enthusiastic, "Haow de dew," that ever burst from a Yankee throat. I looked up, and beheld, stretched over my shoulder, a neck of Rosinantic proportions, and a face which I had no difficulty in recognizing as the property of a "cute natyve," who had been astonishing a crowd of gaping auditors in mine host's bar-room the preceding evening.

"Pretty as a pictur, I swaow, aint it?"

I was surprised at so much appreciation of natural beauty in so uncouth a subject, but preferring to be left to my meditations, answered rather abruptly, when turning to a little Frenchman who stood near, he repeated his ejaculation.

"Yes, tres bien, ver mooch fine, but ven shall ve have ze dejeuner, ze vat you call breakfast, hey? I have ver mooch pain!"

The Yankee was evidently much disgusted at the small Frenchman's incongruous style of admiring things, and being bent on indulging his loquacity, turned to me again.

"Goin' threw the lake?"

"No!"

"P'raps you're goin' tew Berlington?"

"No!"

"To St. Albans, it's likely?"

"No!"

"Maybe yew're baound tew Ty?"

"Ty" was the talisman that instantly opened my lips to that Yankee's pertinacity. The appropriate abbreviation breathed a spirit of affection for the time-hallowed old citadel, which delighted me. I answered that I was going to "Ty," and, eager to obtain any information in regard to the interesting locality, inquired if he was acquainted with the spot.

"Know Ty? I may say that I riz like a sphenix, aout of its ashes. Why, stranger, if I was goin to land, I could pint aout to ye, within tew feet, the actewal spot where Ethan Allen fust landed on the York Shore."

This extraordinary accuracy of information interested me. Such minuteness I was convinced could only be the result of constant habitude with scenes so replete with historic associations, and early familiarity with local traditions. I therefore regarded my "cute" friend as an invaluable acquisition, and was not a little abashed when subsequent experience and reflection assured me that he had availed himself of the largest poetic license, and relied with surprising audacity upon the obscurity of antiquity, to inflict upon my credulity, a narrative utterly mythical. I subsequently learned, that to do the marvellous, was part of his profession, and was consoled upon the principle of the old saw, about "misery loving company," by the assurance that many a wiser man than I had been "done" by this miracle of cuteness.

I had long forgotten my Yankee informant, and was leaning over the railing, in unfeigned admiration of the constantly varying picture, when Tie-con-de-ro-ga, reverberated from stem to stern, through the handsome steamer. The rich, sonorous syllables, to which I am convinced, only the stentorian lungs of a Champlain steamboat captain can give full effect, made every cranny vocal. Just ahead was a little pier, extending several rods into the lake. Upon its extremity was built a small station house, and near by stood a flag-staff, around which was gathered a waiting group. The bell rings, the gangway is opened, the plank thrown, and—step quickly, my friend, the boat is not made fast—here we are on ground hallowed by the most vivid remembrances of the days that tried men's souls.

From the pier, the distance to the ruins is about half a mile. A wretched road winds off the bluff, and conducts to a point, from whence the plateau on which stand the fortifications is easily accessible. As I floundered through the highway, I reflected that if the redoubtable Allen achieved his famous conquests through mud like this, the world had given him credit for but half his laurels. Mine host's suggestion in regard to the umbrella recurred to me, and the species of induction by which he had argued its practicability were obvious. Nothing but the contumaciously "rainy season," could evidently have caused such a slough.

Instead of following the road, which bending around a slope, passes for some distance within a few feet of the rear works (the farmer drives his team within a biscuit toss of what was once a parapet, bristling with muskets, and hot with blazing ordnances), I turned to the left, and ascended the heights by a shorter but more difficult path. On one side of the narrow way rose a massive wall, in some places as smooth and firm as when last plumed by the masons, but in others sadly torn and disfigured; a circumstance which a well built stone fence, a few feet distant, very satisfactorily accounted for. The ground was strewn with rocks, which had tumbled from their places, and blocked up the way. I finally reached the plain, and stood, perhaps on the very spot, where eighty years ago, the bewildered sentinel snapped his fusce, harmless from long disuse, at the audacious hero, who "faced the tempest, and deserved the name of king."

The field presented an incongruous scene of dilapidated cellars and crumbling walls, from the midst of which arises a tall gray ruin, whose tall outline immediately attracts the attention. It is a portion of the old barracks, whose solid masonry has yet withstood the ravages of time, and the spoliations of neighboring farmers. It is to be regretted that the regularly hewn rocks of Ticonderoga make such excellent stone fences. This unfortunate peculiarity gives them an essential value in the eyes of the husbandman, who, like everybody else in this fast age, is ready to sacrifice whatever is venerable to the single consideration of utility. In an American, regard for the deeds with which his country's history teems, should save these old walls from mutilation. I approached this yet vigorous relic with feelings of unmingled respect. It was once the officers' quarters, and the decrepit old veteran who formerly explained the ruins to visitors was in the habit of pointing out the further door on the left on the upper row, as the place where the Commandant De la Place appeared, when Colonel Allen bade him such an affectionate good morning. At that time, this entrance was reached by a flight of wooden stairs, attached to the outside of the building, all traces of which were long ago obliterated. The roof of this structure is gone, and one end has partly fallen in, but the rest is comparatively well preserved. At one extremity a tall chimney-stack stands up boldly against the sky, and constitutes a prominent feature in the scene. The windowless apertures stare dismally, and the tottering rocks in jagged relief, present a picture of decay, mournfully significant of the ravages of the inflexible destroyer. In front is the parade, now strewn with rocks, and rank with noxious weeds. There, on that memorable morning, were drawn up in two lines, one half on the right and the other on the left, eighty-three Green Mountain Boys awaiting breathlessly, the result of the vociferous summons of their leader, which was thundering around the barracks.

How many a soldier, I meditated, who has hastened here, as the morning reveille awoke the echoes of the primeval solitude, now sleeps beneath my feet, awaiting that last reveille which shall summon him to attend the "innumerable caravan," to be arrayed on the final morning, for the inspection of his Maker. Not then, soldier, will burnished uniform and polished arms avail you, but purity of conscience, and a soul, "shining resplendent in the lustre of unsullied virtue." How often have these mouldering stones echoed to the peals of the gun at dawn, and reverberated with the martial strains, as the music beat down the line at morning parade? What tales of suffering could these crumbling vestiges of former strength reveal? To what groans of pain have they listened, as dying men brought to quarters by their comrades, filled the air with heart-breaking cries. This very spot may once have been the scene of some terrible conflict, or perhaps this ground was once stained by the blood of innocence, spilled by the arm of a remorseless savage.

I entered the officers' quarters through one of the dilapidated windows. The walls of three compartments are still standing in a greater or less degree of preservation. A few timbers are visible imbedded in the masonry, and partially charred by fire. The lower tier of windows reaches entirely to the ground, a fact which proves that a considerable amount of earth, introduced both naturally and artificially, during a long course of years, has raised the surface several feet above its original level. The limestone walls of this old building are in some places four feet in thickness, and the masonry seems solid enough to withstand the storms of years to come. Those venerable artisans were not chary of cement. Wherever the fissures are large enough to discover the internal structure, small chip-stones are revealed swimming in seas of mortar.

Extending from both ends of the officers' quarters, and at right angles to them, are the two rows of ruins which constituted the soldiers' quarters. The parade being between these buildings, was thus quadrangular in form and enclosed on all sides by the ranges of barracks. The quarters of the men are now so much impaired as scarcely to be identified. The walls are almost entirely demolished, excepting where occasionally lending each other a friendly support at the corners, they still rise grimly for several feet above the surface of the earth. The cellars piled up with rubbish and strewn with fragments of rocks, present a scene of melancholy desolation. Here and there the earth has been freshly thrown out and small excavations appear, in which credulous people have burrowed for treasures; but nothing has thus far rewarded the treasure-seekers of Ticonderoga, but discoveries of mouldering bones, misshapen bullets and corroded buttons. These, however, with a spirit intrinsically though not exclusively American, they convert into the precious metal by selling them as souvenirs.

Not far from the barracks, in the direction of the lake, is what is said to be the site of the old magazine, although it possesses no features to distinguish it from the maze of ruins around it. Into this the British once threw a shell from Mount Defiance, which looms up grandly on the right. It now presents a collection of irregular mounds, imperfectly bounded by a wall half hidden in rubbish. Roving flocks now brouse quietly on a spot which was once filled with ingredients of destruction.

It is but a short distance from the magazine to the brink of the heights upon which Ticonderoga stands. From this point the view up and down the lake is gloriously beautiful. You stand upon an elevation of perhaps one hundred and fifty feet, and embrace at a glance, one of the most surpassingly lovely pictures that our ever magnificent American scenery can present. Those warriors had certainly the smiles of an unexampled landscape to reconcile them to their obdurate trade, and to the hardships of an untrodden wilderness. On the right is Mount Defiance, most happily christened, whose symmetrical sides, clothed in the richest emerald, seem to impart a tinge to the sky against which they meet. It needed but a battery blazing from its bald top, and a fitting corps of scarlet artillerymen, to complete a picture, of which the soldier, gazing from these heights, had often been an absorbed spectator. Somewhat to the north, and nestling in verdure, is the little village of Shoreham, where Colonel Allen rendezvoused on the night before his expedition.

Beneath your feet is the calm lake, at this point but little more than a mile in width. The shore line is exceedingly tortuous, so that although one abrupt curve intercepts the glassy surface, another brings it again within the range of vision, and the landscape presents a constant succession of little pellucid lakes, with wavelets glistening in the sun, and flecked here and there by a snowy sail. This feature of the scene renders it exceedingly picturesque—the series of lakelets growing gradually smaller and smaller with the distance, until far beyond, between a vista of miniature bluffs, they are seen to melt away and mingle with the horizon. The sense of solitude is as complete, as when this region was in its wildest state. Not a sound breaks the stillness, scarcely a sign of human habitation greets the eye; and when one turns back, and gazes on the ghastly ruins, a sad, dreary sensation of loneliness insensibly creeps over the heart.

The battlements facing the lake are built upon a solid ledge rising for a hundred feet almost perpendicularly upward from the shore. In many places, the action of the frost has loosened the cement, and the rocks have tumbled down the heights, at the foot of which they lie, in unsightly heaps. In others, however, the works still spring up for thirty or forty feet, and present a surface smoothly faced, though gray, and worn with age. One angle of the glacis is in an extraordinary state of preservation, and with its history tradition, as usual, has interwoven a legend somewhat tragical. I give it as I heard it, without vouching for its authenticity.

During one of the many periods, when the French Canadians and Indians were leagued against the English for the possession of this continent, a powerful sachem of a northern tribe introduced his daughter for protection, within the walls of Ticonderoga. She was surpassingly beautiful, the darling of the old warrior's heart, and possessing all the virtues, with none of the vices of the Indian character. She had plighted her faith to a lithe young Indian hero, who was now on an expedition to St. John's, in the northern part of the lake. Her father had sanctioned her betrothal, with his blessing, on the morning of the youth's departure. A brevet colonel of French infantry attached to the garrison, being attracted by her beauty, assailed her with a heartless tale of passion, and made proffers, which caused the cheeks of the young Indian girl to tinge with indignation and shame.

She bitterly spurned his proposals, while at the same time she kept the secret of his insolence confined within her own bosom, lest a knowledge of it should alienate the high-spirited chieftain, her father, from his allies, and estrange him from a cause in which they shared a common interest. Regardless of her scorn, and unimpaired by her heroic attitude, this garrison Lothario persisted in persecuting her with his importunities, while she continued bravely to rely upon her own resources to preserve her purity, rather than endanger the fortunes of her father, her lover and her race, by hazarding a disclosure of her peril.

One evening, as she was crossing the esplanade between the barracks and the ramparts, she was intercepted by the French officer, who seized her hand, and falling on his knees, reiterated his dishonorable passion, and pointing to an orderly servant, who was holding the heads of a couple of horses behind an angle of a bastion, declared his purpose of forcibly abducting her, if she no longer refused to accede to his wishes. As quick as thought, the Indian girl broke from his grasp, and leaped like lightning upon the parapet, where she stood like Rebecca, defying the licentious Brian Bois du Guilbert. There the similitude ends, however, for seeing the officer springing after her the poor Indian maiden uttered a heart-piercing shriek, and took the frantic leap. Her mangled corpse was picked up the next morning by a water-guard, and brought into the fort. Big drops of anguish stood upon the brow of the old warrior as he gazed on his dead girl, but his eyes exhibited no unmanly tokens of grief. The French colonel guarded his secret well, and escaped the father's retribution.

Leaving the scene of the Indian's tragic fate, and following the line of circumvallation, a short detour brings you upon the rear-works. Here the business of demolition is almost complete. Nothing remains but an irregular margin of rocks, piled upon each other in broken masses. From these rough vestiges, however, one is enabled to trace the outline of the bastions and curtains with sufficient precision. Nearly all the angles are clearly enough marked for identification, and wherever the Gothicism of all practical husbandry has been unusually merciful, the boundary lines of the flanks and faces of the outworks may be distinguished. Within a few feet of the prostrate ramparts, winds the dreary high road, while beyond is presented a dismal landscape of rugged fields, rockribbed, and overgrown with gnarled and stunted shrubs.

This spot was the scene of one of the most disgraceful repulses which ever attended the British army in this country. The splendid expedition under the young Lord Howe, which sailed down Lake George against Ticonderoga, with all the pomp and magnificence of martial pageantry, so graphically described in one of Cooper's later novels, was repeatedly repulsed, and finally forced to a precipitate retreat, by a much inferior army behind these breastworks, under the Marquis de Montcalm. On that day, the life gushing from the hearts of six hundred soldiers, soaked this bleak plain in blood. The disgraceful termination of this ill-starred expedition, as the world knows, was due to the incapacity of General Abercrombie, the successor of the unfortunate Howe, who was shot in a skirmish before the battle. The Marquis de Montcalm gained much well-deserved credit for the skillfulness and bravery with which he defended the fortress against an enemy whose soldiers were veterans, and whose numbers were more than double those of the garrison.

The varied imaginings, the philosophy, and solemn reflection, which hover around this locality, when contemplated in connection with the memories of its mournful history, invest it with an interest too touching and melancholy not to excite emotions in the most careless spectator.

Between the rear defences and the barracks, is an irregular plateau of several acres in extent. This area is undulating in its character, and its scanty herbage has furnished an unsatisfactory pasturage to many a deluded sheep, since the time when its once smooth surface facilitated only the passage of gun-carriages and artillery horses. At a point about three-fourths the distance across the plain, is cut a deep trench, whose course runs nearly parallel with the outer works. In some places the walls of the talus or slope are in perfect preservation. Its rocks, imbedded as they are in solid embankments of earth, are less assailable than those above ground, and the peculiarity of its position has defended it against the despoiling hands of those, whose ancestors it once preserved from spoliation. In other places, however, more accessible, the masonry of both the scarp and counterscarp is entirely obliterated, and nothing remains to indicate its course but an irregular chasm. The part which exhibits the least mutilation and decay, is at a point where, to preserve its parallelism, the trench makes an angle, corresponding with a salient angle of the exterior defences. Here, the facing of the walls is still perfect, although the cement has crumbled from between the stones, and externally, the surfaces present a toppling and unsteady appearance. The mortar within, however, holds them with a tenacity which would preserve the structure for years if let alone.

I had nearly finished my explorations, and was enjoying the glorious view from the edge of the bluff, when I was accosted by a man, whose accent betrayed an Hibernian pedigree. He pointed to a microscopic shanty, far down at the base of the heights, and told me, that though that had been his habitation for half-a-dozen years, he knew nothing about the ruins. Shade of Mr. Jonathan Oldbuck! Six years a dweller on a spot whose every mouldering rock tells a tale, and so insensible! In an American, such extraordinary apathy would at once have subjected him to the suspicion of not being indigenous. In an exotic Irishman, it was less remarkable. He soon disclosed the object of his visit, by exhausting a capacious pocket of sundry relics, all well authenticated and duly apprised. The inventory of his small stock comprised bullets, perfectly whitened, and of a variety of forms, shot rough and mishapen from incrustations of rust, gun-flints, and Indian arrow heads. All these he told me, the earth around his dwelling yielded plentifully; and occasionally the spade struck against the decaying bones of some soldier, who had been buried where he fell. The man dilated lugubriously upon these rough mementoes, and told their probable history, with remarkable unction. He was evidently one of those, who, "grieved for an hour perhaps;" and would doubtless rehearse the same eloquent narrative to the next visitor who encouraged him to empty his pockets.

I was indebted to the Irishman for an introduction to one of the most interesting and best preserved ruins which Ticonderoga now affords. It is the bakery. This is a subterranean room, situated within the range of barracks, which formed the side of the parade, opposite the officers' quarters, and is accessible from one of the dilapidated cellars. The aperture by which it is entered, is half-choked up with rubbish and fallen stones. It is an oblong apartment, with an arched roof, pierced on one side by a sky-light, which is now in so ruinous a state as to present merely the appearance of an irregular hole. The masonry of the arch is two or three feet in thickness, and is perfectly solid. The floor is covered with the clay and rocks, which have found access through the door and window. At the further extremity, are two dark holes, the entrances to the ovens. They are now obstructed by loose earth and rocky fragments. It is currently reported and believed, throughout the neighborhood, that there are two underground passages, connected with these ovens, one conducting under the bluff to the shore of the lake, and the other leading to a well, yet visible by the roadside. No one, however, has had the temerity to explore them. The extraordinary massiveness and solidity of this old structure, indicates that the original engineers properly appreciated the sanctity of the cuisine, and were unusually prodigal of genius in consecrating an inviolable temple to the divinest of arts.

As I crawled out of the narrow aperture a large raindrop struck my hand, and simultaneously my guide ejaculated, that; "sure, this wither would make a fish of him intirely!" Mine host's implied prediction was verified; the sky was overcast, and the fast falling drops were giving a darker tint to the gray rocks. I bade a hasty farewell to "Old Ty," whose grim ruins seemed to glare reproachfully, through their ghastly windows, that there had been, "a chiel among them takin' notes" of their present imbecility, and decrepitude, and floundered to the hotel.

"Right on the Goose Question."—Somebody making use of this familiar quotation, the other day, a matter-of-fact gentleman present said, "I don't know what you mean by 'goose.'"

"Ah! my friend," replied the 'somebody,' "not to know a goose, argues yourself unknown."
Witty, but not very complimentary.

"MOTHER, I AM WEARY."

BY MRS. S. E. DAWES.

[A correspondent of the Himra Republican says that in a recent trip over the New York and Erie road, an incident occurred that touched every beholder's heart with pity. A comparatively young lady, dressed in deep mourning—her husband having recently died—was travelling southward, having in her care and keeping a young daughter of some six years. The little girl was mild-eyed as an autumnal sky, and as delicate as the hyacinth—her emaciated fingers as delicate and transparent as the pearls of Ceylon. Touchingly beautiful was the affection of her heart for the mother, whose solicitude for the daughter's comfort was unceasingly manifested. Looking ever and anon from the car window, she turned to her mother, saying: "Mother, I am weary—when shall we get home?" After a time she fell into a gentle slumber, and awaking suddenly a radiant smile overspreading her features, she exclaimed, pointing upward: "Mother, there is papa!—home at last!" and expired.]

"O mother, I am weary, I would lean upon thy breast,
For my head is aching sadly, and I long to be at rest.
And tell me, are we near? shall we see our home to-day?
For mother, I am weary, I am weary of the way."

"I would see it once again, for the skies look brighter there,

And I fancy I could breathe more freely in its air.
'Tis the dearest spot I know, I love its cherished name,
I wonder, mother darling, if it's looking just the same?

"It is not hidden now by its summer veil of leaves,
And looking yonder, mother, do you see it through the trees?

Our journey has been long, and I would cease to roam,
For mother, I am weary, I am weary for my home."

"Through the window by my side I've been looking all the day,

And thinking, mother dear, how long we've been away.
And you look weary too, but rest shall be so sweet,
When once again at home the absent ones we'll meet."

"I see it, darling mother, I see your cheering smile,
And now my weary eyes, I will close them for awhile;
And fold me closer now, still closer to thy heart,
For something tells me, mother, that you and I must part."

The little maiden slept, and o'er her brow of snow
There gathered in her slumber, a bright, celestial glow,
And a radiant smile of love o'er her little features stole,
And thro' her waking eyes beamed forth her happy soul."

"O mother, he is coming, I see my dear papa!
He's wings are like the angels, his face is like a star.
He's holding out his arms, the weary hours are past,
To a fairer world I'm going, I've found my home at last!"

SMOKING AND SNUFFING.

BY MRS. M. E. ROBINSON.

WALKING and talking, riding and reading, laboring and lounging, Ichabod Wise smoked. It was puff, puff, puff, from morning till night, and from night till—bedtime. Cigars found as natural a resting place between his lips as did the tongue in his mouth. Eating and sleeping were the only occupations in which they could conveniently be dispensed with, although he argued that an hour's smoke, were he nervous or restless, lulled him into a delicious slumber; and a four cent Havana proved the best dessert he could taste. Mrs. Wise needed no perfumery; the extract of smoke was most thoroughly disseminated through her entire wardrobe; collars and caps, gloves and gaiters alike heralded their coming. The peculiar odor had so impregnated every apartment, that none could long remain ignorant of the habits of the master of the house. The neat wife aired and aired, opening wide the windows and doors on every practicable occasion for the egress of the unwelcome essence, besides burning various condiments in the hope of overpowering the predominating exhalation. Alas for Mrs. Wise! she utterly failed in her laudable intention.

"Ichabod," she said, gathering up the cigars and ashes that that individual regularly deposited upon the mantel, "I wish you'd leave off smoking."

"Ah!" responded placid-faced Ichabod.

"Yes; wont you?"

"I'll see about it; perhaps it'll come right one of these days. But I don't see, Rebecca, how you can have the heart to wish to cut off such a simple and harmless gratification—such a cheap amusement."

"It is neither harmless nor cheap," was the reply.

Mr. Wise took out his cigar and smiled incredulously.

"It is a dirty habit, too," resumed Mrs. Wise, energetically. "A gentleman will not suffer his mouth to be soiled by contact with tobacco in any form; at least, that is my opinion."

"But smoking is not chewing, my dear? I wouldn't be guilty of chewing; it is a dreadful bad way for a man to get into—chewing is."

"One is as bad as the other, though perhaps the former is not quite so obnoxious to the generality of people," she rejoined.

"But my dear, smoking is fashionable, everybody smokes; and what the majority do, must be right." And the speaker strengthened his argument by an emphatic puff.

"Fashionable! And because some brainless exquisite discharges a mouthful of smoke in a lady's face, you would feel yourself warranted in doing the same thing, would you? Fie, Ichabod!"

"My dear Rebecca, you're quite off the track; I smoke in the street, as you well know," returned the quiet Ichabod; "yet I consider it decidedly out of taste to go on a public promenade with a lighted cigar in one's mouth. In fact, were I a lady, I should object to walking with a gentleman addicted to the habit."

"Yet you see no impropriety in puffing smoke into my face whenever you feel disposed!" retorted Mrs. Wise.

"There's an enormous difference between you and the public, Rebecca; you're my wife—a favored individual, with whom I am to feel no diffidence, no restraint, no formality. If I can't smoke in your presence, where can I smoke?"

"But it makes me sick and dizzy; I've assured you of that a great many times, Mr. Wise."

"It can't be possible! Why, when I'm sick, it makes me well! Strange we are constituted so differently!"

Ichabod lighted a fresh Havana. Rebecca looked resolute.

"I've a mind to learn to smoke myself," she said, after observing him a few moments. "If it is such an unalloyed gratification, I should like to participate in it. What a famous time we could have puffing away together!"

"Capital! try it, Rebecca! I shan't oppose it in the least. If there's one bad trait of character that I don't possess, it's selfishness; I enjoy myself, and I'm willing and desirous that everybody else should do the same. I smoke, and I've no objections to your smoking; or snuffing, or chewing, if you like them better. Individual sovereignty is a great thing, Mrs. Wise!"

A cloud of blue vapor so enveloped the sapient head of Ichabod that he did not see the peculiar expression of his wife's face; the fixed determination, the suddenly formed purpose. Silence prevailing, the individual with the cigar began to feel drowsy; the puffs were fainter and farther apart, and finally the fascinating roll of tobacco was taken from his mouth and laid upon the mantel. Sleep took possession of the senses of Ichabod, who was Wise by name if not by nature.

"You have not given me the money for dinner," observed Mrs. Wise, as her connubial partner was leaving the house, upon the next morning.

"I laid it on the mantel, last night. You will find it there."

Mrs. Wise looked in the place indicated and found part of a cigar and some burned fragments of a bank note. Holding them up to view, she said:

"A harmless habit is smoking, certainly!"

"Why—how in the world—"

"A cheap amusement, and cheap in its results; isn't it, husband?"

"How could that happen? I surely didn't—"

"Yes, you surely did put a lighted cigar on this bill, and here are the remains of it. A similar thing has happened twice before. Ah! here is a V in one corner. Five dollars gone for half a cigar!"

Ichabod had no relish for a lengthened conversation on this particular theme; so he produced more money and hurried away.

His wife Rebecca mused.

"When we walk he smokes, when we talk he smokes. Everything smells of cigars, from myself down to the scrubbing-brush. It's a habit that costs me a great deal of annoyance, and him a great deal of money. It ruins his health and my carpets. It consumes a great deal of time and tobacco, and mortifies and embarrasses me not a little. Cannot something be done to show him the folly of being enslaved by a Principe or an Havana? Cannot I, a woman, possessing, perhaps, in some degree a woman's wit and shrewdness, invent some way to cure him of smoking? I'd learn to puff myself, but unfortunately I have a very vivid recollection of an experiment in the smoking line, practised in my younger days. My sensations were not pleasurable; I have no hesitation in confessing that I was decidedly miserable. I felt so little like myself, that I should be unwilling to risk losing my identity again. "Like cures like" may be a good maxim, but in this case it isn't available. Yet Ichabod must be cured."

On the following day Mr. and Mrs. Wise descended to the dining-room together. The former took from his pocket a cigar case and proceeded to get up an appetite for breakfast by the use of a portion of its contents; while the latter, producing an enormous snuff box, composedly took a generous pinch. Almost immediately a hearty sneer followed this simple action; then another, and still another, until sternutation promised to be Mrs. Wise's employment for the day.

Ichabod started at these unusual manifestations, smoked away faster than ever, and then endeavored to look much amused. But Rebecca's face reflected no merriment; she was sober, nay serious, as (the snuff having spent its force) she took her seat at table and began to pour the coffee. When the meal was concluded, the cigar and snuff were resumed. Smoking and sneezing were as earnestly carried on as though they constituted the chief employment of life. A rocking chair held Mrs. Wise, snuff box in hand, and Mr. Wise leaned his back against the wall, manifestly regarding the matter as an excellent joke. As long as the cigar did duty, so long was snuff administered to an unoffending nose; when that was laid aside, the box of goodly proportions was consigned to her pocket, to remain till its rival again called it forth.

"Come down to the store this morning, Rebecca, and I'll go with you to look at those paintings on exhibition," said our hero, determined to take no notice of this new freak of his wife's. "Come at ten; I have an hour then at my own disposal."

Rebecca went; she was fond of paintings; but the snuff box went, too.

When, as usual, Ichabod's mouth was equipped with a cigar, a pinch of Macaboy found its way to his helpmate's nostrils; the effect was not quite so startling as in the first application, but the pedestrians who jostled past our couple were occasionally startled by a series of sneezes, commencing piano and ending forte.

From being amused Mr. Wise began to feel somewhat annoyed. His wife was a very pretty woman and very prettily dressed; he disliked to see a huge snuff box in her gloved hand, or witness the curious, inquisitive glances of passers-by. He had purposely refrained from speaking of this new phase, in the morning, hoping it would prove of short duration. But now matters looked threatening. What did she intend to do? Why, take snuff, it was evident, and whenever and wherever it suited her fancy. He flung away his cigar and quickened his steps; Mrs. Wise concealed her box, and he breathed easier.

"I won't seem to remark this freak, and doubtless she will soon tire of it; indifference will be better than expostulation," thought the long-headed Ichabod, as they entered the exhibition room. "Women are so fractious and obstinate, at times, that one feels necessitated to let them have their own way."

Now habit so tyrannised over the forbearing husband, that he could not enjoy looking at the fine paintings hanging about him, without a cigar between his lips. He would not insist upon having it lighted, but he wanted to feel its sympathising presence—to be certain of its consoling proximity. The distance was short between his pocket and his mouth, and the desire was put into action in less time than we have been putting the thought into words. Absorbed in a beautiful landscape, for a brief space he forgot the existence of Mrs. Wise; but a hurried glance around discovered her quietly sitting on a sofa opposite, in the act of tapping the cover of the dreaded box. Already she was beginning to attract attention. He caught her eye at the moment her finger and thumb secured a small quantity of the fragrant powder, and at the same instant he unaccountably dropped his Havana; while the snuff, strange to say, was recklessly wasted on the dirty floor. Curious coincidence! Twice or thrice his fingers wandered nervously to his pocket, but he mastered the inclination, and walked about as indifferently as though cigars had no existence.

"Plague take the woman!" he muttered. "What crotchet has she got into her head now, I wonder? I never knew she was addicted to snuff-taking. Detestable habit! worse than smoking a pipe or chewing opium! I hope she doesn't intend to keep it up, at home and abroad. If she does, I'll—I'll apply for a divorce! Snuff! But I won't appear to notice it, and I've no doubt she'll keep the dirty thing out of sight."

Mr. and Mrs. Wise left the hall, discussing the merits of the different pictures, snuff and cigars being mutually avoided. Upon going home to dinner, he found some relatives whom he had not seen for some years, and to whom Mrs. W. was a total stranger. But it seems that she had introduced herself, and—her snuff box; for as Ichabod entered, she was engaged in passing it around for the good of the company.

"Excuse me, Mrs. Wise; I never use snuff; but mother will be happy to keep you company," said a young cousin, good humoredly, declining the offered box.

The new-comer was so much confused by this (to him) extraordinary behaviour, that he failed to do himself justice in the greeting of his friends. That his wife might persevere in her new undertaking, had never occurred to him; and that she should expose her weakness (for so he viewed it) before company, was a greater wonder. The dinner, which was excellent, he could not relish; visions of accidental deposits of snuff in the gravy and pudding, interfered with his appetite, which was generally keenly appreciative of good cooking. But he kept up an animated conversation with his guests to disguise the newly fledged prejudice. About half an hour after leaving the table, the host began to feel uneasy; the trouble was, he wanted to smoke. And smoke he did, after remarking "that he hoped that cigars were not offensive to any one present." No dissenting voices being heard, Ichabod's happiness commenced; but simultaneously with the cigar-case appeared the snuff box, Mrs. Wise treating herself to the scented powder with the gusto of an old grandmother.

"Ichabod smokes and I snuff; he uses tobacco rolled and I powdered," she went on to say, with great sang froid. "I really felt quite lonesome to sit and see him enjoying himself so much, cut off as I seemed to be from any part of his gratification; so I got some genuine old Maccaboy, and now I feel quite contented-like. To be sure, I sneezed a great deal, at first, which was a slight drawback to my happiness; but now I can take as big a pinch as anybody, and not have my head feel as though it was going to fly off. Once I used to think that smoking was a vile practice and snuff-taking a disgusting habit; but it's wonderful how completely my prejudices on these points have been overthrown, and, as I may say, thrown to the winds. Yes, it's almost miraculous how my opinions have changed! Aunt," she added, turning abruptly to an elderly lady near her, "I shouldn't wonder at all if I should soon take to cigarettes."

"I hope not, my dear," was the response.

"And why not?" queried Mrs. Wise, in seeming surprise.

"Because—don't be offended, my dear, at an old woman's opinion—because a lady's breath should never smell of smoke."

Rebecca laughed and fortified herself by another liberal pinch out of the capacious snuff box.

"That's a primitive idea, aunt. Do you not know that to smoke well is considered an elegant accomplishment, now-a-days? It's decidedly genteel!"

A pitying smile was the only reply to this enthusiastic avowment.

"Pipes are vulgar; I don't think I would patronize pipes; but I don't doubt I should look charmingly smoking a cigarette. And then Ichabod and I can take so much comfort together. Poor fellow! he's puffed away so many hours alone, that it's quite time his taste were reciprocated. Say, Ichabod, won't it be delightful?"

At this glowing picture of future felicity the visitors exchanged significant glances, and Ichabod, with flushed face and hurried manner, left the room, pleading an imperative engagement. That his wife was fast taking leave of her senses, he was tempted to believe; else why did she act so peculiarly and use such strange words? He preferred to listen to two lectures a day upon the ill effect of cigar smoking, than hear her make such a remark as her last one, or see her take such huge pinches of snuff. His wife's pretty fingers and classic nose soiled with snuff! Pah! it was too revolting to think of!

"Take care, sir—take care of my corns!" said a voice, and looking up, Mr. Wise recognized his old family physician whom he was about running over.

"Ah, pardon me, doctor! I was careless, I fear."

"Monstrously so! At the rate you were going

I might have been crushed, if I hadn't been fortunate enough to gain your attention," pursued the professional man, good naturedly, putting his capacious person in motion.

"The truth was, doctor, I was thinking," said Mr. Wise, apologetically.

"Of what?"

"My wife."

"Then you can be pardoned; for few husbands are guilty of thinking about their wives, especially after being a married man so long as you have!" was the laughing retort.

"Don't joke, doctor! I'm not in the mood; besides, I want your advice."

The small, twinkling eyes of the physician were fixed an instant on the sober visage of Ichabod; then he said:

"Well—your wife?"

"My wife, sir, I'm suspicious, is in a very bad way."

"In a bad way! Why didn't you let me know before, and get a prescription for her? Negligence, sir, negligence!" fumed Esculapius.

"Because I haven't supposed, until to-day, that she needed attention," replied Ichabod, in an humble tone.

"The symptoms, sir, the symptoms?" peremptorily.

"Water from the head, snuffing, and violent and continuous sneezing."

"Bad, very bad! Catarrh—the most aggravated kind of catarrh! I'll drop in and examine the case this very afternoon, by your leave."

"Do so, my dear doctor; but first let me remove any wrong impression my words may have given you. My wife will not confess herself sick; women are so eccentric about such matters, sometimes, you know."

"Ah, don't trouble yourself! I perfectly understand the whims of the feminine world." And thereupon Dr. Bolus complacently produced his snuff box, wrapped the cover, and snuffed with much satisfaction; which movement caused Mr. Wise to recoil in alarm. Bolus sneezed and walked on, while his young friend went puffing in an opposite direction. The latter heard several sternutatory explosions after the old doctor turned the next corner, distant about rifle range, which caused him to quicken his footsteps, and exclaim:

"Confounded bad habit for man or beast is snuffing! If I had a dog that took snuff, I believe I should kill him!"

Ichabod returned to tea at the usual hour. When he opened the parlor door his wife was in the very act of sneezing. Dr. Bolus was present, and she was taking snuff with him very easily—with the nonchalance of a veteran who has snuffed ten pounds a year. Alarming spectacle! both physician and patient were indulging in the contents of that odious box! He fancied the former looked unusually grave, and felt not a little curious to know what his opinion might be.

"I find your lady affected with a very singular disease of the head," Dr. Bolus remarked: "I haven't met with a case just like it for several years."

"Indeed! What seems to be the difficulty?" said Ichabod, somewhat wrought upon by the doctor's serious manner.

"It is an obstruction of the estachian tubes, with an accumulation of morbid matter upon the pituitary glands, which affects the whole sensorium," quoth the doctor, with professional solemnity.

"Nothing dangerous, I presume?" added the husband.

"All derangements of the human system are dangerous, if neglected or improperly treated," remarked Bolus.

"You can set her to rights in a few days, doubtless?" continued Ichabod, who was now getting really anxious.

"The brain, my young friend, is a very difficult organ to reach," asserted the doctor, with emphasis. "A little reflection will convince you that it is not easy to apply the remedy to the diseased structure."

"You don't mean to affirm that you have no medical agent that will apply to her case?" exclaimed Ichabod, now quite nervous.

"Certainly not," replied the doctor, reaching across the centre table to dip his thumb and finger into Mrs. Wise's snuff box. "There is a remedy."

"What is it?" queried Ichabod, with evident perturbation.

"Har-chew!" went the doctor.

"Har-chew!" followed the patient.

Both used their handkerchiefs, and then Bolus said:

"Snuff," with a solemnity befitting the occasion.

"Snuff," repeated the fair patient, feelingly.

"Snuff!" added Ichabod, starting from his seat as though a highly galvanized plate of zinc had been introduced between his person and the chair.

"Snuff," continued the doctor, "is—"

"An invention of the devil!" cried Ichabod.

"Har-chew!" quoth Mrs. Wise.

"Snuff is a very cheap and convenient remedy, and acts powerfully on the olfactory nerves, and even on the substance of the brain itself," pursued Bolus.

"I should think it might!" groaned Ichabod. And at that instant the doctor's nose went off with a terrible explosion.

"But seriously, doctor, is there no alternative? It is a most disgusting remedy?"

"On the contrary, sir, 'tis a most delightful medicament. In the course of a year, by plentiful application of Maccaboy, your wife will sneeze away all her bodily ailments—a very easy way of getting rid of trouble, I think. But I wont warrant a cure unless she will take it often. I'd advise you to purchase it by the bladder; half a dozen bladders, sir, will work wonders in her case."

"But, my dear sir," remonstrated Ichabod, "my wife's a small woman, and will by no means hold so much snuff. Why, I apprehend that she would actually sneeze her brains out in three months!"

"Supply the vacuum with snuff," suggested the doctor, quietly.

"I begin to think you have done that yourself!" retorted Ichabod.

"You are at liberty to think what you please, but Mrs. Wise must take snuff."

"You are particularly disagreeable, doctor! Reflect; think of a young and pretty woman, like Mrs. Wise, going about with a vile snuff box in her hand, filling her model nose with the loathsome powder, scattering it over her embroidery, into her daily bread, perchance, destroying the whiteness of white handkerchiefs, and sneezing to the right and left like a confirmed old doser. What is more disgusting than to see a respectable female going about with a black spot on the tip of her nose! Positively, I can't think of Rebecca's taking powdered tobacco!"

"But tobacco does you a great deal of good, husband," said Mrs. Wise, demurely.

Ichabod made no answer.

"It prevents your food from hurting you, quiets your nerves, keeps your head clear, and is such a comfort to you generally. To be sure it makes your breath bad, scents up the house and clothing, takes considerable time, burns up things occasionally, gives me the sick-headache, and costs quite a sum of money; but all this is but a trifle compared with the good smoking does, and the enjoyment it brings."

There was a momentary pause.

"Doctor, will it affect my breath any?" naively inquired Mrs. Wise.

"I'm sorry to say that it will. It will make your voice sharp, also, and impair your intellect, somewhat, if you persist in it a few years."

"Affect her breath, make her voice sharp, impair her intellect! Horrible!"

Now Mrs. Wise had a breath sweet as a rose, a voice like a silver flute, and a fine intellect; and to think that any of these should suffer was terrific to Ichabod. He tried to make some compromise with the doctor, but Bolus was inexorable. He then shifted his ground and pretended to regard it as a joke or an innocent conspiracy; but the doctor became severe and accused him of having no real regard for his wife's health; while the latter applied her handkerchief to her eyes, and seemed to be deeply injured in her feelings. In fact her visuals grew very red and inflamed, which was accounted for, afterward, by the circumstance that she got snuff into them. The unfortunate Ichabod yielded with an ill grace, and spent the evening out.

He passed through varied experiences after that eventful evening. Maccaboy pervaded the house; it seemed as diffusive as cigar-smoke, penetrating everything, leaving everywhere the impress of its odor. The large snuff box appeared alike in the kitchen, dining-room, parlor, and boudoir; it rested beside Ichabod's cigar case at night. He found the aromatic powder on his best handkerchiefs, on the combs and brushes, and on the toilet table. The sound of sternutation became terrible to his ears; he ran when he heard persons sneeze in the street. He lost confidence in his daily bread, and silyly wiped his plate with his napkin when he dined.

What could honest Ichabod do? He entered into a solemn treaty with Mrs. Wise. The articles of capitulation were exceedingly simple and to the point: He agreed to leave off smoking if she would renounce snuffing. He was to bid an everlasting adieu to Havanas, and she was to say to Maccaboy farewell for ever. The snuff box and the cigar-case were laid away together. The house was thoroughly aired, and the nauseating sphere of tobacco expurgated by various processes. The powdered weed was cast out, and the weed in rolls went with it. And it was a joyful day to Mrs. Wise when the filthy smoke fiend was exorcised and laid. There were no more choking fumes in the parlor, dining-room, and boudoir. Her wardrobe became purified, at length, of the breath of tobacco. The abominations that follow in the track of the confirmed puffer finally departed.

Mrs. Wise's diseases vanished also. Dr. Bolus shrugged his shoulders and looked sagacious whenever he met Ichabod; while the latter, after he had fairly broken from the thralldom of smoking, could laugh at the conspiracy without much effort, though it was at his own expense.

A PARIBIAN PANTOMIMIST.

Paul Legrand is the best pantomimist and clown in Paris. In a piece lately produced, called the Brass Noir, in which he is conspicuous, I really thought I should laugh myself to death—verdict: died of a clown at a small theatre! It is a parody on Gerard de Nerval's Main de Gloire, and the most ludicrous parody imaginable. Pierrot in a battle with a negro, loses one of his arms after having torn off that of his adversary, who has fled, carrying away the white arm. Pierrot, desolate, like the peri at the garden gate, goes in search of a celebrated surgeon, who adroitly adjusts the foreign arm to his mutilated shoulder. Unfortunately the black arm is the arm of a rogue, a mauvais sujet, a thief, a pickpocket, a rake, a canaille, etc., and it obstinately retains the manners of its first master; so, that possessing a will of its own entirely independent of poor Pierrot, who is a very honest fellow, it leads him into all sorts of difficulties. The black arm steals a sack of money, which the white arm honestly refuses to touch, gives blows with its fist, takes the pretty girls by the waist and chucks them under the chin, tickles Pierrot to make him laugh in a pathetic situation, and finally, in spite of the virtue and remonstrances of the rest of himself, leads him off to prison. At the end, however, all is arranged. Pierrot regains his own arm once more, marries the girl of his heart, punches the negro's head, and all terminates happily. The idea is comic, is it not? The representation is droll, beyond expression. —Correspondent of the Post.

AN INCH OF RAIN.

In Lient Maury's "Physical Geography of the Sea," he computes the effect of a single inch of rain falling upon the Atlantic Ocean. The Atlantic includes an area of twenty-five millions of square miles. Suppose an inch of rain to fall upon only one-fifth of this vast expanse. "It would weigh," says he, "three hundred and sixty thousand millions of tons; and the salt which, as water, it held in solution in the sea, and which, when that water was taken up as vapor, was left behind to disturb equilibrium, weighed sixteen million more tons, or nearly twice as much as all the ships in the world could carry at a cargo each. It might fall in a day; but occupy what time it might in falling, this rain is calculated to exert so much force—which is inconceivably great—in disturbing the equilibrium of the ocean. If all the water discharged by the Mississippi River during the year were taken up in one mighty measure, and cast into the ocean at one effort, it would not make a greater disturbance in the equilibrium of the sea than would the fall of rain supposed. And yet, so gentle are the operations of nature, that movements so vast are unperceived." —Philadelphia Post.

Discontent produces much of our discomfort, and all of our improvement. If Plato had defined man as a grumbling biped, he might have defied Diogenes and his rooster. Whoever objected to the definition would have proved its truth.

RIDING A CAMEL.

BY THE OLD 'UN.

WE see that the camels imported by the United States—E Pluribus Unum—have "arriv," and we hope our western Yankees will have a good time in riding them; our own private opinion in the meantime, being, that it is a good deal easier to back a Durham cow than a Bactrian camel. We recollect witnessing a first experiment several years ago at the Lion Theatre in this city. The victim was Dan Reed, a gentleman pretty well known to old play goers in this city, as one of the best stage tyrants of his day. As Gessler in William Tell, he was perfectly excruciating. In private life his temper was none of the sweetest, and we believe it was utterly impossible for Dan to "roar as gently as a sucking dove."

Well, to our story. The management of the "Lion," brought out the melodrama of Blue Beard, with the "whole resources of the unrivalled establishment," "with a reckless disregard of cost," as Mr. Crummles would have said, and in a "style to bid defiance to any other establishment in the world." The great "card" was a bridal procession, in which were introduced two live elephants, a camel, and a stud of horses. Dan Reed was cast for Abomilique, the "three-tailed bashaw," and was expected to mount the camel. Though he protested against a first class actor, in addition to the humiliation of "playing with a menagerie," being obliged to appear on the back of a "ferocious animal," as he styled the camel, still he was obliged to submit to the requirements of the management.

The first night came and a crowded house. At the close of the first act, the procession came on, and went off amidst uproarious applause. Such a big elephant was never seen on any stage. And Dan on his camel was magnificent. His blue beard shone with the brilliancy of a Cairn Gorm, and his sabre and spangles "brought down" the million. Yet, in the midst of his glories and elevated position some ten feet in the air, those who were nearest to him might have seen a shadow of uneasiness on his painted brow. He was evidently dissatisfied with the motion and doubtful of the temper of his "mount," and, sure enough, just as the procession was leaving the stage, a boy in a blue turban, as the camel was passing, animated by the spirit of mischief, kicked him viciously. The animal, though supposed to be as meek as Moses, resented the affront and kicked at the boy in turn. Up went those clumsy footpads, and off went Dan Reed, his sabre flying out of its scabbard as he pitched upon his head. The act drop went down amidst the roars of the audience. The boy fled, and Dan Reed after him, sword in hand, swearing, like Rob Roy to "cleave him to the briskeet." But the rascal made good his escape, and Dan was forced "to nurse his rage to keep it warm."

After the performance, the tragedian, learning that the boy was ward to Andrew Jackson Allen, the costumer of the establishment, sought out that celebrated personage to lay his grievances before him. Now everybody knows that Andrew was hard of hearing and troubled with a perpetual cold in his head. On this occasion, having heard of what had transpired, he saw fit to be impenetrably deaf, and to hear nothing at all, though Dan spoke in the voice of Stentor.

"Mr. Allen," roared Dan, "I come to complain of an atrocious act on the part of your boy—one of the greatest little villains in creation."

"Glad you like the boy," replied "Dummy." "Good boy—clever—subborts his ancient mother add two sisters—picked it up id Halifax."

"He kicked my camel," yelled Dan, making a speaking-trumpet of his hand and bellowing into Allen's ear—"and made the camel kick me off—me, Daniel Reed, a legitimate actor—mark you, sir—led the heavy business at the Federal."

"Excellent, good-natured, abiable boy," pursued Allen. "Sends up all his eardings—I bay his board. Clever lad."

"He's a villain!" shouted Dan.

"Glad you like it."

"And if you don't flog him within an inch of his life—I'll murder him!"

"Thank you, Dad," said Allen, offering his hand. "All he wants is a liddle idstrucshad. He'll make ad agtor—he will—bound to rise. Good princibles. Much obliged for your kide offer. I'll write to his mother—mother and two sisters at Halifax—he subborts ub. Good-night, Dad."

"You be hanged!" yelled Dan. "You're as much of a booby as he is a fool. And if you have any respect for the boy's mother, you'll pay for his funeral—for as sure as the sun gilds the dome of the State House to-morrow morn, that sun shall set upon his bleeding corpse."

It is needless to say that the threat was not executed, and that the next night Dan was billeted upon the elephant, having positively refused to ride the "ferocious animal," on which and off which he had figured on the first night of Blue Beard.

A man who shows himself too well satisfied with himself, is seldom pleased with others, and they, in return, are little disposed to like him.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

CLOSE OF VOLUME THREE.

With the present number of our "Dollar Magazine" we close the third volume of the work. Probably no similar work was ever offered to the public which in a year and a half attained to so large an edition. It will be seen that we are constantly improving the Magazine, both in its contents and the beauty of its typography, using a much better quality of paper, and otherwise increasing its general excellence. We shall continue to make it all that we have promised, and more, and thus respond to the vast popularity it has reached. We have some admirable stories and articles preparing for forthcoming numbers, and send forth with this our hearty good wishes to the army of readers and subscribers who are our patrons.

UNCLE SAMUEL'S FARM.—To give, says an exchange, the English some idea of the extent of our domain, which they have recently talked so much about annihilating, at a single blow, we would state that the distance between the cities of New York and New Orleans is more than equal to that separating London from Constantinople, or Paris from St. Petersburg. By the land route between New York and Astoria, the distance is equal to that between New York and Bremen. By the water route the distance is as great as that between Canton and London.

THE WORLD'S MARINE.—It is stated that the waters of the earth are navigated by 145,000 vessels, of 12,904,687 tons; of which the United States have 5,500,000 tons, Great Britain, 5,000,000 tons, and France only 716,130 tons.

"CONCERT BY OLD BULL!" said a Yankee, reading a poster. "What'll they git up next? Our old bull Brindle can beller like sixty; but I never heard of his goin' round givin' concerts!"

AWARD.—Rossiter, the artist of New York, received a one thousand franc gold medal at the late Paris Exposition.

WASHINGTON IN 1773.

When Col. Washington was in New York, in 1773, it was boasted at the table of the British governor that a regiment just landed from England contained among its officers some of the finest specimens of martial elegance in his majesty's service.

"I wager your excellency a pair of gloves," said Mrs. Morris, an American lady, "that I will show you a handsomer man in the procession to-morrow than your excellency can select from your famous regiment.

"Done, madam," replied the governor.

The morrow came (June 4), and the procession, in honor of the birthday of the king, advanced through Broadway, to the braying of the trumpets and the beat of drums. As the troops defiled before the governor, he pointed out to the lady several officers, claiming her admiration for their superior persons and brilliant equipments. In the rear of the troop came a band of officers not on duty, of colonial officers, and strangers of distinction. On their appearance, the attention of the governor was attracted towards a tall and martial figure, that marched with grave and measured tread, apparently indifferent to the scene around him. The lady now archly observed, "I perceive your excellency's eyes are turned towards the right object. What say you to your wager now, sir?"

"Lost, madam," replied the gallant governor.

"When I laid my wager, I was not aware that Colonel Washington was in New York."

COOL.—At one of the California theatres a few weeks since, a quarrel took place between two fellows in the parquette, and they fired several shots at each other with revolvers. A lady who was in the boxes, was asked if she was not frightened. "O, la! no!" said she. "We are so used to having our bonnets and side curls cut with bullets that we don't mind such things." Such is the "werry last bulletin," as Mr. Weller, senior, says.

VOLUME THIRD.—We are now prepared to bind up the third volume of our "Dollar Magazine," which closes with this number, in our neat and uniform style, for thirty seven cents. Bound and returned in one week.

OLD STORIES.

There are some old stories that never grow stale; they are so good that we can bear their frequent repetition, and welcome them with as hearty a laugh as when we first heard them. We pity a person who cannot laugh at a good old joke—such a man would be very likely to cut a good old friend. We pity a man who can sit at a circus without any relaxation of the facial muscles, while the clown is performing the same pranks and uttering the same jests which delighted his grandfather. Mr. Hardcastle's staple story was "Old Grouse in the gun-room," and yet often as it was repeated, we are led to infer that it enjoyed a fabulous success. When he is marshalling his servants for the dignified reception of his expected guests, he says: "If I happen to say a good thing, or tell a good story, at the table, you must all burst out a laughing, as if you made a part of the company." "Then, eood!" answers Diggory, "your worship must not tell the story of 'Old Grouse in the gun-room;' I can't help laughing at that—he! he! he!—for the soul of me. We have laughed at that these twenty years. Ha! ha! ha!"

Who objects to hearing for the thousandth time the story of the Irishman riding, who, when his horse caught his hind foot in the stirrup, dismounted, saying, "If you're to get on, I'll get off; for, be Jabers! I wont ride double!" Or that other "gentleman," who sat in his saddle, immovable, under a pelting shower, because he was waiting for it to clear up. These genuine old things have a flavor of fun that ensures their perennial bloom.

What a story that is of Sheridan's going out to shoot with Mr. Coke's Irish gamekeeper, at Norfolk, and missing every shot, while his good-natured companion found a ready excuse for every failure. At the first shot, all the birds got away, when the gamekeeper exclaimed, "More power to your honor! Did you see one little fellow drop his leg as he went off? He'll never stand on his tin toes again." The second shot was no more lucky, but the consolation this time was, "Tare an' agers, there they go! But didn't your honor hear the shot rattle among them like pasc again a windey! They'll pray never to see your honor agin on this side of the country." Shot 3d, (birds all off again): "Blood an' oons! but they've caught it!" (After watching them awhile), "There's three wounded anyhow, for they had hardly stringth to fly over yonder hedge: the devil a wink of sleep they'll get this blessed night." Shot 4th, (a pheasant gets away): "Well, I never seen a poor gentleman taken like him; he'll remember your honor many a long day for that. The spalpeen is carrying away more shot than would sit up an ironmonger at Skibbereen." Shot 5th, (a snipe gets off): "Bother! you may cry crake, my fine fellow; you may take your long bill to the other world. You'll wake to-morrow morning with a lumbago in your soft head." Poor Sheridan could stand this no longer, but gave his countryman a fee for his ingenuity, and proceeded on his beat alone.

Children like old stories, even though they don't like old toys. The repertory of the nursery is very limited, and yet no child is tired of hearing over and over again the tale of the adventurous cow that "jumped over the moon;" of the "three blind men who went to see three cripples run a race;" or that fearful narrative of the children who met with an untimely fate in consequence of "sliding on the ice all of a summer's day." We, children of a larger growth, should learn wisdom from the juveniles, and not be ever craving after literary and humorous novelty. There is nothing new under the sun; we should learn to cherish what is good, rather than crave after what is new—old friends, old jokes, old customs.

PLENTY OF COAL.—Professor Hitchcock, in a recent lecture at Chicago on "Geology," states that coal deposits on the northern half of the continent, embrace an area of 225,000 miles, and are capable of yielding 1100 cubic miles of coal. It is estimated that one cubic mile will last a thousand years for all purposes for which it is likely to be wanted; and consequently, we have a supply of fuel in the earth for the next eleven hundred thousand years. So, don't be alarmed!

A LONG BEARD.—The longest beard recorded in history, was that of John Mayo, a painter to the Emperor Charles V. Though he was a tall man, it is said his beard was so long that he could tread upon it.

THE FATHER OF WATERS.—The total length of the Mississippi and all its tributaries, is fifty-one thousand miles, which is more than twice the equatorial circumference of the earth!

EXPRESSIVE.—Landon thought that a rib of Shakspeare would have made a Milton; and the same portion of Milton all poets born ever since!

TO HOUSEKEEPERS.—Painted wood pails are more poisonous than lead pipe.

TO CURE FELONS.—Have them arrested.

MR. MANAGER BLUFF.

Our old friend, Mr. Manager Bluff, of fortunate memory, has been dead some years, and so we can afford to indulge in a reminiscence or two respecting him without scruple. We have nothing to say against him. De mortuis nil nisi bonum. He left a competence to a remote relative in England; but he would have left a million had fortune accorded to him his full deserts. Nobody could manage an audience better than Bluff. When there was a row "in front," in consequence of the non-appearance of a favorite comedian, incapacitated from playing by inordinate devotions at the shrine of Bacchus, Bluff, and he alone, could allay the storm. He would appear before the curtain, dressed in black from head to foot. Profoundly bowing to pit, boxes and gallery, with his hat on his heart, he would say, in a tone of deep emotion:

"Ladies and gentlemen,—I deplore, as much as you resent, the absence of Mr. — to-night. Were it attributable to the usual cause, the absentee should this moment be struck from the roll of my corps dramatique. But should I be able to state that he was at this moment watching by the sick bed of an aged mother, whose moments in this world are numbered (white handkerchief to the eyes), I am sure—ladies and gentlemen (broken utterance)—that your expressions of blame would be changed into those of sympathy." And amidst tremendous applause and cheers, Mr. Bluff would withdraw, and the performance would go on, with a "stock" in the part of the erratic star.

Bluff got up a piece once on a time, called the "Battle of Bunker Hill." It was such a shocking mass of stuff, that the crowded audiences, attracted by the novelty, hissed heartily, and the curtain fell in a regular row. The poor "author" shuddered at the wings at the utter condemnation of his play. "You are a fool," said the oracular Bluff. "Wait." Seizing an American flag and a cutlass, and in the costume of a patriot soldier, which he had worn during the piece, he presented himself at the footlights.

"Ladies and gentlemen,—I beg to return you thanks for the kind applause which you have bestowed on the brilliant effort of genius I have had the honor of presenting to you this evening, and to announce that it will be repeated every evening of this week." Cries of "no! no!" hisses, cat-calls, yells, burst from every part of the house. "Ladies and gentlemen," continued Bluff, when there was a lull in the storm, "when I tell you that many of the dresses and properties used in this piece actually belonged to men who fought and fell at Bunker Hill—that the dress in which I now appear before you once clothed the limbs of a hero of the Revolution, who died at the side of your immortal Warren—when I tell you that this cutlass escaped the relaxing hand of a soldier of the times that tried men's souls—that this very flag was used at the Battle of New Orleans—I know that your sympathies will be with me!" Tremendous applause followed this "gag." "Ladies and gentlemen," continued the unblushing manager, "I know you will join me in the sentiment I am about to utter: the immortal memory of George Washington!" Three times three cheers! "Ladies and gentlemen,—I thank you for your verdict. You embolden me to announce the continued representation of the 'Battle of Bunker Hill!'"

Thunders of applause shook the house, and the piece subsequently ran for forty nights. Wasn't our friend Bluff a model manager?

HIGH FALUTIN.—A western stump orator in the course of one of his speeches recently remarked—"Gentleman, if the Par-sy-fix Ocean wor an inkstand, and the hull clouded canopy of heaven and the level ground of our yearth wor a sheet of paper, I couldn't begin to write my love of country onto it."

MEMORY.—Feinagle taught a system of artificial memory—mnemotechnica. One day a friend of Feinagle's found the waiter in a coffee room, laughing heartily. On asking the cause of his mirth, the fellow replied, "I can't help it, sir; it's raining hard, and that ere memory-man has gone and forgotten his umbrella!"

DESCRIPTIVE.—Young Bob Battles was undertaking to describe to another boy the common musical instrument called the "accordion." He floundered away in his efforts, and finally said, "Jim, you know what it is—it's an educated bellows."

XTRAVAGANZA XTRAORDINARY. — Charles X., king of France, was exceedingly xccrated by his people. He was xpatriated for his xcesses, to xpate his xtravaganza was xiled, and xpired in xile.

THE "CRADLE OF LIBERTY."—In 1775 Faneuil Hall was used for theatrical purposes, by officers of the British army, for their own amusement.

BEAUTY.—Among egstern nations obesity is thought to be the prime requisite of beauty; and the plumpest lady bears away the palm.

THE SON OF NAPOLEON.

Paris has been giddy and reeling with the effects of that popular intoxication produced by the recent dynastic event which has given Louis Napoleon an heir. Another child has been born into the family of kings—born to the hope of one day ruling the most brilliant, and, as recent events have demonstrated, the most powerful state of modern Europe. Luxury and fortune rock his cradle, and he is the unconscious recipient of homage from the gifted, the high born, and the fortunate. But who shall cast his horoscope? No one on earth can predict his destiny. He may live to wear the imperial ermine and purple; he may eat the bitter bread of exile; he may fill an untimely grave. France is a country of direful vicissitudes. In Paris there is but one step between the throne and the scaffold—but one step between the plaudits and the curses of the people.

Forty-five years ago, the thunder of the same guns which have just announced from the esplanade of the Invalides the birth of an heir to the present emperor, proclaimed the advent "into this breathing world" of a son of the elder and greater Napoleon. "Never was an earthly monarch greeted with a more affecting demonstration of a nation's love and homage." The child was born to the proud title of King of Rome. What brilliant hopes gilded his future! Had any sinister voice then declared, "in three years the great Napoleon will be forced to abdicate the throne of France; in four years, after a brief return of power, he would be languishing, death-stricken, a hopeless prisoner on a barren rock in the Atlantic; the wife who had just crowned his hopes, separated from him, content with the possession of a petty Italian duchy; the heir of these bright hopes, spoiled of his kingly title, the doomed victim of an infamous conspiracy, headed by his grandfather," the prophet of evil would have been regarded as an imbecile. Yet such was the actual fate of those who stood so high upon the pinnacle of worldly greatness and happiness only forty-five years ago. It is impossible not to recall these things on the present occasion.

But there are points of difference as well as points of similitude in the two events. The marriage of Napoleon I. with Marie Louise of Austria, was a marriage of policy. To accomplish it, he repudiated his first love—the wife of his bosom—the amiable and devoted Josephine. Bitterly was he punished for the violation of his vows. Austria became his speedy enemy, and Marie Louise, who never loved him, was false to him in the hour of misfortune, and false yet to his memory. Louis Napoleon's marriage was an affair of the heart. The parvenu was more self-reliant than his uncle. He scorned to acknowledge that he stood in need of strength from a royal alliance, and gave his hand and heart to a beautiful and accomplished lady, who brought him no political influence as a dowry. When the King of Rome was born, England was the powerful and deadly enemy of France, and Russia on the eve of withering her military power. Louis Napoleon's son is born when England is the humbled and subservient ally of France, and when the mighty power of Russia has succumbed to the Gallic eagle. It must be confessed that he comes upon the stage at an auspicious moment.

The event, however, is not one which we, upon this side of the Atlantic, can be expected to regard with much satisfaction. Inasmuch as it strengthens the hands of the present ruler of France, it depresses the hopes of the patriots of Europe, with whom we deeply sympathize; for Louis Napoleon is the avowed champion of order—that is to say, of despotism—in Europe. The prospects of liberty look darker to our eyes than they did at the close of the Congress of Vienna. Then there were elements of instability in the very order of things decreed by the Holy Alliance. The Bourbon lilies were replanted in an uncongenial soil, where they could not but wither. Now, the despot of France is upheld by the blinded millions of that most enigmatical of empires. Liberty is now no more in France, and its spirit is crushed out in Italy and Germany. The hopes of Poland and Hungary are once more blighted. England, constitutional England, shorn of her proud influence, is but a wheel in the complicated machinery of despotism, autocracy and spiritual tyranny; and it must be many, many years before the volcanic fires of liberty can burst the rigid iron crust that overlays them.

FOREIGN PASSENGERS.—The total number of passengers from foreign countries who have arrived in the United States, since April 30th, 1843, is given at 3,400,000.

CREDITABLE TO AMERICAN SKILL.—Engines are being built in New York for the Austrian Royal Danubian Steam Navigation Company.

JAMES'S NOVELS.—Mr. James has written fifty-nine books, nearly the whole of which are novels—and the list is not yet complete.

GOOD NEWS FOR THE SURGEONS.—The railroads have resumed their regular trips.

TABLE TALK.

We must all eat to live ; but many people live only to eat—a miserable way of passing one's existence. We remember somewhere to have seen a little treatise, published somewhere about the year 1812, in which the author asserted that passions, and even accomplishments, were dependent for their character on food. Thus, mental heaviness was said to be produced by beans, potatoes and lettuce ; brilliant imagination by the wings of quails and partridges ; volubility by eating larks, and anger by feeding on roast turkey. A diet of peacocks would produce vanity, and excessive indulgence in goose a state bordering on idiocy. But it is not worth while to follow out the fanciful speculations of this writer.

We degenerate moderns can never achieve anything in the gastronomic line to what was done by the ancients. Ancient history bristles with facts relative to the profusion of Roman tables and the voracity of Roman eaters. We read of Lucullus's three hundred dining-rooms, and the Apollo room, wherein each banquet cost the revenue of a whole province ; of six hundred ostrich heads, each prepared in a different way for a "pot-luck" dinner given by young Hellogabalus ; of twenty-two courses counted at a supper of the same emperor, who never suffered the same plate to be used before him, though it was of massive gold ; of couriers, appointed by Trajan, to bring to him, on the banks of the Euphrates, fresh oysters from Lake Lucrinus (not far from Rome) ; of Apicius, who, after discovering a number of new dishes, killed himself because he could no longer live so well on two hundred thousand dollars a year, to which his income had been reduced ; of the Emperor Antoninus, who died from eating too much cheese ; of Claudius Esopus, a Roman actor, who taught Cicero the art of declamation, and gave six hundred pounds for a bird which had learned to sing, speak and think, that he might make a fricassee of it. Darius assembled at dinner fifteen thousand guests, and sometimes spent a million dollars on a banquet. Caligula, according to Pliny, would suffer no wine on his table that was not one hundred and sixty years old. Asinius Celer gave seven thousand crowns for a barber. When the Emperor Otho dined with his brother, seven thousand sorts of birds and two thousand sorts of fishes were served up. Cleopatra, when supping with Mark Antony, was so delighted with a bird prepared in a particular way, that she left nothing but the bones ; and the Roman general was so gratified with the cook that he sent for him and made him a present of a whole city. In modern times, Louis XV. forgave the Duke de Soubise the loss of the battle of Rosbach in consideration of an omelette, which the marshal invented.

Shall we recall some of the great eaters of ancient times ? The Emperor Claudius one morning called for his breakfast—not that he was hungry, but he thought he could pick a bone or two. Well, a hundred perches were served up with a hundred becaficas. After eating ten melons, by way of prelude, the emperor swallowed everything on the table, including thirty-three dozens of oysters—thirty-three pounds of grapes were eaten by way of helping his digestion ; and then he was ready, with a clear head and good conscience, to attend to public affairs. He had risen from the breakfast table with an appetite ! The comedian Phagon, in the presence of the Emperor Aurelian, devoured a wild boar, a hundred loaves, a sheep, two sucking pigs, and washed the whole down with an orca of wine—a measure, the capacity of which we cannot ascertain, but for the sake of poetical consistency, we'll call it a hog's head. We might record a good many more trencher feats, on classical authority, but we pause ; for our readers might fancy that the ancient historians were too much addicted to drawing the long bow.

PREFERABLE.—Light American plows have superseded the heavy Scotch plows in Malta. They were introduced recently by the Governor, Sir Wm. Reid, formerly of Bermuda. The Scotch plow was too heavy for the warm climate and the mules of Malta.

TONNAGE ON THE LAKES.—According to the Buffalo Commercial, the tonnage of lake steamers now on the stocks is 17,775, and of sailing vessels 31,183, all of the value of $2,720,500. Vessels were lost last season whose tonnage amounted to 20,850.

PRESERVATIVE.—A small piece of linen, moistened with spirits of turpentine, and put into a bureau or wardrobe for a single day, two or three times a year, is a sufficient preservative against moths.

BUENOS AYRES.—This must be a pleasant place to live in. During six months the people there have had two conspiracies and three threats of invasion.

TELEGRAPHIC.—The cable of the New York and Newfoundland Telegraph Company will be laid by Mr. Canning.

CHINESE TAILS.

The tails worn by the inhabitants of the "Central Flower-Land" are a badge of servitude. On the subjugation of China by the Tartars, an edict was issued requiring the whole nation to shave the front of the head, and to plait the residue of the hair into a tail, the length and size of which is considered in China a great mark of masculine beauty—in consequence of which great quantities of false hair are worked up into the natural hair, the ends being finished off with black silk cord. Their Chinese rebels cut their hair short, and the moment they make a recruit to their ranks employ the shears upon him. They are thus sure of their fidelity; for the absence of the tail is a proof positive of rebellion. To the lower orders it is a useful ornament. A traveller relates that on one occasion he saw a Chinaman flogging his pig along with it; while, on another, the servant was dusting the table; and when their belligerent propensities are excited—which is not often,—they will twist each other's tails round their hands, pulling with all their strength, and enduring the most horrible torture, till one or the other cries "Hold, enough!" In San Francisco, when the naughty boys of that golden city get hold of a party of unfortunate Chinamen, obfuscated with opium, they tie all their tails together in a hard knot, and then throwing a bunch of fire-crackers into their midst, amuse themselves with their frantic and impotent struggles to get free. "Pretty vicious that!" as Mr. Squeers says; but boys will be boys.

MIGHT AND MAIN.—Gordon Cumming, the great lion slayer, was telling Rogers, one day, how he once came, unarmed, upon a huge lion. "Thinking to frighten him, I ran at him with all my might," said the hunter. "Whereupon," said Rogers, "he ran away with all his mane, I suppose?" "Exactly so," said Cumming. We think this story was coming it rather strong.

SAINTS FOR RUSSIAN SOLDIERS.—During the last campaign in Russia, more than 60,000 images of saints were sent from St. Petersburg for the encouragement of the Russian soldiers.

WORTH THINKING OF.—An exchange warns boys against gambling with marbles, as the first step in a downward career of vice.

PASSING AWAY.—Seventy-one revolutionary soldiers died during the past year.

VERY TRUE.—Every hour spent in studying is working for higher wages.

ÆOLIAN HARPS.

How sweet and suggestive are the notes of an æolian harp, as the wind plays over its strings! Now it murmurs low and gentle as the whispers of love; anon, wild and plaintive, it seems the complaining voice of the spirits of the storm. In the year 1785, the Abbate Gatoni constructed at Como a most singular æolian harp. He stretched fifteen iron wires, of different thicknesses, from the top of a tower, about ninety feet in height, to his dwelling house, about one hundred and fifty paces distant. This giant harp, by its mysterious sounds, while the air was calm, indicated changes in the weather. This was ascribed to electric influence. The same phenomenon occurred in a similar harp, constructed by Captain Haas, of Basle. The effect of the vibration of the wires in each of the giant harps, prior to changes of the weather, or during storms, is said to be quite indescribable. The sounds swelling or dying, or combining in the wildest harmonies, were sometimes heard for miles around.

• SCHOOL BOY LITERATURE.—In 1750, a gallows and whipping-post stood near Porter's tavern, at Cambridge, in Massachusetts, which gave rise to the subjoined couplet, intended to caricature the times:

"Cambridge is a famous town,
Both for wit and knowledge;
Some they whip, and some they hang,
And some they send to college."

EARTHQUAKES.—The most remarkable earthquakes of modern times are those which destroyed Lima in 1746; Lisbon in 1755, in which 20,000 persons were killed; Calabria in 1783; Caraccas in 1812; Aleppo in 1822; Guatemala in 1830; and San Salvador within the last year.

GOING UP.—Dr. Root, of St. Louis, has sold a piece of property at St. Paul, Minnesota, for $24,875, which a few years ago cost him only $600. "Now by St. Paul! the work goes bravely on."

HORRIBLE.—One thousand barrels and four hundred and thirty-two thousand bottles of patent medicines are manufactured annually by two establishments in Providence, R. I.

COL. BRAGG.—This gallant officer, who used to give away "grape," is now "in the sugar line," on a plantation at Lafourche.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.—Nearly all the newspapers in Spain—once the most bigoted country in Europe—now go in for religious liberty.

Foreign Miscellany.

Large discoveries of tin ore have been made in Australia.

The Protestants of France have nearly 1000 ministers and 1500 places of worship.

The plague has broken out in Nankin, China, and nearly one hundred thousand persons have died.

The famous porcelain manufactory at Sevres, France, is to be forthwith transformed into barracks. Such is progress.

A railroad is just completed between Alexandria and Cairo, which will vastly increase the facilities of communication with India.

Sir Hyde Parker, commander of the English naval forces in the East Indies, died at Devonport on the 21st of March.

Napoleon determines to send an extensive expedition of colonization to Madagascar. England does not oppose it.

There is some talk of a powerful force being sent into Africa to complete the entire subjugation of the native tribes.

Among rumors prevalent one is, that the emperors of Russia and Austria have respectively promised to visit Paris soon after the conclusion of peace.

The Armenians and Greeks have protested against the late toleration and reform decree of the Sultan. The Greek petition is especially directed against the articles relating to the clergy.

Among other notable arrivals announced at the Jardin des Plantes, in Paris, is that of a live alligator, six feet long, from the Mississippi River.

Accounts from Manilla state that bands of brigands were scouring the country, and spreading incendiary proclamations against the Spanish government.

An Englishman, named Hand, has patented a process for preserving animal food any length of time, without sugar or salt, exclusion from air, or any of the common modes of preservation.

A venerable missionary, Rev. Mr. Davis, who landed at Tahiti in 1801, died at his work at Papara, recently, in his eighty-eighth year. He has spent fifty-four years of missionary labor in Polynesia.

Cornelius, the German artist, has completed a picture, "The Last Judgment," the total height of which is 96 feet, and that of the principal figures 17 feet. The artist is said to have treated the subject with great skill, and has introduced 128 figures in every possible variety of grouping.

The several missions in Western Africa are said to be in a very prosperous condition at the present time. There is also a special religious awakening in Liberia. It does not appear to be confined to one denomination, but extends to all denominations of Christians.

The Sardinian troops in the Crimea, both common soldiers and officers, show a great zeal to procure and read the Bible. More than four thousand Bibles and Testaments have been distributed among them. The chaplain of the army himself called for a Bible, and said he would not oppose such a work.

New Testaments, in the Turkish language, are allowed to circulate in Turkey.

Rat skins have become scarce in Paris—and of course kid gloves are higher.

An American hotel is to be established in London, with a capital of over $4,000,000.

In Southern Russia, 100,000 persons have died of typhus fever.

It is stated that the conscription in France for the next year will amount to 140,000 men.

The annual consumption of eggs in Paris alone is 175,000,000, of the value of 7,724,256 francs.

The revenue of England increased eight millions sterling in 1855 over 1854, and France four millions.

The Joint British, French and Sardinian Submarine Telegraph line, when completed, will be 12,000 miles long.

King Oscar, it is said, intends to lay claim before the Paris Congress, to the Aland Isles, as belonging of right to Sweden.

At a book sale in Paris a short time ago, a curious edition of Voltaire, containing not less than 12,860 illustrations, was sold for $1115.

Ali Pacha, the Turkish Plenipotentiary, is said to express openly his sympathy with the cause of the Poles and Hungarians.

Six thousand French have embarked at Marseilles for the Crimea, probably to supply sick vacancies.

We obtain from the foreign papers the highly important and astonishing intelligence, that upon the table of the Peace Conference in Paris there were six inkstands, two for each ambassador.

The mullen, that very useful weed with a tall and elegant flower stalk, which roots itself at ease along the highways of New England, and which we strive to eradicate, is cultivated in Old England as the "American velvet plant."

The government of France, and of some other continental States, have so successfully bred fishes that their artificial propagation has ceased to be an experiment; and all the streams of Scotland and Ireland have been replenished with salmon.

Of the 606 convicts in the Ohio Penitentiary, there are—Second convictions, 58; third, 9; fourth, 3; fifth, 1. 423 are intemperate; 61 are married; 50 are blacks or mulattoes; 26 are over fifty years of age; 244 cannot read or write; and 400, or nearly 66 per cent. of the whole number, have no trades!

The London Times, in an editorial, speaks of "our allies' unwise and undignified demonstrations in favor of peace," and conceives that the British will be discontented with the terms of peace, the only results to England being her victories, and the consciousness of undiminished resources.

Captain Davison, of England, has patented the application to cannon of a telescope sight and cross-wires, or micrometer, so that by means of them and a collimator, the piece of ordnance may be brought to its proper position by day or night, after every discharge, without the necessity of observing the object aimed at, after the proper range and aim have been first obtained.

Record of the Times.

In Pennsylvania, a voluntary desertion of two years entitles a wife to obtain a divorce.

The Texas Legislature have given the widow of David Crockett a league of land.

Rogers's receipt for long life was, "temperance, the flesh brush, and don't fret."

A correspondent of the "Country Gentleman" has seen an egg with two others inside.

A public school teacher in New York recently asked for books for "an ingigent pupil."

A young lady advised to take exercise, lately jumped at an offer.

The Chinese call law losing a cow for the sake of a cat. Quite expressive idea, that!

The message of the governor of New Jersey in 1713 was three lines long. A model.

Boots used to be made of brass and iron. Remarkably nice for tender feet.

Lyell, the geologist, says it must have taken 67,000 years to form the Mississippi Delta.

Frankenstein, of Cincinnati, has made a noble statue of a kneeling child.

Property to the amount of $2,028,900 was sunk in the Mississippi River in the year ending September 30, 1855.

The story that Louis Napoleon led a dissolute life in New York in 1837, is flatly contradicted in the Courrier des Etats Unis.

The mammoth safe, made for the New York Park Bank, is said to be the largest in the world. The weight is ten tons, and the cost was $2500.

The Spaniards say, "At eighteen marry your daughter to her superior, at twenty to her equal, at thirty to anybody who will have her."

The members of churches in connection with the denomination distinctively known as "Christians," in this country, is 864; value of church property, $864,056; number of seats, 304,630.

Rev. E. H. Nevin, of Boston, and two other gentlemen, have purchased 12,000 acres of land in Iowa, on which they purpose to colonize 100 families, mostly from New Hampshire and Maine.

The population of Pittsburg, Pa., and the seven or eight boroughs which surround it, is set down at the present time at 122,620, being an increase of fifty-five per cent. in less than six years.

The cost of publishing Lieut. Wilkes's book, which grew out of the Antarctic Exploring Expedition, has already amounted to a million and a quarter of dollars! So says Mr. Clayton in the Senate of the United States.

James G. Shute, of Woburn, Mass., whom the Boston Traveller calls an "amateur zoologist," has kept a tortoise two years and six months without food. It is an interesting experiment—to the "amateur," but how would he like to have it tried upon himself?

A lawyer recently attempted to palm himself off as Rufus Choate in a neighboring town. At the suggestion of a printer, who was present, the "writing test" was applied to him. He wrote a legible sentence, and was promptly kicked out of the company.

A man who is opposed to capital punishment lately refused to hang a gate.

It is said that thirty slaves are annually fitted out in the port of New York.

The "Sons of New Hampshire," living in Boston, propose to celebrate at home next fall.

In California, one circular saw lately sawed 7500 feet of boards in two hours.

An anonymous defrauder of the revenue lately restored $800 to our collector.

The rose of Florida, the most beautiful of flowers, emits no fragrance.

Forty-eight clergymen of the Church of England are converted Hebrews.

An international fair is to be held at Buffalo in September next.

St. Simonton, C. G. H., is a great resort for turtles. What a place for aldermen!

A priest in Paris has been preaching against the extravagance of ladies in dress.

The Chinese are said to divide the human race into men, women and Chinese.

The Adriatic (Collins steamer) is larger than the Persia of Canard's line.

The Norwegian population of Dane county, Wisconsin, amounts to 6623 persons.

The Indian title to Manhattan Island (New York city) was bought for twenty-four dollars.

Professor Liebig has been offered five thousand dollars to come to this country and lecture.

There are eleven railroads in Wisconsin, the length of which when completed will be 695 miles; 432 miles are now finished.

Arrangements are being made to build a Female Seminary in connection with the Baptist college at Kalamazoo, Mich.

The citizens of Lowell propose placing a chime of eleven bells upon St. Anne's Church, at a cost of $4000.

Galveston, Texas, has 6000 population; San Antonio, 7000; Houston, 6000; Brownsville, 5000.

The Delaware River is to be bridged at Milford, Hunterdon county, N. J., at a cost of ten thousand dollars. The structure is to be finished by the close of the present year.

The California Farmer expresses the opinion that hereafter coffee will be grown in that State for their own consumption, and also for exportation.

Benjamin Marshall, Esq., of Troy, New York, offers to give six acres of land for the purpose of securing the erection of a suitable building in that city for the reception and treatment of patients afflicted with infectious diseases.

A strong-minded woman in Chelsea, Mass., has her own maiden name engraved upon the street door-plate. Her husband, she says, lives with her—not herself with her husband. A distinction with a difference.

The National Bank of New York, of whom the late Albert Gallatin was the founder, and his son, James Gallatin, the president, will re-organize in July under the General Banking Law, with an enlarged capital—$1,500,000 instead of $750,000.

Merry Making.

Why is G like the sun? Because it is the centre of light.

What utility is there in killing hogs, if they are cured directly afterwards?

"I'll give you a poke in the eye," as the thread said to the needle.

When tired, and your patience is worn completely threadbare, then—"darn" it.

Why is the Boston almshouse like Nahant rocks? Because there is a surge on there.

Why is a joiner less handsome than his wife? Because he is a deal-planer.

The man who lately received a "lock of hair" is on the lookout for a key to it.

What utility is there in killing hogs, if they are cured directly afterwards?

The editor of the Young America has a ferocious poodle, which he backs to lick any plate in the neighborhood.

"Have you read my last speech?" said a prosy M. C. to a friend. "I hope so," was the satisfactory reply.

A sign in Ann Street, Boston, reads, "Lodgers taken in." We guess there is no deception about that "shingle."

A young lady being asked by a boring politician which party she was in favor of, replied that she preferred a wedding party.

It is a bad sign when a preacher tries to drive his logic by thumping the desk violently with his clenched hand. His arguments are so-fist-ical.

A New York mathematician says, if the chalk mines of England should ever become exhausted, the price of Orange county milk would advance to twenty cents a quart.

An editor in Arkansas was lately shot in an affray. Luckily, the ball came against a bundle of unpaid accounts in his pocket. Gunpowder could not get through that!

What is the sovereign difference between Russia and Austria? Why, in Russia the emperor is pope, and in Austria the pope is emperor, as verified by the concordat.

Gentleman from the interior, totally unacquainted with the daguerrean art: "Look a' here, mister, couldn't ye just throw in a pair of moustaches? I'm going to raise some in the fall."

A manager was recently solicited to make his seats more comfortable. "People sleep half the time now during a performance; it wont do to make them more easy, or they would sleep all the time."

A learned young lady one evening, lately, astonished the company by asking for the loan of a "diminutive, argenteous, truncated cone, convex on its summit, and semiperforated with symmetrical indentations!" She wanted a thimble.

The Chinese people make out pretty long pedigrees. In a history of the Celestial Empire, we find this passage: "About this time the world was created." An engraving is introduced to illustrate the fact, representing a mandarin in the clouds, looking on through a spy-glass.

Why are kind mothers like novel writers? Because they indulge in fancy.

What is that which if you take the whole away, there will be some left? Wholesome.

"There is more parade than potatoes," as the Irishman said of the dinner table at a fashionable hotel.

Why does a shoemaker, when he has filled an order for you, earn a title? Because he's Major (made you) boots.

We once heard of a dog who had a whistle which grew on the end of his tail. He always called himself when wanted.

An eminent artist is about getting up a "panorama of a law suit." It opens in the year 1, and closes with doomsday.

A rather credulous individual, on being told that he should not believe more than half he heard, asked, "Which half shall I credit?"

Never purchase friends by gifts, for if you cease to give they will cease to love. Some call them "small potato friends."

"Mr. Smith, the hogs are getting into your cornfield?" "Never mind, Billy, I'm sleepy; corn wont hurt 'em."

A Western paper advertises thus: "Run Away—A hired man named John; his nose turned up five feet eight inches high, and had on a pair of corduroy pants much worn."

A woman is a great deal like a piece of ivory—the more you are ruined, the closer she clings to you. A wife's love don't begin to show itself till the sheriff is after you.

The French government gives every soldier who has lost a limb an artificial arm or leg of the best construction. This is truly giving arms to a "deserving object."

A pragmatical young fellow, sitting at a table over against the learned John Scott, asked him what difference there was between Scott and sot. Just the breadth of the table, answered the other.

Paddy said that the best friend he had in the world when he came over to Liverpool, was an "Irish thirteen," (a shilling). Poor Paddy was about right.

A fellow in Albany is going to have his life insured, so that when he dies he can have something to live on, and not be dependent on the cold charities of the world, as he once was.

An old lady in Vermont was asked by a young clergyman to what denomination she belonged? "I don't know," said she, "and don't care anything about yer 'nominations; for my part, I hold on to the good old meetin' house."

In Tristram Shandy, the enthusiastic Corporal Trim, in giving his account of the beautiful Beguine, who attended him during a fever, and relating the dreams which disturbed his slumbers, says: "I was all night long cutting the world in two, giving her half."

During a trial that occurred in the police court the other day, a constable testifying with regard to a lady, said—"I know nothing of her but what I hear the neighbors say; and, in my opinion, what women say of one another is not worthy of belief." His opinion! Where are the strong-minded and the cowhides?

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

VOL. IV.—No. 1.

BOSTON, JULY, 1856.

WHOLE No. 19.

A LEGEND OF THE SPAW INN.

BY MAURICE SILINGSBY.

It was rather late one pleasant Saturday afternoon, as I took up my journey from Manchester, England, in the direction of the large manufacturing town of Ashton-under-line, which is romantically situated on the ascending bank of the river Tame.

It was near sundown when I arrived, and I made up my mind I would pass the Sabbath there; so I alighted at the sign of the "Odd Whim," formerly the residence of a wealthy gentleman, who had once held a high position in church affairs, under the especial auspices of Roe, or "Old Roe," as he was called, the Israelite Prophet. This is one of four residences, surrounded by beautiful grounds, and located in the outskirts of the town, at the four points of the compass, each owned and occupied at one time, I was informed, by the more prominent dignitaries of said church.

It was a favorite prediction of old Roe's which led to the purchase of these lands. It seems that he had prophesied to his followers that the town of Ashton under line would one day become converted to the faith, and it was the intention of the faithful, at such time as the prophecy should be fulfilled, to construct a mighty wall which should effectually exclude them from the world, and these four points were to be the only entrances to the city of the faithful. But the iniquity of the prophet becoming evident shortly after this, it had the salutary effect to explode the much cherished scheme. Three of these famous estates have since fallen into the hands of some cotton lords of the neighborhood, while the other, as I have said, was converted into a fashionable inn, the name of which I have already recorded.

The next day I had the curiosity to visit the church, owned and still devoted to religious purposes by the remarkable sect which properly boasts the honor of its erection. It stands on Fleet Street, and was built during the first part of the present century. It was constructed after no particular model, and as you approach it from the main street of the town, you are half inclined to look upon it as some sort of prison. This idea is speedily dissipated, however, by the inscription which glares at you above the entrance—"Israelites' Sanctuary,"—with the date of its erection, etc. The gallery is open to visitors on Sabbath afternoons only, when such as choose are free to enter within its sombre vestibule, where they are speedily accosted by the sexton, who conducts them up a weary, winding staircase to a seat in the gallery.

On first entering, you are struck with the unusual air of splendor which pervades everything coming within the scope of your eye. The interior of the church is constructed somewhat after the plan of our amphitheatres, with circular pews of solid mahogany, in the centre of which rises a large and costly organ, of octagonal shape, with a high pointed roof. The organist, and, in fact, all the male portion of the choir, are graced with long beards, which descend quite to their waists. The female singers are attired in short-waisted white dresses, with old style Quaker bonnets and green veils, which are thrown back while singing, exposing to view many a sweet, bright face. I left the church at the conclusion of the service, highly impressed with the novel scenes I had witnessed.

Leaving Ashton-under-line on the following morning, I took the road through Mosely into Yorkshire. As I advanced, the scenery about me grew wilder and more irregular every moment. After riding a couple of leagues or so, I entered upon a desolate heath, called Booth-deen, which extends for several miles along the road on either hand. The road all through this region is covered with pulverized limestone, which contrasts oddly enough with the gloomy aspect of the heath. On either hand, at short intervals, are to be seen high granite posts, which were planted on purpose, no doubt, to guide travellers during severe snow storms, or in the darkness of night. To ride through such a spot, even in broad daylight, will create in the breast of the traveller a feeling of homesickness. To add to my general discomfiture, before I could distance this gloomy region of country (I should shudder to cross it unarmed after night-fall), it began to drizzle, and then to rain steadily, and by the time I had reached the nearest house—which proved to be an inn—I might easily have wrung from my clothes a gallon of water.

The Spaw Inn, as the sign swinging in front betokened, was standing alone, within a pistol-shot of the heath, and surrounded by a few acres of beautiful green upland—such as might not have been expected in such close proximity with this sterile locality. A little beyond, with a shady lane leading to it from the main road, is still to be seen the ruins of an old gibbet; and between that and the inn is the famous Spaw Spring—famous among the peasantry for miles around for certain curative properties, which it is believed to possess, and from which the inn properly derives its name.

On entering the inn, I found several persons assembled, who, like myself, had been driven thither by the rain. The landlord was a large, rosy-cheeked man, with comfort and good cheer palpably written in his face. To judge from his appearance, he could not have fallen much short of twenty stone weight. Each new arrival—for there were several who presented their dripping persons after me—seemed to give our host additional satisfaction; for, to judge from the merry twinkle of his eye, as well as to the hearty welcome which he gave to each of us on entering, he could not have been otherwise than pleased that the rain had favored him with so goodly a company.

"It's an ill wind that blows nobody good!" he would say, rubbing his hands gleefully.

There was one sturdy fellow present, named Jake Hasp, whom, with the exception of myself, everybody seemed to know, and who seemed to know everybody. He was just then preparing to launch out into a story, which might be supposed to be of no little interest, to judge from the half dozen eager faces that surrounded him.

"I tell you what, boys," said he, "the Padfoot would frighten the stoutest hearted man in England, with his great saucer-like eyes. I saw one, and I wouldn't wish to see the like again."

"Pshaw!" said the landlord, interrupting him, "who do you suppose will believe that story? The Padfoot is too big a dose for modern Englishmen to swallow. I tell you there's no such thing, Jake."

"Well, then, I tell you there is," answered Jake, stoutly; "for I've seen it, and what I've seen with my eyes—you see I've eyes, don't ye?—I believe, I do."

"Yes; but you might have been drinking pretty freely, as you do sometimes, and then you might have imagined anything."

"No, no; it's no such thing, now. I saw it as plain as I see you."

"Well, never mind; tell how it was," said one of his auditors. "I'm ready to listen to it; I be!"

"Well, it's not much of a story," answered Jake. "It's not equal to Suirs' yarn about the old gibbet up yonder" (Suir was the landlord), "but such as it is, I've half a mind to tell it. Like enough it's better than no story at all on a rainy day."

"Yes; and like enough Suirs will tell his, then," added another of the company. "Suirs' version of the 'legend' is said to be tip top, and if the rain continues we'll have it out of him somehow."

"That we will," persisted a second; "so out with it. Blaze away, Jake!"

"Well, I'd been down at Manchester for a couple of days, and was just coming home, d'ye see," pursued Jake. "Perhaps I might have dranked pretty freely while I was there—I don't say I didn't; but I was as sober as a beadle for the full of an hour before reaching home. I'd often listened to stories of the Padfoot, but I'd never seen one at that time, and what was more, I had no great faith to believe in them either. Well, there's a lonesome bog about a mile from my house, through which I had to pass, and in the centre of the bog—as near as I can guess—there's an old log bridge which crosses the stream; and I'd been over it a thousand times, day and night, and at all seasons, but had never thought of seeing the Padfoot, nor nothing like it. Well, it hadn't been dark very long when I came in sight of it, and what should I see but a black object standing by the roadside, just at one corner, as you would pass on to the bridge. I didn't take much account of this circumstance, and so I kept trudging along; but when I came within a few feet of the object, where I could see it plain, it just wheeled round, facing me, and then I knew from the descriptions given by those who had seen it, that the thing before me was none other than the Padfoot. It had a monster head, with great flaming eyes, and the body was less in stature than a dwarf's. I was near sinking to the earth with fright; for every time I attempted to move a peg, the terrible eyes would roll round on me, till I felt the very blood in my heart freezing. How I managed to get past that dreadful bridge, I don't know; but when I did get by, if I didn't—if I didn't run, then it's no matter!"

A variety of opinions were now offered, but in the main, the story was credited, and as the rain still continued to pour down freely, there was soon after an urgent call for the landlord's story.

Our host had never thought proper to dignify his narrative with a title, although, for the last half century, it had served him as a staple article of entertainment. And on similar occasions with the present, the "Legend of the Spaw Inn" had no doubt beguiled the wearisome moments of many a gloomy inn-bound traveller, who, like myself, had been called upon to linger for a day within the sterile borders of Boothdeen Heath. The legend, with the kind permission of the reader, and the usual license granted to story-tellers, shall be told after my own fashion, for convenience sake, discarding the old style method of putting words in the mouth of a second person.

Further back than even the memory of the "oldest inhabitant" dates, there resided in the ancient and opulent city of Manchester an old gentleman, who possessed from inheritance considerable landed property in Yorkshire. His name was Matthew Sheil. He had an only son, with whom he was associated at this time in business; and although he, as well as others, persisted in advising to the contrary, the senior Sheil, though now on the verge of threescore-and-ten, was yet in the habit, as he had been for forty years before, of riding into Yorkshire, solitary and alone, once a year, to look after his rent-roll. The business on those important annual occasions usually occupied him about four days in its transaction. Being of a grasping, miserly disposition, he had preferred not only the danger, but the trouble of the thing, rather than spare the stipend which a local agent, however trifling the charge, would require to accomplish the same important end.

During the last few years of his life, the son had constantly upbraided him with the folly of the thing, telling him that he would be robbed, and possibly murdered, if he went on in the same way, and advising him to place the business either in his hands or in those of some respectable agent, who would do equally as well. But no reason or objection that could be urged, was of sufficient importance to prevent him from pursuing the same course which he had marked out for himself so many years before, and from which, whether in rain or shine, he had never once deviated.

"It wuid be suir foully tu throw away as mouch as that, when I caun do it joust as well, I've doun it these forty year an' muir, and never was molested yet!"

Such was the old gentleman's parting salute on the occasion of his last visit into Yorkshire. On this occasion the son felt more than his usual disquietude, and after fretting away the first two days of his father's absence, he grew so uneasy on the third that he determined to take the road in the direction of Yorkshire, and meet him on his return. The old gentleman, during these yearly visits, had made his head-quarters at the Spaw Inn, riding all day among his tenantry, and returning thither at night. On the morning of the fourth day he invariably started on his return, so that the son knew that on the evening of the third, if nothing should have happened to him, he would be most likely to meet him there. Accordingly he hurried on and arrived at the inn in safety, just at nightfall. On entering, he discovered two men, seated on a bench, with a loaf of bread and a pot of beer between them. They were rather hard looking specimens of that turbulent class of people which infest large manufacturing towns, creating discontent among the multitude of operatives, otherwise miserable enough, which swarm those noisy, greasy and begrimmed localities.

The first care of young Sheil was to make inquiries of the landlord respecting his father, and then to see that his horse was properly cared for; for he had ridden pretty sharply during the last five miles, not having much relished the idea of walking his horse through the gloomy region of Boothdeen.

"He left the inn this morning rather earlier than usual," answered the landlord, "saying that he had much business yet to transact; but he thought he should get through in season to reach here by sunset, or a little after. He will be here very shortly now, I think. I have always thought it strange, however, that the old gentleman will still persist in riding round the country in this fashion, and at his time of life, too. Why, it is really dangerous now; I should hardly think of such a thing myself, as stout as I am. But he don't seem to mind it—not a bit! And yet I suppose a great many, besides his tenants, know what he is about?"

"Yes; but it is useless to reason with him," answered the son, "for he will do it. There is no doubt but he will continue the same practice as long as he lives, or at least as long as he is able to get about. It was my anxiety on this account that induced me to visit Yorkshire to-day. I expect nothing but that he will be made away with on some of these occasions."

"Does he usually collect a very large amount during these visits?" inquired the landlord, carelessly.

"Yes; too much for an old man like him to carry, who is totally unable to defend himself. He usually returns with about a thousand pounds."

The two men seated on the bench here exchanged glances.

"Well, he is very foolish to do it, that's all I can say for him," responded the landlord, with an ominous shake of the head. "I suppose he will return through Boothdeen Heath as safe as he will on any other part of the road from Halifax, however. I have never heard of anything happening on the moor."

Here the two men arose, and after settling for their loaf and pot of beer, quietly withdrew from the inn.

After they were gone, the son remarked that he felt such a sensation of uneasiness that he should wait but half an hour longer before he again took the road. It had grown quite dark since his arrival, and the darkness had tended more than ever to increase his anxiety. The moon had not yet risen, and the landlord advised him by all means to wait till after it had, before venturing into the heath.

For some minutes succeeding the last remark, young Sheil continued to pace up and down the room in a restless, abstracted manner. Some three quarters of an hour might have possibly elapsed since the departure of the two men, and the heralds of the moon had just rolled their first wave of light into the hungry gulf of darkness, when the silence without became broken by the sound of a horse's hoofs coming swiftly along the heath.

"That is the old gentleman!" exclaimed the landlord, throwing open the door, and peering out into the darkness. "I should know the peculiar sound of the horse's hoofs among a regiment of troopers. I never knew him to ride so before, though! I think he must have been alarmed at something. Why, he is driving at a fearful rate!"

The dull clatter of the horse's hoofs now grew louder and more distinct every moment. So intense was the anxiety of young Sheil that he was forced to lean against the door for support. In his present distempered state of mind, every additional sound seemed more than ever the premonition of evil. Nearer and nearer it approached, louder and louder rose the ringing, clattering hoof-notes, as though the very silence had suspended breath to add intensity to dread. In a moment after, the outline of a horse was visible. It approached; it entered the gate—it was riderless!

Without a word, the landlord ran into the kitchen, rallying the groom and post-boy, who had retired thither to gossip with the cook, and procuring lanterns, they all started, in great alarm, towards the heath. Young Sheil, in his anxiety, did not wait for the rest, but springing into the saddle, turned his horse's head, and spurred madly down the hill, and along the Halifax road. For about five minutes he continued to ride with unabated fury, when suddenly the horse stopped, elevated his head, snuffed the air two or three times, and then snorted vigorously. Young Sheil stretched forward over the saddle-bow, and gazed along the road. Not a dozen paces in advance of him lay a dark figure, outstretched and motionless, by the roadside. He sprang from the horse, while a sudden pang of dread shot through his heart, and feebly seizing the bridle rein, he moved forward with trembling steps. On reaching the object, it proved to be the body of a man, and on closer examination, the son could no longer doubt that he now beheld the dead body of his father! At first, he conjectured that the horse might have taken fright at something, so as to have thrown the old gentleman, who, at his time of life, might have been easily killed by the fall. But this idea was speedily dissipated on the arrival of the rest with the lanterns; for they found the skull of the old man fractured, and beside him lay the club which had probably been used in accomplishing the bloody work. A little distance off lay the old gentleman's pistol, which, for some reason, had not been discharged.

From appearances, there seemed to have been something of a struggle, as there was blood to be seen for several yards around the spot where he now lay. His pockets had been rifled of everything in the shape of money, and the murderers had so far made good their retreat. Suspicion naturally fastened itself on the two men who had overheard the conversation between the younger Sheil and the landlord, and during the next two or three days, Boothdeen Heath, and the adjacent country, were pretty thoroughly ransacked by police runners from Halifax, Huddersfield, and other large places; but all efforts to discover the perpetrators of the foul deed proved utterly abortive in every instance, and after a short time the excitement gradually wore away, and nothing further was heard or said of the murder.

Fifteen years passed away, and the circumstances connected with the Boothdeen tragedy were well nigh forgotten. The son had succeeded to the estates in Yorkshire, and like his father had kept on the practice of visiting his tenantry once a year. This was not done, however, from any penurious motive. Nothing of that kind had ever influenced the actions of the younger Sheil; but he felt an unconquerable desire to fathom the mystery, and there was a feeling that told him he could never expect to do it by remaining in Manchester. To him, there was a melancholy interest associated with the Spaw Inn, and as often as he visited Yorkshire he was sure to remain there over night, when, betwixt him and the host, the old topic of the murder was sure to be revived, and not unfrequently discussed and speculated upon till a late hour of the night.

On the occasion to which we refer, he had just returned from Halifax, as far as the Spaw Inn, where he had previously arranged to stop over night. The landlord was standing at the door when he drove up, and he remarked to him before they entered the inn, that he had been thinking it over, and it was now just fifteen years ago to-day since his father was murdered on the heath. While they were conversing, they observed a man approaching the inn in the opposite direction. He was dressed in a threadbare suit of black; was very pale, and seemingly much exhausted. There was a jaded, careworn expression about the face, and a restless, anxious look about the eye, which would be taken in at a glance by the most casual observer. He might have been fifty years of age, though the cadaverous aspect of his features, and the general emaciation of the body, might have led any one to pronounce him much older. He approached the landlord, and desired to know if he could be accommodated with a room by himself, as it was his present intention to stop at the inn for a few days.

The landlord readily conceded to the requirements of the stranger, whom he immediately conducted to a room adjoining his own sleeping apartment. During the time thus occupied, young Sheil had been standing in a maze of bewilderment. He had seen that face before. He had seen it somewhere under peculiar and trying circumstances—but where? It was sometime before he could obtain the real clue to his thoughts, but when it came, a blaze of startling intelligence shot out from every feature of his face, which was speedily followed by an unearthly pallor, and a sharp, nervous compression of the lips. When he entered the inn, the landlord expressed his surprise at the sudden change in his appearance, and desired to know if he was unwell.

"No, I am not," responded Sheil; "but I have an odd request to make, which, if it is a possible thing, you must comply with. It is nothing less than that you appoint my sleeping room next to this stranger's. I allude to the one who has just arrived."

"It is rather of an odd fancy," replied the host, curiously; "but if my bedroom will answer your purpose—it is the only room adjoining the stranger's—it shall be placed at your disposal."

"Thank you; it will do very well," answered Sheil; "but you need not mention it—what I have said—to any one. I have particular reasons for being cautious."

The stranger, who had retired to his room on first entering, did not again make his appearance below stairs, but on the plea of fatigue or indisposition, had ordered supper to be served in his own room, thereby frustrating Sheil in his intended scrutiny, which he had thought to enjoy at table without interruption—or, at least, without awakening any suspicions of what was then passing in his mind.

The time which necessarily intervened between this and going to-bed, was spent by young Sheil in fidgetty silence. If he spoke at all, it was only in reply to some direct question propounded by the landlord, and when, at an early hour, he was shown up to the landlord's room, he felt no inclination to court slumber. He lay on the outside of the bed, and listened intently to catch the faintest sound or movement from the stranger's room; but everything was silent in that quarter. For two hours there were occasional sounds of life coming from below stairs, and then all was silent. The next hour seemed almost an age in duration. Never, during the whole experience of his life, could he recall anything half so protracted and painful.

At length there was a movement in the stranger's room. He arose; he could hear him when he stepped from the bed to the floor. With suspended breath and teeth hard set, young Sheil continued to listen. In a few moments the occupant moved cautiously to the door and softly raised the latch. He heard him creep along the passage, stealthily descend the stairs, open the street door and pass out. So silently was this accomplished that no one but a listener could have detected it.

The instant the door was closed, Sheil sprang to the window, which overlooked the yard and out-houses. It was a bright moonlight night, and everything about the premises was clearly discernible from where he stood. In a moment the stranger passed round the corner and came fully out in the moonlight. Here, for an instant, he paused, and looked anxiously around and up at the windows. Sheil drew back into the shadow of the room, but still continued to watch his movements narrowly. After satisfying himself that no one was astrid about the inn, the stranger passed off into one of the out-buildings, and presently re-appeared, carrying in his hand a spade, which he swung over his shoulder, and then passed off with cautious steps in the direction of the heath, on the Halifax road.

The precise moment for action had now arrived, and with a palpitating heart, young Sheil crept down stairs, and drew his boots on in the open air. He then started off in hot pursuit of his object, keeping as much as possible within the shadow of the dwarf trees and bushes which grew by the roadside. Occasionally the stranger would pause and look about him anxiously, as though he more than half suspected some one was dogging him; and then, as if re-assured, he would move stealthily on again. In this way they continued on for nearly a mile. During this time, however, they had not followed the Halifax road, but had struck off to the left and entered on a more elevated part of the heath. At length the stranger paused, and Sheil, who was not twenty rods behind him, sank down in the shelter of a clump of bushes, where he could safely sit and observe the other's movements. At first he began by making a careful examination of the ground, stirring the leaves all about, and peering down at the same time like one who is in anxious search to discover some coveted object.

"This can't be the spot, though I could have almost sworn it was," said the stranger, speaking aloud for the first time, and advancing directly towards the bush where Sheil was sitting. "Ha! ha! here it is—here are the very stones! I should have known it if I had had my eyes open!" And the next moment he kicked over the stones, and struck his spade into the ground. He then nervously threw up a few shovels' full of earth, after which he stooped and picked up something, held it up in the moonlight (it was a small bag), and shook it. Sheil knew by the dull, clinking sound which followed the motion, that the bag contained specie of some description; and satisfied upon this point, he hastily but cautiously beat a retreat to the inn, where he arrived some moments before the other.

He watched him on his return, and saw him replace the spade in the shed. He saw him when he came out from the shed; he saw him pass round the corner; heard him ascend the stairs cautiously, and enter the room, undress, and get into bed. Then all was silent. After listening for some time, and becoming satisfied that the stranger had fallen asleep, he descended softly, and groping his way to the room which the landlord occupied, requested him to get up immediately.

In a few minutes the host appeared, rubbing his eyes, and wondering very much if his guest was in his right senses.

"Hush!" said Sheil, interrupting him, just on the point of speaking; "as I am a living man, I have this night discovered my father's murderer!"

The landlord was so astonished at this unexpected declaration that he came near dropping the candle which he held.

"Who?—who?" he managed to stammer out.

"The stranger!—the stranger!" responded Sheil, who was scarcely less excited than the host. "I can't stop to tell you how, for I must be in Halifax as quick as it is possible for a horse to take me there. But there must be no noise made. Let the post-boy be called quickly; but don't for your life mention a word of my suspicions to any one. Everything must depend on secrecy and despatch; for if there was the least movement made to excite his suspicion, the bird would be flown ere my return."

With these injunctions, the landlord roused the post-boy, and in ten minutes after, Sheil was on the road to Halifax.

On reaching Halifax, his first care was to procure a warrant for the stranger's arrest; and then in company with two of the police, started back with all haste to the inn. The sun had but just arisen when they drove into the yard, and the stranger was just coming down stairs. He colored slightly on perceiving them, but in a moment after the habitual pallor returned—the same haggard, emaciated look—the same restless expression of the night before.

On a signal from Sheil, one of the officers approached to arrest him; but no sooner did the stranger perceive his intention, than he drew a pistol which he had hitherto concealed, and discharged it full at him. The ball grazed the officer's shoulder, but did no further damage to any one, and in a moment after, the stranger was effectually secured and handcuffed. He was then conveyed to Halifax, where he underwent an examination before a magistrate, who committed him for trial at the next assizes. During the time which elapsed between the examination and trial, Stephen Brock (such was the stranger's name) continued doggedly indifferent to all permission on the part of others in reference to the confession of his crime. He had held no conference with Sheil, and therefore did not know the nature of the testimony which he would bear against him, but congratulated himself, up to the moment of his trial, with the presumption that no evidence could be brought against him sufficient to warrant his conviction. The testimony of the landlord and groom—the post-boy had died shortly after the murder—tended in no way to excite his alarm; but when Sheil was called, and stated in a clear and unshaken voice that he recognised in the prisoner on the night of his last arrival at the Spaw Inn, one of those very persons whom he had seen there on the night of his father's murder, and on whom, at that time, the suspicion of the crime had so naturally fastened itself, the prisoner began to exhibit some symptoms of alarm. When he went on still further, and stated what had subsequently transpired, how he had watched his movements, and had afterwards followed him into the heath, etc., the guilt and terror of the prisoner became so manifest as to satisfy every one who might have hitherto entertained doubts of his guilt, of his participation in the crime. Suffice it to say, that the jury, after a very brief deliberation, returned a verdict of guilty, and the prisoner was sentenced to be gibbeted on the very spot where he had buried the money.

When the murderer, Stephen Brock, became satisfied that there was no longer any hope for him, his whole demeanor changed, and he made the following free confession of his crime:

"I was born in Leeds, where I continued to reside up to the time of my father's death, which occurred when I was not yet sixteen years of age. From Leeds I removed with my ather and a younger sister to Manchester, where we began life in the mill. I remained there long enough to see my sister consigned to the grave, a victim to the wear and tear of such a life—its maddening, whirling, incessant clatter, bringing death into a thousand families, that a few insignificant cotton lords might be suffered to roll in affluence, lording it over, or crushing out the great mass of life which lay shrinking or grovelling at their feet. From that hour I became eloquent on the subject of reform. If I was wronged, or if I saw another wronged, I rebuked them openly for the wrong. If they struck me, I returned the blow with interest. I was reported as a dangerous, turbulent and rebellious person. I became an outcast, and in company with others similarly situated to myself, I led anything but a praiseworthy life.

"I then started on foot, in company with a friend, for the purpose of procuring work in some of the smaller towns. We arrived at the Spaw Inn just at nightfall, where we had thought of stopping till the next day; but the conversation which we there heard, between the landlord and the old man's son, decided us in our wicked courses. We left the inn, pretending we were obliged to get on to Halifax; but no sooner had we entered on the heath than we made the rash resolve to waylay and rob the old gentleman. We did not thirst for his blood—we only desired to get possession of his money.

"Scarcely had we arranged our plan, when we heard the old man approaching. I advanced ahead of my companion and accosted him in regard to the distance to Halifax. He answered 'seven miles,' but did not think proper to draw rein. I then seized the horse by the bridle, and my companion advanced with a club. No sooner did the old man perceive our intention than he drew a pistol, which I succeeded in knocking from his hand before he could discharge it. We then dragged him from his horse, and gave him to understand that his only chance of escape depended on his yielding up his money; but his love for the base metal predominated over everything like fear for his personal safety, and so he positively refused to submit to our demands. We felt that time was precious, and knew that it would not answer to parley much longer with a person so miserly as to sell his life rather than endure the agony of a separation from the smallest fraction of his possessions. We then endeavored to rifle his pockets of their contents, but the old man fought us desperately, shouting 'murder! murder!' with all his strength. My companion strove to choke him into silence, but in the attempt got his fingers somehow between the old man's teeth. The next instant, before I could interfere, my friend caught up his club and dealt the old man a crushing blow over the head. He straightened back with a groan, but gave us no further trouble. We soon succeeded in getting possession of a bag of gold, which he carried secreted about his person, and dragging him to the roadside, we left him there, and then struck off into the heath. After wandering about for some time, we ran afoul of a den where some wild animal had burrowed, but which was now deserted; and gathering together some bushes, we crept in and covered up the opening. Here we continued cooped up for four days, at the expiration of which time hunger drove us from our hiding-place.

"On quitting our retreat, we made an equal division of the spoils, and agreed to separate, each taking a different route. We had in all about four hundred guineas each when we parted. My companion I have never seen since. I do not know where he went, or whether he is now alive. He was naturally well disposed, but withal hasty and impetuous, and easily rendered desperate by injustice. I think from my previous knowledge of his character that he has long since repented of his crime, and therefore his name shall be kept a secret.

"After separating from my friend, I journeyed on for several miles, when the idea occurred to me, if I should be suspected, and so large an amount of money be found about me, that the circumstance of itself might lead to my conviction. I therefore determined to go instantly back and bury a portion of my ill-gotten store near the spot where the crime had been committed. It seems now as though some higher power than human understanding directed me back to that fatal spot, that in revisiting it in after years it might lead to my final detection. I reserved only a hundred guineas for present uses, and buried the rest on my return to the heath. I then made the best of my way to Liverpool, where I secured a steerage passage on board a packet just on the eve of sailing, and bound to New York.

"In New York I was robbed during a fit of intoxication of every farthing I possessed. Various were the obstacles and disappointments which I encountered in the New World. Nothing which I undertook seemed to prosper. I became at first disheartened, gradually my health became impaired, and for fourteen years I led a most miserable and precarious existence. One year ago I made up my mind to return to England, dig up my buried treasure, and retire to some obscure village or hamlet, and spend the remainder of my days in peace and quiet. But Justice in this has forestalled my intentions, and I am now sentenced to expiate my crime on the gibbet."

A few weeks after rendering the foregoing confession, Stephen Breck was conveyed from the jail to the gibbet, which had previously been erected in that part of Boothdeen where the tragedy had been enacted—was confined therein, with a loaf of bread and a small tank of water just in front of him, but so placed that he could not reach it; and there for many days the physical agony of the poor wretch was protracted, till death, the result of starvation, ensued. It is generally believed by those who are familiar with the legend, that Stephen Breck was fourteen days in the gibbet before yielding up his life. Then the vultures and birds of prey came and pecked away the mouldy loaf and the putrid flesh of the murderer, till nothing but a skeleton remained encased in the iron folds of the gibbet. Years passed, and the bones gradually crumbled into dust, and the four winds of heaven swept them away to mingle with their mother earth.

Thus ended the landlord's "Legend of the Spaw Inn." I visited the spot the next day, but so many years have since elapsed, that but little of the old gibbet now remains.

BUSY BY STEAM.

One of the busiest places in the world is a rail road station about starting time. Some come early, and some are always late; but whether prompt or tardy, every one has something to do. To purchase a paper, to get a cup of coffee, to have a trunk labelled—or, greater work than all, to get a ticket—are duties that require time; and all these little things have to be done when only a few minutes of sand are left in the hour glass. Here are fat old ladies and pale-faced men; single women and singular men; persons with families and people without, young and old, sad and happy, the sensible and the dreamers are all present, and have a journey before them. Some open windows and some shut them; carpet bags are hung up, bundles are upon the seats, and newspapers are unfolded, and everything is being prepared. A great many last words said; messages rattle on both sides, hands are shaken, kisses are exchanged and away we go.—Railroad Journal.

STEEL TOOLS.—In making tools, the artist is directed by the color of the steel while heating. The different colors direct, in tempering, to a standard. When steel is too hard, it will not do for tools intended to have a fine edge, because it will soon become notched, and if too soft it will too easily bend. Purple is the color for gravers, or tools used to work in the metals. Blue is the color for springs and instruments for cutting soft substances, such as leather, etc.—Scientific Am.

SONG TO INEZ.

BY FRANK FORESTER.

The winds of heaven are free!
They brook no mean control;
Fearlessly bounds my heart to thee,
As a steed to reach the goal.

The skies are bright and pure—
I dream of heaven and thee;
Gazing in their pearly depths,
Thy angel form I see.

The flowers of earth are fair—
The breezes toy among;
Gently as float the sephyras there,
Ye breezes bear my song.

The birds sing gladsome songs,
The echoes catch the stream;
Will Inez listen unto mine,
And echo back again?

The grave is dark and deep!
The heavens are high above;
When the weary heart lies down to sleep,
Will Inez weep in love?

AN OLD BACHELOR'S WOOING.

BY T. BURLINGAME ROSS.

"HUMPH!" said Mr. Thomas Spencer to himself, as he pulled a gray hair from his left whisker, "humph! I believe I am getting to be an old bachelor! Forty-one last birthday! and there's my nephew Tom been in college two years, and got engaged to Emma Marsden, whose mother, I believe, was in love with me once, and I should not wonder if I was just a little bit taken with her. Positively, I am getting along in life some. Now it seems but two or three years since I went to brother Harry's wedding, but it must be at least twenty, for Tom is in college and Jenny has a beau. (Whew! three gray hairs over the left temple!) Now it was silly in Harry to marry so young, before he got anything ahead, though he has done pretty well, considering he has had the drawback of a wife and family all along, yet he has not half so much money as I now (that stuff I got of Barton does not help my hair a bit, and there is a bald place coming). Well, it is rather lonesome being a bachelor when all one's friends are married, or dead, or something of the sort. I believe I must go and get married, too. Pity that the girls now-a-days are so homely; not half so pretty as they were fifteen or twenty years ago.

"Let me see, whom shall I take? There is Mary Barstow—her father is rich, and she is an only child. She is not handsome enough though—I am pretty good looking, myself, and I must have beauty in a wife—her foot is decidedly too large, and her hands have rather a bony look about the knuckles—no, Mary won't do.

"There is Susan Ray, young and pretty, but not rich; I suppose she would grow crazy almost, with joy at the thoughts of marrying me; but I ought to make money when I marry.

"Old Gray is rich and has daughters—let me see—Fanny—O, she is too old—near forty, I guess, thirty-five at the least, and she has got some temper too; and Bella, and Ada, the second wife's children are both engaged.

"I guess (plague take that gray hair, the fifteenth I have pulled out!) I guess I shall go and call on Susan Ray; 'twon't do to be too pointed though in my attentions at first; I may want to back out—pity they are so abominably poor. I shall have to support the whole family, I suppose."

Mr. Thomas Spencer, having pulled out all the gray hairs he could find in his head and whiskers, carefully shaved his upper lip, parted his hair with mathematical exactness, put on an embroidered shirt, a faultless vest, elegant coat, and white kid gloves, drenched his handkerchief in patchouli, and started for Mr Ray's domicile.

Susan Ray and Jenny Spencer sat at the window, deep in confidential converse, as Mr. Thomas Spencer came down the street and approached the house, for Susan and Jenny were inseparable friends and schoolmates.

"There's your uncle, Jenny!" exclaimed Susan, "how nice and elegant he looks! Which is the oldest, he, or your father?"

"Father, I believe," was Jenny's answer.

"Don't you pity poor old bachelors? I do; nothing to care for, and nobody to care for them," said Susan.

"O, Uncle Thomas doesn't need any pity, Sue," replied Jenny, "he is perfectly satisfied with himself, and thinks father was very foolish to get married; he cares about furniture and dress, and then he has got a tame parrot and a pair of rabbits to care for him. But as I was saying, Henry Jones told me it was a fact about Charley Harcourt and Ada Gray, that they were engaged, and would be married in spite of her father's opposition and—"

"Jenny, I declare your uncle has just rung! Do you suppose he has come for you?"

"I hope not; I won't go down unless he asks for me."

Susan went down in great amazement, when told that Mr. Thomas Spencer had asked for her, and when he invited her to accompany him upon a grand sleighing excursion the next day, she asked if Jenny was going.

"I suppose so," was his reply.

"Then I shall be very happy to go!" said Susan.

Mr. Spencer took his leave, rather puzzled to know what Jenny's going had to do with his escorting Susan.

Susan, too, was still more puzzled, when she found, on returning to Jenny, that she was going with Henry Jones, and not with her uncle, and the idea of riding with Mr. Spencer alone seemed too formidable to be entertained for a moment. Still worse did she feel about it, when about an hour later, William Clark, a young man whom she liked very much, called to invite her to accompany him with the same party.

"Too bad, Jenny! too bad, isn't it? Here I've been and promised to go with your old bachelor uncle, and can't go with William!" and forthwith poor Susan began to cry.

"Sue, you will make yourself sick," said Jenny, "crying so."

"Good! so I will, Jenny, and you tell Henry just how it was, and Henry will tell William, and so I will stay at home, and it will all turn out right."

So Miss Susan, whom Mr. Thomas Spencer supposed to be wild with joy at the thoughts of receiving a little attention from so wealthy and distinguished an individual as himself, was actually crying herself sick at the thoughts of being obliged, on his account, to decline the pleasure of a drive with a homely, red-headed youth, with a genial heart and busy brain, it is true, but not more than ten dollars cash in his pocket.

When Jenny went home that evening, she carefully placed upon her uncle's table a note, the purport of which was, that indisposition would prevent Susan's having the pleasure of riding with him the next day.

"'Indisposition,' hey!" almost shouted our bachelor friend, "what the ——" we will leave the rest of his exclamations a blank, as they were hardly suited for "ears polite." Suffice it to say, that the next morning saw him on the way to invite Mary Barstow to ride with him. He was there rebuffed by the news that she was engaged.

"Engaged, is she?" muttered our hero to himself. "Well, so I heard a good while ago, but didn't believe it; one is indisposed, and 'tother engaged—pursuit of a lady under difficulties—now I vow I will get some girl to go with me on this sleigh ride, and I will get married, too, to somebody. Mary and Susan will both cry their eyes out, when they find that one of them might have been the happy and fortunate bride; they think I am not in earnest, only flirting a little, I suppose; my day for that is over—too many gray hairs coming, haven't time—hope those silly girls have not spied them yet, I pick them all out every morning.

"I have it, I'll go down and talk with old Gray; he hates Harcourt like sin, ever since he—well, I won't call no names—got the better of Harcourt's father in that land trade; he'll let Ada go with me, I know, rather than with Charley. After all, Ada is prettier than Susan, and her father is richer than Mary's. She looks a little as Emma Marsden's mother used to, too."

Mr. Gray sat in his counting-room calculating his gains. Mr. Gray was looking very cross indeed, because his daughter Ada was invited to the great sleigh ride by Charley Harcourt, and he did not want her to go with him, although the only protest he could allege for refusing his consent was, that he did not like him. Mr. Gray, however, was always very affable and polite to Mr. Spencer, and welcomed him with great cordiality as he entered the counting-room "on private business."

Gray sent his clerk out of ear-shot, and then told Mr. Spencer that he was just thinking of calling on him to propose their going into partnership.

"Yes, Mr. Gray," said Mr. Spencer, "but we will talk about that some other time. I have come this morning to confer about going into partnership with one of your daughters; I think it is about time for me to get married."

"Yes, Spencer, my boy, so it is," returned the old gentleman, "and my Fanny will be just the wife for you; just the right age, steady, and a capital house-keeper; she more than saves her board and clothes by her good management. To be sure she is a little prim, sort of old maidish, but she'll get over that, and will make a first rate wife. Spencer, my boy, I congratulate you, I congratulate Fanny, I congratulate myself!"

"But, my dear sir," faltered Mr. Spencer, "it was not Fanny that I had in my mind. She is a fine girl, I own, but Ada was the one I meant."

"Ada! O, well, that don't alter the case much, only she won't be half so good a wife for you. She is romantic and sentimental. She'd rather read romances than stuff sausages, and eat bread than make it; and then, I don't believe she'd have you, she is bewitched by that young Harcourt, and I can't compel her to marry against her will, you know."

"O, I will manage that," replied Spencer, "she won't refuse me when she finds I am in earnest. I guess I shan't suffer by comparison with Harcourt, any day. Let her go with me to this sleigh-ride, and I'll fix it up. Stay, a bright idea has just occurred to me. You know our destination is to the town of —, just on the State line, and one mile only, from the place where we stop, across the line, is the village of —, famous for clandestine marriages; give me your consent in writing, and I will engage to bring her home as Mrs. Spencer, this very evening."

"Well, if you can do it with her free consent, you have mine and welcome. Here, I'll write it, 'I, Otis Gray, of —, in the State of —, do freely and cheerfully consent to the marriage of my daughter with Thomas Spencer, Esq.' Will that do?"

"Yes, only you have not put in the name."

"Name? O, no matter for that. I consent you shall marry any of them, as soon as you please, you take your choice, or whichever you can get."

Mr. Gray went home at noon in a much happier frame of mind than he had left it in the morning, and informed Ada that Mr. Spencer would call for her at three o'clock, to take her upon that sleigh-ride she was so anxious for.

Mr. Spencer went from Mr. Gray's counting-room to his brother's house, and confided his whole plan to Mrs. Mary Spencer, requesting her to board himself and wife for a few days, until he could make some permanent arrangements, not noticing Jenny, who was watering her flowers at the other end of the room. So engaged was he in making a dazzling toilet, that he did not observe, as he might, from his chamber windows, that Henry Jones was speedily called in, as he was passing the house, accidentally, of course, nor did he see him go out and join Harcourt in the street, nor that Harcourt soon called at Mr. Gray's, nor that Jenny ran over there in great haste and soon came back, radiant with the conscious look of possessing some charming secret. Henry Jones was likewise despatched to search out William Clark, who had been very much out of sorts, ever since Susan's refusal to drive with him, and the consequence of his interview with him was that Susan had another invitation from Clark, which she accepted, Jenny very properly deciding that if her uncle was going to woo and marry another young lady during the ride, he would not notice Susan's sudden recovery from her indisposition.

Three o'clock came; a file of single sleighs passed rapidly through the principal streets of —, on their way to —, for a supper and a dance. Mr. Thomas Spencer and Ada Gray preceded, Henry Jones with Jenny Spencer, Charles Harcourt with Fanny Gray, who, for the first time in a dozen years, condescended to join in any such "frivolous amusement," as she termed such things; William Clark and Susan Ray, Harvey Lunt and Mary Barstow, and so on until twenty-eight sleighs, each containing two of the young folks, had passed the boundaries of —, and were on their way to the scene of festivity.

"Miss Gray," said Mr. Spencer, as they rode merrily along, "I have come to the conclusion that it is about time for me to get married; what do you think about it?"

"Really, Mr. Spencer I never thought of it before, but now you mention it, it seems very reasonable and proper."

"Spoken like a girl of sense, as you are; no foolish diffidence. Your father has given his consent to my marrying you, will you have me?"

"What are you worth, Mr. Spencer?"

"Well, that is a sensible question, too. Your father told me you was romantic and not practical, but I don't know about that. What am I worth? why about fifty thousand dollars."

"Is that all you are worth, Mr. Spencer?"

"Bless us! What's the girl thinking of? Is not that enough?"

"To tell the truth, Mr. Spencer, I always expected to marry a man worth a great deal more than that; but I will consider, and give you an answer before we go home; I will marry you unless I have an opportunity to marry somebody worth more, at least, some one who can make me believe he is worth more."

"You wont see anybody to-day worth more than I am, I guess, for I could buy up, soul and body, every young man in this party."

Ada's eyes flashed, and she seemed upon the point of retorting; she however checked herself, and the rest of the ride was achieved in total silence. The sleighing party arrived at their destination in good time, partook of an excellent supper, and after one dance, in which Ada was Harcourt's partner, Mr. Spencer came to Ada for her decision.

"Let me see my father's written consent, first," said she.

He handed her the paper which she read and returned to him, saying:

"I have no objections to make to it."

"Then if you have no objections, slip on your hood and cloak, and meet me at the front door, where I will have the sleigh waiting. We will ride over the line and get married right off, and come back before they miss us."

"But we ought to have witnesses to our marriage, ought we not, or will the justice's certificate be enough?"

"What a head for business! Yes, ask Fanny and—well, Harcourt come with her; ask Harcourt and Fanny to come with us for witnesses, or stop—you ask Fanny; I will ask him."

Ten minutes afterwards, and two sleighs, each containing a lady and a gentleman, rapidly traversed the road which crossed the State line, and stopped at the tavern door about a mile from the house they had left.

Spencer and Harcourt assisted the ladies into the house, and Harcourt went in search of the justice, taking with him Mr. Gray's certificate of his consent to the marriage, at Mr. Spencer's suggestion, lest any objection should be raised by that functionary.

The worthy 'squire was soon on the spot, and married Mr. Thomas Spencer to Miss Gray, before the ladies had removed their hoods and veils; Mr. Harcourt and the remaining Miss Gray signed the certificate as witnesses, and then, much to Mr. Spencer's surprise, Mr. Harcourt requested the justice to perform the same service for himself and his lady. He did so, and Mr. and Mrs. Spencer signed the certificate as witnesses for Mr. and Mrs. Harcourt.

When the two couple returned to the hall, they perceived they had scarcely been missed by their gay companions, so they joined them in the dance, which was kept up with spirit until quite a late hour, but Mr. Spencer was much annoyed by Ada's dancing frequently with Harcourt, and pleading fatigue as an excuse for always refusing him; and he was not particularly pleased with being obliged to pay so much attention to Fanny, as etiquette required, under the existing circumstances.

The dance at last broke up, the sleighs came to the door, the bills were paid; the gentlemen helped their partners into the sleighs, and they soon reached their homes.

"Sister Mary, let me introduce you to my wife," said Mr. Thomas Spencer, as he ushered a lady, closely hooded and veiled, into Mrs. Mary Spencer's parlor. He left her there for his sister to make her feel at home, while he went to carry his horse to the stable. When he returned, he found his brother, sister-in-law, and niece chatting merrily with a lady, unhooded and unveiled, and with the face of—Fanny!

"Fanny," said he, "I am glad to see you here, but where is Ada?"

"Ada? with her husband, I suppose," replied Fanny; "how should I know?"

"Where is Mrs. Thomas Spencer, madam?" vociferated the recent Benedick.

"Here, my dear," replied Fanny, courtesying, at the same time handing him the certificate of the marriage of Mr. Thomas Spencer to Miss Fanny Gray, with the names of Charles Harcourt and Ada Gray as witnesses.

While this interesting scene was transpiring at Mr. Spencer's, Mr. Harcourt had driven to Mr. Gray's. Mr. Gray was impatiently awaiting the return of his daughters, in order to learn Mr. Spencer's success in his wooing. He was not surprised when Harcourt appeared at the door, for he supposed Fanny was his companion.

"Has Spencer married my daughter, Harcourt?" was his eager inquiry.

"Yes, and I have married your other daughter; will you receive us, or will you disown us? I can give her a comfortable home, even if you discard us entirely!"

"What the —"

Blank was the good man's state of mind, at this announcement, and blank had better remain the space we might otherwise occupy with his exclamations.

"Come, father, forgive us, and let me come in," said Ada's silvery voice from the sleigh. "Spencer concluded to take Fanny, after all, and now we are married, it can't be helped, you know, here is our certificate, witnessed by Spencer and Fanny."

"Well, children, come in," at length gasped the old man. "Perhaps it is best as it is, after all; any way, we'll make the best of it. Come in!"

Mr. Thomas Spencer neither fainted nor died on account of his slight mistake. He made a most exemplary husband, a pattern of conjugal meekness, and Fanny was renowned far and near as a wonderful housewife; but there are fewer brown hairs on his crown and cheeks than there were white ones in the days of his wooing (perhaps it would be more critically correct to say day), and he is observed not to express his former contempt for early marriages.

A LUCKY BARBER.

Richard Arkwright, passed the earlier part of his life in the humble occupation of a barber—but he was fond of reading, and what proved of more value to him, he had early acquired habits of reflection. He conceived the idea of spinning cotton by means of machinery, and notwithstanding he was miserably poor and friendless, notwithstanding he was everywhere ridiculed as a visionary projector, who deserved a cell in a mad-house, by the force of energy and application he succeeded in carrying his design (which has proved so beneficial to the human race) into effect—and afterwards revelled in all the luxuries of wealth, and was knighted by his sovereign.—Portfolio.

TO MARY T.

BY WALTER DRUMMOND.

A little, laughing gipsy,
 With an eye of brightest blue;
 With locks of golden, curling hair,
 And cheeks of rosy hue.
 Ah, methinks when thou art older,
 Hearts will break for love of thee;
 Would that I, thy heart then winning,
 All its wealth be kept for me!

Lightly o'er the bright green sward,
 Tripping on with graceful tread,
 With a spray of pure white roses
 Wreathed around thy youthful head.
 Life is bright—the present charmeth
 All the thoughts of thy young heart;
 Would that I, all gathering shadows,
 From thy life might keep apart!

Gaily comes thy silvery laughter,
 Ringing clearly through the air;
 Mirthful tones and gleeful warbling,
 All unknown are grief and care.
 O, that thus forever singing,
 With a heart all-pure and wild,
 I might ever thus be near thee,
 Thou, thyself, be e'er a child!

THE PEARL DIVERS.

BY AUSTIN C. BURDICK.

ABOUT northwest from Putlam, and distant only a few miles, upon the west coast of Ceylon, was the residence of Sir John Lakin. He had come out from England many years before the time at which we open our story, and engaged in the pearl fishery. He was quite wealthy then, and in this he had an advantage over many of those who were engaged in the same business. He could command the services of the best divers, and he could buy up pearls of those who needed the money. And though he had now amassed a fortune, yet he was still in the business. Money was his god, and he worshipped it most devoutly. The baronet's wife was dead, and the only member of his family who was of his own blood was his daughter, an only child. Her name was Bella.

Bella Lakin was nineteen years of age, and was as handsome as her father was avaricious. She did not possess that classic beauty which serves sculptors as ideals of goddesses—but it was a beauty peculiarly her own. It was a beauty of goodness—a beauty that could not have had any life without a warm, noble heart to enliven and soften it. She was short in stature, round and full in frame, with ruddy cheeks and sparkling blue eyes. When she spoke she seemed ready to laugh, for a warm smile was always playing about her lips, and winking in her eyes when her soul was at ease. In short, she had one of those faces which would tempt a kiss from the lips of an anchorite.

One calm, moonlight night, when the fresh sea-breeze drove away the heat that had been so burdensome all the day, and the air was filled with the perfume of oriental spices, Bella walked in her father's garden. But she was not alone. By her side walked a youth who had known her long. His name was Allan Wilton. He was an Englishman, born in Calcutta, of poor parents, his father having been a lieutenant in the army. Allan came to Ceylon when only fourteen years of age, and had been engaged as a common pearl diver ever since—being now four-and-twenty. From his father he had inherited a noble soul, a quickness of intelligence, and a fine sense of honor. He loved knowledge, and with Bella's assistance he had had as many books as he wished to read and study. He had been with the baronet now six years, and during that time he had brought up more pearls for his employer than any other two men, if we except one native who had been dead now over a year. He was a noble looking youth, carrying national pride in his soul, and modesty and goodness in his soul and face both.

"Bella," he said, as they reached the extremity of the garden and sat down beneath a talipot tree, "I hardly think I shall spend another season in Ceylon."

"What?" uttered the maiden, gazing up into her companion's face as the smile faded away from her own. "Not live in Ceylon? You do not mean to leave us?"

"Yes—I must go."

"No, no, Allan—you do not mean so. You will not leave us."

"I fear I must, Bella."

"But wherefore? O, if you go, what shall I do?"

"You will find plenty to do."

"Ay—to sit and cry because I am so lonesome. You will not go, Allan—you will not. Tell me you will not go."

"Ah, Bella, you know not what you say. I must not stay."

"But why not?"

"Why—the reason should be plain," replied the youth, with some hesitation. "But I can speak as plainly as you wish. I surely will not hide anything from you, though I would rather you should gain the knowledge from your own understanding."

"But Allan, how can I? What is it? Tell me—tell me all."

Allan Wilton gazed some moments into the fair girl's face, and then he said, with some tremulousness in his tone:

"Pardon me, then, for the speech I now make. You know how long I have known you. You know I came here a poor boy, when you were a laughing, joyous girl—"

"And am I not the same now?"

"You may be in that single respect; but, alas! no longer a mate for me. O, I must speak plainly now! Bella, these years I have passed near you have been happy ones, for amid all my toil the light of your smiles has cheered me on. But I am a boy no longer, nor even a youth, as we use the term distinct from manhood. I am a man now, and you have grown a woman. Even now I shall never efface thine image from my heart, nor would I if I could. But if I remain longer, I shall only become more firmly bound by those ties which must break the heart in rending. O, Bella—good, noble girl—you must see it now. It would be wicked for me to stay. Plainly, now, I tell thee—it can do no harm—I love thee too well to stay longer. Now you have the truth."

The fair girl withdrew her hand from the youth's loosened grasp, and bowed her head. She remained thus some moments. Finally she looked up, and the moonbeams were reflected from the pearly tears that had collected in her eyes, and now stood trembling upon the lashes.

"Allan," she said, in a low, agitated tone, "I do understand you, and if I have never before thought of this as you now present it, it is because I have been so happy in your company that I have not looked much to the future. For joy, I have only looked to your coming, from hour to hour, and from day to day. But do not leave me now—O, do not! I should die if you were gone!"

With these words, spoken at the close in quick, spasmodic tones, she placed her hand upon Allan's arm, and pillowed her head upon his bosom.

"But," said Allan, trying to be calm, "why should I stay, when it could only end in misery to us both? O, you should know that to live thus, we should be unhappy unless we could be united forever—and that cannot be."

"Why may it not be?" murmured the maiden, without looking up.

"How, Bella? Would you consent?"

"O, with all my heart, and all my soul!" And as the fair girl thus spoke, she clung more closely to the noble youth.

For a moment Allan forgot all else but the words he had just heard; but he would not deceive himself.

"Alas," he uttered, "I could almost wish I had never known the thing you have told me, for thy father will never consent to this—never!"

"He may—he may," cried Bella, earnestly. "He loves me, and I do not think he would see me miserable. He has money enough, and—"

"Hold, Bella. I can have as much money as we should ever want. I possess a secret that is worth more than I should dare to estimate. I know of a new pearl bank which no man save myself has yet seen. But your father is too proud to mate his child with a pearl diver."

Yet Bella was hopeful. She made Allan promise that he would not go away till he could know all, and she even intimated that rather than live without him she would follow him.

"Are you crazy, my child?" Sir John Lakin cried, as his daughter confessed her love for the poor pearl diver. "Marry you with such as he? Preposterous! Why, I should as soon think of seeing you wedded to one of my native slaves!"

"But Allan is good, father, and he is worthy of the hand of any woman in the country. He loves me, and I love him."

"Nonsense, Bella. I have a husband all ready for you! One who can provide for you."

"Perhaps you mean Condor Sudham," the girl said.

"Ay—I do mean him."

"And do you mean to tell me that I must be the wife of that man?" asked Bella, speaking more with rank astonishment than with fear.

"It is all settled, my child."

Bella gazed into her father's face in speechless surprise; and no wonder. This Condor Sudham was a scion of an old Dutch family that once had a title. He was born on the island, and was now over forty years of age. He was a member of the Legislative Council, and a merchant, and was one of the most wealthy men of the country. He was a short, dumpy, coarse, dark featured man, well enough as a member of government, but never made for an affectionate friend. He was married already to his money, and wife and children would only find a secondary place in his heart.

And such was the man the baronet would have his child marry. Sudham had seen Bella often, and he thought she would make a fine addition to his estate. He would take a pride in showing her, and having her preside at his table. But the maiden herself had different opinions upon the subject.

"If I thought you were in earnest, father, I should know exactly what to say."

"Ah, and what would it be, my child?"

"I never can be that man's wife."

"Very well. You will have a father's authority to contend with, then. Be assured you shall marry with him, for so I have promised."

But the baronet found himself with more work on his hands than he had counted on. Bella grew sad and melancholy, and ere long the truth burst upon him that his child was beginning to lose all her love for him. She looked upon him as the tyrant who would crush her, and she smiled no more in his presence. He could not help noticing this, and he wished to overcome it; but yet he thought not of granting to his child the holy boon she asked. He looked upon the poor pearl diver as the only obstacle to his plans. He had no faculty of looking down into the heart. He knew of only two powers of nature—two moral and social executives; one was power of station, and the other power of money. One day he and Sudham sat in council.

"Upon my soul," said the Dutch scion, "I must have her for my wife, for I have made all my plans with an eye to that event."

"And so she shall be," the baronet returned. "She is crazy now with this pearl diver."

"Why not send him off?"

"Because I fear Bella would go with him."

"But shut her up."

"Yes—I know. But then she would moan and grieve herself away."

"Then look," cried Sudham, energetically, for a very happy thought had struck him. "Why not get him to dive for the great pearl which is sunken close by the Bangale Rocks?"

"But would he do it?" returned the baronet, catching at the idea.

"Make him do it," suggested the merchant. "Promise him the hand of Bella if he succeeds."

"And suppose he does succeed?"

"He cannot. Among these rocks there is a current running so swift and furious that no mortal man can withstand it. Over twenty of the best native divers have lost their lives in pursuit of that pearl. I have seen logs of wood sunk near those rocks, with something attached to them to sink them, and in a few moments the surface of the water would be covered with splinters. I tell you if he dives there he comes not up alive."

"Very well," returned Lakin, after some thought; "if you say so, so be it."

"I do say so, and let it be done as soon as you please."

And so it was settled.

This pearl, after which Allan was to be requested to dive, was one which had been taken some years before on a bank not far from the rocks. Three divers were out, and all three of them were under water together, when an oyster of extraordinary size was seen. It was brought up and opened, and within was found a pearl as large as a robin's egg. As the boat was nearing the shore, a dispute arose among the divers as to who should receive pay for the pearl. From words they passed to blows, and in the struggle the oyster was lost overboard. It sank near the rocks, and as the oyster was dead, it could not have moved away by any volition of its own.

"No, no, no!" cried Bella, after Allan had informed her of the ordeal her father had given him to pass. "You shall not do this. O, all who have tried it have died!"

"But it must be so," returned the youth, calmly and firmly. "Your father has given me his solemn word, in presence of the councillor, Sudham, that if I bring him up the pearl I shall have your hand. If I die, then so let it be; but I feel that I shall not. Last night I had the most pleasant and promising dreams, and I have not a single fear in the prospect. Think: If I succeed—thou art mine forevermore. O, we will not look beyond this! And listen: I think I hold a secret which none of the divers have fairly considered. They have always taken the time of the whole ebb of the tide, thinking that the water would be more still then; but I am sure that the most quiet time at the bottom is after the tide has begun to come in. At the ebb, there is surely a mighty current whirling around those rocks, induced by some subterranean channel; but when the tide has turned, and been half an hour on the flood, I think the water is more calm below, though it surges so furiously at the surface. But do not dissuade me. I know the undertaking is perilous; but what is my love for thee, if I would not risk my life to gain it?"

A vast crowd were collected about the shore opposite the Bangale Rocks. The story of the strange trial which was to come off had become known among the people, and they had assembled to witness it. The chief magistrate was there, and other magistrates of that section. Bella was there with her father, and she was pale and trembling.

The hour had come—the moment of the clear ebb—but the pearl diver was not yet present. Nearly half an hour passed away, and the people began to imagine that he would not come. But just as the murmur was becoming general, a boat appeared, coming around a distant point, in which were three men. One of them was Allan Wilton. He stood in the bows of the boat, and his bearing was firm and sure. He was dressed in a close-fitting garb of oiled silk, with a simple skirt of silk about his loins which reached half way to his knees.

At length the boat stopped, and there was a hushed stillness upon the shore. The water was in wild commotion, and the surges lashed madly among the rocks.

"O, he shall not dive!" gasped Bella, clasping her hands in agony. But her father bade her be still.

Four stout oarsmen rowed the boat to the spot where the youth wished to stop, and there they held it. He did not reach the place where the water hissed and boiled, but stopped at some distance from it. A few moments the light bark trembled close by the mighty caldron, and then the youth stood upon the bows. He cast one glance upon the fair form that now leaned upon the baronet for support, and then he closed his hands above his head, and prepared to dive. There was a low murmur upon the shore, like the rumbling of a distant storm, and every eye was eagerly fixed upon that noble form. In a moment more, the diver left the bow of the boat, his body vibrated an instant in the air, and on the next the troubled waters had closed over it.

Bella Lakin stood with hands firmly clasped, her eyes fixed with a wild, vacant stare upon the spot where the youth had gone down, while every muscle and nerve in her frame seemed fixed as marble.

The minutes passed—one—two—three—four—five—and there was a quiver in Bella's frame, and her hands worked nervously upon her bosom. The color now left her lips, and a more deathly hue overspread her countenance.

But look! There comes a shadow upon the surface of the water—the element breaks, and a human form arises. It is the pearl diver! He shakes his head smartly, and then strikes quickly out, with one hand firmly closed. But he goes not towards the boat. He turns his head to the shore, and his strokes are long and stout.

Bella started eagerly forward, and then sank back again. Her lips moved, and an earnest prayer of thanksgiving went up to God!

The pearl diver landed, and walked proudly up to where the baronet stood.

"Sir John," he said, "your long-sought prize is gained, and so is mine. Here is the pearl!"

He extended his hand as he spoke, and in it was one shell of the huge oyster. A filmy, muscular substance still adhered to the shell, and in the midst of it was the massive pearl!

"It is not the one!" uttered Condor Sudham.

"No—it cannot be!" responded the baronet.

"Let me see!" shouted an old diver, working his way through the crowd. "I am the one who first found it, and I know it well, for I not only opened the shell and thus killed the oyster, but I measured the pearl. Ha! 'tis the one—the very one! and here is where I notched the shell in opening it. Gentlemen, this is the pearl!"

"Sir John," now spoke the chief magistrate, who had stood close by the baronet, "you cannot retract. By my soul, he must be a wretch indeed who could snatch reward from such devoted love and matchless daring."

"Ay, ay!" shouted a hundred tongues.

"It must be the pearl," the baronet uttered. He looked up as he spoke, and found that his child was already clasped within her lover's embrace, and that upon his bosom she was weeping in frantic joy. He dared say no more.

Condor Sudham cast one look of intense chagrin on the happy couple, and then turned away.

Within a week, Allan Wilton held Bella to his bosom, and she was his for life; and within the next week he gained permission to fish for pearls during one year in any place which was not yet let out. He engaged his divers, and went out to the place of which he had once spoken to Bella, and there he went at work. People wondered at the vast supply of pearls he gained, and great effort was made to buy him off. But he maintained his exclusive right for the season, and at the expiration of that time, he stood second only to Sir John in wealth among all the men of the country. But this was only secondary in his life-cup. That one prize, which he gained, when he went down amid the mad waters of the Bangale, was the brightest jewel in his crown of life—the "pearl of great price!"

ILL LUCK.

A little bad luck is beneficial now and then. If Patrick Henry had not failed in the grocery business, it is not at all probable that he would ever have been heard of as an orator. He might have become celebrated, but it would not have been from his eloquence, but the great wealth he acquired by a speculation in bar soap and axe-handles. Roger Sherman became a signer of the Declaration of Independence for no other reason than that he could not make a living at shoemaking. He cut his bristles and tasked his "all" on the "rights of man." The consequence was the same individual who found it "bootless" to make shoes, in a few years became a living power in our Revolution.—Child's Magazine.

MEMORIES OF THE HEART.

BY WINNY WOODBINE.

I sit in the deepening twilight,
While the stars twinkle faint in the sky,
And sadly repeat thy name over,
When I think that none others are nigh.
Then memory with magical power,
Brings back to my weary-worn heart,
Those eyes when so strangely we met,
So happily met—but to part.

Dost remember the clasp of the hands,
That spoke in a language so sweet;
And the glances that thrilled our hearts through,
When our eyes in confusion would meet?
And the low-breathed tones of thy voice—
As it whispered sweet words in mine ear—
'Tis brought by bright memory all,
Till again its soft music I hear.

'Tis many long days since we parted,
And blossoms have faded and died;
Now Spring, with her birds and her flowers,
Is roaming again the hill-side.

When the Summer, in all its bright beauty,
And its soft, dreamy hours, shall come—
We will meet 'neath the blue-beaming skies,
And ne'er again far shalt thou roam.

LAYING IN THE WINTER'S COAL.

BY EMMA CARRA.

MR. GRIMMOND was a coal dealer, and had been so long engaged in that business, that from his profits he had built him a fine house and furnished it not only with useful furniture, but with luxurious adornments. And he had bought more land, too, near where the sea washed up, heavily freighted with ships bearing for him the ebony minerals that his surplus money had purchased. And then callous hands eased the noble vessels from their burdens, and stored away the shining treasures in the spacious yard till winter should come. Those who, like himself had plenty of money, came early and bore away what seemed to the poor man a mighty bulk, and he wondered, as he heard the grating of the shovel, how his rich neighbor could consume so much in one season. And then he went on his way musing and resolving that now while coal was cheap, he would reserve enough from his wages the next month to purchase one ton, and the next month he would purchase another, and so on until when the price of coal began to increase, he would have plenty in his cellar to last him until the warm sun would heat his little parlor sufficiently, and his family would need no fire except to cook their plain meals. At the end of the month, when his employer handed him his thirty-six dollars, in payment for his month's services, George Manton told him his intention and Mr. Eldredge encouraged him to do so, saying:

"If poor people could only realize what an advantage it would be to purchase coal in summer, and their summer goods in winter, availing themselves of the seasons when they are selling cheap, they certainly would, I think, make greater efforts to do so."

And then Mr. Manton left the shop, and as he passed the coal yard on his way home, he thought he would just step in and tell Mr. Grimmond that he would engage three tons of coal at the present price, and one ton might be delivered at his house the last Saturday in every month until he received the complement.

"That is right, Mr. Manton," said Mr. Grimmond. "I like to hear a mechanic talk that way—it shows that he intends to get along in the world and be somebody;" and then he waited a moment as if expecting that his customer would say something more, but as he did not, he added: "I suppose you pay before the coal is taken out of the yard?"

"Certainly, Mr. Grimmond. I never ask any man to trust me, nor ever will while I have health to provide for my family." And the noble-hearted mechanic colored, while the expression of his face told, though mutely, that the inner man was fair, though the covering might be coarse and his purse light.

Mr. Grimmond read the thoughts depicted, and fearing he might lose a customer, said blandly:

"Of course, Mr. Manton, I know you will pay me. Everybody says you are an honest man; and besides, haven't you bought all the coal you have used for four or five years of me? and you don't owe me a cent now. So when you get ready to lay in your winter's coal, just come to me and I will do better by you than any other man in the city."

Mr. Manton tried to forget the remark about paying and think only of the latter fine speech, and then after promising he would call at the appointed time, left the yard and took his way homeward.

It was a neat little cottage standing in a shady street that Mr. Manton with his wife and three children occupied one half of, and now as he stepped within the threshold and saw all look so neat and orderly—the children with clean faces and happy voices welcoming him, the table spread with wholesome and tempting viands for his comfort, he felt that his hard earned money was judiciously spent; then crowding all three of his little juveniles into his lap, he began to sing, with a contented air, "home, sweet home," until his Julia made her appearance from another room and finished the arrangements for tea.

"I am going to get in my winter's coal this summer, while it is cheap," said Mr. Manton to his wife, as they seated themselves at the table.

"Are you, dear?"

"Yes I am, for I do hate to be always running after coal in the winter, getting a half or a quarter of a ton at a time, and besides, it costs almost twice as much."

"So it does, husband, and I am glad that you have concluded to do so. But how much do you intend to get?"

"Well, three tons certain, perhaps more. And so, Julia, you will try to economise all you can, wont you?"

And then as his wife answered "yes," with a smile that seemed to feel what she said, he commenced sipping his well-steeped tea and chatting about the new house he and his fellow-workmen were building, and then described the nice little cottage he would like to build for himself one of these days, as soon as he was able. Then the wife, with mock gravity, described how she would like to furnish it; and finally, the children, who had listened very patiently to their parents, archly added that they supposed after the new house was built, and all those nice things in it, that they should have as fine clothes as Mr. Stewart's children and Mr. Eaton's.

Mr. Manton glanced across the table at his wife, and then remarked, pleasantly:

"How easy it would be to rise in the world, if success depended on imagination alone."

And nothing more was said or thought about the coal, until the supper was ended, the daily paper read, and the children all soundly sleeping. And then as Mr. and Mrs. Manton sat by the open window chatting, with the wick of the shaded lamp picked low, the husband tossed his well filled purse into his wife's lap, observing:

"Now, Julia, let us see how prudent we can be, and save up something so we shan't be so troubled to get along next winter as we were last; and in the mean time, I will be looking out for a better chance."

"I will," said the wife, as she pressed her finger on the clasp and took out the notes; and then added: "It is so pleasant, let us take a walk up to Mr. Bond's and pay our rent to-night. You know it is due to-morrow, and he will be here in good season in the morning, if we don't carry it to him to-night."

"I am willing, my dear," said the husband; and then he drew together the blinds, and picked up the wick of the lamp that he might smooth his hair a little and arrange his dress, preparatory to the walk. Mrs. Manton placed in the bureau all the money except ten dollars that were reserved for the landlord, and then went and leaned over the little trundle-bed to make sure that the children were really asleep, so that they might not miss her.

"I will be ready in a moment, George," she said, as she stepped to the foot of the front stairs and warned Mrs. Crane that she would be out for a short time, asking her if she would be so kind as to speak to the children if they awoke.

The accommodating neighbor answered "yes," and the mechanic and his wife proceeded towards the home of the wealthy Mr. Bond. It was a refreshing evening, and Mr. Manton and his wife enjoyed the cool breeze as it went gently past, for they had both been busily toiling during the day, which had been sultry in the extreme. Together they watched the moon, as it seemed to dance behind a silvery cloud, and then lazily creep forward like a tired ball-room belle. They spoke of their long walks together ere children clustered around them and shared the profits of their toil; but they did not regret that they owned those household jewels, for it was sweet to labor for those they loved. And thus with pleasant words and thoughts they went on until they ascended the granite steps that led to the hall door of their landlord. A gentle ring, and they were ushered into a small back sitting-room to await the pleasure of the moneyed man, as he entertained more favored guests.

Half an hour passed, and then Mr. Bond came in and with marked coldness which seemed to say, "you cannot expect familiarity from me," received the money nearly due and then informed them that he let the house altogether too cheap, and that he should have to raise another dollar in the month. When Mr. and Mrs. Manton humbly expostulated with him, saying the present rent was a large sum to extract from thirty-six dollars a month, he answered with an independent air that folks must not aspire to live in any better house than they could afford to pay for. Mr. and Mrs. Manton were therefore left to decide being turned from the little cottage, or wrenching another dollar from their limited number. The walk from the brick mansion was not so pleasant as the walk to it, but Julia tried to appear as though she thought but little of the additional expense, it was so trifling. And when her husband suggested that the amount added would at the end of the year pay for two of the tons of coal he intended to buy, she answered pleasantly:

"Well, I will do all my own washing for a year to come, and that will more than save it."

"O no, Julia, that will never do," answered the husband; "for a few visits from the doctor would exceed the twelve dollars a year."

But his objections did not alter the wife's determination to do her washing, though she said no more about it, and soon both retired to forget in sleep that the morrow would dawn but to increase their cares.

When morning came, and Mr. Manton had returned to his labor and the children were gone to school, Mrs. Manton turned the key of the kitchen door and then went to the bureau and took out the remainder of the money that her husband had given her the previous evening, that she might deliberately form her plans for spending it to the best advantage.

"Twenty-six dollars left," she repeated, musingly, and then added: "The flour barrel is empty—I wish I could buy a barrel of flour. But I must not, for that would leave me only fourteen dollars to meet every other expense for a month, and George must have meat once a day, at least, and other things nourishing, for he has to work very hard; so I will buy flour by the bag until we get the coal. A quarter bag will be three dollars, then I shall have twenty-three left; but O dear! we need butter and sugar and molasses, for I have to buy things in such small quantities that it seems as if I am out almost every day. And then there are the two girls—they must each have a pair of new shoes and their bonnets from the milliners, or they will have to stay from Sabbath school on Sunday. And I ought to get me some kind of a cape, for my shawl is too shabby to wear and it is too warm now. And poor George ought to have a thin hat; I know that heavy hat he wears is more than half the cause of the headaches he complains of." And the perplexed Mrs. Manton gave a deep sigh, as the actual wants of the family crowded so thick upon her, and she looked at the small sum in her lap to meet them. That little roll of bills was the magic power that was to supply all their necessities for thirty days—fuel, food, lights, clothing, etc.

Mrs. Manton mused long, and the longer she sat, the more desponding became her features, for she could see no door to escape. At length, she looked at the little time-piece on the mantel and she saw that the morning was far advanced; so she arose and replaced the money, for the present, and resumed her necessary and seldom changing round of duties that always brought comfort to her family, and made her industrious husband feel that the fruits of his labor were spent advantageously. Sunday came, and the children were furnished with the desired articles that they might attend the Sabbath school, but Mrs. Manton looked at the faded shawl and stayed within. And her husband bore her company, for his coat was a little threadbare, and his hat of last year's fashion. But when the evening came, and the sun had retired as if to avoid a conflagration of the earth, the husband and wife, after the children were sleeping, went out and enjoyed a pleasant walk, and then attended the short evening conference at the church.

And so the month passed away. Mrs. Manton made no complaint of her limited income, for she knew it was the best her husband could do for the present, and she tried to make the star of hope illumine the future. Mr. Manton asked no questions; he knew that he had given his wife all that he had, and she had made him comfortable. But he did not know how carefully the best was always kept for him, nor why the children were coaxed to wait till father was done before they made a meal of the fragments.

The month passed away, and Mr. Manton once more returned with his month's wages, and handed to his wife all except six dollars—the payment for a ton of coal. The bin was empty, and Mrs. Manton tried to feel pleased that they were going to have so much at once, but then when the rent was paid, she would have but nineteen dollars to support a family of five again for thirty days. Every one of the family needed shoes; the children must have some, or they would have to take their best ones for every day, and they were thin and of so cheap a make that they would not last any length of time for common wear. Her husband had had his boots patched and the ribs sewed, until the sums had nearly reached the cost of a new pair. When he alluded to his worn boots, she hadn't the courage to tell him how ill they could afford three or four dollars to purchase him a pair; so he was supplied with the necessary articles, and the children wore their best, and Mrs. Manton wore rubbers when she went out to the grocery or market.

But with all Mrs. Manton's studied economy, the remaining sixteen dollars would not make them all comfortable during the month, and she knew that if she got in debt, it would be almost impossible to pay; so when the two pounds of steak were cooked for dinner, Mr. Manton ate heartily, and then the children partook of the remainder, while a cup of tea and a slice of bread was all that went to nourish the wife who was so overburdened with care and poverty. The husband noticed his wife's increasing pale ness, but he did not realize the cause, for he generally ate his meals hurriedly at noon, nor did he know how hard she worked during his absence. Mrs. Manton thought she would try to obtain a cheaper house, but when she went out to look, she found that cheap tenements were generally situated in those neighborhoods where she would not be willing that her children should see the examples set. And so the summer wore away, and there was no more coal bought, for there had been a doctor's bill to pay, and the insatiate speculator had drained the poor man's purse to the last farthing that he might still add to his ill got thousands. He cared not how—it mattered not if his path were wet by the widow's tears; gold, gold, was still his cry—for he had set himself up a god.

The winds of winter began to moan and shriek, and the children crushed the crisp snow beneath their feet on their way to school. The mechanic and his family had now to leave their cottage home, for the landlord had told them to leave immediately, or settle up the two months' arrears. In vain was the plea of Mr. Manton that his wife and infant boy had exhausted all, save what had gone for food, in being restored to health, and now he only asked for time. "Move out, or pay immediately," was still the answer, "for there are plenty who would be glad to hire the rooms and pay in advance." The pale wife and feeble boy were therefore removed to three rooms in a narrow alley, for the husband was penniless now, and all others wanted pay in advance. But the doctor had said that those he loved would soon be well again, and Mr. Manton began to hope, and when their little home was arranged, he thought he might work steadily now.

But his trials were not over yet, for when he went back to the shop, he learned from his employer that the severity of the weather was such that he had concluded to suspend work and close his shop for a few weeks. The young mechanic turned away, and crept into an obscure corner of the yard and wept like a child. Tears gave temporary relief to a heart that seemed full almost to bursting; so after he had sat and pondered long, he once more sought the street. But he did not turn his steps in the direction of his home, for how could he go there, where so much was needed, and tell them that his workshop was closed! So up and down the streets he travelled in search of work, calling at the various shops, and gladly would he now have worked even for half of what he saw some others no more capable receiving; but he scorned, although in want, to injure those who labored.

At the close of the day, he returned once more to their home. He had expected to find his Julia on their faded lounge in the corner, with her head pressing the pillow. But in this he was happily disappointed, for she felt much better to-day, and was neatly dressed. With the aid of little Jenny and the twenty-five cents he had left her in the morning, she had got a comfortable supper on the table and a bright fire glowing in the stove. And now when she heard his footstep on the stairs, she met him at the door, while the children gathered around and the convalescent little Charley put up his lips for a kiss, saying: "All well now, papa;" and then looking towards the table, added, "got a good supper, too."

Mr. Manton pressed his wife to his bosom, and gave a kiss all round to the children, and then fairly danced for joy, while a good-natured under-tenant put her head in at the door, and laughingly inquired if they were moving out, that occasioned the noise.

"O, no," said the husband to their favorite neighbor; "but I expected to find my wife and Charley sick, and no fire nor supper, but instead of that I found—look here;" and he pointed to his tidy-looking Julia and the supper on the table.

For the next hour, Mr. Manton forgot but that his purse was full, or that he had no place engaged in which to labor on the morrow. But the next day came, and the last hodful of coal was turned on the fire.

"Where shall I get more?" said the husband, despondingly; for he had now told his wife of the closing of the shop.

"O, don't fret, George," said his wife, coaxingly. "Winter won't last forever, and we are as well off as some of our neighbors. There will be some way provided, for God will take care of those who make an effort to help themselves." And then she added: "Go ask Mr. Grimmond to trust us for a ton of coal. I don't believe he will refuse you, for you have always bought of him and paid him punctually."

"I know I have, dear, and if I didn't need a favor, I should never be afraid to ask one from Mr. Grimmond. But he is a hard-hearted man, Julia, and has but little pity for the poor." And he sat a few moments thoughtfully looking into his wife's face till she urged him again, and then he consented, feeling that it was his only alternative. If he had credit he must get in debt; so he took his hat and went out.

Mr. Grimmond was sitting in his counting-room when Mr. Manton opened the door. Everything within bespoke ease and plenty. A good fire was burning in the stove, an unbroken bunch of superior cigars lay on the table, and when the young mechanic entered, the coal-dealer just glanced up from his newspaper, gave a nod and resumed his reading. George uninvited passed on towards the stove, wishing that he had not come in, and nothing but a mental vision of home prevented him from leaving immediately. At length Mr. Grimmond laid down his paper, and with a consequential air inquired the business of his visitor.

Mr. Manton in a few words stated that he should be out of work for a few weeks, that his wife and youngest child had been sick for a long time, and his means were all exhausted, so that he wished to get a ton of coal and he would pay him the first thing when he commenced work again.

"The same old story," said the dealer, lighting a cigar. "Why, Mr. Manton, I might give away every ton of coal I have got in my yard if I would only take promises for pay."

"I never asked you to trust me before," said Mr. Manton, trying to swallow the choking sensation in his throat, and still thinking of the helpless ones at home.

"Nor needn't have asked me now, if you hadn't lied so to me last summer."

"Lied!" repeated Mr. Manton, abstractedly, as if his memory were trying to recall the past.

"Yes, lied. Didn't you promise to buy a ton of coal every month until your winter's store was harvested? And you bought one ton and that was the last of it."

"But O, Mr. Grimmond, if you knew how hard I tried to save from my wages that amount and could not, you would not blame me. I think now the privations that my family have endured, while my earnings went to enrich my landlord and—" You he would have added, but in spite of insult, he still wished, for his family's sake, to get trusted; so he continued: "Speculators have done a great deal towards producing the illness of my wife and child."

"The same old story," said the coal-dealer, taking up his paper and pretending to be busy with its columns: "I can't trust you. A man that will lie once, will again. Poor folks ought to look out for these things in the summer;" and he leaned back in his chair and went on with his reading.

The blood arose to the temples of the young mechanic, but the mild words of his patient wife rang in his ear—"there will be some way provided," and in silence he turned and went out. As he came once more into the broad street, he involuntarily cast his eye across the river to the strong stone building with its grated windows, and he murmured inaudibly: "What wonder that so many at night are tossing so uneasily there on their hard narrow beds, when wealth is so unequally divided!" And then there came strange thoughts through his brain—thoughts to which he would not have dared to give utterance—of deeds that have often brought the wherewith to prolong a life made more wretched by the prolonging.

Mr. Manton did not go directly home. How could he? for he could be the bearer of nothing that was pleasant; and he thought, too, that his wife, if he were not there, would borrow coal of a neighbor, and so he went about to look for work again. But being as unsuccessful as on the preceding day, he turned homeward when it began to grow dark. He went quietly up the worn stairs that led to his apartment, and stood fearing to open the door, lest he might find the inmates in a worse state than he had left them. The fire might be out, and he had left nothing at home to buy food; so he listened to see if he could learn anything of their condition, but his heart sank within him as he heard no sound. Presently the silence was broken by a cry from Charley, and then Jenny said in a loud voice:

"Now we can make a noise, mother, for Charley is awake."

And then they began an infantile concert, the mother joining and seemingly the happiest of the number. "What a happy disposition," thought Manton, "to sing in the midst of such poverty!" And then he opened the door a little way and peeped in. Mr. Manton thought of witchcraft and all the incredibles that he had ever read of, as the scene presented itself to his view. Their little parlor kitchen was as warm as a July sun could have made it, his wife and children were all dressed clean, with smiling faces, and on the table was spread a supper of warm biscuit, cakes, etc. Mr. Manton threw the door open wider, and advanced like one bewildered.

"That was beautiful coal that Mr. Grimmond sent," said Julia. "Didn't I tell you he would trust you? and he has, not only with one ton, but I know there are two. And see what beautiful biscuit that flour makes—but where did you get money to buy so many things? A barrel of flour, besides butter and sugar and tea. And what made you send me that twenty-five dollars? Why didn't you come and bring it and tell me who lent it to you?"

Mr. Manton stood perfectly still in the centre of the room, looking first at one and then at another of the happy group.

"Julia," he at length said, "what do you mean? Are you crazy, or am I dreaming?"

"Neither," said the wife, taking from her pocket a purse and drawing out twenty-five dollars in bills. "There," said she, "didn't you send that home?"

"No, Julia, I know nothing about it."

And then the wife told him that a few hours after he went away, there was brought to the door for them two tons of coal, and as night approached, she got a man to put it into the cellar. And soon after the coal was brought, Mr. Bligh had brought them a barrel of flour, a firkin of butter, and other groceries; and when she questioned him about it, he only smiled and said all was paid for. And a boy had brought her a letter containing twenty-five dollars.

Mr. Manton took the note which his wife thought he had written and sent to her because he could not return immediately, and he read: "Please accept the amount enclosed, and, as I know you will, lay it out to the best advantage." No name was signed, and Mr. Manton again seized his hat and went out to make inquiries of Mr. Bligh and Mr. Grimmond; but he learned nothing there, for the former only smiled and told him if he lacked again to call on him, and the latter was surly, saying he knew nothing about it. But there was no more suffering in Mr. Manton's family that winter. When the snow began to disappear, Mr. Manton told his old employer that he could not afford to work any longer for previous prices, as it was his intention to make a greater effort than ever before to make his income larger.

"Well," said Mr. Eldredge, "I am getting tired of so much care, and I should like to get a good active partner. I will furnish capital—how would you like the chance?"

Need we say it was eagerly accepted by the other, whose joy knew no bounds at this sudden favor of fortune. Mr. Manton seemed to possess the entire confidence of his partner, who supplied him liberally with money, while he with untiring energy contracted and built, hired and paid from the profits of his accurate calculations a small army of men. Mr. Grimmond daily passed through Greenborough Street on his way from his residence to his counting-room, and felt quite chagrined to observe one day a large wagon of coal unloading before a pleasant house, with the name of Manton on the door plate. He felt that one of his own wagons might have been standing there, had he conducted kindly towards the young mechanic, and he hastened on lest any of the bystanders should perceive his changing color.

One day, Mr. Eldredge and his partner were alone in the shop, when the former inquired of the latter:

"George, did you not have a pretty hard time, last winter?"

"God forbid that I should ever see another such," he answered.

"And did not some one assist you?"

"There did. And I have tried a great many times to find out who it was, but cannot."

Mr. Eldredge took a slip of paper from his pocket-book, and handed it to the other. It was a receipted bill for two tons of coal. And then he handed another bill for flour and other groceries. Mr. Manton stood for a moment so overcome, that he could make no remark; then recovering, he exclaimed:

"O, sir, was it you that did all that? I can never thank you enough, nor repay such extreme kindness, though I should live twice the appointed time of man. But how came you to know of my necessities?"

"I was in the little entry that led to Mr. Grimmond's office, while you and he were talking. I heard your voice and then I heard his insulting answers; so I stepped behind some lumber till you were gone, and then I went in and gave him a piece of my mind. After that, I went down and bought the coal of Mr. Fenneck, for I knew you were an honest man. But I thought I would say nothing about it, for you know I am an odd sort of a man and have a way of my own, generally."

Mr. Manton proved a valuable partner to Mr. Eldredge, and in a few years lived in a house of which he himself was landlord.

TEN THOUSAND BLESSINGS.

A correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette states that a clergyman in Pittsburgh, Pa., lately married a lady with whom he received the substantial dowry of ten thousand dollars, and a fair prospect for more. Shortly afterward, while occupying the pulpit, he gave out a hymn, read the first four verses, and was proceeding to read the fifth, commencing:

"Forever let my grateful heart," when he hesitated, balked, and exclaimed, "Ahem! The choir will omit the fifth verse," and sat down. The congregation, attracted by his apparent confusion, read the verse for themselves, and smiled almost audibly as they read

"Forever let my grateful heart
His boundless grace adore,
Which gives ten thousand blessings now,
And bids me hope for more."

The words of a language are like the pieces of a child's dissected picture; and eloquence, and poetry, and philosophy are the pictures made by putting them together; but somehow, it is hard to fit the words into their proper places.

SHE NEVER WILL SAY THAT SHE DON'T!

BY JAMES LYNDENBERG.

She never has said that she loved me,
 Yet I often have thought I did spy
 Some sweet little dewy emotion
 Beam on me from out her blue eye:
 But still, if I ask her to love me,
 She coquettely says, "Well—I won't!"
 And yet if I beg her "Be serious,"
 She never will say that she don't!

I have thought, too, in some foolish moments,
 When my brain and my heart were both one,
 That her smile was the least bit the sweeter,
 When on me like a sunbeam it shone;
 And I've caught her, at least once, I'm certain,
 Gaze on me more steadfast than wont,
 And yet she won't promise to love me—
 But, never will say that she don't.

'Tis a pickle I'm in, now that's certain—
 Do I love her? O ask if the flower
 Which turns to the sunbeam of morning,
 Loves warmth in that beautiful hour!
 And I pray, as my life-hope is drinking
 Its future from love's dewy font,
 That my Mary, whenever she answers,
 She never will say that she don't!

MISS LINSCOMBE'S APPRENTICES.

BY MARY L. SUMNER.

"Don't fail me, Miss Linscombe," said a loud, imperious voice, as the speaker turned towards the door of Miss Linscombe, the fashionable dress-maker at Salisbury. "Don't fail me; if you do, I will never bring a dress to this establishment again."

"Depend on me, Miss Campbell. Nothing shall prevent you from having it."

"There is a great deal depending on the success of this dress," said a young lady who accompanied Miss Campbell; "for which you will be held personally responsible."

Miss Linscombe laughed a little, weak laugh, as if she wanted to appear to understand the young lady's meaning, but could not.

She reiterated her promise and the visitors departed. Miss Linscombe's plausible and polite manner departed, too, for her next words were harsh and severe.

"Miss Butler," she called out to a young woman who was just tying on her bonnet to go to her dinner, "be back without fail, in twenty-five minutes. That is all the time I can spare you to-day. Immediately on your return you will put on these flounces; and I beg you will spend no idle time. Miss Campbell's dress must be sent home at half-past five o'clock, precisely. Any delay on your part, I shall highly resent."

The girl made no answer, but sighed heavily. She had already staid at the workroom nearly the whole of two nights, and it had taxed her feeble frame too much. She was languid, weak, dispirited.

She went home to her miserable boarding-house, sat down to an unwholesome, half-cooked meal, and hastened back to her task. Other charges were given her respecting Miss Campbell's dress, but they fell upon deaf ears, for on her way back she had seen Harry Seaton, and he had asked her to go to the theatre with him that evening. It had changed the whole current of her life at once; that life, which, in the morning had seemed so utterly without sunshine. Miss Linscombe's dull, dreary room, with its hangings of red, blue and green dress-patterns, suspended on lines stretched across from window to window; the shabby court which it overlooked, and the bits of cloth and linings, which lay scattered round, making it look like Rag Fair; all looked duller and drearier, and shabbier when she returned, than it ever had done before. There was another scene, into which her imagination was fast entering. Already, she saw the lights, the fine dresses, and the beautiful scenery, and nodded her head to imaginary music.

"Not that way, Miss Butler!" screamed out Miss Linscombe, with a very red face, and a look which seemed expressly invented by nature, for a head mantua-maker; "stitch it after this fashion," and Miss Butler unpicked her work, and began again with as little success as before. Miss Linscombe grew angry. She retaliated upon the girl, all the harsh and unlady-like things which Miss Campbell had said to her, while trying on the rich dress that morning; the memory of which rankled in her heart. Strange, that such things do not teach softness and charity to others!

Miss Linscombe's sharp voice did not affect Jane Butler as it usually did. She was away in an ideal world of her own, of which Harry Seaton was the figure in the fore ground, and the stage people in the back. She was listlessly picking at the garment, when one of her companions touched her arm.

"Jane," said she, "mind what you are doing, or you will be ruined. Miss Linscombe's eye is upon you."

The girl started, and thanked her with a look, while she drew her work nearer, and tried to put more interest into her manner. She could do so as long as Miss Carter kept talking, but when she ceased, Jane went back to her mimic world.

Miss Linscombe went out, and Miss Carter offered to help her, but Jane would not permit a friend to get into disgrace for her sake, so she hurried her frounces on, in a way highly discreditable to her usual neat work. Everything seemed to conspire against the dress being finished. Needles broke, silk twisted and knotted, and the bias edge of the frounce drew, and was tortured back again into something like regularity; and before all was straight again, four o'clock struck! An hour and a half to finish what was scarcely begun, and the thought of Miss Linscombe's face when she should come in, and find it unfinished! Jane grew nervous, in spite of the stage floor that was before her eyes. Five! and Miss Linscombe came in, with a face pale with rage, when she saw the small progress Jane had made.

"Hand it over to Miss Carter," she said, "and do you take these skirts and finish them for the Misses Stearns."

Three skirts! Jane knew that the three would occupy her until nine or ten o'clock, and so did her employer, who had determined to punish her. Miss Carter took the work, and her more experienced hands performed it, but not until six. She, too, received a rebuff, which Jane wept over, although she had not done so for her own.

Harry had promised to call for her at seven. It was nearly that, and she had not yet dressed. She was desperate. "Miss Linscombe," she said, "cannot I be excused for this one evening? I promise to do better in future, if you will kindly let me off now. It is so very, very important for me to be at home now," looking at the clock which pointed to nearly seven. Miss Carter joined in the request, offering to stay and work for her; and so did a large, indolent-looking girl, whose work Jane had one day finished for her.

No, Miss Linscombe was obdurate, although the girls all showed themselves indignant at her refusal. But fortune sometimes favors us when we least expect it, and so it now did Jane. Across the wide entry which ran between the rooms, there was a door exactly opposite Miss Linscombe's apartment, from which often issued the dulcet tones of a flute. Sometimes the door was open, and at such times, Miss Linscombe, with an air of offended delicacy, would charge her young ladies not to look across. They sometimes wondered why she herself lingered so long in the hall, after they had heard her well-known footstep on the stairs; but up to this time, none of them had seen the flute-player except Miss Carter. What was their surprise, as well as Miss Linscombe's, to see him enter, flute in hand, and addressing himself to the "principal," request to give her and the other ladies a little music.

Jane's tearful eyes at this moment caught the glance of her employer, and she looked so beautiful through her tears, and Miss Carter so sympathizing, that she said in her blandest tones, "Young ladies, Miss Carter and Miss Butler have leave to go now," and turned to the gentleman once more, begging him to be seated, and expressing her delight in the music which they had already heard and admired. Miss Linscombe absolutely forgot that Miss Campbell's dress was not yet carried away, until Miss Carter offered to take it home.

"True," said she, with one of her little laughs, "it was engaged at half-past five; but really, she knew that it was impossible, and so did I."

Jane's cheek crimsoned with anger, for she well knew that she could easily have performed the work, had she not been so hurried and excited. She thought it would have been more honest in Miss Linscombe, to say so at once. That lady seemed now as eager to get rid of her two work-women, as she had been to detain them; but that was before Mr. Walker's entrance. On his part, he looked disappointed, when Maria Carter turned to leave the room; but he could not retreat from his own offer, to play for Miss Linscombe.

As the girls emerged from the close, hot room, where, with less than a half hour's respite, they had remained since seven in the morning, both gave a long sigh of relief. They parted, and Jane fairly ran home, which she reached at the same moment in which Harry rung the bell.

"One moment, Harry," she began, and then thinking of Miss Linscombe's premises, which she had just been condemning, "no, fifteen minutes, and I will be ready."

She came down at the appointed moment, and Harry, who thought her pretty before, was startled at her beauty now.

Her soft, silky hair was drawn up in a large knot at the back of the head, and disposed in large bands at the sides; showing the truly elegant form of her head. A single scarlet geranium was fastened in her braids. Her dress was simple, but beautifully made; and her gloves, fan and handkerchief were all of a kind denoting taste in the wearer, yet indicative of simplicity, and even of economy in the materials.

She was gratified by Harry's evident admiration; and her happiness was untouched by any thought of her afternoon's vexation. Miss Linscombe and her room faded into nothing, as she entered the brilliant scene; nor did she think of them again, until she looked up and met the curious, prying eyes of Miss Campbell, and heard her loud and disagreeable voice, evidently talking of her and Harry. The lady's companion, an inferior-looking man, whom she kept calling "Cousin James," lifted his lorgnette in the direction to which she pointed, and after a long stare, he whispered long and loud, in words, where Jane distinctly heard her own name, in connection with "my dress-maker's girl."

Miss Campbell wore the new dress. She was dressed, therefore, magnificently; and the jewels which she displayed were rich and costly. Her hair was profusely decorated, and she sported a fan, bouquet-holder and handkerchief, that would have purchased a small house. She annoyed Jane so much by her close observation of her, that she begged Harry to move a little, where she could hide herself from her view. In vain; that great, unwinking eye found her out, wherever she moved; and Harry told her not to mind it. How could she help it, when she knew that she would acquaint Miss Linscombe, the following day, with the story of one of her girls presuming to go to the theatre? Jane had heard those things talked of too often in the workroom, not to dread it for herself. She could not give herself up to the play, as she wished. Moreover, Miss Campbell seemed to know that she spoiled her pleasure, and to rejoice in so doing.

It was all too true. Miss Campbell had marked her prey, and she was determined to hunt it to the death. She had known Harry Seaton from his childhood—nay, she had spurned his offered love, because she aspired to a richer suitor, who, in turn, spurned hers. Then she tried to lure Harry back again; but he would not be so lured; and from that hour, she had declared war against whoever she might be, that should win his heart.

That she should live to give place to a dress-maker's apprentice! She hadn't dreamed of this; and the very dress which Jane had been so unhappy about, was the one in which Miss Campbell was intending to re-capture her lost lover. She happened to know that he was to be at the theatre this evening, by means of the young lady who had accompanied her to Miss Linscombe's, and whose brother, James Hartley, was the "Cousin James," who attended on her and his sister thither.

Miss Hartley was one of those hangers-on so well described by the name of toady, to Miss Campbell, whom she praised and flattered in a way that any honest person would have scorned. But Cornelia Campbell was bred in the atmosphere of flattery, and she thrived and grew by what she was fed on.

She had, long ago, repented of her folly in giving up Harry Seaton. Her beauty had entangled his boyish heart, and her evident love for him had, for awhile, riveted the chain; but his eyes were soon opened, and he saw her as she truly was—a vain, weak, unprincipled woman, who would sacrifice hearts for a mere show; and in whose word he had not one spark of faith, since she had perjured herself to him for the hope of a new love.

Thence Harry resolved never to become enchained again by one of her set. He would seek a wife among the virtuous and industrious classes. He met Jane Butler, a few days afterwards, as she was carrying home a dress to his sister, was captivated at once, by the sweetness of her face, and the modest dignity of her manner; and, with the perfect approbation of his sister, who despised Cornelia Campbell's duplicity towards her favorite brother, he offered, and was accepted. The few weeks that remained of Jane's engagement with Miss Linscombe, she chose to fulfil; and to save the annoyance of having it talked of in the workroom, it was agreed to keep it private, until she should leave it.

Could Cornelia Campbell have known this, she would have been furious. Her worst suspicions did not point to an engagement; and Jane, who divined her scornful manner, guessed but too well that to-morrow, the affair would be discussed before Miss Linscombe and the others. She shrank painfully from such an exposure of her affairs; and Harry's eloquence was long exerted before he could calm her fears. He suggested that his sister should spend several hours at Miss Linscombe's room the next day, in order to shield Jane from what she so much dreaded; offered to face the arch enemy, as he called Miss Campbell, and stand guard over Jane himself.

They needed not to plan; for before breakfast the next morning, Jane received the following note from Miss Linscombe:

"MISS BUTLER:—I am informed by a friend, whom I can perfectly trust, that you were at the theatre, last evening, with a gentleman of so much higher position in society than yourself, that there can be but one construction put on the affair. I need not say, after this, that it will not be pleasant for us to meet again. I shall not expect you at my rooms, either to-day, or at any other time. F. LINSCOMBE."

"There," said Miss Linscombe, "I trust that matter is settled."

"To my satisfaction it is," said Miss Campbell, who had watched the operation. "She will not be bold enough to cross our paths again, I think. By the way, how is your Mr. Walker, who plays the flute so well?"

Miss Linscombe blushed and fidgeted. Cornelia Campbell was not, surely, going to interfere with Mr. Walker. She took a look around her room to see if the door were shut, and catching a glance at the vacant chair, which was usually occupied by Maria Carter, she suddenly asked where she was. The large, indolent girl whom we noticed before, answered, without the least perceptible change of countenance, "She is gone to be married, ma'am."

"Married! heavens, to whom?"

"To our neighbor, Mr. Walker."

Miss Linscombe's face would have made a study for a painter, at that moment. She had really thought that Mr. Walker was partial to herself; and her astonishment and indignation were inexpressible. Jane had been prevailed on to pass the night with Harry's sister, and had left word at her boarding-house, that she should do so; therefore Miss Linscombe's note had been sent directly to her, by her landlady. She was somewhat frightened when she read it, but Harry and his sister soon comforted her, by offering to settle the matter with Miss Linscombe and all the rest of the world. That evening Miss Linscombe's young ladies received cards from "Mr. and Mrs. Harry Season," with Jane Butler's name in the corner. A few hours previous, they had received similar ones from "Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Walker."

A VEGETARIAN.

An English gentleman dining in Paris, at the table d'hôte, [public table at the hotel,] wishing for some potatoes to eat with his meat, as he had been accustomed to do at home, called to the servant, "Garçon, des pommes de terre, s'il vous plaît," (waiter, some potatoes, if you please.) The dish of potatoes was accordingly brought to him, and taken away when he had helped himself. The same request was repeated to the servant as each successive course of meats was served, until the waiter, having become familiar with the order, brought the potatoes without further request; and thinking that if the gentleman wished potatoes with one dish he would like them with all, continued to bring them to him through the whole dinner, dessert and all, much to the gentleman's annoyance, and the amusement of all who saw it.—Galignani.

HEAVY AND WINDY.

A blacksmith who fancied himself sick, would often tease a neighboring physician to give him relief. The physician knew that he was perfectly well; but being unwilling to offend him, told him that he must be careful of his diet and not eat anything heavy or windy. The blacksmith went off satisfied—but on evolving in his own mind what kind of food was heavy or windy, returned to the doctor, who having lost temper with his patient, said: "Don't you know what things are heavy and windy?"

"No," said the blacksmith.

"Your anvil is heavy and your bellows are windy; don't eat of these, and you will do well."
—Eccentric Anecdotes.

THE TIE.

BY E. P. JAYCOCK.

O, God alone could forge the link
That binds my soul to thee;
Else I could break the magic tie,
And once again be free.
I strive—O how I strive to break
This fetter on my soul;
As well might I the tempest hush,
The boiling sea control.

What agony around the thought
That this must ever be,
Till death with cold and icy hand
Shall come to set me free!
Long years have passed since hope's bright ray
Fled from my youthful breast;
And sad has been my young heart since,
With longings for its rest.

There is a rest for weary souls,
A haven that is calm;
Where over all the wounds of life
Shall flow a healing balm!
And I must bear with patience here,
Though ties should bide or break;
And loose not all the hope of life
For any human sake.

A RECORD OF DARK DEEDS.

BY SYLVANUS COBB, JR.

ANY one who has passed through Bedford on foot, cannot have failed to notice an old building which stands close to the bank of the Ouse, on the south side. It was erected during the reign of Elizabeth, and having been constructed of heavy timber, it has withstood the crumbling touches of time marvellously well. It has two quaint, old gables upon the street, which hang far over the walk, seeming ready at any moment to come tumbling down upon the heads of the pedestrians; and then projecting above the narrow court, which is to the east of the building, are two more gables, exactly corresponding with those in front. There was once an entrance upon the street, but that was closed up during the reign of the second James, since which, the only legitimate means of ingress and egress has been through the wide door-way which opens upon the court beneath the further gable.

Early in the spring of 1764, two women came to hire the house. They were sisters, and gave their names as Roxana and Nancy Rhodope. The former was fifty years of age, and the latter two years older. They were tall, dark-looking beings, with large, bony frames, but with little flesh; and altogether they had an evil, sinister look, which was not calculated to inspire the beholder with any great amount of confidence in their virtue or humanity. However, nothing evil was known of them, and the owner of the house rented it to them for about a tenth part of the sum asked for such a tenement in any other part of the city. They professed to have some little money of their own, meaning to take in washing and sewing as soon as they could obtain it. Several months passed away, but the sisters were never seen to take home any work. They were seldom seen out by daylight, save when they had occasion to buy provisions. At length a third member was added to their household. This was a boy, deaf and dumb, whom they told their landlord they had taken out of charity alone. He was not over sixteen years of age, and perhaps not so old. His body was thin and bent; his legs very crooked; his head large and thick, and his arms so long that when standing erect his fingers' ends reached some inches below his knees. They called his name Jasper Lucan. Besides his peculiar form, there was another thing which drew attention to him; and that was, his movements, or, rather, motions. He moved about like a thing made up of springs. Never walking like other people, but jerking along with a frog-like motion at times, and at others leaping like a cat.

Strange stories began to be circulated about the two sisters. People who lived near, sometimes heard strange noises in the old house at night, and the boatmen upon the river, who could look upon the back windows of the upper story, said that there were often lights in the place all night long. At length these stories became so numerous, and the various surmises so alarming, that the good people in the neighborhood began to fear the old sisters. Governesses and fractious mamas threatened their refractory children that they should be sent to the "Old Sisters;" and the school-boy who would frighten his companion, had only to say: "There come the Rhodopes!" One morning a new cause of alarm turned up. It appeared that about midnight, preceding, the boy, Jasper Lucan, came out from the house and went down to the river, where he threw something into the stream. To do this he stepped upon a stone, and it was his fortune to slip off. The water was deep where he fell in, and had it not been for a boatman who was close by, he would have been drowned; but this boatman pulled him out and set him on shore, and finding that he could get no reply to any of his questions, he brought his lantern to see what was the matter. Having got his light, he found that the boy he had saved was Jasper Lucan, and that his clothes were covered with blood.

The boatman examined him carefully, but he found that he was not wounded in any way. His trousers, which were of coarse duck, were all besmeared with blood, and so were his shirt and hat. But the boy was not detained, for no answers could be gained from him, and then the man had his boat to attend to. Before noon, this piece of news spread over the town, and stories about the old sisters went up in the market accordingly.

Near the old house of the four gables, in a small hut upon the river's bank, lived a poor blind woman named Morris. She had one child, a son, named Luke, about fifteen years old, who managed, by picking up odd jobs, to support himself and his mother. One day Luke Morris was seen going into the house of the old sisters; he remained something over an hour, and then came out. When he reached his own dwelling he found seven persons there, waiting for his return. Immediately upon his entering they surrounded him and began to ask questions concerning his visit to the old house of the hags; but he would give no satisfactory answers. He only smiled when they asked him if the house wasn't all covered with blood; and when they asked him if he had heard any dismal groans, he told them, "Yes, a thousand of them."

"But, Luke—dear boy," urged his blind mother, "you mustn't go to the dreadful place. They'll kill you and cut you up."

"Yes, Luke," added an old woman who lived near, "you will be murdered and cut all up, just as sure as the world! Don't you go a nigh 'em. They only git ye in there so as to have ye jest when they want ye."

Luke informed the sympathizing friends, that one of the women—Roxana—had made a proposition to him to that very end, offering to support his mother through life, if he would allow them to cut him up to make meat pies of.

The hearers received this in good faith, and their horror was not to be expressed in words, though some of them attempted it. Had they been informed that the old sisters ate three roasted aldermen for breakfast, they would have believed it. However, the visitors departed at length, and then Luke told his mother the sisters had hired him to work for them occasionally.

"But what kind of work?" the old lady asked.

"I am to help Jasper Lucan catch fish in the river, and there may be other things to do."

The mother was far from being satisfied, but after much argument she gave her consent that the boy might help the old sisters, on the condition that he would never allow himself to be killed and cut up.

The new story of Roxana's trying to kill Luke Morris so that she might cut him up for meat pies, spread rapidly, and a score of people waited upon the owner of the old house, and begged him to turn the two old beldams out of doors. But he informed them that he could not do it, as he had given them an unconditional lease, and bound himself not to trouble them so long as they would be responsible for the safety of the house.

But matters at length came to a crisis. Winter had come, and the boatmen could ply their skiffs no longer, for the river was frozen over. One day the startling announcement was made that Luke Morris was missing! He had not been seen for four days. People crowded in upon his mother, whom they found weeping and moaning frantically. This was on Friday. She told them that her son had been gone since Tuesday evening; that he said he was going to work for the two sisters, and that she must not be alarmed until she saw him, for he might be gone some time. The mother was sure that by "some time," her son only meant some hours; and after a deal of talking, it was finally decided that the boy actually said "some hours."

But—horror of horrors!—on the very next day, some men found a mangled body in the ice close by the old house where the beldams lived. The prize was carefully taken out from its cold bed and carried directly to the office of the police, and there its appearance could be clearly made out; and hence it proved to be, not a human body, but the heart, lungs, liver, stomach, and intestines of such. Of course, the body itself had been chopped up for "meat pies!" A physician was sent for, and he decided that the remains were those of a person somewhere between the ages of fourteen and twenty. This settled the matter at once. A writ was applied for to the recorder, and he issued one immediately, and placed it in the hands of a proper officer to be served.

The two sisters manifested the utmost astonishment when they were arrested, but they betrayed no fear. When they were led forth into the street, a thousand people were collected to see them, and a cold, fearful shudder ran through the crowd, as the dark, forbidding, withered features of the beldams were visible. The boy Jasper was found in the house, and he also was arrested. The officers found it necessary to procure a carriage before they could make their way with the prisoners through the excited crowd.

In the meantime three officers remained to search the house. They went through the chambers first, but found nothing there, save some few articles of ordinary furniture. From there they entered the attics, but with the same result. Next they went into the lower rooms, and these they examined very carefully, entering every closet, and opening every cupboard. But they found nothing out of the way here. They then procured lanterns and went down into the cellar.

They had searched around here for some time, when they came to a trap-door, which they raised. As they lifted it, such a powerful stench came up that they were forced to let it down immediately. But they soon raised it again, this time protecting their nostrils. The place was deep and dark, and though they held down their lanterns at arm's length, yet nothing could be seen. Finally one proposed getting a string, and thus lowering one of the lanterns clear down. A line was procured, and a lantern lowered into the vault, and the officers were enabled to see a dark, corrupted mass of flesh and bones!

They closed the vault as they had found it, and were about to return, when one of them discovered a narrow passage away in one corner, which they had not before noticed. Towards this they made their way, and having followed it a distance of some twenty feet, they came to a square vault or room, near the centre of which, upon the damp stone, they saw a dark spot, as though a thick puddle of some dark liquid had coagulated there. Instinctively one of the men turned his gaze upwards, and he saw a small crevice in the plank ceiling through which the stuff had dropped. They knew that there must be a place overhead which they had not visited, and as soon as they could calculate upon the bearings and distances, they went back to the first floor. Here they followed up the course which was necessary to lead to the point over the vault, until they were brought up by a partition; but they knew they were right, and that there must be a room beyond. At length they passed around to where they remembered having found a closet with nothing in it, and upon examining the back of this closet, they found a secret door which they were obliged to burst open, not being able to find any legitimate means of opening it.

Mercy! What a sight met their eyes. The room to which they had thus gained entrance was about ten feet square, with a raised bench on one side, and the floor, walls, and bench all covered with blood! Sticking into the top of the bench, was a knife, all bloody, and also upon the floor they found a club covered with the same fearful witness of crime. It was truly a terrible moment for the officers. They gazed first upon the blood marks everywhere about them, and then upon each other. They were pale and tremulous, and without giving utterance to any intelligible sound they turned from the place. They breathed more freely when they had reached the outer air, and having securely looked up the house they started for the recorder's office, where they found the other officers awaiting their coming.

In a few words they gave an account of what they had found, only taking care to make it as terror-striking as possible. Thereupon the two sisters were asked if they had any explanation to make.

"About what?" asked Roxana, with perfect coolness.

"About these fearful witnesses that are brought against you," answered the recorder.

"Of what am I, or rather, are we, accused?"

"Why, of wilfully and wickedly murdering Luke Morris."

"And are we to be tried for that crime at the present time?"

"No, not tried; but we are here to commit you for trial."

"Then at present we have nothing to say. When our time of trial comes on, we may speak. But now, my lord, I simply know that we could say nothing which would remove the prejudice from your mind, and myself and sister shall be more safe in prison than in the power of an ignorant and infuriated mob."

The two sisters were fully committed and led away, while the boy, Jasper Lucan, was retained. It was soon found that he could not speak, nor give any intelligible sign to them. The recorder then wrote a question upon a piece of paper, but the boy could not read it; and after trying in vain for some time to get a grain of information out of him, they gave it up and sent him off to be locked up, there to remain until the trial should come on at the next assizes.

In the meantime hundreds of the citizens flocked to the old house of the four gables, where they were admitted by the officers, and upon beholding the bloody room, and the vault of putrefaction, they gave utterance to the most dreadful curses upon the heads of the wicked murderesses. At one time it was feared that the prison would be broken open by the infuriated people, and the two sisters taken therefrom and torn in pieces. It was now not only very freely talked, but very generally believed, that the dark sisters of Bedford had long followed the practice of killing all whom they could entice to their den, and many a youth and man was called to mind, who had mysteriously disappeared. To be sure, these cases were mostly confined to the river hands; a class of people who had for years been in the habit of sailing away without giving any sort of notice of such intent to those who were left behind, and remaining away for a long while without asking any one's leave. Yet many such were missed, and it was easily concluded that the dark sisters had chopped them up.

The time of trial came within a few days after the sisters were imprisoned, and they were the second on the docket. They were brought into court guarded by fifty men, which force was necessary to keep off the mob, as the threat had been made that they should never reach the courthouse alive. The indictment was read, and the prisoners plead not guilty. Then the evidence was called for. First came the man who had cut the heart, liver, lungs, and etc. from the ice. The counsel for the defendants wished to know if the man could swear that those were not the intestines of a hog. Of course the witness could. He knew they were those of a human being.

However, he was allowed to proceed, and when he had got through, the old women who were in the blind widow's house when Luke told what the sisters had said to him, were severally called up. They testified that the boy came in very much frightened,—"e'n a'most scared to death," one of them swore—and told them that the sisters had promised him to take care of his mother while she lived if he would allow them to cut him up to put in meat-pies! This evidence produced a marked sensation in court, and the sheriff had to watch the prisoners closely, as there was an evident intent among the lookers-on to seize them, even in that sacred place.

But finally the evidence was all in. A butcher who lived not far from the house of the four gables, very reluctantly testified that he had thrown the inwards of a hog out upon the ice, and that a dog dragged it off down the river. Another man swore—he was obliged to do it—that he saw the dog drag the hog's inwards down to a point back of the old house, but there the animal broke through a thin place in the ice, and scrambled out, leaving his prize behind him, fast among the broken pieces of ice. But this was nothing. Everybody knew that the sisters had murdered a great many men and boys, and they deserved punishment accordingly.

So the judge charged the jury, and they retired to make up their verdict. They were gone from the court-room just four and a half minutes, and when they returned, the scowl of malignant satisfaction which rested upon their features told that they had agreed upon the death! But ere they could give their verdict, a very extraordinary circumstance transpired to throw a different coloring upon the whole matter. A sudden movement was made at the door, and on the next moment, Luke Morris hurried down the aisle and confronted the judge.

At first the people seemed to think that this was only a ghost that had thus made its appearance, for it had just been proved that the real Luke Morris had been murdered and chopped up into minute particles. But the delusion could not last long. When the youth rushed forward and confronted his mother, and then turned to the judge, the truth was apparent. The counsel for the prisoners arose and asked for a staying of proceedings; but the judge was determined to question the youth first, and that, too, without much regard for legal rule.

"You are Luke Morris, are you not?" he asked of the boy.

"Yes, my lord," replied Luke.

"And you have been some in the house of these two women who are now in the prisoner's box?"

"Yes, my lord."

"And you were in there on the day that you were first missed by your friends?"

"Yes, sir."

"And now tell us where you have been."

The boy looked around upon the prisoners, and they made a motion for him to proceed.

"I have been to London, my lord."

"To London? And what did you go there for?"

Again the boy gazed round upon the women, and this time Roxana spoke.

"Tell the truth, Luke, and hide nothing," said she.

"Now speak, sirrah, and look not at those women again. What did you go to London for?"

"I went to carry a lot of fur tippets, and fur gloves, and fur capes; and some other things made of fur."

"Ah!—And for whom did you carry these things?"

"For Dapsley and Bottom, on the Islington Road."

"But I mean, who sent you with them?"

"The two old women back of me, my lord."

"And where did they get them?"

"They makes 'em, my lord."

"Make them—of what?"

"Of skins."

"What kind of skins?"

"My lord," here spoke the counsel for the defendants, "why not let the boy—or rather, cause him to—tell the whole story of what he has seen there, and what he has done? and also have him understand that he will suffer severely if he conceals or falsifies anything?"

So the judge ordered the boy to speak. The poor fellow scratched his head awhile, and then he commenced.

"Well, my lord, these women, the old sisters, as they is called, ax'd me as I would come an' work for 'em. I told 'em as I couldn't, 'cause I didn't know what they wanted me to do. Then they told as if I'd promise not to tell they'd tell me all about it. I promised, and they told me as they wanted me to catch cats for 'em to use, an' if I would do it, they'd pay me fourpence for every white cat an' every black one, an' thr'pence ha'-penny for others. Jasper couldn't catch so many as they wanted. So I agreed to work for 'em. I knowed of lots of cats that didn't belong to nobody, an' I pitched into 'em. Sometimes me an' Jasper'd get ten in one night. Then we'd take them into the house, to a little room clean away in the back part, through a little closet, an' there Jasper'd kill 'em, and then I helped him skin 'em. Then the old women took the skins an' kind o' tanned 'em by the oven, an' then made 'em up into all sorts of things."

"Where did you use to throw the bodies of these cats?" asked one of the counsel.

"Why, we used to throw 'em into an old well in the cellar, where the water of the river came up an' washed 'em away; but all at once we found that the place had got choked up so that the bodies couldn't wash away, an' they made such a smell that we throwed 'em into the river, after that."

Upon this there was a very curious sensation in court. The case was looked into; a few officers sent again to the house; the witnesses examined again; and finally the decision was arrived at that there had been no murder done. The man who said 'twas a hog's inwards found upon the ice was believed; and, furthermore, Luke said he told the women at his mother's house that dreadful story about being chopped up for meat-pie, just to stop them from questioning him, never dreaming that they would take it in earnest.

And so the two sisters were cleared; but they chose to leave the town, for their business was ruined there, people being sure to keep their cats in doors while the dark twain remained; and some who had very fine white cats even went so far as to tie the feline rovers up until they were assured that Roxana and Nancy Rhodope had left Bedford.

There are three modes of bearing the ills of life; by indifference, which is the most common; by philosophy, which is the most ostentatious; and by religion, which is the most effectual.

THE BACHELOR'S SACRIFICE.

BY FRANK PARKLOVE.

They call me "old bachelor!" whisper I'm gray,
 And hid! it is time I should marry!
 High time I had given all my hunters away—
 My fishing-rods, dogs, and my guns—for they say
 One can never fish, hunt, or go sporting a day,
 The moment one's wedded a fairy.

They call me "old bach," but still think me "some,"
 And say, "'tis a pity he's lonely;"
 They forget I'm a bankrupt—are willing to come
 To my old Gothic cot—if—I'll give up my gun,
 My fishing rods, dogs, and my hunters, and come
 And pay my devours to them only!

They call me "old bachelor!" tempting me on
 To the 'alter with sweet syren phrases;
 But I give one more glance at my dogs and my gun,
 And I think of "Old Hunter," I think of the "fun,"
 The "fire on-the-wing," and the "trophies" I've won
 On the western and southern prairies;

And my poor dogs look up in my eyes with a glance
 Thrilling with human emotion:
 I wake with a start from a strange, fitful trance,
 And I think "O where, Frank, on the widened expanse
 Of America's wilds, or la belle jolly France,
 Can you ever command such devotion?"

Now they all crowd around me, each kissing my hands,
 Fondling me loving as ever.
 O, dogs! I can give up goods, houses and lands—
 Even fetter this body with Hymen's stern bands—
 But you! dear companions in far distant lands,
 Your chains I never can sever!

Yes, chained to me, dogs, by the chains of love—
 Chained to the grave we go!
 What? give up my dogs! for a white kid glove?
 A ring—and a kiss—and a glance of love?
 No! who loves the master the dogs must love—
 We'll together bide death's tally-ho!

THE LAST OF THE LEATHER BREECHES.

BY THE OLD 'UN.

OLD HARMANUS SCHOENHOVER was, some twenty years and odd ago, the "oldest inhabitant" of the village—for it was a village, then—of Brooklyn, N. Y.; a genuine old Knickerbocker, faithful to the traditions of the times, and looking down with sovereign contempt on all modern innovations and improvements. He lived in an old wooden house, the gable end of which projected far into Fulton Street, and the dooryard of which was always ornamented, in summer time, with those choicest of acclimated exotics, particolored tulips from Harlaem, and sun-flowers from—heaven knows where. Harmanus was generally known as the "Last of the Leather Breeches," from the style of garment that encased his nether limbs. He also wore a broad-skirted, cinnamon-colored coat of homespun manufacture and make, decorated with huge blue glass buttons, a very long waistcoat of black cloth, a white neckcloth, and a huge three-cornered hat trimmed with tarnished gold lace, in the loop of which, when he went abroad, he invariably wore a little clay pipe, with the stem tipped with red sealing-wax. We must not forget his square-toed shoes, large enough for the wear of a gouty alderman, with their huge plated buckles. The rising generation did not regard his attire with that veneration which it inspired in a few relics of the old school, who had not, however, courage enough to imitate his example and resist the modern abominations of dress. They would often laugh in the very face of the sturdy old Knickerbocker,

"His old three-cornered hat,
 And his breeches and all that,
 Were so queer."

But the old gentleman was queer in other ways than matters of dress. His notions on the currency were queer. He had no faith in banks or in Wall Street speculations. He would sometimes discount short paper with undoubted endorsers, and he owned some real estate; but the bulk of his property consisted in sundry fat little kegs solidly filled with gold and silver, which he kept in his little sitting-room up stairs, fronting the street. Then he was queer in other things; he had queer ways of helping poor people anonymously, and absurd notions that charity should begin at home and only expand outwardly in proportion as every necessity within its immediate sphere had been relieved. So that putting all these things together, the good man passed for being a little cracked—and heads with nothing at all in them were gravely shaken, like empty poor-boxes, when his name was mentioned.

The old fellow viewed with annoyance and disgust the changes that took place in his native village. He only smiled when the stages from Patchogue and Babylon and Islip disgorged at Carmann their loads of antiquated figures that looked as if they might have stepped down from the canvases of a Flemish gallery of the 17th century. He didn't recognize as fellow-creatures men and women attired in the modern Parisian mode.

At length, the wise men of Brooklyn pronounced Schoenhoever's house a nuisance. It was shabby, it was tumble-down, it destroyed the alignment of the street. It must come down. The corporation offered him a handsome price for it. He rejected it with disdain. He was told that he must abandon his mansion—the homestead of his fathers—will ye nill ye. He dared them to violate the sanctity of his castle. He was notified to vacate—he scorned the summons. The whole town became interested.

The old man was a non-resistant, like old Father Lamson. He shut himself up with his money-bags and doggedly awaited the result. Workmen were sent to pull down the house. The whole vicinity was thronged with curious spectators as at a ship-launch. Merrily rang the axes and hammers and saws, and the “yo-heave-ho!” of sturdy fellows pulling and hauling at cables. At last the end of the house was torn away—challenging the legal fiction that a man’s house is his castle—and there sat old Harmanus in his elbow-chair, with his cocked hat on his head, and his immortal leather breeches on his sturdy legs, sublime in his martyrdom, and smoking tranquilly his old clay pipe. His family had been removed to another of his houses. He was invited to join them. But he declined, with a majestic wave of the hand and a graceful emission of tobacco smoke. Then he was lifted carefully, arm-chair and all, carried down the staircase, and deposited on the opposite sidewalk. His goods and chattels were sent to his wife—but even when his money-bags departed he refused to accompany them, but sat, all through that day, a silent spectator of the utter demolition of his venerable house. At night, he rejoined his family.

The removal of this old landmark marked the merging of one era into another, and had the significance of an historical event. The corporation paid the old man a large sum; but he did not long survive the destruction of his house. His son lives in a marble palace, with gas and water all over the house, and drives a pair of blood horses, but few beyond the family remember, in the heady current of life, the “Last of the Leather Breeches” of New York.

PATENT MEDICINES.

The following certificate of the efficacy of patent pills is taken from the Philadelphia Mercury. “I, John Lubberlie, was supposed to be in the last stage of consumption in ’49, suffering at the same time under a severe attack of rheumatism, liver complaint, dropsy, gravel, and cholera morbus. Simultaneously, also, I took the yellow fever and small pox. The latter, assuming a chronic form, completely destroyed my lungs, liver, spinal marrow, nervous system, and the entire contents of my cranium. I got so low that I did not know my brother-in-law when he came to borrow some money. For three months I swallowed nothing but twenty packages of Kunkelhausen’s Pill, which effected an immediate cure in two weeks. Sworn and subscribed, etc.

A REVOLUTIONARY INCIDENT.

A large party of Virginia riflemen, who had recently arrived in camp, were strolling about Cambridge, and viewing the collegiate buildings, now turned into barracks. Their half-Indian equipments, and fringed and ruffled hunting garbs, provoked the merriment of some troops from Marblehead, chiefly fishermen and sailors, who thought nothing equal to the round jackets and trowsers. A bantering ensued between them. There was snow upon the ground and snowballs began to fly when jokes were wanting. The parties waxed warm with the contest. They closed and came to blows; both sides were reinforced, and in a little while at least a thousand were at fist-cuffs, and there was a tumult in the camp worthy of the days of Homer. ‘At this juncture,’ writes our informant, ‘Washington made his appearance, whether by accident or design I never knew. I saw none of his aids with him; his black servant was just behind him mounted. He threw the bridle of his own horse into his servant’s hands, sprang from his seat, rushed into the thickest of the melee, seized two tall, brawny riflemen by the throat, keeping them at arm’s length, talking to and shaking them.’

As they were from his own province, he may have felt peculiarly responsible for their good conduct; they were engaged too, in one of those sectional brawls which were his especial abhorrence; his reprimand must, therefore, have been a vehement one. He was commanding in his serene moments, but irresistible in his bursts of indignation. On the present occasion, we are told, his appearance and strong-handed rebuke put an instant end to the tumult. The combatants dispersed in all directions, and in less than three minutes none remained on the ground but the two he had collared.—Irving’s Washington.

A CURIOUS DISCOVERY.

In the town of Leicester, England, says a foreign exchange, the house is still shown where Richard III. passed the night before the battle of Bosworth; and there is a story of him still preserved in the corporation records, which illustrates the caution and darkness of that prince’s character. It was the custom to carry, among the baggage of his camp, a cumbersome wooden bed, which he pretended was the only bed he could sleep in. Here he contrived a receptacle for his treasure, which lay concealed under a weight of timber. After the fatal day in which Richard fell, the Earl of Richmond entered Leicester with his victorious troops; the friends of Richard were pillaged, but the bed was neglected by every plunderer as useless lumber. The owner of the house afterward discovered the hoard, and became suddenly rich without any visible cause. He bought lands, and at length arrived at the dignity of being mayor of Leicester. Many years afterward, his widow, who had been left in great affluence, was murdered for her wealth by her own servant-maid, who had been privy to the affair; and at the trial of this woman and her accomplices the whole transaction came to light.

Sincerity is an opening of the heart. We find it in very few people; and that which we generally see is nothing but a subtle dissimulation to attract the confidence of others.

THE LIFE—THE TRUTH—THE WAY.

BY ELANOR D'ARNOFF.

Thou! who unseen didst guide my youth,
In pleasant paths of wholesome truth—
And when I turned away
Rebellious—to the world—to find
Food for a discontented mind—
And e'en forgot to pray—

Preserver! thou who ne'er forsook
Me in my wandering ways—nor took
Just vengeance on me then—
O hear the prayer I raise to thee!
And even now forget not me—
O guide me forth again.

Forgive my base ingratitude,
O thou most mighty—thou most good—
Bear with me once again.
A wicked, fearful child of clay,
I at thy feet most humbly lay
The talent thou hast given.

All unimproved, debased it lies,
Too wretched for thy sinless eyes—
I with a broken heart
Come—for I've nowhere else to go—
Earth's brightest visions end in woe—
E'en pleasure hath a smart.

At the 'leventh hour I come to thee—
O Father, cast me not away—
Sick—heavy—faint—I come;
Through all my life thou'st watched o'er me;
But blind, I knew not that 'twas thee—
O Saviour, take me home!

THE THREE PICTURES.

BY AGNES BOND.

"BEAUTIFUL! charming! so expressive and lifelike!" were the words which came from a group of people surrounding two newly-hung pictures in the exhibition-room at B——. "How much it resembles some face that I know," said one. "Yes, that sweet smile seems so familiar, and yet I cannot recall it," said another. "And I wonder who is the artist, and whether they are portraits," said an elderly gentleman as turning to the catalogue, he read: "61 and 62, Fancy Sketches, by Claude Huntington." Only one of the party, a lady, was silent; but eagerly she gazed upon the pictures, as though unmindful of those about her.

The paintings were small, but most exquisitely touched and finished. The first represented a little girl of some seven or eight summers, with bare feet wading a small stream, but midway she had paused as if from fear. What a vision of childish beauty she was, as she stood there! the sunny smile on her sweet young face, the blue eyes just filling with tears, while golden curls fell on her neck in careless grace. About her neck and twined among her curls, were wreaths of blue violets, her frock was looped up with bouquets of them, while from one arm hung her straw cottage hat filled with the same delicate blossoms. She was looking up so entreatingly to the fine face of a boy, a few years older, standing opposite, while the rosy lips seemed to say "come help me." The boy, too, had an interesting face; one could read upon it of great and conscious powers, of deep devoted love for the beautiful and true, as he reached forth his hands to the timid child. A summer sun was shining down upon them, making each water drop in the little stream gleam and glisten like silver, and the robins sung in the old oak-tree that bent its branches protectingly above them.

The other was a companion to it. The same laughing streamlet wound its way along, the old trees rose as proudly as before, while on a mossy bank beneath them reclined a young girl and a youth. The maiden had the same smile that danced about the child's face. The liquid eyes beamed now with the light of love, and in the whole expression there was such a look of purity and goodness as an angel might have worn. The curls that clustered round the open brow were encircled with a wreath of violets, and as she bent her eyes beneath the eager look of the youth, she had scattered them about her on the bank. The youth, too, had the noble features of the boy—the tender, loving expression, the open, confiding look, which showed him at once affectionate and brave. The maiden seemed to listen so trustingly and confidingly, and the youth gazed on her so fondly, as he poured into her ear the dreams and aspirations of his heart, that one could see that the future seemed fresh and fair before them. Life was just opening, in beauty and light, the pages of its wondrous book to those young hearts.

Such were the pictures. The lady who gazed on them so intently was past the first dawn of youth, delicately formed, and moving with such an air of unconscious grace, yet regally as a queen might move, that one passing would irresistibly pause to watch her movements. Still, it was the face that most of all would have attracted one; there was such a winning sweetness about it, at times almost amounting to sadness, the large eyes betokened such a capacity of feeling and suffering, while the smile that played around the lips seemed like a ray of sunshine lighting up the other features, and giving the whole expression such a pure, forgiving look, as to make it a face to be remembered a life-time.

Tears stood in the lady's eyes, and a bright glow on her cheeks showed that the pictures had awakened some sleeping memory, when one of the party, a lady, said gaily :

"Why, Florence, you haven't said a word about the paintings, and you are usually so enthusiastic and discerning!"

"Fie-upon you. Your friend Florence," rejoined the lady's father, "has perhaps been so accustomed to the superior merits of the old world artists, that she cannot bring down her mind to anything so simple as these. But I've been thinking these pictures must be by the young artist who has just returned, after a long residence in Europe. He is said to be a young man of talent and genius—assuredly so, if these are a specimen."

"O yes, papa, it's the same gentleman to whom old Madame Huntington willed her immense property, on condition that he should take the family name. How curious the girls will all be to see him. I remember, now, they said he was an artist."

So they chatted gaily as they passed along, but Florence was as one in a dream. She was again a child, crowned with violets, fording the stream and reaching forth her arms to one who seemed then powerful to save. She was sitting on that bank beside the dear one who was to cherish and protect. The neglect, and trials, and fears, which years had brought, were swept away by the sight of those pictures, for she knew they were no fancy sketches, but portrayed real scenes in her life. She knew, too, who the artist must have been—the lover of her youth, between whom and herself coldness and unexplained differences had sprung up, and for years they had no knowledge of each other. As they opened the door to go out, she went mechanically, and two gentlemen passed in. One bowed to the party, the other gazed upon Florence like one spell bound. They were the artist, Claude Huntington, and his friend, Fred Grey, but Florence saw them not; she was breathing the soft fragrance of violets, and heard a voice calling her, "Violet, Violet!"

As they descended to the street, she declined all invitations to dine with her friends, saying she must be alone then.

"How strangely Florence appears to-day!" said the gay Clara Seymour; "not even a word of praise called forth by her favorite pictures. I can't account for her abstractedness!"

"Your friend is probably capricious, as you women all are," rejoined her father.

"O, papa, you're out there, for Florence is entirely free from all caprice. I think she must be anxious about her appearance to-morrow night; but then I know she will not fail, dear girl! She has had some deep sorrow, I am certain, though she bears everything so bravely! If I were only in her place, such a magnificent singer, so caressed and admired with her face and figure, how I should triumph over all you common minds!" said Clara, laughingly.

"Most fortunate for us, you are lacking in all these things!" said a companion.

Claude Huntington and his friend Frederick Grey entered the gallery.

"O, what a lucky fellow you are!" exclaimed Fred; "genius will certainly find its reward. See what a group of connoisseurs are gathered about your pictures! I must rush up to them and tell them the artist is present, and would be grateful for their patronage. How fortunate I persuaded you to send them in. By the way, you said there was a history connected with them, and you would tell it some day. Some love experience, eh?"

"You are just the same light-hearted fellow, Fred, as ever. How often I've wished for some of your buoyancy of spirits! But tell me, I beseech you, who was that lady we passed on coming in? That face haunts me like one I knew and loved years ago, and yet it cannot be!"

"Now don't go into raptures with that face, though to be sure it's no wonder that you, with your passionate love for the beautiful, should admire and worship such glorious beauty as hers. The lady is Mademoiselle Florence, as she is called, the great prima donna whom half the men in town are raving about. But it's utterly useless to make love to her, for she treats all her admirers in the same way, with politeness and respect—a poor return, they think, for their mad worship. Not much is known of her previous history. She has been for some time in Europe studying music under the best masters. She is said to have a handsome fortune, and is quite alone in the world, having no near relatives. The Seymours, who see her more than any one else, say that their acquaintance is just renewed, they first having met her while in Europe, some years since. But to-morrow night you will have an opportunity to see her radiant beauty in its true light. She is to make her last appearance in a new opera which is said to be admirably calculated to bring out her wonderful powers of voice and manner. You'll accompany me, wont you? It will be a fine chance for you to see the elite, and also to be seen by anxious mothers and designing maidens as the unmarried heir of a hundred thousand."

So the gentleman rattled on, unmindful of the continued silence of his companion, or the deep look of anxious sadness that had crossed his face.

It was a gala night. Crowds of people were thronging the street leading to the opera-house. Lines of carriages drew up before the door, depositing the beauty and fashion of the city. Stately dames, gay matrons and lovely girls in their first season, cold, cautious business men, men of the world, the dashing representatives of Young America, were all there to do homage to the talent and beauty of one who was to stand before them for the last time. How brilliantly shone that fair assemblage beneath the glaring gaslight! How the jewels flashed and sparkled, flowers filled the air with their odorous incense, while lace and satin velvet and blonde were folded over sad and joyous hearts!

Claude Huntington and his friend were there. The latter seemed as gaily talkative as before, but the artist had such a look of anxiety on his face, that one could see that he was hoping for the unravelling of some mystery or secret trouble.

Shortly the curtain rose, and the prima donna stood before them, more radiantly beautiful than ever she had seemed before, like the realization of some poet's dream, or a statue endowed with life, rather than a living woman. She bowed that queenly head, and for a moment cast her eyes almost timidly about her, while loud and ringing applause greeted her. Then from those parted lips came forth such sweet tones, as to hush to quietness all sound besides. All listened in breathless admiration to that silvery voice, rising at times in such thrilling tones, then falling in winning, trembling cadences, lifting, it seemed, the one who uttered them and those who listened, above themselves and the present. It was wonderful, the hushed adoration with which all listened! None thought now of the jewels that flashed on her neck, arms and brow, or the delicate satin that rose and fell at every gush of that birdlike voice, or the spirit-like beauty of face and form; but, as if it were a voice from another sphere, they sat entranced. More wonderful was the revelation of such wondrous and enchanting power, such a rare gift is the melody of a woman's voice!

She ended. What bursts of applause! what shouts of admiration! Bouquets, wreaths, diamonds, gems, were showered upon the stage—the unsolicited tribute of all ranks to genius and beauty.

Claude Huntington had seen her; he had drank in every tone of her voice, which seemed like a dream of his youth, when his friend came to his speech, and said:

"Didn't I tell you she was divine?"

"Such a voice! such an air!" he replied. "I knew it must be Violet; no other face could affect me like that."

"Ah, then you know her?" said Fred; "how provoking you shouldn't have told me!"

But he was silenced, for again the singer stood before them, in answer to repeated calls. She was radiant before—she was lovely now; the jewels had disappeared, but in their place were violets, blue violets, a wreath of them about her head, the sleeves and skirt of her dress looped up with them, and a bunch of them in one hand.

As she bowed again, and her lips parted with a smile, the applause was louder than before. Her face was pale and almost colorless, but as she cast her eyes over that vast assembly, they rested for a moment on the face of Claude. A crimson glow overspread her face, her heart beat convulsively, the violets dropped from her hand, and she retired.

Again they applauded. Then there was the usual hurrying and crowding, and soon the gay opera-house was deserted and silent. None save the artist had noticed the resemblance between the child and maiden of the pictures and the prima donna, as she stood before them crowned with violets; he knew now they were the same. None save the prima donna had noticed the artist's pale, troubled face; she knew it was the lover of her youth.

In a lovely Italian home live the artist Claude Huntington, and Florence his beloved wife. Surrounded by the genial influences of that fair land, its golden sunshine and balmy air, his home adorned with the rare creations of others, and himself known and admired now as a great master, blessed in his domestic relations beyond all he had hoped, he is happy—they both are happy. Theirs is the old story of youthful love and promised devotion, and subsequent estrangement, through the jealous interference of supposed friends. The youth gained fame and honor, and the maiden's rare and noble gifts brought her fawning flattery and adulation. Still, to both came the old love promises and early memories. Neither fame nor wealth could satisfy the heart's desire, but after their probation, love brought them again to each other, and crowned them anew.

On the walls of the room in the artist's home hang the two pictures we have mentioned, with a third beside them. This represents a woman in the fullness of her charms, ere time has in the least touched her wondrous loveliness. Beauty glows on her full rounded cheek, the soft symmetry of the limbs seems faultless, there is a loving smile on the lips, and the hair falls in soft rippling waves, while over all the unspeakable glow of happiness is spread, the wife's and mother's love shining beyond mere beauty of face or form. A cherub babe is on her knee, and proudly and lovingly she gazes in the manly face beside her. Some violets, those old and much-loved flowers, are twined about her head, and the little one clasps them in its hands and seems shouting for joy.

Not long ago some old friends came to visit them, no other than Frederick Gray and the gay Clara Seymour, now his wife. When Claude brought them to this room, and showed them these home pictures on the wall, they well remembered them, and Clara clapping her hands, said gaily :

"I see it all now. I know whose sweet smile that was that puzzled us so much in the exhibition-room, and why Florence was so distraught, when papa said she was capricious. I know, now, why she came out crowned with violets at her farewell concert. How strange that with all my discernment, I never discovered all this!"

THE GERMAN FOR PLATE.

"Good gracious, Anna, what is the German for plate," "Teller," I replied, leaning over the stairs. "Tell her what?" returned my aunt, not supposing that she had heard aright. "Teller," I answered back at the top of my voice. "How can I tell her, unless you tell me what to tell her?" she retorted in a tone that betokened she was gradually becoming heated, and, indeed, the weather was sultry. "Can't you hear me tell you to tell her, teller?" "That's just what I want to do; but how can I tell her unless I know what to tell her?" I was laughing so heartily that I could only shout out, "Tell her, teller." But fearing that my aunt might become exasperated, I ran down stairs, and for her edification uttered the magic word. Of course, the desired plate was produced, to her great amazement; but she good-naturedly joined in my un-repressed merriment.—Autobiography of an Actress.

A KISS.

The following answer was made to a young lady who had sent her lover a kiss—in a letter.

Thanks to my little absent friend—
A kiss you in your letter send,
But, ah! the thrilling charm is lost
In kisses that arrive by post;
That fruit can only tasteful be
When gathered, melting, from the tree!

THRILLING INCIDENT.

A young man named Hund, was sent, some four years ago, in mid-winter, by his master on an errand about twenty miles, to carry provisions to a village in the upper country. The village people asked him for charity to take three orphan children on his sledge a few miles on his way to Bergen and leave them at a house on the road, when they could be brought to Bergen. He took the little things, and saw that the two elder were wrapped up from the cold. The third he took within his arms and on his knee, as he drove, clasping it warm against his breast—so those say that saw them set off, and it is confirmed by one who met the sledge on the road, and heard the children prattling to Hund, and Hund laughing merrily at their little talk. Before they got half-way, however, a pack of hungry wolves burst out upon them from a hollow in the thicket to the right of the wood. The beasts followed close to the back of the sledge. Closer and closer the wolves pressed. Hund saw one about to spring at his throat. It was impossible for the horse to go faster than he did, for he went like the wind—so did the wolves. Hund, in his desperation, snatched up one of the children behind him, and threw it over the back of the sledge. This stopped the pack a little. On galloped the horse, but the wolves were soon crowded around again with the blood freezing to their muzzles. It was easier to throw over the second child than the first, and Hund did it. But on came again the infuriated beasts, gaunt with hunger, and raging like fiends for their prey. It was harder to give up the third—the dumb infant that nestled in his breast—but Hund was in mortal terror. He threw away the infant and saved himself. Away over the snow flew the sledge, the village was reached, and Hund just escaped after all the sacrifice he had made. But he was unsettled and wild, and his talk for some time, night or day, was of wolves—so fearful had been the effect upon his imagination.—Miss Martineau's Norway and the Norwegians.

PRACTICAL COUNSEL.

Amos Lawrence, of Boston, in his Diary and Correspondence, gives the following characteristic counsels: "At the commencement of your journey the difference between going just right or a little wrong, will be the difference between finding yourself in good quarters or the miserable bog or slough at the end of it. Do not cheat yourself by doing what you suspect may be wrong. You are as much accountable to your conscience as you would be to me to use diligence in taking care of a bag of money which I might send by you. Good principles, good temper and good manners will carry a man through the world much better than he can get along with the absence of either. The most important is good principles. Temptation, if successfully resisted, strengthens the character; but it should always be avoided. The moral taste, like the natural, is vitiated by abuse. He whose life ends at thirty may have done much, while he who has reached the age of one hundred may have done little."

He that knows himself, knows others; and he that is ignorant of himself, could not write a very profound lecture on other men's heads.

A TIME TO WEEP.

BY CLARA AUGUSTA.

By sadness of countenance the heart is made better. —
Ecc. 7: 8.

'Tis well to weep when troubles come
And draw the darkened veil
Of sadness o'er the countenance,
When weary griefs assail.
Laughter is sweet, and joy is good,
But woe its turn must take—
'Tis tenfold bliss at God's decree,
To suffer for His sake.

He hovers nearer when we groan
In anguish deep and wild,
He sheds a halo o'er us, then,
As if an angel smiled.
We know that 'neath his sheltering wing
For us there's ample room,
Where we can cast all care away,
And banish from us gloom.

It is but right to weep with hope,
But never with despair;
The love of God is over us
And round us everywhere!
And he'll sustain the son of faith
Beneath his mighty arm,
Until his feet shall press the shore
Of heaven's eternal calm.

LOVE IN A LAWYER'S OFFICE.

BY M. M. MELBOURNE.

It was a clear, cold winter's day in New York; a day when the biting wind enters the ill-built homes of the children of poverty; when her sons and daughters shiver in their tattered garments, and vainly strive to procure warmth from their glimmering fires; when the cold and hunger pains drive the wretched to despair; when life's necessities are beyond their scanty means; on such a day, and at such a time, our story commences.

In a miserable attic of a dilapidated old house in one of the poorest and most degraded streets of the great city, might have been seen a picture of misery calculated to touch the most callous heart; a picture, alas! all too common in great cities, but none the less worthy of commiseration on that account. One small window, partly shaded by an old faded curtain, lighted the apartment, and discovered the abject poverty of the inmates. The walls had once been covered with paper, that now hung in fragments, weather stained and torn. The ceiling, smoked and discolored, was scarcely high enough to admit the entrance of a man of medium height, while the uneven floor trembled and shook at the lightest footstep. A bed of the humblest description occupied one side of this uninviting tenement, with coverings far from suitable to the inclement season, and the wants of the miserable invalid who reposed on it. A chair and a small table, a wooden chest, some common tea cups on a shelf, a few chips blazing in the little stove, and a few more on the hearth beside it; a little little sauce-pan, half filled with gruel, and a row of medicine phials on the low mantel shelf, completed the articles in the room.

Leaning over the stove, in busy preparation of the contents of the tin sauce-pan, was a young and sickly-looking girl, whose faded and worn out dress corresponded with the equipments of the room. But when, at the sound of a weak voice from the bed, she raised her head, you might have seen a face of unsurpassed beauty, hunger-pinched and careworn as it evidently was; for if the complexion was pale and sickly, the features were perfectly and beautifully formed, the large dark eyes were positively startling in their brilliancy, the snowy forehead was banded with heavy black braids, and the poor, thin hand that added fresh fuel to the fire was of far too delicate appearance for her menial employment. And when in answer to the call, she bent over the couch, there was a look of love unspeakable in her splendid eyes, and reverential fondness in the kiss she pressed on the brow of the invalid.

"You are better, dear mother," she whispered, as a smile played for an instant round the pale lips of the sick woman, and a faint color tinged her cheek. "You have slept for several hours, and that last medicine has done you good."

"I feel better, my darling; but the room is cold. Is there nothing you could add to my bed covering?" And she shivered violently.

The happy light faded from the young girl's eyes, and she hastened to the box that contained her scanty wardrobe, and selected from the few garments a half worn out shawl, spread it carefully over the bed, adding an old tattered dress and cape. The mother lay with closed eyes, and beheld not the tears that streamed down the pale cheeks of her daughter, as she quietly performed her little labors of love; and no sob was permitted to disturb the stillness of the room. After inducing the invalid to take some nourishment, the daughter sat and watched her until once more the transparent lids closed in heavy slumber; and then stealing gently from the room, she crossed a short passage, and opened another door.

Here dwelt an Irish family in the greatest poverty; but with characteristic sympathy for others' distress, always ready and willing to assist the poor, pale girl, so devoted to her dying mother.

"Can Mary sit with mama for an hour, Mrs. Brady?"

"Sure she can, Miss Julie; and how may herself be by this time?" asked Mrs. Brady, wiping her hands from a tub of soap suds, and coming towards her visitor; and before an answer could be given, she went on: "And are you going to look for more work, poor child? God help ye! it's the hard lot ye have in the world." And poor widow Brady, in her sympathy for another's wo, forgot her own trials, her dead husband, her five children and her poverty.

Half an hour afterwards, Julie (for by that name we will call her for the present) was walking hastily toward a street, where the day before she had seen on some shabby looking buildings numberless little signs, bearing various names, mostly ending "Attorney at Law." To these she now directed her steps; for Julia had relinquished the hope of procuring those employments usually sought after by young women, and in despair had come to these abodes of "wisdom and justice" to solicit employment as a copyist.

It were painful to enumerate the disappointments, the annoyances, the inults, endured by the poor girl in course of an hour's search. From one, her request met an angry refusal, accompanied with a look of astonishment that sent the bitter tears rushing to her eyes; from another, words that brought the proud blood to cheek and brow, and caused her to turn and leave the room with a haughty step and a fiercely throbbing heart. For an instant, she thought of quitting the building and returning home, but the recollection of her mother, without food and peniless and now when there was hope that she might recover, gave her fresh energy; and she crossed a long gallery, and gave a gentle tap at an opposite door.

Instead of the usual "come in," there was a quick footstep, the door was thrown open, and a gentle voice asked her to enter; and when she raised her eyes, instead of the accustomed coldly inquisitive glance that met her own, she beheld a handsome pair of eyes, beaming with kindness, and fixed on hers, with but ill concealed admiration.

The owner of these beautiful eyes was a very young man, and so polite that Julia, in her innocence, and judging from her previous treatment, doubted if he could be a lawyer, and in acquainting him with her business candidly told him so. Interested in her, and not a little struck with her beauty, the young man gradually, and without any appearance of rude curiosity, drew from her the outlines of her history. Deeply affected at her description of her mother's illness and poverty, he hastened to furnish her with the desired employment, and would fain have offered to remunerate her then for what she was to do, had not a certain something in her manner deterred him from acting on his benevolent purpose.

Julie left the warm and comfortably furnished office with a light heart, that not even the cold wind sweeping through the galleries could chill; and holding her thin cape closely round her, she hurried homeward with such sensations as only those can experience who have suffered the same poverty, the same disappointments, and the same heart sinkings. She knelt beside her mother's bed, and whispered the good news that she had found work.

"Plenty of writing, dear mama; and he will pay me so well you shall not want for food and clothing long." And the sweet, flushed face was buried in the pillow, and an earnest, grateful prayer ascended to Heaven, more truthful, more sincere, than many offered up in gorgeous chambers, and by the occupants of downy couches.

Long into the dark, cold hours of that night did Julie bend over the little rickety table, and write with blue and stiffening fingers, long after her little fuel was consumed and her lamp had burned dim; and when it was finished, and carefully rolled up and laid away, she softly took her place beside her sleeping parent, and in happy dreams forgot her troubles for a few hours.

The employer wished to have the writing early, and with weak and trembling steps, she once more entered the dingy block, passed the long flight of stairs, and stood in the presence of her handsome friend. But this time he was not alone; another young man, apparently some three and twenty years of age, sat in one of the lawyer's comfortable arm-chairs, luxuriously enjoying the morning paper. While the young lawyer was giving Julie her instructions, and she with burning cheeks and trembling hand strove to hold the parchment steadily, the stranger was attentively examining her over the top of his paper. After highly commending what she had done, her kind employer renewed the supply, and then accompanied her to the entrance of the building; and bidding her good morning, slipped a package into her hand, containing a far larger remuneration than she had dared to expect.

There was joy in the miserable little attic that night, and on many succeeding nights; and the mother's health gradually returned, and little comforts gathered about them, and Julie no longer felt ashamed of her appearance in the street; for she was warmly and neatly clad. She frequently met the young stranger at Mr. Franklin's office, and at last imagined he bore a resemblance to some familiar face, but whom she could not recollect; and so few words passed between her and the lawyer, that she never dreamed of inquiring his name, nor did Mr. Franklin ever ask her own.

We must now introduce the reader to this young stranger, his home and his friends. In the first place, his name was Albert Sutherland. He was a classmate and intimate friend of Edward Franklin's, with talents to have enabled him to rise to the highest honors in the land, with riches sufficient to render unnecessary all exertions for a livelihood. His devotion to an only sister, bequeathed to his care by their dying parents, united to a naturally good disposition, and the example and advice of his friend Franklin, had preserved young Sutherland from those temptations generally so fatal to the happiness of young, idle men of property. He had other relatives, but not in America; and having no one to share his love for his sister Claudine, he bestowed on her the deepest affection—a mingling of admiration, anxiety and devotion, far surpassing the cool, indifferent feeling usually denominated brotherly love.

Since his parents' death they had still resided in the handsome house bequeathed to his sister, and it had always been his study to surround her with agreeable acquaintances, to fill her home with luxuries, and to fulfil in every respect the sacred promise made at his mother's death-bed. And Claudine Sutherland was worthy of her brother's love, and well rewarded the sacrifices he made for her conveniences, by welcoming his friends with the warmest kindness, rendering his home a very paradise of comfort, and returning his love with interest.

It was the evening of the day on which Albert had first met Julie, and he had accompanied Edward Franklin to a political meeting that detained them till a late hour. The friends parted at Sutherland's door, and Albert, after divesting himself of his cap and cloak, sprang up stairs to his sister's room, where he knew he should find her, as she never retired while he was absent. As he opened the door, a warm and comfortable sensation struck him, and he took his seat beside her with that peculiarly happy feeling one experiences after a long walk on a cold night when suddenly entering a warm, well lighted room. A very pleasant chamber was this favorite retreat of Miss Sutherland's, with its soft, flowery carpet, warm velvet hangings, through which not even a stray breath of cold air dared penetrate; its elegant rosewood furniture, its well filled book-case, costly vases, mirrors and pictures. A very inviting and pleasant room, and occupied by a very lovely and agreeable girl—at least, so Albert thought, when she laid aside her book, made room for him beside her on her own pet lounge, warmed his chilled hands in her own soft palms, and then gently passed her arm round his neck and kissed his cheek.

"You are very good to give me so warm a welcome, after compelling you to sit alone all this long evening, dearest." And he passed his arm lovingly round her waist, and looked into her bright eyes.

"I should be very selfish to deprive you of all enjoyment, Albert; even now I sometimes fear that you pine for scenes and amusements that your constant attendance on myself prevents your enjoying."

"Not so, sister mine. I am quite contented; nay, perfectly happy; and there is only one man in the world I really envy, and that is Edward Franklin."

"And why should you envy him?" asked the sister, with evident astonishment. "Is not your lot a happier one in every respect than his?"

"My lot, as you call it, is; but not my disposition. If you only knew, as I do, what pleasure he takes in doing good, how nobly he spends his very modest income, you would join me in praising him. Only this morning, he gave me the history of a poor girl, who came to him to procure writing, and he had barely finished when she entered."

"Who is she? What is her name?" questioned his sister, with apparent interest.

"That he does not know; but her mother is a widow, poor and in ill health, and entirely dependent on this child's care."

"What is she like? Do satisfy my feminine curiosity?"

"She is beautiful!—perfectly angelic, if angels have magnificent black eyes and hair, and blush like rosebuds. I wish you could have seen Ned's look when he told me her history, as far as he knew it; I really believe he had tears in his eyes."

"I wish you knew her name, or residence; something might then be done to assist her."

"O, she's not that kind of person at all; quite an independent, high-spirited girl, and one who has evidently seen better days."

"Well, if Mr. Franklin needs assistance in his charitable works, you can tell him you know one very willing to help." And the bright eyes looked brighter than ever as she spoke.

"And now I have another piece of news for you, Claudine: cousin Frank intends paying us a visit in a few weeks; he leaves Jamaica about the middle of next month."

"O, what good news, Albert! I knew he is coming to assist us to find Aunt Durell. Is it not so?"

"That is his intention; and, now you remind me of it, that young protege of Franklin's is the counterpart of Aunt Adela's portrait."

Lifting the light, he walked up to a large oil painting, and after attentively surveying it for a few minutes, turned to his sister, saying:

"It is her image! Claudine, would it not be strange if that girl should yet prove to be our cousin?"

"O, Albert, hush! What sufferings they must have endured, should it prove so! But it is impossible. You know they told us she went to New Orleans."

Some further conversation they held on the same subject, and then both concluded that the likeness was a mere accident. Albert kissed his sister, wished her good night, and left the room, and soon all was silent in their elegant and happy home.

We must now leave our friends in New York, and take a voyage over the waters.

It was Christmas eve, at the island of Jamaica, and on every side were seen preparations for the coming festival. The houses, decorated with oranges, presented to a stranger's eye a most extraordinary appearance, and filled Europeans with wonder at the endless profusion of beautiful fruit. Every door, every window, was festooned with the ripe oranges, and the people, both black and white, were in busy preparation for the morrow.

It is not our intention to give a description of the "Orange Festival," annually celebrated at these islands; for to those who have witnessed it, the account would be nothing new; and to those who have not, our words would give but a faint idea of the uproarious mirth, the general joy, the feasting, the dancing and the revelry that attend the "Gathering Celebration."

In one house there was little joy and less revelry. The master, Mr. Sutherland, wandered through his rooms, restless and discontented, finding fault with his servants, grumbling at the weather, and upbraiding his grandson for joining in the universal merriment.

Mr. Sutherland was suffering the pangs of an accusing conscience, and his ill tempered efforts to make others as uncomfortable as himself, produced their usual effect, and merely added to his own unhappiness. Thirty years before, his beautiful home had been the abode of peace and contentment, the happy dwelling-place of his wife and five as lovely children as ever blessed a parent's arms; and now he stood alone in the world—wife, children, all were gone, with the exception of one grandchild with him, and the orphans in New York. He was an Englishman by birth. Five-and-forty years before, he had come to Jamaica to transact business for a London firm; had fallen in love with the beautiful daughter of a rich Creole, married, and by various means became rich also. His wife had presented him with three sons and two daughters, and while the youngest was yet an infant, had died, and left him a lonely, disappointed man.

His two eldest children, Charles and Julia, married early in life; the one to the daughter of a New York merchant, and the other to the son of a neighboring planter. Charles accompanied his wife to her home, united with her father in business, and died when still a young man, leaving Albert and Claudine in independent circumstances. Julie Rae and her husband lived together for a few years, and then she returned a widow to her father's house, bringing one little son with her. Albert and Francis, the two next, both died in youth, and one daughter alone remained to comfort and bless her father's saddened life. This child had always been the father's pet; the youngest, the darling; on whom he centered all his future hopes; and this one was doomed to destroy all the bright air castles he delighted to build.

Mr. Sutherland had long cherished an intense hatred towards a French family of the name of Durell, and, as is usual in such cases; repeated aggravations on both sides had wrought a deadly enmity between the heads of each family. Mr. Durell had more than once drawn his sword on Mr. Sutherland, when defenceless; and the latter had openly avowed his intention of shooting the Frenchman whenever an opportunity offered.

But a few years passed without any fatal result from their hatred, and they at last found themselves surrounded with children, and too far advanced in years to indulge in feats of arms; but the dislike was increased instead of lessened, and age merely strengthened their animosity. What therefore was Mr. Sutherland's dismay on learning that his beloved Adela, the darling of his heart, had fled from her home, and was united to the son of his enemy! Vain would it be to attempt to describe his ungovernable rage, the horrible curses he bestowed on the hitherto cherished girl, and her young husband, or the threats of punishment for those who should dare to mention her name in his presence.

His whole nature changed, and from an agreeable, kind friend, and loving parent, he became peevish and sullen, passionate and tyrannical; and so unhappy did he make his widowed child, that, worn out with grief and ill treatment, she fell into a decline, and died some few months previous to the commencement of our tale. The old man liked her son; but the poor lad had from infancy endured care and sorrow, and he grew up to manhood prematurely sad and thoughtful, always grateful for his grandfather's kindness, and patient under his unjust abuses.

He had loved his Aunt Adela, and her sad fate had been the great grief of his life; but situated as he was, in absolute dependence on his relative for support, he was powerless to assist her, and could only weep over her distressing appeal to her father for help (written some ten years after her marriage, and on the death of her husband), and pray that he might one day be able to rescue her from poverty.

Six years had now elapsed, and no tidings of the disowned one were received, either by young Rae, in Jamaica, or his equally anxious cousins in New York. Frequent letters passed between them; and those of Francis were filled with inquiries, directions and entreaties to his relations to continue the search, and generally ended with the hope that he might one day come himself to join in it.

Albert and Claudine were almost in despair at the thought of ever finding their lost relative, and as all advertisements were unheeded and unanswered, at times fancied she must be dead. However, the news of their cousin's expected visit somewhat revived their hopes, and Albert made arrangements to accompany him to New Orleans, whence they had learned Madame Durell had gone soon after the death of her husband. Frank wrote to have all ready for an instant start on his arrival; and as he was now independent of his grandfather (an uncle having left him some property), he avowed his intention of spending both life and fortune in the search.

When Frank Rae first beheld his cousin Claudine, he was struck with her beauty, so different from that of the belles of his own island, and never wearied of admiring her beautiful blue eyes, bright curls and fair complexion. He almost regretted that he had hastened Albert's preparations, so that nothing delayed their departure, and sighed as he held the little hand of his cousin, and heard her sweet words of encouragement and hope.

"Good-by, darling," exclaimed Albert; "take good care of yourself; write punctually." And he added, in a whisper, "Be kind to Ned; he has promised to take my place in my absence, and you know my wishes."

They were gone. Claudine returned to the room lately echoing to the sound of their cheerful voices. It looked dull and lonely, and the tears rushed to her eyes as she collected several articles they had left scattered around. There were the maps they had been consulting, the pens, books and papers they had last been using, and she fell into a fit of musing very unusual for her.

"How different he is to what I had imagined, with such a world of sorrow in those beautiful eyes. Poor Frank! his has been a sad life; but I hope his cares will soon be at an end." And Miss Sutherland inwardly resolved to alleviate them as far as lay in her power.

Dangerous musings for you, Miss Claudine, who have so long cherished an ideal lover in your heart, whose chief attraction was his melancholy, which you, with your gaiety, was to dissipate!

We have too long neglected our young friend Julie and her mother; but we return to them, to find their circumstances much improved, their lives rendered happy, and all through the kindness of Edward Franklin. Charmed with Julie's innocence, her beauty and her filial love, the young lawyer had interested himself to procure her employment from those better able to reward her than he was; and at the time we return to them, they were very comfortably lodged in a quiet street, and the invalid mother surrounded with all that her situation required. She still looks pale and wan, still moves with trembling steps, and suffers pain; but the light of hope is in her eye, and cheerfulness sounds in her voice.

And Julie is changed—wonderfully changed. You would scarcely recognize the poor, pale, half clad girl of a few months previous, in the beautiful young woman who at times is seen entering the old dingy block on the street. And Edward Franklin wonders at the change; but still more at his own nervous anxiety on those days when he expects her to come with her beautifully written copies of atrociously scrawled originals. He would give freely all that the last "case" brought him to know the name of his fair employee; but Julie, for some reason best known to herself, evades all indirect allusions to her secret, and Edward is too much of a gentleman to make the inquiry in plain terms. But a new light shone in Julie's dark eyes, and strange emotions cause her heart to throb with mingled pain and pleasure, when her mother speaks in grateful terms of him who had rescued them from misery and wretchedness.

Poor girl! She knew not that it was love that caused her hand to tremble and her cheek to flush when his name was spoken; that made the few moments passed in his presence anxiously looked for rays of happiness; that filled her heart with joy at his praises; that illumined the old dingy building where they met, until it became in her eyes more beautiful than a fairy palace. She knew not that he longed to hear her light footstep, to look on her lovely countenance, to listen to the sound of her sweet toned voice, and meet the glances of those earnest eyes. She knew not that he multiplied directions, and gave unnecessary instruction, for the sole purpose of detaining her by his side one instant longer; that when she disappeared, all looked cold and gloomy. But she knew that he was kind and good; that a noble soul shone through the depths of those dark blue eyes, and intellect was stamped on the fair brow. She held him in her heart as some shrined saint, sacred and alone, to be worshipped at a distance and in humble silence.

"You look disappointed, my child," said her mother, as she one day returned from her walk to the office. "Is anything amiss?"

"Nothing, dear mother. I feel somewhat sadder to-day than usual, and then the walk seemed longer. You see I have even more than my usual number of pages." And she held up the roll of parchment.

But Julia did not say that Edward Franklin had been called away before she arrived there, and her disappointment at not seeing him had made the way seem long and her countenance sad.

"I am afraid I do not explain it distinctly enough," said Mr. Franklin's gentlemanly client. "You see the case stands thus," and he proceeded to demonstrate for the third time the flagrant infringement of his patented "useful invention" by Smith, Brown & Co.

"Ah—yes—I see it all," exclaimed the young lawyer, starting out of a reverie. "But I should like to take these papers to my office, and examine them at my leisure." And huddling them all together, he hastened away before the astonished gentleman could find words to arrest his retreat.

"I don't believe he half understands it now," he peevishly exclaimed. "But these lawyers are always in a hurry."

"Has any one called in my absence?" asked Edward Franklin, with assumed indifference.

"Only your copyist," answered his friend. "I gave her the papers you directed me to."

"Only my copyist!" thought Edward; "how provoking!—and she will not come again for a week. And a letter from Sutherland, too! 'Unsuccessful search—hope I visit Claudine often—soon coming home—dying to meet that black-eyed angel again.' Why, he has parted with the little wisdom he used to have." And Edward felt inclined to give way to a regular fit of ill humor.

But the dreaded week came to an end, and once more he was blessed with a sight of the beautiful girl who had so seriously interfered with the past seven days repose; but this day she bore away with her, all unconsciously, the words that decided their fate.

It was a long, kind letter, and Julie, after perusing it, sat for an hour in silent thought, while the tears were slowly stealing down her cheek and falling on the paper in her hand. But she knew her duty, and entering the room where her mother sat, placed the letter in her hands, and waited to hear her decision.

"God bless you, my darling!" were the mother's first words. "I shall now die happy, since a protector is found for my child."

"But, mama, Mr. Franklin has requested permission to visit you; your secret must then be known."

"It is proper it should be, Julie. You have my permission to write immediately, and state your name and residence. As to his other questions, I leave them to your own heart to decide."

That evening, at an early hour, Edward obeyed the gentle hint conveyed in the answer to his request.

With a beating heart, he ascended the several flights of stairs that led him to the "object sought," and was soon in the presence of the young girl. It was a small, plainly furnished room that he entered, where all around denoted the humble means of the occupants; but all was neat and nicely arranged, and, truth to tell, he forgot all minor matters in his great joy at the fulfilment of his long cherished wish.

Julia received him with a look of blushing consciousness that increased her beauty, and gave renewed strength to his hopes. After conversing about her mother for some minutes—whose indisposition had compelled her to retire—Edward crossed the room and seated himself beside his companion.

"I have not yet thanked you for the kind permission granted to my request, Miss Durell; and before I do so, I must inquire if another question, asked at the same time, will receive an equally favorable answer?"

Julie covered her face with her hands; and Edward, pitying her confusion, again spoke:

"Perhaps I have been too hasty in thus making known my sentiments; but time can add nothing to my love; and though I can offer you neither riches nor honors as my wife, a comfortable home and the devotion of a lifetime shall be yours." And encouraged by her silent emotion, he drew her gently towards him, and listened to the low, murmured words of gratitude and joy that gushed from her full heart.

After the first thrilling emotions had passed, Edward told her all his hopes and prospects, and repeated what he had before said, that her home would be a humble one. But what mattered that to one whose daily bread depended on her own exertions, whose whole life had been one scene of poverty, and who was now in the first enjoyment of "young love's dream?" She would have shared a dungeon with him, so that he but loved her. Long they conversed; and Julie each moment realized more fully the blessed certainty that her cares were at an end; that the strong arm, caressingly thrown around her, would shield her from life's troubles; that the warm heart beating at her side was hers, and hers only.

Julie had often contrasted the happy young lives of other children with her own prematurely careworn girlhood, and marvelled at the difference; but in the few first hours of her great joy, she experienced an excess of rapture more than sufficient to atone for long years of misery. Hers was a mind capable of appreciating the depth and strength of his unselfish love, and all the best emotions of her heart were called into action by her humble opinion of her own merits and entire conviction of his goodness. * *

"O, I am too happy, mama; my heart is too full of joy!" And she buried her face in her mother's bosom, and wept like a child.

"Such emotions do not last long, my child. You are very young, and have seen but little joy, and this great happiness overpowers you. But never forget that such joys are not to last forever." And the invalid sighed over her own shattered hopes, her gay girlhood; her marriage, with its few short years of bliss; and the long, sad months of her widowhood.

But the widow's trials were nearly ended, and her last days were to be spent in peace and contentment, surrounded with fond, loving hearts.

"I congratulate you with all my heart, Edward," warmly exclaimed Albert Sutherland, as they sat in the former's office, and talked over the events of the past few weeks.

"Thank you; I wish you had been as successful; but tell me more of the circumstances."

"Why, it all amounts to nothing. She left New Orleans three years ago, and her husband's relations appear quite indifferent as to her fate. They either could not, or would not, give us any information, but we have every reason to think that she must be in poverty, as her little property was gone ere she left there. It is all the more distressing, as her father is dead, and has left all he possessed to her and her children."

"I should not give up the search. You may find her where you least expect."

"We do not intend to. But now, Ned, when am I to be introduced to the fair Julie? And, by the way, you have not yet told me her other name. I presume she has one."

"O, there's no doubt about that," said Edward, laughing. "And here it is, in her own hand-writing."

"Julie Durell! For Heaven's sake, Edward, what have you been thinking of? Why, it is Aunt Adela's daughter!"

The young man caught up his hat and rushed out of the office, leaving his friend utterly bewildered at his impetuosity.

"Aunt Adela, dear Aunt Adela! don't you know me?" exclaimed Frank Rae, flinging his arms around her attenuated form, and pressing kiss after kiss on her pale lips, while his bosom heaved with emotion, and the tears rolled down his cheek.

"O, how I have longed for this hour!" he continued. "And now it comes when least expected. And my fair cousin, too," addressing Julie, who sat beside Albert, blushing, and about half ashamed of the cousinly liberty he had taken with her sweet lips; "how much joy has this day brought me!"

The widow and her child were immediately removed to Albert's home, and arrangements made for them to dwell with him and Claudine. Frank purposed, also, taking up his abode with them; and the family affairs in Jamaica were all settled by a trusty friend.

Madame Durell, by her father's will, received a handsome income during her life, but Julie was heiress to his splendid fortune, with the trifling reserve of a small legacy to each of her three cousins. "It is best for young men to work for their living," so read the old man's will; "and as my grandchild, Claudine Sutherland, is provided for, I leave all I possess to my long lost daughter, Adela, and her heirs, which she will receive with my blessing."

In the confusion and joy of making all these new family arrangements, Edward Franklin had been forgotten; at least by all but Julie, and to her his silence and absence were exceedingly painful. She longed to tell him all her joy, to set his heart at rest about the humble home he had so grieved about, to let him know he must no longer spend his bright days in a dingy office—in fact, to have him share her happiness.

What then was her distress when days passed on and still he came not; one, two weeks, and no word from him who occupied her every thought. She was in despair. Was he away? Had he forgotten her? Was he ill? At that thought she summoned courage to acquaint Albert with her uneasiness, and he, vexed with himself for neglecting his friend, hastened to learn the cause of his strange absence.

He found him in his office, hard at work with his pen, surrounded with books and papers, and looking pale and careworn. The usual friendly greeting passed, and then Albert delicately introduced the subject uppermost in his mind, while Edward listened, with his face averted, so that his companion could not judge of his emotions. At last, turning suddenly, he said:

"It is useless to speak of this, Albert. I have struggled hard to overcome my feelings; but, thank Heaven, the worst is past, and I can now look my fate calmly in the face. Your cousin and I have met for the last time."

"This will need some explanation, Edward," was Sutherland's half angry answer; for at that moment he thought of Julie's tearful eyes and quivering lips, as she told him her fears for the other's safety. "My cousin's happiness must not be sacrificed to an idle whim. If you have any good reason for your conduct, I must know it."

"Albert, you should know me too well to suppose that I would trifle with any woman's happiness—least of all, one like Miss Durell. But it would be unmanly in me to compel the fulfilment of a promise, made when our relative positions were very different; when she felt lively emotions of gratitude towards me, and when I even then blushed at my inability to place her in her proper sphere. The case is very different now. Beautiful and rich, she can choose a husband among the honored of our land, can grace the circle nature evidently designed her for; and shall I place a barrier in her path—a hindrance to her happiness? Never! Heaven knows I owe her too well." And overcome with his emotions, he buried his face in his hands, and turned away.

In an instant his friend was by his side.

"You will forgive my suspicion, Ned? I ought not to have judged you. But for Julie's sake, let her hear your determination from your own lips. See her once again; explain your reasons, and convince her, if you can, that you are right."

He had promised to come, Albert told her, and in feverish expectation, she passed the hours until his arrival; but now the time-piece on the parlor mantel showed the time approaching, and her anxiety increased as each footstep sounded on her ear. Very beautiful she looked, her dark eyes flashing with suppressed emotion, her fair cheek flushed with crimson, and her beautiful lips quivering with her momentary disappointment. Very lovely in the rich and elegant dress that displayed her graceful figure to perfection, and surrounded with the costly decorations that adorned the room. Her new life had given fresh charms to her beauty, and she revelled in the enjoyment of those appliances of wealth, of which her childhood had been deprived, but which, nevertheless, were her proper surroundings. But hark! he has come!

Springing from her seat, she met Edward with outstretched arms and a passionate exclamation of joy; while he, forgetful of the resolves of cooler moments, clasped her closely to his breast, and pressed warm kisses on her lip, cheek and brow.

"Why, O why, did you not come to share all my happiness?" she murmured, as, after leading her to a sofa, he seated himself beside her, and drew her fondly to him. "Why leave me all these long days to weary myself with watching for your appearance, and to weep over my disappointments?" And the tears rose to her eyes at the thought of all she had suffered. "And now you have come, you do not look happy, and you are thin and pale. Tell me, Edward, what has distressed you?"

"You have judged rightly, dearest; that I am sorrowful, and selfish, as it may seem, it is your good fortune that has made me so. We can no longer be to each other as we have been; no longer meet as we have done; and I must no longer hold you to an engagement that prevents your fulfilling the bright destiny there is in store for you. You are very young, Julie; scarcely more than a child, both in years and knowledge of the world; and were I to take advantage of your inexperience and gratitude, and make you my wife, the day would come when you would despise me for my presumption. I do not doubt that you love me now; but when sometime hence you are surrounded by men whose devotion is flattering to those they love; when you know and estimate rightly the advantages you possess, you will smile at your girlish passion for the poor lawyer, and in time entirely forget him."

"Never!" and the beautiful form before him, drawn to its fullest height, and quivering with emotion, looked anything but "childlike." The rosy color fled from her lip and cheek, and a look of terror was in her eyes, as if fearful of some calamity her utmost efforts could not avert. "Never! never shall you leave me and sacrifice our happiness to your ridiculous notions of honor, your wicked ideas of woman's vanity. No! sooner would I fling away the glittering trash that has betrayed your love, than consent to break the solemn pledge that bound my soul to yours."

"Julie, pray be calm," exclaimed her companion; for she looked and spoke like one bereft of sense.

"Not till you promise to speak no more of parting; to be kind and good as you were in those happy days when you loved me, when all was joy and peace, and no worldly thoughts came to disturb us. And this then is to be the end of all my bright hopes, my anxious thoughts and trembling fears; and you cast my love away as a thing of little value, a childish feeling, that will pass with the object from my mind! O, Edward! why did you save me from my misery to plunge me into worse?" and strength and passion gave way, and she sank weeping on the sofa.

"Julie dearest, look at me—speak to me; be angry if you will, but do not weep. You little know the agony it cost me to speak such sorrow, full words; but I recall them now, and nothing but your own will shall ever part us."

The tear stained face was buried in his bosom, the quivering form held in a close embrace, and in the rapture of that sweet reconciliation, both were repaid for the past agony.

"Albert tells me that Julie is to be married next month," said Frank Rae, as he sat beside Claudine's work-table one fine morning, and watched the operations of her embroidery needle.

"Yes, she told me the news several days ago." And Miss Sutherland's voice was calm, but the color deepened on her cheek, and the hand quivered that drew out a tangled thread.

"Edward Franklin appears to be a fine young man," he continued, while he watched with interest her increasing confusion; "and if all Albert says in his praises is true, he well deserves Julie's love."

"I believe Albert does not exaggerate his merit. He loved Julie when she was poor and friendless; and when she became rich, most nobly offered to free her from her engagement, fearing that her gratitude for his past kindness might influence her choice. I am glad she refused—such love ought to be rewarded."

"Ought all true love to be rewarded, cousin Claudine?"

"Yes, when it is true."

"Then I claim some return for all I have bestowed on my cousin Claudine." And Frank drew his chair a little closer to the work-table, and laid his hand on the little fingers so nervously attempting to perform their duty. "You cannot have been blind, dear one, to the fact that your society has become each day more precious to me; that while with you I lose that sadness early grief had made habitual; in fact, that with you rests my future happiness or misery. I have fancied that your efforts to dissipate my sadness were sometimes made to repay my partiality; but if they proceeded solely from your natural kindness, without reference to my affection, hesitate not to say so; I deserve the punishment for my vanity."

There was little need of words; for in that blushing, downcast countenance, and heaving bosom, he read a favorable answer to his wishes.

"My own, my own!" he whispered, as he folded her in his arms. "Your precious love will banish all sad remembrances. Heaven grant that I may never cause a sorrowful pang to your gay, young heart."

It was the wedding day; a bright, sunny afternoon as ever cheered a young bride's heart. In a few hours the solemn words were to be spoken that would link their fates forever with those beloved ones on whom they had bestowed their wealth of young affection; and the two fair girls sat together in their room and interchanged fond thoughts, and bright hopes of future happiness.

Very different they appeared, as they sat side by side in that beautiful chamber, where so many of Claudine's happy girl days had been passed—very different, but O, how beautiful! Julie, with her calm, still look of perfect content, and the love-light burning in the depths of her large dark eyes, looked like an eastern princess as she reclined on the velvet cushions of her lounge, and arranged sweet buds and glossy leaves to adorn her cousin's bright curls. And Claudine, with her blue eyes sinking beneath Julie's earnest gaze, and the bright crimson mounting to her forehead, held in her hand a tiny note, the bearer of sweet love words from her fond young betrothed. In all parts of the chamber are seen preparations for the bridal, from the heavy travelling trunks that stand open and half packed, to the rich white dresses, the delicate gloves, and tiny slippers. * *

"The wedding is over, the guests are all gone," and the newly married couples are about bidding adieu to home and friends, to wander for a few months 'neath the "sunny skies of Italy." There are mingled smiles and tears, and fond charges, and loving promises, ere they depart, and Albert assures them he will "take the best possible care of Aunt Adela," and shakes hands with the two bridegrooms, and kisses the two brides, and they drive off, while he hurries back to console the weeping mother, parted for the first time from her darling child, to cheer her wish, hopes of the happy future in store for her, when a few short months shall have passed, and her child shall have returned to her side.

HANDEL AND HANGING.

A wretched man—a private soldier—having to be hanged the other day in the Crimea for an uncommonly atrocious and cowardly murder, a band, as we are informed, preceded the prisoner to the place of execution, playing "the Dead March!" No doubt this was the Dead March in Sawl, that sublime composition of Handel's; so grand, so solemn, so funereal, yet so triumphal. This is just the glorious measure whereunto you would bear a hero in honor to his grave; but is it precisely the tune to which you would lead a criminal to the gallows? Those who selected it for that purpose would probably, with a similar taste in music and appreciation of Handel, drum a rogue out of the regiment to "See, the Conquering Hero Comes!"—Punch.

CHILDREN'S TEACHING.

In passing up the street the other day, we met two little girls of some seven or eight summers, who, unmindful of what was going on, seemed as happy as two larks, and looked as beautiful as they seemed happy. Stopping at one of our candy shops, one of them made a purchase of candy—a large, nice-looking stick—and breaking it, gave her companion half, saying as she did it, "Here, Mary, you may have the largest half, as you are the smallest." Dear, artless child! what a lesson of usefulness was contained in thy simple words! God bless you, and enable you through life to manifest the same gentle and sweet spirit! "Here, Mary, you may have the largest half, as you are the smallest." What teachers children sometimes are!—Fall River Monitor.

We are only interested in others in proportion to the interest we take in ourselves, and look for in consequence from them.

THE MELODY OF SPRING.

BY H. WARD.

Am.—"The Boney Boat."

In lordly halls of splendid pride,
Let favored minstrels sing;
Give me, in full and flowing tide,
The melody of Spring.

The morning songs of playful birds,
That roam on buoyant wing,
Bring music sweeter far than words—
Blithe melody of Spring!

They cheer the ploughman in his toil,
Ay, happier than a king;
He blesses, while he turns the soil,
The melody of Spring.

The sick at heart, who feel the pain
Of disappointment's sting,
Revives with joy, to hear again
The melody of Spring.

O'er all the hills and vales around,
The woodland echoes ring;
We hear in every dulcet sound,
The melody of Spring.

It brings to mind the sunny hours
Of life's young blossoming;
While nature wakes, with charming powers,
The melody of Spring!

OUR OPPOSITE NEIGHBORS.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

FOR three or four weeks, my maid Felice and myself have been watching the movements of the family who have recently taken the handsome brick house opposite. We saw the arrival, the moving of the furniture, and all the appointments and appendages. They were unexceptionable. When I say that the house is in Roulstone Street, a quarter of the city which is indisputably genteel, being the very centre of wealth, fashion and refinement, the reader will be satisfied that there is nothing further to say.

For myself, I have only to say that I am a single lady of a handsome property, and of considerable personal attractions, although of an age which I do not choose to have stated in the census reports. As I am not writing a history of myself, I feel justified in holding back some particulars which my neighbors sometimes inquire into rather too curiously. Felice is often asked what rouge, hair-dyes, and other toilet appendages, I most patronize; and it is but a few days since Mrs. Flimsy, my next door neighbor, above, inquired if I wore a wig. Thanks to Bogle's exquisite skill, she will never find out. Impertinent curiosity!

Well, as I said, our curiosity has been very much excited by the strange demonstrations at the opposite house. I am dying to get acquainted with them; but I am mortified to see that they close the blinds, or drop the curtains, whenever Felice and I take our accustomed seat at the front parlor windows, which, being a little higher than theirs, would give us a delightful opportunity of reconnoitering.

For some time, we could not ascertain the name; but at length, a beautiful silver plate was placed on the door, and Felice, pretending to be frightened at a dog, as she was passing the house, ran up the steps, and found it was St. Leon. The handsome gentleman who goes away every morning is of course Mr. St. Leon. He is very graceful and dignified. Mrs. St. Leon, too, is very beautiful; and there is a young lady there with long curls, whom we take to be her sister; and there is a very lovely child, who comes toddling to the door every time the father goes out, and kisses her little fat hand to him as he goes down the steps. As we cannot ascertain the younger lady's name, Felice and I have concluded to call her Fannie for the present. There has been a very young gentleman walking up and down Roulstone Street, every day since the removal. He comes up on our side, and down on the St. Leon side, looking melancholy and interesting. We fancy him to be a lover of Fannie's. This impression is strengthened by seeing her dart suddenly to the window one day after he had passed, and strain her eyes in the direction in which he vanished.

Within a short time, we have seen a carriage driven to the door, almost immediately on the departure of Mr. St. Leon, and an aged gentleman, closely wrapped up, has been assisted up the long steps. The driver then goes off, but punctually comes back before Mr. St. Leon's hour for returning. Mrs. St. Leon always comes to the door, and her face bears marks of excessive weeping. Felice with her usual aptitude, has given this old gentleman the name of Summer; and to the pale youth, who walks so languishingly, she has given the name of Spring.

For a long time we were unable to connect Mr. Summer with the family; but finally concluded that he must be Mrs. St. Leon's father, and that the match not suiting him, he only comes at such times as he knows her husband is absent. I wonder if we have really hit upon the right interpretation. Without the assistance of Felice, I should never have found out the whole of this little romance; but Felice is a very jewel of servants; and I reward every one of her discoveries with some present which excites her gratitude so much, that she generally taxes her ingenuity in a very remarkable manner for the rest of the week.

Monday Feb. 22.—Mr. St. Leon has just gone from dinner. Mrs. St. Leon is looking anxiously from the window. Fannie and the child accompanied Mr. St. Leon to the door, where, Felice thinks, he pressed her hand rather warmly for a wife's sister to permit. Certainly he is fond of her. I wonder that Mrs. St. Leon allows Fannie to go to the door so often with him. A carriage stops. Her father has arrived, but looks very sad and feeble. I should not wonder, if, after all, his poor daughter has made a bad choice of her husband. He is probably a sad rogue. Why does her father permit Fannie to stay with her?

Tuesday.—Yesterday I gave Felice my brown satin. To-day she made a discovery. Mr. Spring, as she calls the pale young man, rung at the door opposite, and was admitted by the servant. Felice is certain that Mrs. St. Leon was in the parlor when he went in; and that she rose and threw her arms about his neck and kissed him. Really, I think our opposite neighbors are no better than they should be. I shall certainly never call there; and yet it would be a satisfaction to find out what kind of a family they are. Felice was in the post-office to-day when the servant carried in a letter to go by mail. She pretended to be looking at an advertisement over the letter-box; but in reality she was reading the address. It was written in a very fine hand and directed to St. Leon Kinniard, London. Who can that be?

Evening.—The curtains are up in the opposite parlor. Fannie sits there with Mrs. St. Leon's baby on her lap. Mr. St. Leon is just going up the steps. Good Heavens! He is in the parlor, and positively kissing Fannie! I blush while I write it. Poor Mrs. St. Leon! I pity her, and yet she did so wrong to marry without her father's consent! But she has had her retribution.

Sunday.—I intended going to church to-day, but I am so intensely occupied with my opposite neighbors, that I must stay at home. Besides I have a cold, and if Rev. Mr. Spriggins calls here to-morrow, of course I shall give one of these reasons.

They are going to ride to church! Here comes Mr. St. Leon. He is waiting on Fannie into the carriage first. Mrs. St. Leon sits on the front seat and the servant girl beside her! Felice says that is probably to keep her in her place; as family secrets might be told out of the house if they were not kind to her. Felice shall get acquainted with that girl.

Monday.—I am about tired of conjecturing what that family can mean by their strange and extraordinary conduct. Nothing but the most reckless disregard of the proprieties of life can account for it in the least. This morning a lady closely veiled entered the house, and we saw her go into the parlor, where she fell into Mr. St. Leon's arms. His wife going in at that moment, she deceitfully turned to her in the same way, but evidently with less cordiality. What can one think of them?

Wednesday.—I find, by Felice, who has been over to call on the servant, that we have gone all wrong in our conjectures. The very pretty little romance which Felice and I have been three weeks weaving, has turned into a very ordinary, every day affair.

Felice thinks that the girl put on a great deal of mock dignity, when she told her how she had mistaken the character of the family. It seems that "Fannie," is after all, the true Mrs. St. Leon, and the child is hers, too! The lady whom we called Mrs. St. Leon is sister to the husband, not to the wife; and the old gentleman is Mr. St. Leon's father, instead of hers. "Mr. Spring," as Felice calls, is a brother to the ladies, and he is extremely dissipated. The husband will not receive him at his house, but Mrs. St. Leon disobeys his express commands in this respect, and often sees her brother. In this she is advised and upheld by her husband's father, who believes that he will finally be reformed by kindness. The old gentleman's afternoon visits are with special reference to "Mr. Spring." Finally the lady who entered the house on Monday, was Mr. St. Leon's own sister.

So ends our romance, and I am so angry at finding everything so natural, that I have refused to give Felice the mulberry cloak which she has been teasing me for so long. Heigh ho! I will never undertake to guess histories through the windows again. My "occupation's gone!"

A KISS FOR A BLOW.

A visitor once went into a school in Boston, where he saw a boy and a girl on one seat who were brother and sister. In a moment of thoughtless passion, the little boy struck his sister. The little girl was provoked, and raised her hand to return the blow. Her face showed that rage was working within, and her clenched fist was aimed at her brother, when her teacher caught her eye. "Stop, my dear," said he, "you had better kiss your brother than strike him." The look and the word reached her heart. Her hand dropped. She threw her arms around his neck and kissed him. The boy was moved. He could have stood against the blow, but he could not withstand a sister's kiss.—H. W. Wright.

WASHINGTON'S PERSONAL APPEARANCE.

Mr. Everett's beautiful and truthful description of the personal appearance of Washington, reminds us of a remark made by an officer of the Revolution—the late John Marston, of Massachusetts, who had the good fortune to be a spectator in the House of Lords, in the year 1783, when the Prince of Wales (the late George the Fourth) came of age. The hall was crowded with the most distinguished noblemen and gentlemen of the kingdom—with great generals, admirals and civilians—with all that England contained that day of eminence, dignity and rank, assembled to behold the heir apparent of the British crown take his seat for the first time as one of the hereditary legislators of the realm. Mr. Marston scanned the brilliant assemblage with a critical eye, and was deeply impressed with the lofty bearing of many of the noble personages who composed it; but, said he in describing the scene to his friends, "I looked around in vain for a Washington! There was not a man in the House of Lords that day, who in personal appearance, dignity of manners, and majesty of deportment, could be compared with General Washington."—Evening Gazette.

NICELY SOLD.

A Liverpool paper, under the head of "Strange Stupidity," tells how a goeling of a gentleman was recently served in one of the banks of that city. He had entered the institution with the intention of depositing £400, one half of which sum was in gold, and the other half in notes. The latter he placed on the counter beside him, and commenced counting the gold, when a bystander touched him on the shoulder and called his attention to the beautiful decorations of the ceiling, and their remarkable effect. The gentleman looked up, in obedience to this kindly suggestion, and having fully admired the artistic effect, looked down again. His feelings underwent a very disagreeable change when he discovered that his notes and his polite friend had both disappeared, nor had the admirer of ornamental architecture or decoration heard a word of either at last dates.

INSURANCE QUIBBLE.

The agent of the Transatlantic Telegraph Company has just returned from England with a flea in his ear. It seems the lost cable was insured in England; but when application was made for the payment of insurance, the company declined on the ground that the cable was exactly where the parties wanted it—at the bottom of the ocean!

These British insurers must have taken a hint from the story of the negro sailor cook, who approached the captain one morning with an anxious face, and said: "Massa, be anything lost when you knows where 'tis?" "No, you fool," said the captain. "Berry glad to hear it," said Cuffy, "cos our new copper tea kettle just fall overboard. But 'tain't lost, massa, cos we know where 'tis."—N. Y. Mirror.

Right and duty are like two palm trees, which bear fruit only when growing side by side.

HOUSE-CLEANING SONG.

BY BERTHA BUEDOCK.

House-cleaning Jubilee is come!
Is n't the weather glorious?
Now turn the house up every room,
Raise a mass uproarious.
Dust, and brush, and scrub, and clean;
Let the neighbors know we mean
All the household shall be seen—
Make a noise victorious!

Just after Lent we do begin
(Providence permitting)
To dust, and scrub, and paint, and clean,
Make things fit to live in.
Dust, and brush, and scrub, and clean,
Cellar to the garret beam;
(Hope the neighbors know we mean
T' hold a hubbub glorious!)

From garret roof to cellar floor,
Spiders shan't be spinning,
Nor cobwebs hang behind the door—
Make a new beginning.
Dust, and brush, and scrub, and clean;
(All except the brain, we mean—
There alone are cobwebs seen—
Dusting that's inglorious!)

EMILY BALL'S COUNTRY SCHOOL.

BY MARY L. MEANY.

MRS. BALL and her eldest daughter sat together in the deepening twilight of an April evening, at times conversing earnestly, then relapsing into silent and apparently painful thought; for a shade of gloom rested on the young girl's countenance, and the mother often turned anxious glances from her thoughtful companion to her other darling, a bright little girl of nine years, who was seated on a low chair by her side.

Theirs was the history of thousands in our broad land. Surrounded with comforts during the lifetime of the husband and father, at his death they found themselves destitute save for the house in which they lived and its furniture. During the year that had since elapsed, unceasing had been their efforts to obtain a livelihood. Mrs. Ball was fortunate in obtaining the plain sewing of three or four families, and this, together with the school which Emily determined to open, they calculated would amply suffice for the support of their little family of three. But Emily's plan proved a total failure. She was too young and inexperienced to succeed in her undertaking in a city abounding with public and private schools; and after a patient trial of six months, finding it vain to hope for any considerable accession to her pupils, who consisted only of a few little boys and girls of the neighborhood, she closed her school, and engaged to make various ornamental articles for a fancy store.

It was a toilsome and unremunerative occupation, and Mrs. Ball soon perceived the effect of such close application on her delicate Emily. She had lost three children by consumption; her husband had also fallen a victim to that dreaded scourge. No wonder her fears were ever on the alert for the two loved ones remaining to her; and seeing her patient Emily growing thinner and paler from unaccustomed confinement, she resolved on some other course ere it should prove too late. On this evening, therefore, as on several preceding ones, they were discussing the subject. The most feasible plan Mrs. Ball at first thought would be to sell their pretty little dwelling and remove to a location where they could open a small store. But after mature consideration, they agreed that it was too hazardous to embark their all in a business of which neither had any knowledge. Besides, the part of the town in which they resided being yet new and but partially built up, they could not hope to obtain any considerable sum for their dwelling. Mrs. Ball had been warned of this by several friends, who suggested that it would be better to rent her house and find lodgings in the neighborhood for a time, till property should increase in value.

"I wonder what rent we could get for it?" said Emily, as her mother repeated the advice she had received.

"Mr. Jones told me to-day that if I decide on renting it out, he will take it at ten dollars per month, which is more than any house of its size in the square rents for; but then this is so prettily finished."

"And what did you tell him?" queried the daughter, anxiously.

"That I would be glad to have his family here if I conclude on letting it. We could easily hire two or three rooms in the neighborhood for half the rent he offers, or even less. And five or six dollars a month would be a snug little addition to our income; but there will be many inconveniences." And Mrs. Ball ceased abruptly, with a heavy sigh. There was silence for some moments. At length Emily said, hesitatingly:

"I have been thinking, mother, that if you had no objection to go into the country, we could perhaps get a little cottage for a low rent, and it would be much more comfortable than living in rooms."

"So it would, my dear, but there are objections to this plan also. In the first place, how would it be about my work? I could not give that up. Then Anna would have to leave school and—"

"O, sister could teach me at home, mother," interrupted little Anna, her eyes sparkling at the thought of the country.

"Yes, darling," replied her sister. "And now that I have mentioned it, dear mother, let me assure you I have been pondering on this plan for several days, and arranging it very nicely in my mind."

"Building castles, or rather cottages in the air," and Mrs. Ball smiled somewhat sadly.

"Nay, but on a very solid foundation," replied Emily, with a return of her former gaiety. "If you approve of my plan, suppose you ask Farmer Blake, next time he comes, if there is any place in his neighborhood we could rent—you know he has spoken of a village not far from his farm. Then perhaps I could get a school that would bring in something; or I could make up things for the stores, which Anna or I could bring in in the stage, or perhaps he would allow Anna to come sometimes in his wagon."

"That would answer very well for my sewing," said the mother; "but as for your work for the stores, I am determined you shall not undertake it again. If you could get a small school—but we will not make any calculations till we can speak to Mr. Blake."

Very impatiently did the little family await the arrival of the farmer, who served them with butter every Friday, and when he came, Emily hurriedly acquainted him with her project, and asked his opinion. Farmer Blake, whose pleasant, good-humored face and manner betokened a kind and genial disposition, listened attentively to the young girl, whose changed appearance, since her father's death, had often excited his compassion.

"Well, I don't know how it would be," he began; "but we must talk it over a little. George," to the boy in his wagon, "you know the few other customers remaining to be served; suppose you go to them and then drive round again, and I'll be ready to go."

George nodded, and with a word to the two large, well fed horses, was on his way, while the farmer followed Emily into the house. After exchanging a friendly greeting with Mrs. Ball, he turned at once to Emily, and said:

"As to a school, I hardly think there would be a chance of success. They have one in the village that is but poorly supported, and as for our immediate neighborhood, there are children enough who never saw the inside of a school-house, but their fathers are too miserly or too careless to attend to that. I wish we could raise a school, for my little ones cannot go regularly to the village, but I am afraid it would be no use to try."

Emily's countenance fell, and she could not trust her voice to speak. The farmer saw how deep was her disappointment, and racked his brain to devise some plan to further her desires.

"I don't know but you might get a few scholars," he said, after musing silently some minutes, "if you would take produce or anything of that kind in lieu of cash."

"It would be just the same to us," replied Mrs. Ball.

"Strange how unwilling some persons are to pay for anything," continued the farmer. "But let us make a calculation—have you a scrap of paper handy?"

Emily handed him a sheet of paper, and taking out his pencil, he inquired "what will be your terms, Miss Emily?" with so comical an expression that, despite her anxiety, she smiled as she answered, "whatever were customary in the country."

"Well, in the village school the charge is one dollar and a half a quarter for the little ones, two for the next class, and three for the largest. Will that suit you, Emily?"

She bowed assent.

"Then I have two for each class, that will be three and four and six—thirteen dollars—cash, of course, for I have no fancy for trading. Then my nearest neighbor, Lewis, his five children will be ten dollars, and he will pay cash, I am pretty sure, or he would supply you with wood for a part of it. There is Thompson, the next, if you'll take butter—and theirs is as good as ours—they will probably send their children; and there's a Mrs. Lee, I do think she would send her niece, if you'd 'take it out,' as they say, in milk and cream. Yes, I'll talk it over with some half dozen of them, and see if we can't manage it. My wife would be delighted."

"But a house—how are we to obtain that?" asked Mrs. Ball.

"O, for a house, I have one that will just suit you. I had it built for a girl my wife brought up, but her husband made up his mind to go farther off, so it has been vacant this year or more. 'Tis a snug frame cottage with four rooms, and well fitted up with closets and such conveniences, for my wife took an interest in it.

"What will be the rent?" inquired Mrs. Ball, after she and her daughter had expressed their pleasure at this prospect.

"O, for the matter of rent, it isn't worth any," said the good-natured farmer, his ruddy cheeks assuming a deeper hue; "but I suppose you would not like to have it without rent, so I will say two dollars per month."

"Two dollars per month?" echoed Emily. "O, Mr. Blake, that is almost the same as no rent at all."

"You will think it quite enough when you see the place, for it is small and rough compared to what you're used to. But still it is comfortable, and a coat of whitewash will make it look like new. Then there is a strip of ground surrounding it that you can garden in, Emily, and a lot in the rear that will grow enough vegetables nearly for the whole summer."

The return of the wagon here interrupted the farmer, and he departed, promising to learn more about the prospect for a school by the succeeding Friday. The longed-for day came at length, though little Anna was confident it never would, and the farmer's pleasant face betokened good news.

"Well, friends, it's all settled, and you can move as soon as you like."

"O, how can we ever thank you?" began Mrs. Ball.

"Thank me for what I would like to know? I guess I'm the one obliged, in having a school opened that my young ones can go to. My wife is overjoyed; and most of the neighbors will send, as they won't have to pay cash. When can we expect you?"

"We can settle our affairs here in a few days," said Mrs. Ball. "One of our neighbors will take the horse, and probably will buy most of the furniture that we will not take with us."

"Then suppose I send my big team early next Friday to take out the things you will want; and I can take you all out in the wagon, for the stage will not go within a mile of your cottage."

Mrs. Ball thankfully embraced this proposal, and he took leave. Thankful as the little family were for the prospect opening to them, little Anna was the only heart that retained its buoyancy during that busy week. Every article was endeared to the widowed mother as associated with the loved and lost; and the affectionate Emily participated in her feelings. The furniture they deemed suitable for the cottage having been selected, the remainder was disposed of at fair prices among the neighbors.

Early on Friday the "big team" drove to the door, and after the allotted articles had been carefully stowed into it, there was time left for a few parting calls on particular friends, ere the arrival of the wagon, in which they were soon comfortably seated and on their way to the country. They arrived at the farm-house before sunset, and having taken supper, the strangers went to inspect their new residence, accompanied by nearly all the farmer's family. It was pleasantly situated a little back from the road leading to the village, and its snowy walls and palings (for Mr. Blake had had the whole newly whitewashed) presented a pleasing contrast to the verdant fields around, and to the woods in the background now decked in spring's lively green. A few peach, pear and apple trees opened their dainty blossoms to the breeze, which they filled with fragrance; and a grape-vine was already putting forth its tender leaves around the arbor that shaded the back porch and pump-house. Little Anna tried the pump, and finding that it worked easily, brought to each of the party a draught of the clear, cold water, which was pronounced delicious.

"What a luxury that will be during the warm season, mother?" said Emily, who was delighted with everything.

They now entered the cottage, which they found as neat and comfortable as they had been led to anticipate. Here their household goods were safely stowed, Mr. Blake having run over on the arrival of the team to see that all went right. It was decided that the Balls should remain at the farm-house for some days, during which they might arrange their little household, and with the help of Mr. Blake's sister sow the seeds and plant the flowers, which were easily procurable, in the garden. What a pleasant task was this for Emily, with a cheerful companion as Miss Jones proved, and with Anna almost wild with childish glee, to assist in her work!

All was soon ready for the family to remove from the kind farmer's to the cottage, which looked so pretty and homelike, that even Mrs. Ball ceased to think regretfully of the home they had been obliged to abandon. The school was soon found to flourish beyond what they could have expected.

Emily was unremitting in her efforts to do good among those with whom her lot seemed now cast. At first, her task was by no means an easy one. Some of her pupils were froward and refractory, some dull and indolent; and the parents, with the exception of the Blakes and Lewises, seemed to expect her to perform miracles in their regard. By degrees, however, she succeeded in winning the respect and affection of her young charges; and then her duties were comparatively light. Her piano was an efficient agent in her plans. The promise of a few tunes would keep up the flagging attention of the dull, and still the rude and boisterous. Flowers, too, the natural playthings of children, what sweet ministers to those young spirits did Emily make them! Rambling in the dim old woods in search of wild-flowers, how easy to lead the opening heart to the love and worship of Him whose sweet creations seem designed to reveal him to us in a gentle, familiar light, while the grand and sublime in nature teach us to bow down awe-stricken before his mighty power! Yet there were some who regarded all this as a mere waste of time, unwilling or unable to perceive that those young hearts and minds were gathering lore superior to that of books, to which they applied with fresh vigor after their pleasant recreations. Others judged more wisely; and their encouragement enabled Emily to persevere in her course, until finally the change apparent in many of the children, and their rapid progress in learning, satisfied even the fault-finders.

One day Joe Wiggins, a boy of thirteen, whose continual toil and jaded appearance often excited Emily's pity, came with a load of wood from Farmer Lewis. It chanced that Emily was playing on the piano, as usual before dismissing her school, and attracted by the unwonted sounds, he stepped quietly to the open window of the little parlor. She observed and bade him enter. After playing a few airs, she dismissed the children, and perceiving that Joe was gazing intently on a crayon-drawing, asked if he was fond of such things. Without turning his head, and apparently speaking to himself rather than replying to her, he muttered:

"Yes, I dream of such pictures, and I try to make them for myself; but it's no use trying."

"Have you ever learned drawing?"

Starting at the question as if now only aware of her presence, with a strange smile and a short "no ma'am," he was hastening away; but Emily insisted that he should rest while eating a piece of pie she brought to him. Her gentle and friendly manner seemed to impress him, for after a moment's thought he offered a sort of excuse for his short answer, adding that he never learned anything except a little reading, writing and ciphering from a schoolmaster who once boarded with his parents. When Emily offered to instruct him in drawing, his face brightened, but in an instant was clouded again as he replied, sadly:

"You are very kind, miss, and I should like to learn, but I have no time."

"Could you not spare an hour in the evening?" said Emily.

He shook his head slowly, and murmuring a word of thanks, sprang into the wood-cart and was soon lost to sight. Emily was still gazing after him, when Sarah Jones came over from the farm-house, and from her she obtained some particulars about the boy who had excited her compassionate interest. He was the oldest child of a man known for miles around as "Singing Wiggins." A farmer well to do in the world, his whole aim seemed to be to render his own existence, and still more that of his family, as irksome and wretched as that of the vilest slave. From morn till eve, whether in his fields watchful that none of his hands lost a moment, or in the market constantly on the lookout to obtain the highest price for his produce, he gave himself no rest. His wife, with only the assistance her oldest daughter, a child of eleven, could give, had the manifold duties of farm-house and dairy to attend to. Joe, between his work at home and the occasional services for which the neighbors would hire him, was constantly employed. Even the two youngest children were made "useful" in feeding the chickens, bringing in wood, etc. Still, their father was afraid they would grow up lazy and good-for-nothing! When Emily had first opened her school, Mr. Blake had tried to prevail on his avaricious neighbor to send his children, but he scouted the idea. In fact, his hatred to "book larnin'" amounted to a mania. He made it his boast that all the knowledge he had was to count up money, and that his children should have no more. Joe, as we have seen, succeeded in acquiring the rudiments of knowledge through a schoolmaster, who, on leaving, further gratified the studiously inclined boy by a present of a set of school-books, from which, however, he could gain but little, as it was only occasionally that he could steal a few minutes, even at night, to devote to them.

It was not an encouraging prospect truly, but Emily resolved to make an effort in behalf of the boy. Accordingly, the next afternoon she went with Sarah Jones to call on Mrs. Wiggins. Taking a cross path through the woods, they soon reached the farm. Emily had pictured it to herself as a forlorn, dungeon-like place; but the house was in tolerable repair, and though there was no flower-garden (Mr. Wiggins was too great an utilitarian for that), a smooth grass-plot, in the centre of which stood a blooming rose-bush, gave a pretty aspect to the place. Emily was rather surprised that they were allowed; but was told by Sarah that the "groom" was for bleaching, and the rose-tree, which Joe had brought from the woods, was suffered to remain at the solicitations of Agnes, the youngest child, to whom the father sometimes yielded.

Mrs. Wiggins, a pale, worn woman, received her visitors hospitably, and invited them to stay for supper, which would soon be ready, adding as an inducement to Emily that if she mentioned it, perhaps "father" would consent to send the two youngest children to school, which was her earnest desire. When Emily spoke of Joseph, the mother sighed and said she had a great deal of trouble about him; he was naturally one of the best hearted children, but his father crossed him so much that he was growing sulky and stubborn—at least to his father, for he was always ready to do anything for her.

While they were speaking, the farmer came in. He was surprised to see Emily, whom he instantly recognised as the "schoolma'am" he had once met at Mr. Blake's, and whom he rather liked, as, to use his own words, she was "a clever young woman, with none of your stuck-up airs." He therefore said he was glad to see her, and wrung her hand so heartily in proof of his pleasure, that her small fingers ached for an hour after. Emily, however, was willing to bear the pain, as the warmth of his welcome encouraged her to speak of the children during the repast, at which none of them were present. But argument and persuasion were of no avail. He was "set agin learnin'; poor country folks had no use of it—it only put them above themselves, and made them good for nothin'. None of his folks had schoolin', and he reckoned his young 'uns were no better than 'em—so there was an end on't."

Emily, despite this plain hint, ventured to speak of Joe, but was interrupted with:

"Look'e here, don't you talk of that ere boy, for it makes me mad, and I don't want to say nothin' to hurt you, ma'am, or miss, I s'pose would be more like the thing—"

"O, call me Emily," interrupted our heroine, eager to ingratiate herself on account of the children. "I dislike formality among friends."

"Well, now, that's what I like," said the farmer, so evidently gratified that Sarah was fearful her companion's fingers would undergo another pressure; but the distance between them fortunately prevented it. "But as I was sayin', Emily—that's a pretty name, too—about that boy of mine, see what learnin' has done for him. Why, mother knows it herself, though she's always takin' his part, and wantin' him to get more—I see him gettin' it, though. You never see sich a changed critter since that plagy school-master put it in his head to want schoolin'. He's grum and ugly as he can be, just 'cause he wants to go to school, or be mopin' over books to lose his time. I'll have no sich foolin'—but it does make me mad to see him so cross-grained, and I can't beat it out of him, neither."

Here Sarah Jones, whose risible emotions had been several times excited, burst into a fit of laughter. The farmer looked at her in amazement.

"I wonder if a bad temper was ever cured by beating!" she said to him; "and the idea of calling such names to poor Joe, the kindest, most obliging boy in the whole neighborhood!"

"O yes, you all think him mighty fine, and that was what pooty nigh spoilt him first, and the plagy books finished it."

Emily hinted that a little indulgence might be beneficial to the lad, especially as knowledge was all he wanted; and when the father replied that he had other things for him to do, she suggested that the evenings might be pleasantly and usefully spent in his own way.

"O yes, yes, I know all about that. Set moping over books half the night, and then lay abed till dinner-time. That wont do for me, certainly."

Emily was obliged to yield the point. For a month more, she heard nothing of "Stingy Wiggins" or his family.

One afternoon, having extended her ramble with her pupils further than usual, she was hurrying alone through the woods, when loud cries from Wiggins's house arrested her attention. She stopped hesitatingly, but recognising the voice of Mr. Wiggins, she discarded all scruples and hastened in. It was a painful scene on which she entered. Little Agnes was lying upon the bed with her mother hanging wildly over her, her father, pale and haggard, standing in speechless distress, Joe kneeling beside his mother weeping convulsively, and the two others standing apart pale and tearful. On perceiving Emily, Joe sprang up hopefully, and quickly informed her of what had happened.

The little girl had been sick for some days, and that afternoon was left in her father's charge, with strict cautions not to give him anything, as he was entirely ignorant of medicines. In the interim, however, the child had a violent spell of coughing, and anxious to give her some relief, the father seized a bottle of laudanum, supposing it to be cough drops, and gave a half spoonful. Just as she swallowed it, Joe entered, and perceiving the open bottle and the spoon, cried out in alarm. His cries brought in his mother, who, on learning of the mistake, could only cry and caress the child who was already sinking into the fatal stupor. Emily's arrival was providential. With quick presence of mind, she gave the simple remedies at hand, and are she left the house she knew that danger was past.

The father's gratitude to the preserver of his favorite child was deep and lasting. Emily, by the mother's desire, took advantage of it to press him again to give his children some little education, and unwilling to refuse her, he yielded. He became reconciled to Joe, too, and gave him permission to attend Emily's school all the fall and winter, if he chose, for he could do without his help!

Joe and the two little girls, Becky and Agnes, were sent to school; and their progress was satisfactory to the delighted mother, and equally so, it was suspected, to the father, though when spoken to on the subject he always said they might be better employed. Jane, the eldest daughter, cared nothing for school. "She was her daddy's own gal," as he said. But when, to the increased astonishment of the neighborhood, Emily's representation induced him to allow his wife to hire a girl for help in domestic matters, Mrs. Wiggins took care that Jane should enjoy equal advantages.

"Hullo, what nonsense are you up to now?" was Mr. Wiggins's salutation to Emily, as he saw her in the garden one fine afternoon in the succeeding summer, and at her smiling invitation, went in to "take a look at all her fine doings." Emily was arranging a bouquet of her choicest flowers to send to Mrs. Wiggins by Joe, who was yet in the school-room practising his favorite pursuit, drawing. The farmer smiled, as he watched her alight, snowy fingers moving so dexterously among the fragile blossoms.

"There's lots of sich things over at our place now. Joe and Beck and Ag were busy all the spring through layin' out a garden. Every youngster about the neighborhood is going stark mad about flowers and all sich—so, of course, mine must go the same way. So they got around me, and I see their heart was set on it, 'tic'larly Joe's, and he's such a changed boy now, that I don't want to plague him. I say, what did you do with him? He's jest like he was long ago, when he was a little gaffer, only better I do think. I never thought I'd have sich comfort with him, as since you've had him in hands."

Just then Joe came out of the schoolroom, and she would have changed the subject, but the farmer went on:

"Here, Joe, maybe you'll tell me what Miss Emily want. I do want to know what she's done with you to make you sich a different boy; you never get into the mumps now-a-days."

Emily felt painfully embarrassed for the shy, sensitive boy, whose crimson cheek showed his boyish mortification at being thus spoken to in her presence; but she felt that her daily inculcated lessons were not wholly unavailing, when at the last words tears rose to the lad's eyes, and pressing his lips to his father's rough, brown hand, he murmured:

"Dear father, I hope I shall never displease or grieve you again."

The father was taken by surprise. He had partly withdrawn his hand, but with a better impulse he passed his arm around his son and kissed the broad, thoughtful brow; then drawing his hand across his misty eyes, and clearing his throat, he turned to exchange a friendly greeting with Mrs. Ball, who came to invite him into the house.

"I should like to know what's come over the boy, that's a fact," the farmer said to his wife that night, as he was telling of his call at the teacher's.

Mrs. Wiggins laughed—laughter, merry jests, and above all, time to enjoy them, were no strangers to the old farm-house now—as she replied:

"Some of our neighbors would like to know what has come over you, too."

"So they would, and it's more'n I can tell, 'less it be some of that cussin' little gal's doin's. But I tell you what, mother, we won't do as well this year as we used to. Let's see."

And the farmer began to make calculations of what he should probably lose, with a comic gravity, unlike the sordid, grumbling calculations of other times. His wife listened placidly. When he had finished, she said:

"You have calculated our losses—now begin and count up our gains."

"No, I cannot do that," he replied slowly and with feeling. "It is easy to reckon our losses—a few dollars 'll cover them; but our gains—who could begin to reckon them?"

Who, indeed? And who could estimate the influence for good exerted, in more than this family, by the young teacher? Who foresees all the fruits, for time and eternity, of the seed sown and nurtured in many a young heart within that little schoolroom? There were none to regret, but many to bless the day that first saw the little cottage become the abode of the "folks from town," who, as the time glided tranquilly by, enjoyed in the faithful fulfillment of duty a peaceful serenity of mind and pure heart-happiness, which many of the great and courted of high places might envy.

There are few people who are more often in the wrong than those who cannot endure to be so.

THE SONG OF THE MARINER.

BY MARY F. BARBER.

O, the sea, the sea hath a charm for me,
 As I list to its changeless roar,
 And I'd rather sail to the sound of the gale
 Than wander the green earth o'er,
 And oft as I gaze into other days,
 I pray that my lot may be
 In the future cast as hath been my past,
 On the breast of the heaving sea.

For 'tis joy to ride on the billowy tide,
 And watch the bounding spray,
 As the tinted clouds that the sky enshroud,
 Herald the rising day.
 And with rapture I gaze on the sun's first rays,
 Gliding the sparkling wave,
 As with azure and gold of beauty untold,
 Old ocean's brow they lave.

And at setting sun, when the day is done,
 To watch in the far-off west,
 The amber and blue form a glorious hue,
 Like halo that falls o'er the blast;
 And dream as I gaze, of those olden days,
 Of joy and lightsome mirth,
 Ere far away I was lured to stray,
 From my childhood's happy hearth.

And often I hear when the tempest's near,
 The voice of the angry waves,
 As with wailing scream it points to the bourn,
 Where the miller will find a grave;
 Yet I never fear when its voice I hear,
 For 'tis sweeter far to me,
 To sink to rest on the ocean's breast,
 Than be laid 'neath the greenwood tree.

I could calmly sleep in the mighty deep,
 Where the waters my brow would lave,
 Where the clouds might weep, and the stars would keep Their vigils o'er my grave;
 Where a seaweed pall would o'er me fall,
 And droop on my bed of gold;
 Where mermaids fair would wreath in my hair
 Gems of unearthly mould.

THE ENCHANTED CAMEL.

BY DR. J. V. C. SMITH.

THOSE who have travelled in oriental countries are familiar with the fact that love for the marvellous is a characteristic of the people. It is interwoven with their thoughts, waking or sleeping; and their traditional stories, like their modern imaginings, abound with extraordinary exhibitions of exuberant fancy.

So recently as at the commencement of the year 1851, the writer passed through a desolate section of the desert of Arabia, between Egypt and Syria, with a friend who cheerfully shared with him the privations and vexations which belong to all expeditions on camels.

Usually, the caravan got under way about daylight in the morning, and came to a halt at four o'clock in the afternoon. From that hour, till dark, the animals were fed, the sheik baked a doura cake, and we cooked or rather ate a kind of meal that was christened a dinner.

Through the day, the customary rate of speed could not have exceeded twenty-five miles, at the farthest. By timing the gait of the camels, the halter of one being tied to the crupper of the other, we rarely accomplished three miles in an hour. It is a tedious mode of travelling, but it is not probable that any other method will supersede it, for crossing the great deserts of Africa, in hundreds of years to come. There is not inland commerce enough to warrant railroads or canals in those arid regions; and if either were constructed, the drifting of impassable sand would ultimately destroy any known device of man that might be suggested. The camel, therefore, fitted by its peculiar anatomical structure for the very localities where they are so very serviceable, can never be dispensed with while nomadic life continues.

After replenishing our stomachs, and the sheik and his slave had lighted their pipes, we filled ours also, and gathering round the apology for a fire, made and replenished every few minutes with bits of sticks, dry grass, and such rubbish as could be picked up on the sand through the day, as a group we were really quite happy.

While the volumes of white tobacco smoke ascended from the bowls, and in small clouds rolled away in the air, the camels, lying down and grinding their dry beans, seemed to participate in the enjoyment. A question arose respecting the intelligence of those awkward beasts. Certainly they have a small brain, with a huge body. With that organ a few sizes larger, it is presumed it would be difficult to manage them. As it is, means are beautifully adapted to ends. They were designed to occupy precisely the place in which they are found. Without them, the Bedouin Arab could not exist, as he now does.

But it would take up too much time to discuss the beautiful law of nature, which has provided for the physical well being of every grade and kind of organized being, from man to a monad, and hence we shall proceed at once to our story.

To a conversation in regard to the instincts of the camel, and its intelligence, and a query as to whether they profited by their experience, the sheik seemed to listen with profound attention. Of course he could not understand English, but we could speak enough of the Arabic to give him the gist of the subject.

Story-telling is a distinct branch of business in the East, recognised as an elevated profession, because it implies a tenacious memory, a familiar acquaintance with the elements of humanity, the virtues and vices of society, and, lastly, they are supposed to cultivate a purity of language, by taking the place of authors in other countries. Shomah Hassan—or, as he was called by his friends, Sheikh Shoghah Hassan—had been a great traveller, and knew the bearings of the prominent objects in the desert, from Suez to Sinia, or from Cairo to Hebron, better than any Arab engaged in carrying frangees and howajjis over the trackless sand.

Sheikh Shomah Hassan was not so old but that he had a full complement of wives, who did pretty much as they chose when he was from home; but they were ruled much as he managed his camels, on returning—that is, they were fed, and sometimes abused.

On one of his returns, which was at an unexpected moment for his faithful household, the door was closed, the water jar broken at the threshold, and an old camel left in the care of his youngest helpmeet to be recruited was gone, and the inmates of the domicile also. Hassan made no outcry among his neighbors, but hampered his camels, after unlading them, gave them a generous supply of food, and then set to work to enter the premises.

Hassan's slave, Gobab, had related the affair thus far, when the sheik laid down his pipe, stroked his flowing, grisly beard, bowed towards Mecca, and said: "Frangees—all this is true, as related by the slave. But he may make mistakes, or neglect to speak with reverence of the Prophet—blessed be the memory of the just, and I will therefore tell you myself of the wonders that belong to the land of the believers."

He took a long breath, raised his turban so that the air might cool his head, shorn the day before, crossed his legs anew, and again paid his respects to the point of compass indicating the direction of the Holy City, and then commenced. Gobab, the slave, put himself in a position to brace his feet, in case he should be frightened.

"With considerable effort, the lock gave way, and on entering, there stood the old camel staring me in the face. Reaching out my hand to take the halter, it was gone. I then put my hand to his neck and gave the sound, cluck, cluck, to make him lie down, that a noose might be slipped over his nose, but he never moved.

"Very well," said I to myself, 'there is something in a bag that will bring you out of the house, if anything remains persuasive in barley.' I opened a sack and placed a generous mess in a skin and returned with the fodder—when lo, he had disappeared!

"The hour of prayer had arrived, so spreading a mat, and salaaming according to the directions of the book, I omitted nothing which our faith demands. On rising and opening my eyes, there stood the camel directly over me, but immovable. Crawling out from under his huge body, avoiding his legs, and rising to my feet—he was gone! Not a tread had been heard—no noise broke upon the stillness of the house save the working of the jaws of the hampered beasts.

"I now resolved to explore the interior of the house, and ascertain what this absenteeism of the whole family could mean. On popping my head into the door, there stood the camel again—stiff, apparently, as though he were made of stone. Looking again towards Mecca, the fountain of light, and repeating the tabib, which is confessing unlimited confidence in the protection of the Prophet, I boldly squeezed between his tall, bony limbs, and thus got beyond him.

"Entering the harem, there sat all my wives on the divan, dressed gorgeously—fast asleep, but bolt upright. Touching Allem Bulec, the youngest—fair as a lily, sweet, too, as a newly-plucked rose, who cost me three hundred piasters of a Jew dealer—the camel screamed, but Allem moved not. What was particularly frightful, no effort of mine could remove her from that position! There the old camel stood in his place, repeating the horrible noise, which I was quite sure would be heard at a great distance, and attract somebody to the place.

"Next I tried to raise my oldest wife, the mother of a son now in the army of the pasha; but she was in precisely the same fixed position. At that juncture, it was first perceived that neither of the four were breathing. This discovery shocked me exceedingly. But arming myself with new courage by repeating the tabib again in a loud voice, they simultaneously opened their eyes!

"'Allah is great,' said I, 'and Mohammed is his prophet!' The words were no sooner out of my mouth, than nothing remained in the room but the divan on which they had been sitting and my solitary self.

"Night was fast approaching. A question came up in my mind what it was best to do. There were either four enchanted women in the house, or none at all—besides a camel. On the whole, it was concluded there would be less disturbance with the working camels, outside, and therefore I enveloped myself in the bournoise, and snugly edged up by the side of one of them, for the sake of the warmth to be afforded.

"It was now dark, when everything was arranged for repose. But before closing my eyes, I went through with the prescribed prayers under circumstances of peril. I had confidence in the security which a faithful Moslem has in the protecting arm of the Prophet. A Christian, under any manifestations of an evil spirit, has no such resource. With a conscience void of offence, and a resolution to live up to the tenets my fathers had professed, I soon fell into a sweet slumber, which must have lasted till near midnight.

"Something was pulling at my toes, on awaking. I started up, when what should I see but the old camel, with panniers slung on either side, and my four wives stowed away in them, two in each. A small Nubian slave sat on the front of the saddle, holding the halter. They all beckoned to me to get in, but said nothing. 'Very well,' said I to myself, 'a man has a perfect right to go with his own family. Had they been strange women, or the camel not my own property, I should have shaken my head in the negative. As it was, I clucked, when down fell the camel on his knees, but utterly refused to lower his haunches.

"It was excessively awkward to mount while he was in that ugly position. As for stepping into the panniers, that could not be done. Two was enough for any basket, were it ever so capacious, especially when they were women. To my amazement, the slave never offered to slide further back, beyond the hump, his appropriate place; nor did he attempt to make room for me by moving from where he ought not to have been."

Hassan emptied the ashes from his pipe, and recharged it with the real Syrian string-leaf. This was an indication of being comfortable. Our impatience would hardly allow so much rest, or rather break in the narrative. We were anxiously waiting for the remainder. He resumed:

"Waiting for the slave to make room, but perceiving he had no intention of doing so, I caught up a courbash and gave him a terrible blow over the head. 'Moustibe!—slave,' said I, 'by the beard of Abu Talib, your body will be in two pieces if I strike again.'

"But the threat never moved a muscle of his face. My wives stared at me, but said nothing. Determined to be up to my word, I took a sword which was always worn when travelling—for my indignation was boundless—and smote the black rascal. Instead of streams of blood or a scarred carcase, they had all disappeared—slave, camel, wives and housings! This was a dilemma. I was convinced that the evil spirit Kourbras—the same that once tempted the mother of the Prophet—had a hand in these strange phantasmagoric changes.

"With this solution of the cause that was operating to try the strength of my faith, a new resolution animated me to resist his influences on myself. I therefore again turned towards the Caaba in adoration, and touched my head reverentially three times to the ground—repeating at each the prayer against demons. Nothing can stand against that most efficient and sovereign antidote to witchcraft and demonology, like that solemn ceremony. Often the Prophet himself rebuked the wicked attentions of black spirits, by resorting to the same excellent device, which might be recommended even to infidel dogs.

"A question arose in my mind thus: 'Where is the camel? where my four wives?' Scarcely had the thought been matured, when the old camel stood by my side. The baskets were gone, the women had disappeared, but the impudent slave was holding on to the tail of the animal by his teeth! A sight so novel moved my mirth. I laughed outright—ay, and long too. How ridiculous! holding on at the tip of the tail with one's teeth! Suddenly the tail commenced swinging to and fro, which brought a hard strain upon the Nubian's jaws. Still he held his grip.

"After walking round the camel several times, to understand as far as possible whether it was a real beast, and the swinger what he appeared to be, a man, a voice was heard directly overhead calling me by name. Falling on my knees, facing Mecca as before, I said: 'O, Prophet, I am an honest believer, always rising at the call of the Imaum for early prayer; and if I live, it is my desire to make the holy pilgrimage to the tomb of the friend of the faithful. To be a hadghi, is an ambition that it is lawful to indulge.'

"The voice said, in a soft, persuasive tone: 'The camel cannot stoop to thee, O man of almsdeeds! CHimb up to his neck and seize the saddle-pin.'

"I obeyed the directions, and found myself going through the air at the rate of five hundred miles an hour. The Nubian slave quickened the camel, if he slackened speed, by grinding his teeth to the quick of the tail. My turban blew off, the bournouse was rent, and it was with extreme difficulty I could hold on to the saddle-pin. At last the camel came to a halt before a splendid palace somewhere in the dominions of the Shah of Persia. The slave let go of the tail and walked to the gate. Sentinels bowed at his approach—presented their arms, as though he were a person of distinction. Music was heard within, and the sound of revelry pervaded the whole region.

"Soon after the disappearance of the fellow who had been riding through the sky at the extremity of a camel's tail, the great folding-gates opened, and a procession was seen coming down the marble steps. First came the pasha of the place, followed by two hundred of his own sons dressed in scarlet. Their beards were stained with henna, their nails were secured in silver cases, the sign of gentlemen, and they smoked golden pipes. After them, came their mothers. They were beauties—each of whom would have sold at Asuan for two thousand piasters. Contrary to the customs of the true believers, they were without veils. At the demoralizing exhibition of the faces of women, thus exposed, I was shocked.

"By degrees we became accustomed to things which a sense of modesty would at first condemn. This is a common custom in Christian countries; but they are in darkness, nor can they be taught till the book of the law is placed before them.

"Following the females, were six hundred little boys. They were pipe bearers to the pasha. All the while I sat on the camel. Dancing girls, in the witchery of their charms, were performing each side of the procession, and lastly, a troop of horsemen brought up the rear, mounted superbly, with golden hilted swords by their sides. Various interesting gyrations were performed, led off by the pasha. As they passed and re passed me, they bowed gracefully. The camel returned the civility, and then the music gave forth an increased volume of sweet sounds. Lastly, marching directly up to me, the pasha pronounced an oration on the art of managing a wife.

"'Thou art,' said the great man, 'the only husband in the country in which thou residest, of all the subjects of the pasha, who can rule a woman. Thy fame has been spread over the world; and it is for the twofold purpose of honoring one who has found out the art of having peace at home, and compensating thee for the favor thou hast conferred on the faithful by the force of example, that Mouradak, prince of the enchanters, has transported thee hither.'

"Of course he was thanked in courteous language for the flattering encomiums on my successful system of domestic discipline.

"'May it please your Highness, Great Pasha,' said I, 'I was not conscious of meriting civilities or compensation for maintaining peace in my own house. Since you are pleased to give me credit for it, in this public manner, I shall not conceal the art.'

"'And what is it?' eagerly asked the pasha, the whole procession repeating it like an echo; 'what is it?'

"'First, they are provided with all the rice they can eat; hunger provokes discord and family jars. Secondly, they are under no restraint, but go where inclination moves them; consequently they would be ashamed to go to disreputable places. Thirdly, a full stomach makes a merry heart, and liberty never weeps for bondage; therefore, there is more laughing than crying on my premises.'

"'At that, they all cried with a loud voice, 'bring him the pearls.'

"'Forty slaves, bearing each a tray of pearls, came to me, fell on their knees, and so did the camel. My eyes were opened, and lo! there were the panniers, my wives and myself on the beast. They helped themselves to bracelets, rings and anklets of pearls. I filled my bosom and all the spare places in the panniers.'

"'Cluck, cluck,' said the pasha. In an instant, I was standing at my own door! Pushing back the bolt, in I went, and there sat my four wives in smiles, delighted to see their lord.

"'Explain this wonderful scene to me,' said I; 'explain.'

"'Why,' said they all, 'after you swallowed the hot liquor from the Christian infidel's bottle, your senses departed. You laughed, sighed, pretended to be alarmed, and talked incessantly about a camel, a Nubian slave, and our inability to move. Nothing has happened to us or to the camel.'

"'I insisted that enchantment had been used—that what I have related was reality; but was obliged to confess, on the testimony of four witnesses, no one had been enchanted but myself—and the enchanter was confined in a bottle till a Christian let it enter my own stomach, when he took possession of my brain, as he does of yours, O Christian infidel! Hereafter, let your example correspond with your precepts—never tempt the faithful to deal with enchantments which are imprisoned in bottles!'"

COMPLIMENTARY.—An enthusiastic admirer of our distinguished Boston orator, admitted that Washington was a great and good man, but said "it remained for Mr. Everett to bring him out." Seriously, however, the enthusiasm created everywhere by Everett's oration, is a proof of the power of the orator, and of the good taste and warm patriotism of our people.

"LOVE'S FIRST KISS."

BY FELHAM.

O, what is there in life more sweet
Than love's first kiss—
The chaste, pure feeling of a soul
O'erflowed with bliss.

The language of the heart more plain
Than tongue can speak—
Which, coming from the heart, mere words
Would make but weak.

The emblem of a tie that binds
Two souls as one—
The harbinger of joy that lasts
Till life has gone.

MR. JOHN GRAHAM, BACHELOR.

BY FRANCES A. SHAW.

"How pleasant and cozy it is here, this evening! No wife to weary me with her insipid prattle, or vex me with her perpetual teasing and whining; no children to raise up Bedlam around me, and be the plague of my life. Old bachelors, indeed! Let the world deride our single estate as it will, it is all envy. We are the salt of the earth. Talk of our lonely and disconsolate lot! it's wasting breath. Pity us! Folks had better bestow their compassion where it is needed. Who's happier than I?—I'd like to know." And John Graham gazed with an air of supreme satisfaction around his quiet, elegant parlor.

For a bachelor's abode, it was indeed wonderfully pleasant and cheerful. A bright anthracite fire glowed in the grate, shedding its genial warmth through the apartment. Mr. Graham was constitutionally somewhat of a dreamer. It was his favorite pastime to watch the weird, strange shapes which the glowing embers would assume, in their transition-state to smoke and ashes, where, alas! many of our fondest earthly dreams are prone to end.

Reader mine, are you a dreamer? Let me commend you to a bright, glowing fire. It has been the inspiration of my own most cherished dreams. Did you never trace in the dissolving embers grand palaces, gray old abbeys and sepulchral cloisters, and did your fancy never people them with forms to please itself? Ever and anon, the scene will change. The stately palace, the gray old castle, will fade into the simple thatched cottage; the noble lord, the high-born dame will vanish, and in their places we see the lowly lad and lassie. But they are lovers, and love can transform the thatched roof into a palace; it can make the lowliest hut seem the very gate of heaven. Commend me, in summer, to the fleecy, ever-changing clouds, on whose shadowy scroll many a mystic poem and wild romance is written; but in winter, close the shutters, draw the easy-chair before the open fire (I detest air-tights), and let me yield myself to a delicious reverie.

This little word "I" is becoming intrusive, and must be dropped; only let me remark, in passing, that in this respect, Mr. John Graham and my humble self are kindred spirits. Not content with the actual around him, he is sadly prone to make forays into the misty realm of imagination, and commune with beings not of this stale matter-of-fact world, and to wander through scenes which have not their home in the sober mundane sphere. To such follies as these, I too must plead guilty.

John Graham is a man of fortune and leisure. He can dream from morning till night, if so it liketh him; while I, poor damsel! must needs turn my heart inside out, and tell to the gossiping world fancies which I would fain keep in my own breast, glad to receive as an equivalent but a tithe of that gold of which my hero has never felt the need.

Yes, John Graham sat in his velvet-cushioned easy-chair, before a glowing fire, lost in reverie. A volume rich in traditions of the olden time had fallen at his side, and he was dreaming of those days of chivalry when kingdoms were staked for ladies' eyes, when mail-clad knights dared the battle's fiercest fray to win their smile.

But turreted castle and "faire ladye" watching from her lattice for her true knight's return; cloistered cell, where cowed monk and veiled vestal counted their beads and breathed their paternosters; chapel, in whose vaults lay the ashes of the noble dead, and from whose walls madonnas and saints looked down as if to guard their slumbers—all, all had vanished into thin air. Ah me, that such is the stuff our dreams are made of!

But a heap of ashes remained in the grate, the shadows of evening were gathering around him, and Mr. Graham awoke. The ideal had become merged into the actual. The room was growing dark and cold, and its master, rising, rang for fuel and lights, which were speedily forthcoming. The richly cut astral was placed upon the centretable, the fire was rekindled, and the room had assumed its most cheerful aspect, when Mr. Graham, gazing complacently around him, gave utterance to the exclamations with which we commenced this veritable history.

It was a snug, elegant home, that of our hero, situated in one of the most desirable localities of our nation's metropolis. But one item was wanting to complete the perfection of his domestic arrangements. This he very well knew; yet he gave no such thought utterance—not he! He endeavored to persuade himself that he was at the very acme of human felicity, and that the introduction of a wife into his domicile would be the same drawback to his happiness, as was the skeleton in the houses of the ancient Egyptians. That ghastly shape of death was ever present, at the social hearth and festive board, reminding the pleasure-loving inmates of those gorgeous dwellings that they were mortal; and the constant presence of a Mrs. Graham by her liege lord and master's side, would have reminded that gentleman that he, also, was mortal, and, like weak and fallible men in general, had yielded up his bachelor liberty and happiness.

You would have read, at a glance, wealth and refined taste in the surroundings of Mr. Graham. Costly pictures, in gorgeous frames, adorned the walls of the room into which we have introduced you, kind reader. There were among them some of the choicest productions of the old masters (Mr. Graham had travelled in Europe), and also a few chef-d'œuvres of our own artists, for Mr. Graham was patriotic, and always encouraged genius at home. In a recess, partially concealed by a rich crimson drapery, were shelves filled to repletion with books upon whose gilded bindings you might have read the names most venerated in the literature of our own time, as well as those of the great bards and sages of the past. These were not kept for idle show, for their owner was a gentleman of ripe scholarship and decided literary taste. Curtains of the richest lace and velvet draped the windows, concealing the fearful storm that was raging without. We need not descant further upon the evidences of ease and elegance spread with such a lavish hand around our bachelor; suffice it to say, that in his mansion was all that luxury could sigh for, or unbounded wealth procure.

He drew his arm-chair to a table littered with the late magazines and dailies, which he honored with but a cursory glance, few of their articles being suited to his fastidious taste. Near the fire was drawn up a small table, covered with a snowy cloth, upon which was placed a spotless tea-service of china and silver. A slow, cautious step approached; the door opened, and an old lady entered, followed by a servant bearing the tea-tray. The lady seated herself at the head of the table, the gentleman at the foot.

While the twain are taking tea, let us introduce you to Miss Hannah Graham, Mr. John's maiden aunt and housekeeper. A model housekeeper is this Aunt Hannah, and during the twenty years she has occupied that post in her nephew's establishment, he has never had cause to complain of buttonless shirts, undarned stockings, untidy rooms, cold tea, muddy coffee, or any of those thousand-and-one ills which bachelor flesh is heir to, which, we regret to say, few husbands escape.

In Aunt Hannah's eyes, "my nephew" was perfection itself, and she deemed a life devoted to his comfort and happiness, the highest-glory to which a woman might aspire. Tea-time passed stiffly and unsocially, as usual. Aunt Hannah could talk only of household affairs and the weather, and these topics having been for the third time that day daily discussed, a dreary pause ensued. Her nephew having at length arisen from the table, the spinster rang the bell, and the servant came and removed the tea-things, as usual. Then having received a "no, I thank you" to the stereotyped inquiry, which in twenty years had not been once omitted—was anything requisite for her nephew's comfort? could she be of any further service to him?—Aunt Hannah bade her usual deferential "good night," and retired to her chamber.

Mr. Graham being left to his own reflections, relapsed again into a reverie. The train of his reflections ran somewhat in this wise:

"Yes, thank Heaven, that I am a bachelor! May it give me grace to remain so to the end of the chapter. Many a plot has been laid against my single blessedness, many a matrimonial snare has been set for me, but fortunate man that I am, I have escaped them all!

"Tisn't myself that managing mamas and pretty daughters are seeking so perseveringly. No, I haven't the vanity to think that, though I don't consider myself by any means ill looking;" and our hero cast quite a satisfied glance into a full-length mirror opposite, which certainly reflected as handsome and noble a countenance, and as fine a figure as one would wish to see.

"Ah, it's my money, the dear artless creatures are sighing for! With that alone, were I possessed of no other recommendation, I could win the best of them, I dare say.

'Gold is the woman's only theme,
Gold is the woman's only dream.'

says Moore, and he merely echoes Byron's opinion:

'Women, like moths, are only caught by glare,
And Mammon wins his way, where seraphs might despair.'

That's true as gospel, every word of it. Now while appealing to the poets for support of my own long-established opinions, I am more forcibly than ever reminded of the truth of the words of that old bard, who wrote years and years before my grandfather was born :

'O take, if ye would measure well the worth of woman's mind,
A scale made of the spider's web, and weights made of the wind.'

As it was in the beginning with the sex, so it is now—ay, and ever shall be ! How a sensible man can bind himself for life to one of these frivolous beings, is more than I can understand.

"But I have known one true woman. Let me not defame my mother ! There was another, too, whom I once deemed perfection. Had Florence Ingraham smiled upon my suit, I might have met the fate of Benedick after all. It was a lucky thing for me that she refused me. I will set that down as a mere boyish infatuation, the only folly I was ever guilty of in that line. And yet boyish is hardly the word, for when we first met, I was a man turned twenty-five, and she a mere child of fifteen. Yet even then her heart was in another's keeping, and could not be mine. They say that she married wretchedly. I wonder where she is to-night ! But what is that to me ! Just nothing at all. Vive le single blessedness ! It is lonely here, though ! I wish Aunt Hannah wasn't quite so much of an automaton. I wish Smith would drop in, just to relieve the monotony. That Smith's a glorious fellow ! heart free and happy like myself—"

At this stage of our bachelor's reverie, the door-bell rang, announcing a visitor who did not prove to be Smith. Who it was, we will tell you presently.

"An' faith an' is it the likes of ye that's a pokin' yerself here into me mather's front door ? Get along into the kitchen, and it's meself that'll be afther seein' what ye want. I'll not bother the gentleman wid ye. Here I've toted up two flights of stairs, jist to shut the door in yer face. Come round to the servant's door, as ye ought to, and I'll let ye in."

"O please let me come in now, I am so cold ; besides, I must see your master or mistress, to get the pay for this work. Please do let me in now ; I can't wait."

This was the colloquy which disturbed the train of Mr. Graham's thoughts, in which he recognized the coarse Irish brogue of his serving woman Margaret, and the soft pleading tones of a child. He was a generous, kind hearted man. The destitute never left his door unblessed, the suffering unrelieved. He stepped at once into the hall, and said : "Come into my parlor, little girl, and warm yourself."

The child needed no second bidding. She was a pale, fragile creature, apparently some ten years of age, and seemed almost benumbed with cold. John Graham took her tenderly in his arms, and placing her in the chair he had just vacated, he drew it up to the fire with its tiny burden. He then proceeded to remove the old hood and thin, faded shawl, which with a tattered calico frock had been her chief protection against that pitiless storm. Her clothes were covered with sleet, the little feet protruded from the worn shoes, and the unmitten hands were nearly frozen.

"Poor little thing !" said the sympathizing bachelor, as taking the child upon his knee, he held the benumbed feet to the fire and chafed the little blue hands in his own warm, white palm. "Poor child !" he repeated ; and as Margaret stood at a respectful distance gazing upon the scene, and wondering at her fastidious master's condescension, he said : "Margaret, bring me some warm blankets to wrap around this child, and call Miss Graham, I fear she is very ill. Why, Margaret, if I had not overheard your conversation, you would have driven her from the door, and she might have perished."

"An' wouldn't I have my hands full, yer honor, to be afther takin' in all the low trash like her, that's comin' here every day ? I'd have risked her dying—these folks have as many lives as a cat ; 'taint quite so easy killin' 'em."

A look of displeasure from her master checked Miss Margaret's loquacity, and she left the room to execute his commands.

Aunt Hannah soon made her appearance. She gave the child a reviving draught, which soon awoke her from the partial stupor into which she had fallen. She opened her eyes, and gazed intently into Mr. Graham's face, and in those pale, wasted features, he read unmistakable signs of starvation.

"Have you had any supper to-night, my dear ?" he asked, in his kindest tones.

"No, sir," replied the little girl, her transparent cheek becoming crimson, and tears starting to her eyes. "I haven't tasted a mouthful for two days. Mother hasn't neither, and that is the reason why I came out on such a night as this, to get the money for that work."

"What work, my child ?"

"Why, the shirts mother's been making for you. To-morrow is the Sabbath, and we knew we couldn't get it then. O please do pay it to me now, and let me go home. Mother is so sick. She had to sit up in bed, and finish the work."

"I knew nothing about the work. Aunt Hannah was getting it done for me, I suppose. What a dear, kind soul she is, never to trouble me about such matters," soliloquized Mr. Graham. "She has just stepped out to bring you some supper. I'll ask her about it when she returns."

"Please, sir, I oughtn't to wait for any supper—wont you pay me the money now, and let me go? There were just six of them. Mother's at home all alone in the dark and cold. Besides, she'll be frightened about me."

"Pay you, poor child? Indeed I will; but I'm not going to trust you out alone, on such a dark night as this. I'll not send a servant with you, either—I'll go myself. Now, while I am getting ready, just be eating some of the food that Miss Graham has brought you."

Mr. Graham was a long time making his preparations to go out—a much longer time than was necessary, for, as he occasionally glanced at the child, he could not fail to notice the eagerness with which she partook of the food Miss Graham had set before her.

He scrutinized her narrowly, and saw that she was an unusually lovely child. The delicacy of her form, and the refined expression of her features, told that she did not belong to the vulgar herd which a great city usually recognizes as its wretchedly poor. Those long silken curls, the expression of those large hazel eyes, the contour of those finely-chiselled features, strangely reminded him of a fair image which had for years been imprinted upon the tablet of his memory, and whose outlines time and change had not erased.

"It is a mere fancy," he sighed. "Why is it, that always when I see a face strikingly beautiful, I compare it with hers, and never fail to trace some resemblance to those sweet features which will haunt my memory till I die? Ah! crusty bachelor that I am, cynic though I may become, I must admit that Florence Ingraham was my destiny—my life's one love. It was a strange infatuation! Alas, that there could be only one in the wide, wide world like her!"

"Now we are ready, little one," he said, when having muffled the child in the hood and shawl which Aunt Hannah had brought, he took her hand in his, and they sallied forth.

It was a bitter night, and Mr. Graham, strong, robust man as he was, shrank back, as upon opening the door a gust of wind drove the chilling sleet full in his face. Yet he was not one to be deterred from an earnest purpose, and sheltering the little girl beneath the ample folds of his cloak, they walked on.

"What is your name, my child?" inquired Mr. Graham, after they had proceeded a short distance.

"Florence Selby," she replied.

Florence! Ah, that name still had power to send a thrill through John Graham's heart.

"Florence Selby! and what was your mother's name?" he asked, led on by an impulse he could not control.

"Florence Ingraham," was the reply.

"Florence Ingraham? The same, by heaven! the very same," ejaculated Mr. Graham. "Ah, now I understand the strange interest I took in the child from the first. Florence, darling, let me carry you in my arms," he said, tenderly. "You are too fragile to brave this blustering storm. There, lay your head upon my bosom; we will soon be at your mother's; if you have told me the right street and number, it cannot be far distant."

"I have, I am sure I have, sir, and you'll pay her the money, wont you? as soon as we get there, because I want to go out before the shops are closed, and get some bread and fuel for to-morrow."

"Bless your poor little heart! To be sure I'll pay you, and I'll go and get you the food and fuel myself. I'm not going to trust such a little girl as you are out again on such a night as this. Bless me! now I think of it, how much you look like your mother!"

"Have you ever seen my mother? because she don't let anybody that she used to know see her now, if she can help it. She always draws her veil over her face when she meets any of her old acquaintances. I suppose she feels ashamed, because she is so poor. Where did you ever see my mother?"

"No matter now, little Florence, I'll tell you at some other time. But here we are right in her neighborhood. Where does she live? Do any of those lights come from her room?"

"O no, sir. We haven't any candles, nor fire either, to-night; but set me down, and let me take your hand, and I can lead you to our room in the dark."

That was a wretched neighborhood to which little Florence Selby had brought the wealthy Mr. Graham, and before the most wretched of the squalid dwellings there she stopped. Thread- ing their way in the dark through many a narrow passage, and up many a crazy staircase, little Florence at length opened a door, and groping her way to her mother's bedside, whispered:

"Mother, I have come! and such a nice, kind gentleman has come with me! Don't you think, he carried me almost all the way in his arms!"

and he's going out himself to buy us bread and fuel and lights."

A faint moan was the only answer. Mr. Graham advanced through the darkness to Mrs. Selby's side and pronounced her name, but she made no reply. "Your mother is ill, I fear," he said to Florence. "I will go for lights and assistance." Finding his way into the next tenement, he procured a tallow candle. As it shed its flickering rays round the room, they revealed a scene of destitution such as Mr. Graham, although he had for years made visiting the poor a Christian duty, had never before witnessed. They fell upon the wasted form of the sufferer. It was Florence—his much-loved Florence; though years of sorrow had passed over that face, since last they met, he knew her still.

She lay there still and motionless as a statue. Her eyes were closed, their long dark lashes sweeping a cheek Mr. Graham had ever before seen glowing with the rosy hue of health, its faint hectic flush now the only visible token that life remained. He bent his ear down—her breath came short and quick; he in vain attempted to arouse her, and then he felt that, exhausted with that last despairing effort she had made for bread, she had sank back on her wretched couch to die.

At length, she seemed partially roused from her lethargy, by the sobs of the little Florence; she opened her eyes, but their wild light spoke of delirium, and they had no glance of recognition for her child. She essayed to speak, but the words were incoherent, and finally died away into a faint moan. John Graham lingered a little time, and then left the room. He despatched a man for a physician, another for fuel, and a bright fire was soon casting its ruddy glow around that cheerless apartment.

"Ah, you here, Mr. Graham?" exclaimed Doctor Holden, in great astonishment. "Such scenes as this don't lie exactly in your way. I wish they did not so much in mine. To be called from our cozy firesides, on such a night as this, to visit these poor creatures, isn't very pleasant."

"You are quite mistaken in the character of your patient, Doctor Holden," replied Mr. Graham, "and I must beg that you will give her every attention in your power; there is no time for delay."

The doctor advanced to the bedside. "Why," he said, "there is a fever in this woman's veins which must have been brought on by hard work and slow starvation. If she had any constitution left, she might rally; yet I fear it is too late to save her now."

"I cannot hear it, doctor. There must be hope for her; she must not die now. Restore her to health, and name your reward."

Doctor Holden gazed a moment at Mr. Graham in surprise at this unwonted interest, and then said: "Certainly, sir, I shall do my best, and while there is life, there is hope, you know."

"Can't she be removed from this place?"

"She must be, or she can never recover. You see how the storm beats in even now, through these broken windows and the chinks in these old walls. There is little hope for her whether she remains here or not."

"But she shall not die here in this miserable place," said Mr. Graham, in a choked voice.

And that very night, she lay in a downy bed in the very best chamber of his mansion. Aunt Hannah took upon herself the office of nurse. Doctor Holden was unremitting in his attentions, and John Graham's pale countenance and agitated manner told how deep was his interest in the unconscious sufferer.

The crisis came, after many weary days and nights of suffering and of watching. Mrs. Selby had fallen into that deep sleep, from which she would waken to life and health, or which must be to her the sleep of death. Unconscious of everything around her, pale and beautiful as some form of sculptured marble, and to outward seeming almost as lifeless, she lay upon her pillow. Doctor Holden sat at a little table near the bedside, on which a night-lamp was burning. Before him lay a watch marking the slowly fleeting hours, which might finish the span of his patient's earthly existence. Aunt Hannah sat by the sleeper's side, and did not remove her eyes for a moment from those corpse-like features.

Mr. Graham had retired to an adjoining apartment, and little Florence lay sleeping in his arms. Thus they sat, through the whole of that long night, whose hours seemed interminable. Little Florence had fallen asleep, and just as a few faint streaks of light entering through the blind gave token of approaching dawn, Mr. Graham laid her upon a bed and stole softly to the sick-chamber. At that moment, the sufferer opened her eyes; their wild light was gone. Catching that glance of returning consciousness, "Thank God for his infinite mercy, which has spared her to us!" he said, and then approaching her side, he gently whispered her name.

She cast a bewildered glance around the elegantly furnished chamber, and then raised her eyes to the face of her former lover.

"Florence! dear Florence, do you know me?" he said.

Pressing her hand to her brow, as if to recall some vanished image, she whispered: "I have had such a long, long dream! I was so destitute, so wretched! It was a dream that seemed to carry me through so many sorrowing, weary years. I was a mother and the child of my love was starving, and I had no bread to give her. I dreamed I had married George Selby—that I had turned in coldness from your love to his! O yes, John Graham, I know you. God bless you!" she murmured faintly, and then exhausted by the effort, sank back into a quiet slumber. * *

Gradually a knowledge of the exact state of affairs dawned upon Mrs. Selby's mind, and with that knowledge came a deep sense of the debt of gratitude she owed to Mr. Graham.

Some weeks had elapsed. Mrs. Selby had for the first time left her chamber. It was a mild day in spring, and she was sitting in the little back parlor by a window opening into the garden. The balmy air fanned her brow, and the soothing influences of nature spoke peace to her heart. A new life seemed to have entered every vein, and on her cheek she felt the glow of returning health. A soft step approached, and Mr. Graham stood at her side.

"I cannot express to you the pleasure I feel, Mrs. Selby, in seeing you so nearly restored to health," he said.

"Nor can I express the gratitude I feel to you, for your kindness to me and my daughter. We owe our lives to you. Though we can never repay you, God will reward you for it."

"I deserve no reward, Mrs. Selby, and yet you have it in your power to repay me a thousand fold. Florence, dear Florence!—may I not call you so now, since death long years ago severed the tie which bound you to another?—you are now, as you have ever been since our first meeting, dearer to me than my own life. Will you not remain here, and share my fortune and my home?"

"Mr. Graham! You surely cannot be serious! You would not elevate me from that depth of poverty and wretchedness in which you found me, to your own high station in the world. Do not mock me by such words. I have been thinking, as I sat here, that we must not intrude longer upon your kindness. I have acquirements which might be turned to account. Had I friends to assist me in obtaining pupils, I could teach—"

"Never, while I live! Ah, Florence, I have not deserved this distrust. For your sake, I have led a lonely life, through all these years. At our first interview, I loved you. I was a young man then; you were ten years my junior, and—"

"And I," said Mrs. Selby, interrupting him,

"a wayward, thoughtless child—an orphan with no friends to counsel me. I flung your manly devotion from me, for the affection of a wild, capricious boy. I married him, and how soon did I discover that blind infatuation, not love, had induced me to link my destiny with his. We were young and gay; we sought that happiness in society which we found not in each other. By our extravagance, my husband's patrimony was soon gone, and the large fortune left me by my father, which I had deemed inexhaustible, melted away like a snow-wreath. My husband sought to retrieve his losses at the gaming table; it was in vain. Then to drown his shame and sorrow, he had recourse to the intoxicating bowl. He became a drunkard, and ere our child could lip his name, he was in his grave. Yet he died penitent, thank God! Since then, I have struggled on in this great and heartless city; my health at length gave way, and I sunk into that abyss of poverty in which you found me."

"I know it all. What I did not gather from your own lips during your delirium, I learned from your child. Let us speak no longer of the past, dear Florence! It is a theme too painful. I offer you a love that has stood the test of years, and been tried in the furnace of sorrow. Can you reciprocate it? Will you accept it?"

"I can reciprocate it most fully, and accept it most thankfully. Heaven help me to be worthy of you!"

A year from that evening on which our story opens, a happy trio were seated around the cheerful fire in Mr. John Graham's parlor. Tea was over, and Miss Hannah Graham, as was her wont, had retired early.

"Florence, my love," said Mr. Graham, drawing his wife yet nearer to his side, "one year ago, this night, I was sitting here alone wrapped up in my selfish bachelor reflections. I almost shudder to think what a cynic I was becoming. Why, I should soon have eclipsed even Diogenes in his tub! It was a kind providence that sent me to you that night—was it not, dearest? It is a happy change for me, that the past year has wrought! Say, does the new love atone to you for the loss of the old?"

Mrs. John Graham placed her hand in her husband's, and as she leaned her head upon his shoulder, whispered in his ear:

"That meteor-like, in darkness set;
This, sweetly beams life's guiding star;
I did not love thee first, but yet
Thou know'st I love thee better far."

Knowledge, if neglected, is poison. Food, if undigested, is poison.

"IN CHILDHOOD'S DAYS"

BY MIRANDA S. OSBORNE.

In childhood's days—not long ago—
We wandered by the stream,
Whose beauteous marge in wanton flow
Of floral rainbows gleamed—
And zephyrs gaily glided past,
And heaven hung bright on high,
And childhood's heart beat quick and fast,
And life flew gaily by.

In childhood's days—not long ago—
We often met and roved
Beside the stream with footsteps slow,
But never dreamed we loved:
Those days of joy flew quickly past—
A sigh—a tear—we parted:
Death willed it was our first and last—
I roam now broken-hearted.

In childhood's days—not long ago—
It seemeth like a dream;
I hear the murmuring brooklet flow,
I sit beside the stream:
I press the marge her footsteps trod—
The flowers her hand caressed—
And whisper "Loved one—gone to God!
Thy childhood's dream was blest."

THE SURPRISE.

BY CLARA A. HOWARD.

"AND you say you are sad, my poor Julie, and want to come for a few days to Linden Place! My dear cousin! did you not feel that you would be most cordially welcome, without even announcing, much less begging, a visit? Come, then, without delay; but leave your sadness on the road. Linden Place is in full glory, and it will not abide shadows. You say your heart weeps, while your face wears a smile! Well, love, you must 'lay your wet heart by the side of your sunshiny face, and the bog will be dried presently.' In truth, I do not blame you, Julie, for being sad in a city, in the glorious time of summer. Why, you lose the better part of life, by being cooped up between bricks and mortar. Come out with me into the glorious old woods, and let dear nature speak to your heart and it will make it all too glad for weeping."

Such was the letter which Julie Bowen received from her lively cousin, Mrs. Linden. It was the first real smile that Julie's face had shown for the last six weeks; and yet one could hardly have thought that, situated as she was, she could have been very unhappy. Kind and indulgent parents, affectionate brothers and sisters, a luxurious city home, and all appliances for comfort and elegance, would seem to have been fully sufficient to the happiness of most young ladies. But we all know how little the surroundings of any person of true sensibility can influence her happiness.

Only one year had Julie been initiated into fashionable society; and although she had floated on the topmost wave, far away, in the distant country town where her school-days had always been passed, there was one whose love was dearer to her than all this pomp and show, of which she was so tired. One glance of his large, spiritual eye was better than all the false-hearted compliments which thickened about the beautiful co-heiress of Mr. Bowen, whose wealth was almost fabulous.

But in the charmed circle of fashion, Fletcher Hervey would have been sadly out of place. His were the still and quiet occupations of a scholar; and his home could never be made amongst the frivolities and affectations of city life. He loved Julie Bowen, not for her wealth, for he had not even heard of it; but for her sympathy with his tastes, her fine appreciation of all talent, all genius, and all art that came within the scope of her observation; for her longings after a purer and more spiritual existence; and no less for her tender, womanly heart.

Step by step, through the last half year of Julie's scholar-life, their love had progressed, and yet no word had been spoken by either. Fletcher Hervey was poor, and he felt bound to keep aloft from all engagements, until he could see his way clear before him. With the scanty salary of a teacher of languages, how could he expect anything for the future, but the meanest subsistence? But though lips may be mute, there is a language of the eyes not so easily guarded, and long before she was called to her father's princely home, to enter upon the world where she was to make a part of the pageant, she knew that she was dearly and truly loved.

A year went round, and Julie, dissatisfied with herself and every one around her, and longing for some place of quiet seclusion, where the butterflies of fashion would never think of folding their painted wings, wrote to Mrs. Linden, to invite herself to her pleasant home. It was a rare pleasure that she gave to Alice Linden, when she asked to go to her. She loved Julie better than either of her cousins. There was a great contrast between them, for Alice was a lively, impulsive and fanciful woman, while Julia was silent, almost to pensiveness, and with no slight tinge of romance lingering about the depths of her heart. No one could resist the hearty sympathy and unaffected cordiality of Mrs. Linden.

She met her visitor at the door, with welcome on her lip and in her eyes, and a voice of such tender sweetness, that Julie's tears sprang to her eyes.

An hour passed with Mr. Linden, showed her that he was worthy of his wife; and before the day had gone by, Julie felt herself perfectly at home. Her friends manifested that rare tact which leaves a visitor to her own pursuits, after providing liberally the means of enjoyment.

The family passed most of the time out of doors, and this freedom charmed Julie's taste, while it improved her health, and exhilarated her spirits. She joined eagerly in every plan which would keep her out of the house; and her friends rallied her upon the taste she exhibited, so different from other town-bred ladies.

"I am not a town-bred lady, Alice," she answered, "nor do I wish to be. My wishes all lie centered in a country life. I could rejoice to have a mere subsistence in the country, and work hard for that."

Alice laughed.

"You would suit a cousin of William's admirably," she said. "He is forever quoting these lines:

'I never formed a hope of happiness,
But in the country was the scene.'

"But do you think, my lady fair, that you could really make butter and cheese, milk the cows, and bake corn-cakes?"

"No doubt of it whatever," said Julie, smiling. "I could do a great deal—sacrifice a great deal for those I loved."

Alice looked her in the face for a few moments without speaking. When she turned away, Julie heard her say, "Tears—low spirits—wants to live in the country—make sacrifices—bad symptoms!" and she shook her head gravely as she uttered each sentence.

"Nay," said Julie, following her, "I am not willing that you should think that—"

"That! that what?"

"What you were thinking of as you turned away."

"Really, Miss Bowen, I did not know you were a clairvoyant. I shall be afraid to think my own thoughts, now that I know that you are given over to the black art. But I will forgive you if you will 'make a clean breast,' to me, of all your thoughts. I know something is the matter with your little heart. Confess!"

And Julie, who had never spoken to mortal ears of her love for Fletcher Hervey, unveiled her whole heart to her cousin Alice. Not without many struggles indeed, but frankly and openly, without keeping back a single feeling in connection with it. Indeed, as she had come to her for a cure, it would have been ungrateful not to describe her disorder to so kind and tender a physician.

"I really had designed, cousin Julie," said Alice, "that you should have bestowed your 'hand, heart and fortune,' upon a pet friend of William's. I will not tell you his name, because that would be hardly fair; but I will tell you this much. He is noble, talented, as highly born and highly bred as any of the Bowens (I may say that, since I belong to the family!) and I doubt not, has as tender a heart as your Mr. Hervey. I am expecting him here on a visit, for he always comes on the first of September, to enjoy a week's shooting with William; and if you do not prefer him to your country school-teacher, I will give you over to a depraved taste."

"I defy him!" said Julie, catching some of her cousin's playful spirit.

After this, there were a great many mysterious talks between Mrs. Linden and her husband, and had not Julie thought it perfectly impossible on her cousin's part, she would almost have feared she was betraying her confidence. At any rate, she was confident that she was the subject of their conferences, for twice she had heard her name, just as she was opening the door of the room where they were talking, and moreover, their confusion showed that something was connected with her.

Time passed rapidly, even with Julie. Her sick heart healed under the glorious influences of nature that were everywhere around her. She loved to go out into the grand old woods, and give herself up to a higher inspiration, than even Fletcher's love could give her. Hers was no common, girlish passion, which could vent itself in words—she was no love-lorn maiden, cherishing an idle sentiment and dignifying it with the name of love! No, she was an upright, pure and good woman, who made even the largest meed of human love subservient to the worship of the divine.

She believed fully that her life and Fletcher Hervey's must and would remain apart. She believed truly that Mr. Bowen would sooner see her die, than wedded to a poor man; and her recent communing with nature, and with her own heart, and the confession that she had made to her cousin relieving her of her heavy secret, all combined with a full purpose that she had formed, of devoting her life to the duties of her situation, and allowing nothing selfish to mingle therein. It is a very good resolve, Julie! Let us see if you can keep it!

The other members of the Bowen family had returned from their sea-side excursions, to the pleasures of a city life. Broadway was thronged with crowds of gay people who had come from summer tours, to mingle again in show and dissipation. Mamas, whose summer schemes had been rudely blasted. Young lovers, who had failed of securing the heart of the lady of their choice; old men who had left town to lessen their expenses, and had found them wonderfully increased; all met on the same plane of disappointment and vexation, again to form new plans of convenience, of love, or of retrenchment.

Julie was sent for at home, but Mrs. Linden would not hear of it; and her husband who was going to New York on business, promised to make it all right with her father and mother. She was so quiet here that she could not endure the thought of plunging again into the excitement and bustle of the city, and she was thankful when Mr. Linden brought the required permission. The first of September had come and gone; but no signs of Mrs. Linden's expected visitor. She read part of a letter to Julie, which he had written to her in answer to her earnest invitation.

"You ask me to come to you, dear friend, and you hint strongly that there is an attraction there which, you say, will soften even my obdurate heart. How little you know of me, Alice! I could tell you a history of the devotion of that heart, which would put all your preconceived ideas of it to flight at once. But I forbear. Perhaps when I come to you, your womanly sympathy will bring me to confession. Meantime, think anything of me rather than that I am obdurate or insensible. Remember that there is such a thing as unreturned love! I will be with you soon; but when, it will be impossible for me now to say."

"This is vexatious enough," said Mrs. Linden. "I know him so well, that I am perfectly aware why he refuses to appoint his visit. He knows with what a flourish of trumpets we always receive him here, and he intends to take us by surprise."

Julie unconsciously let her thoughts flow out to this stranger, whose visit was so important to her friends—for Mr. Linden was as anxious as his wife was—and she really began to feel some curiosity to see him. But he did not come, and gradually she returned to her old musings about Fletcher Hervey. Not a single word had she heard from him since she parted from him so long ago, when his look only, not his words, betrayed the pain with which he saw her go. Not even his name had by any chance been mentioned to her; and sometimes she doubted if he still remembered her.

A rose-leaf or two, a bunch of field violets, two or three lines of Italian—not immortalized by love or poetry—but a common school exercise, were all the visible signs she possessed of ever having known him. She had brought them instinctively, away from home, lest they should be discovered by her too curious sisters. She hardly knew whether she valued them or not. She only knew that she had a dread of destroying them, as if it would break some link between her heart and another, which she was hardly able to decide if it were at all right for her to keep bright in remembrance!

Among Mrs. Linden's other methods of passing time agreeably, she had a great passion for private theatricals. She had often gratified this taste, before Julie came, but thinking that her cousin would not like it, she had not proposed it until now. As the evenings lengthened, and grew cool, making it impossible to stay out of the house as they had done, Mrs. Linden's thoughts reverted to her old fancy; and with the aid of a few friends, she had contrived a very respectable dramatic representation, in which her husband and Julie, however, declined to appear. She therefore held them as prompters; the spectators being chiefly their neighboring acquaintances with their families. It closed with a dance, in which Julie was prevailed on to join, Mrs. Linden having previously insisted on her putting on a fancy dress, she had herself worn.

It was that of a flower-girl; and Julie, with her sweet, innocent face, and naturally graceful air, combined with the perfect simplicity of her manners, looked the character to a charm. As she was dancing a face, appeared a moment at the door, which made her start and tremble; it was so like Fletcher Hervey's. She lost her self-control for an instant, and lost the figure, but a moment's reflection showed her how impossible it was. As she ceased dancing, Alice came to her, and led her out of the hall. "Let us go to your room, Julie," she said. "William has a friend here, who may stay all night, and we will dress you in your own character."

She proceeded to dress Julie, who was powerless against her, in a beautiful white dress, which had just been sent home, and fastening a single white camelia in her hair, she left her, charging her not to appear below, until she was ready for her. Julie took up a book, and waited patiently. She heard some of the people driving off, and wondered that Alice did not call her to bid them good night. At last the house was still, and Alice came for her. As they turned into the little room at the bottom of the second staircase, Alice told her they were all gone.

"I did not call you," she said, "for it is so fatiguing to stand for an hour, saying nothing but good night! Besides I want William to see you in full glory. Your dress is charming, and you look as fresh as you did at five o'clock. How do you manage it? I am all worn out with the toil of seeing these people. Absolutely, I won't see them again this winter."

And she rattled on until she heard Mr. Linden come up stairs, when she left Julie alone, and passed into the drawing-room. Julie was standing by the table where she had left her; and when she heard, as she supposed, her footsteps coming back, she turned to speak to her. She looked up and saw Fletcher Hervey!

Alice had contrived this afterpiece to her evening's entertainment, with full satisfaction to herself. She had kept Julie's secret inviolate; and even Mr. Linden did not know that Fletcher had ever seen Julie before. Nor did Mr. Hervey know whom he was to meet in that little room, to which Alice had sent him for the bouquet which she had purposely dropped there.

Human nature is not always so sordid as we think. Julie had wronged her father by believing that he would not look upon a son-in-law without money. Mr. Bowen had seen enough, the last two or three years of his life, to make him feel that honest poverty is better than riches dishonestly acquired by rash speculations. When Fletcher Hervey, agreeably to his friend Linden's advice, stated his circumstances and his hopes to Mr. Bowen, the latter grasped him by the hand, and expressed his entire satisfaction with him as a son.

Mrs. Bowen sighed a little over Julie's narrow prospects; but when she knew Fletcher's worth, and perhaps also, when she knew that he had been appointed to a large professorship, and afterwards, too, when he became sought after as a great man, to whom her great men bowed down in conscious inferiority, she was not only reconciled but glorified herself exceedingly on account of her son, the professor. As to the professor himself, he could value all those things, exactly for what they were worth.

As the time drew near when Julie's marriage was set to be performed, she grew anxious that Fletcher should select some place out of the city, for their future home. Not merely for a fashionable summer residence, but for a permanent abode, like that of the Lindens. In this, too, Mr. Bowen acquiesced.

"You will begin to know me better, one of these days, my daughter," said he, when Julie told him how she had dreaded his knowledge of her attachment, and her fear that he would not permit her to live out of the city. I am beginning to see life under a new aspect. I have purchased two fine estates on the Hudson River. One is yours; the other I shall occupy myself."

It was enough. Julie's happiness was too deep for thanks. They spend a month every September at Mr. Linden's, to keep the anniversary of that evening on which they so unexpectedly met there.

A LETTER OF RECOMMENDATION.

When Dr. Franklin was minister of the United States to France, he was frequently importuned by persons unknown to him to give them letters of recommendation. For cases of this kind, and when it was impossible to refuse, he prepared the following model, and, in some instances, actually employed it to shame persons making such indiscreet applications, and in some measure to stop them:

"PARIS, April —, 1777.

"SIR:—The bearer going to the United States, presses me to give him a letter of recommendation, although I know nothing of him, not even his name. This may seem extraordinary, but I assure you, it is not uncommon here. Sometimes, indeed, one person unknown brings another equally so to recommend him; and sometimes they recommend one another. As for this gentleman, I must refer you to himself for his character and morals, with which he is certainly better acquainted than I can possibly be. I recommend him, however, to those civilities which every stranger of whom we know no harm have a right to; and I request you will do him all the good offices and show him all the favor that on further acquaintance you will find him deserve."

ORATORICAL FLOURISHES.

Figures of speech are dangerous matters for orators to meddle with, and should be handled with great care and skill, unless an ambitious speaker is willing to risk making himself ridiculous. A clergyman not long since reproved his congregation from the pulpit and gravely assured them that "the hand of Providence would not wink at their transgressions!" A descendant of one of the revolutionary sires, in the national legislature, astonished his brother legislators by saying: "My father and my grandfather both saw the darkness of midnight glittering in the blaze of their dwellings." John Randolph once spoke of himself as "standing on the vacant seat, which we now occupy"—but he was probably absent at the time. Another distinguished member of the House of Representatives made the following pathetic appeal: "If this bill passes, a small, still voice will be heard in the western district, which will not knock in vain at the door of Congress!"—Olive Branch.

A good and generous man is happy within himself and independent of fortune; kind to his friend, temperate to his enemy; religiously just, indefatigably laborious, and discharges every duty with constancy and congruity of action.

COME TO THE COUNTRY.

BY N. S. HILL.

Come to the country—there's pleasure and health,
Unknown in gay cities of splendor and wealth,
There's joy on the hills, when the merry winds blow,
And flowers nod their heads in the valleys below.

A murmuring brook meanders along,
And over the hills is heard the wild song
Of the woodland birds, so happy and free,
As they flit through the trees, and over the lea.

O, leave ye the cities of bustle and show,
And to the green hills of the country we'll go,
For the land of our fathers, the land of the free,
Is the home of the happy; then come here with me.

GONZALES THE PAINTER.

BY ANNE T. WILBUR.

A YOUNG man, wearing the handsome half Flemish, half Spanish costume of the portraits of Van Dyck, was seated before an easel, and contemplating, with a thoughtful look, a large picture, almost finished, representing the transmigration. He still held in one hand his palette, and in the other his pencils, which he grasped with a kind of suppressed despair. After a few moments of silence, he dropped pencils and palette, clasped his hands, and tears filled his eyes. Suddenly the door of his studio opened. The young painter hastily wiped his eyes, and rose with a movement of impatience.

The woman who had just entered had the thick and short form, the ruddy complexion, and wore the costume of Flemish peasants; she might have been taken for one of the buccones of Tenebris. She approached the easel, scolding.

"I was sure of it," said she; "you have been at work on your holy picture, instead of finishing the paintings which the Archduke Leopold ordered." And turning towards several sketches suspended to the wall, continued: "Is it not a shame to leave there unfinished, so many beautiful things?"

"A shame," returned Gonzales, ironically, "to quit these drunkards' fights and kitchen interiors to paint the Mother of God!"

"The mother of Satan, rather! Think you not that everybody will recognize in your madonna the portrait of La Caterina? How dared you give the Virgin the face of an opera dancer?"

"Why did God give the opera dancer the face of a virgin?"

"Say that you are glad to have a pretext to entice this young girl hither. O, I am not your dupe, and I know why you love better to paint women than drinkers!"

"Again, Margaret!" exclaimed the painter.

"I will not suffer another woman to enter here," continued the housekeeper, raising her voice.

"You forget that I am master in my own house, Margaret."

"And you forget that I am your wife."

"O no, I remember it but too often!" said the young man, angrily. "Accursed be the day when I encountered you!"

"You were not then so proud."

Gonzales started.

"You are right," said he, bitterly. "I was then a beggar without a shelter. I had received only six rix dollars for my best picture, and my landlord had driven me from my lodgings. O, I have forgotten nothing! You picked me up in the street like a forsaken dog; you generously gave me food and a refuge."

"Who talked of this?"

"You, Margaret; you reminded me of it; but do you know what I have given you in return? I have given you my hopes and my most beautiful dreams; I have become your husband—I who might have been your son! I have toiled in your presence like a workman for his patron, hearing only your scolding voice, seeing only your discontented face. And yet I feel within me all the aspirations of youth! I dream of beauty, sweet songs, and brilliant fetes. O, how often, as I passed the palace of Rubens, and listened to the music of his balls, have I wished to enter! How often have I looked through the garden gate at the young ladies and their cavaliers dancing beneath the trees! And I had but to will it, and the gate would open to me; for whoever can write his name with his pencil, is welcome with Rubens, and Gonzales is not unknown to him! But it would have deranged the monotonous life I have led with you; on returning from the company of these sweet-voiced ladies, I should have found your language more rude, and your temper more intolerable. I prefer to renounce a pleasure, which would only increase my sadness; besides, Art can console for all—even for lost youth. It is to her that I have confided my sorrows; but do not seek to deprive me of this last consolation, Margaret; for when there is no hope, patience must fail."

These words were pronounced with profound bitterness and suppressed anger; but the coarse Fleming did not appear to comprehend him.

"What does all this signify?" said she. "You suffer cumui, you desire to go to balls; who hinders you?"

Gonzales made a violent gesture; but immediately repressed it.

"Return to your kitchen, Margaret," said he, with resigned despair.

This calmness exasperated the Fleming.

"To my kitchen!" exclaimed she. "Am I then a servant, and have I not a right to remain here if I will? O, I am not such a fool as you think for, Jean; in the midst of all these fine phrases, there is one thing I comprehend—it is that you are weary of me, and wish me dead. Yes, dead! I should then no longer be a restraint upon you; you could go to the fetes of Rubens, and dance with the beautiful ladies. Only, Jean, when I am no longer here, you must not be sick so often; for these young ladies are afraid that fevers and vigils would spoil their complexion. You must not require them to pass ten days and nights watching beside you; only servants, like myself, ever do that!"

"Yes," said the young man, "you have taken care of me as the executioner takes care of the criminal—to have the pleasure of killing me afterwards at your ease! Am I not, besides, your property?—and like a good manager, must you not preserve a domestic animal whose productions you wish to sell? What you would save, is not my life, but my labor."

"Your labor is indeed worth saving: it is now two months since you have sold a picture, and yet there is a demand on every side; but you had rather remain whole days before this great canvass, watching the flies and seeming to think, that you may be idle."

"Go to your kitchen, Margaret," repeated Gonzales, his patience almost exhausted.

But the Fleming had been wounded to the quick, and, as it often happens in such cases, she felt her anger increase as she spoke.

"Yes," returned she, "my place is in the kitchen; for it is that of honest women; and here are only filles de joie; ingrates, who forget what has been done for them; idlers, who suffer themselves to be supported by a wife!"

Gonzales could listen no longer. He seized her by the arm, pushed her rudely out, looked down the door, and threw himself in a chair at the other end of the studio. It was the first time he had resorted to violence to escape the persecutions of his wife, and he was at once sad and terrified at what he had done.

Gonzales had espoused Margaret partly through gratitude, partly through weakness, and without calculating the consequences of such an engagement. He was at an age when one tries all that is new, without hesitation; when one risks happiness and life through indifference or curiosity. He had regarded his union with Margaret less as a marriage than as a domestic association. He had seen in it, at first, only the means of securing a home, where he would find some one to take the place of mother and sister; he soon found out how much he had been mistaken.

Margaret loved him with an exclusive and tyrannical affection. Jealous and imperious, she pursued Gonzales everywhere with her orders and complaints. No nature could be more opposite to that of the young painter. Her ignorant brutality was equalled only by his delicate susceptibility; he was one of those souls in love only with idealities—charming but frail butterflies, which cannot come in contact with reality without brushing the dust from their wings. Since the despotism of Margaret had been extended even to his art, he had begun to find it more difficult to endure. Already he had several times resolved to recover his independence by leaving Anvers; but the necessity of affection restrained him—he dreaded the return of that isolation which had made desolate his earlier years. Margaret was as yet the only being to whom he was attached by any tie; with her he was unhappy; but he was not alone, and for his heart, full of love, solitude was annihilation.

The scene we have just described made him once more think of flight; and without having resolved upon it, he was asking himself how and where he could go, when he heard a gentle knock at the door of the studio.

"Who's there?" asked he, hastily.

A sweet and slightly tremulous voice replied, "It is I, master."

Gonzales opened the door, and a boy of about fifteen years, wearing a rich Polish costume, entered the studio.

"Pardon me, Antonio," said the painter, passing his hand amicably over the head of the boy, "I had forgotten that it was the day for your lesson."

Antonio raised upon him a glance of sadness, which seemed to express a reproach.

"I had not forgotten it," said he, softly.

Gonzales seated himself again, pensively, and the child approached him with timid tenderness.

"You are sad, master."

Gonzales cast down his head.

"I understand you: she has been here again."

"Yes," said Gonzales; "she came to remind me that she has supported me two months in doing nothing; and she is right, for two months I have labored only for art; my days and nights are consumed here before this canvass, where I efface each morning what I have painted the day before!—for all my efforts are useless, Antonio; in vain do I essay to seize the vague images that float before my thoughts—at the moment of in-roducing them, they are effaced and disappear. And how could it be otherwise? Nothing recalls to me their beauty. I seek in vain around me forms to imitate—all is coarse, heavy, trivial. O, why was not I born in Italy, like our divine masters? Why did I not grow up like them in an atmosphere of light, elegance and poesy? Ah! they were happy; their souls had but to reflect the creation which surrounded them, and their pencils to copy it. They needed not to invent sunlight and grace. They painted amid fragrant flowers, melodious songs, beautiful women; and their genius was happiness!" As he spoke thus, Gonzales had approached the picture. "All this is cold and vulgar," he said, shaking his head. "Shall I never find the model of that beauty of which I catch a glimpse in my reveries? O, Raphael! Titian! where are the beautiful women who rendered you immortal?"

He sighed, and turned towards Antonio.

"I thank thee at least, child, for one of the forms of which I had dreamed. Look! my angel's head is beautiful, and yet it does not equal thine! Wilt thou serve me again as a model to-day?"

"I am at your orders, master."

Gonzales resumed his palette, placed himself before the easel, and compared the features of the angel with those of Antonio.

"How noble are the outlines of your face!" said he, looking at the young Pole with complacent admiration. "What sweetness and sadness in your look! Ah! if you had but a sister who resembled you!"

There was a long silence. Gonzales had resumed his painting with ardor. Suddenly the door of his studio opened, and Margaret again appeared.

"Some Spanish gentlemen wish to see you," she said, harshly.

"What do they want?"

"I do not know; but they came in a gilt carriage."

"Their names?"

"One only gave his name—it is the Count de Los Cavallos."

Antonio uttered a cry.

"Well, do you know him?" asked Margaret.

But the child replied only by casting a terrified glance around. Voices were heard on the stairs.

"They are here," said Margaret, going to open the door.

Antonio ran to Gonzales.

"I am lost!"

"What mean you?"

"In the name of Heaven, let me depart unseen."

"It is impossible."

The visitors were already on the landing.

"Conceal me, then! conceal me!" cried the bewildered child.

"In this cabinet," said Gonzales, pointing to a closet where he kept his canvases.

At this moment the count, accompanied by two gentlemen, appeared on the threshold.

"Here is my husband," exclaimed Margaret, presenting Gonzales to the visitors.

"Good morning, master," said Los Cavallos, "Rubens has spoken to us of you, and we came to see your pictures."

"Look, gentlemen."

The young gentlemen began to examine the pictures suspended to the wall, and stopped before the six ordered by the Archduke Leopold.

"Why do you not finish these beautiful pictures?" asked the count.

"I am working on something else."

"Yes," muttered Margaret, "on an Annunciation."

"And where is this Annunciation?"

Gonzales pointed to his easel, and the three Spanish noblemen approached; but scarcely had the count cast his eyes on the canvases, when he exclaimed: "Look! Cabrella; do you not know that angel's head?"

"It is the niece of the Duchess d'Alcazzo, the beautiful Dolores."

"What say you, gentlemen?" exclaimed Gonzales, approaching.

"Ah! you introduce great ladies into your holy pictures," resumed Los Cavallos. "But how knew you the duchess? I have never met you at her house. How did you obtain the portrait of Dolores?—for it is she; the resemblance is wonderful."

"This angel's head," interrupted Margaret, who had approached, "is the portrait of the young Pole."

"What Pole?"

"Antonio; he was here just now. What has become of him?"

"He has gone out, sir," said Gonzales, hastily.

"It is impossible; we should have met him on the stairs; he must have concealed himself."

"He is not here, I tell you."

"I will wager that I can find him."

But Gonzales darted upon his wife a look in which there was so much of command that she stopped short.

"What is all this?" asked the count. "Why conceal from us the young Pole who sat for the angel?"

"The woman is mad, sir; I painted this head from memory."

Los Cavallos looked at Gonzales with a suspicious air, took his companions aside, and exchanged a few words with them in a low tone.

Gonzales felt that he must put an end to this "Do the gentlemen desire anything more?" he asked, coldly.

The count cast upon him a haughty glance. "Do we disturb you, master?"

"I live by my labor," replied the painter.

Los Cavallos made an angry gesture, which he immediately suppressed.

"We will leave you then," said he. "Only beware! for it sometimes costs dearly to paint noble ladies." And turning to his companions, he added: "Let us go to the duchess. We will verify the resemblance of Dolores to the angel."

Gonzales opened the door for them, and saw them disappear down the winding stairs. Hardly were they alone, when Margaret advanced towards the cabinet, and found herself face to face with Antonio.

"I was sure of it!" exclaimed she.

"Go, go, Margaret!" said Gonzales, hastening thither.

"Why did he conceal himself? What signifies all this?" she uttered.

Suddenly the eyes of the Fleming rested upon Antonio. She uttered an exclamation, as if a new suspicion had struck her, and, by a movement too rapid to be prevented, put aside the pelisse of the child.

"A woman!" exclaimed she.

Gonzales remained immovable and speechless.

"A woman!" repeated Margaret. "It is very possible! Ah! I comprehend now! These, then, are the pupils to whom you give lessons, Gonzales?"

"Silence, Margaret!"

"And do you think I will suffer this?"

"Away!" he exclaimed, furiously.

"Yes, I will go; but I will return quickly with the Duchess d'Alcasso!"

She darted from the studio. The young girl made a movement as if to follow; then stopping short, said, "After all, what matters it?" And she threw herself into a chair, weeping.

During all this scene, Gonzales had remained as if struck with a stupor. What he had just learned was so sudden, so unexpected, that he could hardly comprehend its meaning. He caught a glimpse of happiness which he dared not look in the face, and before which he closed his eyes. Meanwhile, when he saw himself alone with the young girl, when he heard her sobs, he felt his heart melt. He approached her, and said in a supplicating tone:

"Sorrow, pity me—I dare not understand or believe. O, give me no false hopes! All that has passed here is so strange that I fear an explanation. This disguise; these visits. What is there for me beneath all this? Is it happiness or a disenchantment?" And as the young girl remained silent, and her sobs redoubled, he knelt before her. "Sorrow, a single word to tell me what I am to hope or fear. Look! I ask it on my knees."

The young girl threw her arms around his neck, and pronounced his name in a low tone. The latter uttered a cry of joy.

"Dolores! Dolores! is it true then? Did you come on my account? Do you love me?"

"Gonzales!" repeated she, resting on the forehead of the young painter her cheek moistened with tears.

The latter placed one arm around her, and raising her head with the other hand, said, in a voice broken with happiness, "Is all this not a dream? Am I not mad? I, beloved by you, Dolores—by you so noble and so beautiful! But how can this be? Dare I love you? Only to look at you, I weep with joy! O, what has inspired you with this kindness towards me?"

"For a year past, Gonzales, I have known you and loved you."

"Where then did you see me?"

"At the convent of St. Marie, while you were painting your Samaritan. Each day, concealed in a curtained pew, I passed whole hours in looking at you. Invisible for you, I lived in the intricacy of your heart. I saw your brow by turns pale with despair or luminous with enthusiasm; I heard you speak of your work, censure or praise it; I witnessed all the emotions of your inspiration. Sometimes, when the curious came to pay you a visit, I heard you talk of Art, of Poesy, of Religion. All you said seemed new to me, and yet I felt that all these thoughts were within me. At last, one day (you have perhaps forgotten it), a young painter, whom you had known in your childhood, came to see you. You confided to him your sufferings, and I then learned them. Your friend, in his turn, related his life to you; he was full of courage and hope; he was beloved! After having listened to him, you took his hand. 'Be happy, Rynold,' you said to him. 'Ah! if I had been thus beloved, I, too, might have possessed genius.' And you wept, as you spoke thus. From that day I loved you."

"Angel!" exclaimed Gonzales, clasping the girl in his arms; "and I knew nothing of it!"

"Perhaps I should have betrayed myself; but I had not time. My aunt, who was in Spain, returned and took me from the convent of St. Marie. I saw you then more rarely; nevertheless, I sought you everywhere, and I often encountered you on the promenades or in the museums. But suddenly I ceased to see you. It was a long time before I learned the cause of your disappearance. At last, by means of inquiries, I heard that you had been long ill, but were convalescent. I could no longer resist my anxiety. My aunt, solely occupied with the pleasures of the world, left me entirely at liberty. Aided by my nurse, who lives near here, I procured this costume, and presented myself before you to take lessons in painting. You know the rest, Gonzales. I saw you often, I heard you speak; I was happy, and should still have remained silent, had not chance discovered all."

"Ah! do not complain of it, Dolores, for I owe to chance the happiest hour of my life. If you knew what I feel! I would thank you for my happiness, and cannot; I am at your feet as a child without strength, without volition, overcome by surprise and joy. I fear lest a movement should awaken me, and I would die here listening to your voice and looking at you."

"Gonzales, do you then love me also?"

"Do I love you, Dolores? You are the realization of all my hopes, all my dreams! Do I love you?—you, who have descended like an angel to the poor forsaken one!—do you not see that you are now all in all to me, that I can no longer live but for you and with you? Blessed be the chance which led these gentlemen hither!"

"Ah! you remind me; you have made me forget all—Los Cavallos is now with my aunt."

"You are right."

"The duchess is implacable; she will revenge herself on you for my love."

"What care I?"

"Reflect that Margaret will conduct them hither. O, I will not wait for them! I should die with shame and grief! Then they will separate me from you, Gonzales."

"Never!" said the painter, encircling her with his arms. "It is God who has united us; he will never separate. You cannot henceforth remain here, Dolores; well, let us break the bonds which detain us; let us renounce our past, and both commence a new existence; let each be to the other, in future, family and world; let us fly together!"

It was rumored, a few days afterwards, in the studios of Anvers, that the painter Gonzales had disappeared, and no one could divine the motive. The Duchess d'Alcazzo announced on her part, that her niece had suddenly set out for Spain, summoned by a brother of her mother. Rumors of flight and elopement soon arose; but the duchess quelled them without difficulty. She contrived to give her friends news of Dolores, and to show them the letters which she wrote her, she said, from Spain, so that at the expiration of a short time, her absence no longer occasioned remark.

Meanwhile the duchess neglected nothing to discover the retreat of her niece. The precautions which she took to conceal her flight had been dictated less by affection than by pride. What she desired above all was to conceal that an Alcazzo could descend to love a man of the people; for it was not the fault which displeased her—it was the lover. Little cared she for honor, if appearances were saved; and Dolores, the wife of Gonzales, instead of his mistress, would have seemed to her still more guilty as having stooped more irrevocably. But what she desired at any price, was to separate her from Gonzales, and to have her re-appear before any unsuspected circumstance should have revealed the truth. Her pride was interested in this, so she had recourse to every method of discovering the two fugitives; but especially to an old family servant, whose address had been of service to her on many occasions.

Perez had formerly been a spy of the Inquisition, and had thus acquired the cunning perspicacity of all accustomed to espionage. Like the savages of the New World, who trace on the grass the print of the enemy's moccasin, he could discover the slightest vestige, the most fugitive indication; he would follow your trail, recognise the air you had breathed, or the word you had uttered on your passage, to a host or a beggar. Besides, entirely devoted to the Alcazos, the pride of Perez was also involved, and he swore to find the young girl, and set out, provided with instructions from the duchess.

As he had hoped, the talent of Gonzales aided him in his pursuit. The latter had taken refuge in Brussels, where he lived by the product of his pictures, which he took care to sell through other hands. Perez found at Amsterdam several of these paintings, recently brought into the market. He went from purchaser to purchaser, and at last arrived at Brussels, where he discovered the fugitives.

His measures were immediately taken to carry off Dolores, and rid himself of her lover. One evening, therefore, as they were returning home, he placed himself in their way, accompanied by several men, who threw themselves on the young painter, and struck him several blows with the poignard; but some citizens, attracted by the cries of the girl, ran thither and compelled the assassins to take flight. Perez, arrested by them, was thrown into prison, whence he emerged only at the expiration of three months, and through the intercession of the Duchess d'Alcazzo; and when he found himself free, the lovers had left Brussels. He recommenced the search with new ardor; but, doubtless informed of what had happened, Gonzales had taken precautions that his works should not betray him. Perez in vain frequented the shops of the merchants, asking for pictures of Gonzales, and offering to cover them with gold; all his inquiries were useless—Gonzales painted no more!

The envoy of the Duchess d'Alcazzo had already traversed in vain Flanders, Holland, England and France. He was returning to Anvers in despair, but nevertheless visiting on his way all the brokers' shops, and asking information. One day, as he was at Oudenard, in the studio of Hals, less celebrated for his talents than for his skill in trafficking that of others, this painter received several pictures, which he unrolled in the presence of Perez.

"What are those paintings?" he asked.

"Marvels," replied Hals; "flower pictures of a young man who has revealed himself only within a few months. Usually, the greatest artists announce themselves by imperfect works; this one has commenced by chef d'œuvres. There are in his productions the grace and experience of a master. You shall judge, for I have here his largest and finest picture." Hals put aside the curtain, and showed Perez a large picture suspended to the wall.

It was the interior of a poor but gay little room. In the background was a bed of serge, with the benitier and consecrated branch, and near to it two rude chairs. On the narrow case-ment, some broken porcelain pots, garnished with variegated tulips; and finally, in the middle, a willow basket, half overturned, whence were streaming verdure, fruit and flowers.

"Look!" said Hals; "what delicacy and harmony!—there are not only here flowers, furniture, fruits; this is a whole picture, and this deserted chamber has its expression like a head of Rubens. Among all the painters of our times, we have had but one who could give to his interiors this charm, and to his painting this finish: it is Gonzales."

"Gonzales!" exclaimed Perez; "do you say that this painting resembles his?"

"As much as two kinds of painting can resemble each other."

"And you call this flower painter—?"

"Henri Staube."

"Where does he live?"

"At Harlem."

"I will buy this picture, Master Hals," said Perez; and that very evening he was on his way to Harlem.

At the extremity of a suburb of Harlem, and in the midst of a garden cultivated by the florist Roffman, stood a cottage half buried in jessamines. It was composed of a single story, which was reached by an exterior stairway, overhadowed by vines, and interlaced with rosy honeysuckles. This was the dwelling of Gonzales and his young mistress. They had been allured by the isolation of the habitation which concealed them from all eyes, and by its rustic grace. Besides, Gonzales had the advantage of having always before him the flowers and the fruits he wished to paint. Having comprehended—after his adventure at Brussels—that his pictures would always lead to his being recognized, he resolved to change the kind and his name, that he might defeat the malice of his persecutors. It cost him something to quit thus a career gloriously begun for an uncertain and novel one; but the security of his happiness was at stake. Then there was for his soul something more precious than fame—it was art. Little cared he, after all, for the applause of men; what he thought of was the work itself. His love, so deep and so delightful, was mingled in his soul with admiration of his art. He loved Dolores, not only because she was lovely in herself, but because she was a beautiful model. He thought less often of her devotedness than of the inspiration of her beauty; and he saw in her not only a beloved woman, but a wonderful part of creation, something holy, the very sight of whom inspired genius.

So he devoted a part of his days to studying her graces, to copying them on the canvass. He cared little that his progress was not known by the world, that it was not applauded; he felt his talent increase; he experienced happiness from it; he entered each day more into the possession of art. Like the early Christians who adored Christ in the catacombs, without listening to the noise of the Rome above them, he cultivated painting, careless of the voice of renown. As for Dolores, all that her lover felt, she felt. These two souls seemed to have mingled in the same religion; but they had reached this end by two opposite paths—Gonzales had comprehended love by art; Dolores, art by love.

All the time the painter had to spare, he devoted to sacred studies. Condemned to paint for others only flowers or fruits, he painted for himself Madonnas, saints and angels. Dolores served him as a model for his labors, which he concealed from all eyes, and his life passed away thus in a succession of delightful studies and sweet emotions. As it increased, his happiness alarmed him; he feared every instant to see it crumble away, and guarded it with feverish anxiety.

Since his arrival at Harlem, he had done everything to conceal himself and efface his memory from the world. The merchant who purchased his pictures was the only man to whom he had spoken; his house, the only one into which he had entered. Dolores was still more sedentary; she never went to the city, and avoided frequented places. Only when the evening was pleasant, she descended with Gonzales to the fields which lay extended before the garden of the florist; they sought the most solitary paths, and leaning on each other, advanced slowly over the fine grass, gathering the wild flowers, watching the flight of the butterflies, or hearing the sigh of the birds in their mossy nests.

Sometimes, after a long walk, they would pause, and Dolores would seat herself, while her lover remained standing before her. With folded arms and head inclined, he would watch the sun as it set behind the trees, listen to the sound of the breeze among the leaves, or the songs of the laborers in the distance; and amid these thousand harmonies, these thousand beauties, Dolores would seem to him to be the queen of creation. Then the night would descend slowly; the moon would peep through the poplars, and both would resume their walk. Hours of loving conversation, when arm presses arm, head inclines to the beloved head, and confiding love gives kiss for kiss.

For some time past, Gonzales had been at work upon a head of St. Cecilia, which, in his judgment, would surpass all he had hitherto done. It was the first time he had experienced that joy of the artist who recognizes that his life is communicated to his work. One day, after having labored with more assiduity than usual, he felt the need of repose, and went out alone. The merchant to whom he sold his flower paintings owed him some money; he directed his steps towards his shop to claim it.

A light breeze was beginning to temper the heat of the day; the houses of the faubourg cast a shadow which afforded a shelter; children, seated on every threshold, were taking their evening repast, and young girls were conversing beside the fountains. Gonzales advanced, casting around him an enchanted glance. Like all men who have been long confined by study, he experienced in the open air an ineffable impression of happiness; he felt his muscles expand and his brain enlarge; the balmy air of evening intoxicated him; his feet no longer touched the ground; everything seemed radiant and smiling. He traversed thus the faubourg, and arrived at the shop of George Krab. The merchant's son was there alone. Gonzales asked for his father.

"He is above with a stranger."

"I will wait for him," Gonzales said. And he began to examine the pictures and curiosities of every kind which garnished the shop of Krab. A portfolio filled with engravings, after Michael Angelo and Raphael, at last fixed his attention. He seated himself behind a large picture of Rubens, in the middle of the warehouse, and began to examine them one by one.

He had already been there a long time, when voices were heard on the stairs. A door at the side opened, and Krab appeared, accompanied by a stranger.

"Go, William," said the merchant to his son, "your mother wants you."

The child went out.

"Here are the two pictures of which I spoke to you," continued the merchant, pointing to two paintings suspended to the wall.

"Are these by the same Henri Staube, whose paintings I saw at Oudenard?"

"It is I who sell his pictures to Master Hals."

"Does he paint anything but flowers?"

"No."

"You are sure of it?"

"Sure."

"And you say that Staube has lived in Harlem only six months?"

"About that period."

"What is his appearance?"

"He is a tall, handsome young man; a little pale, somewhat sad, with long hair and a mild eye; rather a Raphael than a Rembrandt."

"He is, indeed! Does he live alone?"

"I do not know; he comes here only to bring me pictures, and never talks of himself. Nevertheless, I remember now that neighbor Ryscoff told me he met him one evening in the fields with a very pretty young woman on his arm—his wife, doubtless."

"It is he! it is he!" repeated Perez. "I must see him."

The merchant looked at the Spaniard with astonishment. "You have business with him?" said he, in a suspicious tone.

"Yes, Master Krab; where does he live?"

"I do not know," he replied, drily.

"How?"

"Master Hals, it appears, is tired of paying me a poor commission on the pictures I sell him; he wishes to have them directly from the artist."

"You are mistaken, sir; I do not come on the part of Hals."

"Then it is on your own account? In any case, you may seek elsewhere information respecting Staubs. I am not yet stupid enough to give the address of my painters to a broker."

"You are in an error," exclaimed Perez. "I am not a picture dealer; I swear it to you."

"It is useless."

The merchant conducted him to the door.

"Master," said Perez, stopping and looking around him, "I will give you a hundred ducats if you will point out to me the dwelling of Staubs." And as the merchant was about to make a sign of refusal, he continued: "Listen, the matter in question does not concern pictures, but an elopement."

"What do you mean?"

"I am in search of a young girl who eloped, if I am not mistaken, with your flower painter, whose name is not Staubs, but Gonzales."

"Is it possible?"

"I have every reason to believe it; but you can aid me in ascertaining it, by putting me in the way of seeing the young woman with whom your painter walks."

"That would be difficult; he lives alone in a cottage in the new faubourg, rarely goes out, and receives no visits."

"We will arrange it so as to make him go out. I may rely upon your discretion, master?"

"As I upon your hundred ducats?"

"Here is half the sum; the rest you shall have if you succeed."

"Agreed," said Krab, counting the money.

Perez approached the painting which the merchant had shown him when they entered, and read the name written below—Henri Staubs.

"Yes, yes," muttered he, "you thought to elude me by changing your style of painting, and signing a false name; but I well knew that I should recover traces of you somewhere."

"In fact," said the merchant, who had approached, "I now see in these paintings of flowers something of the touch of Gonzales."

"O, it is he, I am sure! He could escape me only by ceasing to paint and losing himself in the crowd. But these great artists must express what is in their hearts, and be constantly in correspondence with the public. They hope to conceal themselves by changing their handwriting, and do not dream that sooner or later the pen will be recognized. Adieu, master; I will go and take my measures, and to-morrow we will commence the campaign."

As he spoke thus, Perez went out of the shop, and the merchant followed him.

Meanwhile, Gonzales had heard all. As soon as he found himself alone, he quitted his retreat, and opening a back door, left the shop and hastened to the new faubourg. The conversation he had just heard left him no room for doubt—they had discovered his traces, and a prompt flight had become necessary. But this flight would only postpone the danger; the fortunate chance which had served would not always occur; even should they once more escape the pursuit of the Alcazzos, would they not soon be exposed to it anew, and all their precautions to conceal themselves be useless? Perez had said it—the pencil of the young painter must everywhere sign his name.

Gonzales was at last compelled to understand that he was placed in the alternative of renouncing Dolores or renouncing Art!—and yet between these two misfortunes, the choice appeared to him impossible—the painter and the lover were so united in him, that to lose one of his joys was to lose both. What would Art be without Dolores but nature without the sun! But how could he refuse genius at the moment it was about to come to him? Was not this a sacrifice to be expiated by the remorse of a lifetime?

He traversed the faubourg, seeing and hearing nothing, and arrived, in despair, at the garden of the florist. Within sight of the cottage, he paused. Dolores was there, doubtless awaiting him, and as yet he had not decided! He threw himself, without strength, on a bank of turf—his uncertainty had become despair. He cast around him a bewildered glance; the languid flowers were beginning to raise their heads; the water in the ponds was rippled by the evening breeze, and the setting sun sparkled through the acacias like a conflagration. This beauty of creation overcame Gonzales.

"O no!" murmured he, extending his arms; "no, I will not renounce all this! I will live with the flowers and the sun! I am a painter!"

At this moment a sweet and suppressed song was heard. The young man started, and putting cautiously aside the foliage of the arbor beneath which he was concealed, he perceived Dolores leaning out at the window, seeming to be looking up the road. She was holding in her hand a common earthen pitcher, which she was wiping, and chanting, in an undertone a romance of her country:

"And the shepherd said to Inez: 'I have loved you seven years, senora, and I wished to tell you so once.'

"Now let your father's soldiers come, that they may load me with chains; summon the executioner that he may put my limbs to the torture; order for me a coffin, for I know that I have deserved death."

"Inez replied to the shepherd: 'It shall be according to your desire; but for chains, you shall have my arms; for tortures, my kisses, and for a coffin, the bridal bed.'

"I also love you, and for you will quit the chateau of the count; I was rich, I shall be happy; I was powerful, I shall be beloved."

"I will go and dwell in your cabin, Sanchez, I will watch with you the goats upon the rocks; I will be an industrious and submissive wife, as I ought."

"And do not care that my forehead is whiter than thine—it will quickly be embrowned on the mountains; do not be uneasy because my hands are weak—they will be strengthened by labor; but look at my heart, Sanchez, for my heart is courageous and strong."

While Dolores sang, a revolution seemed to be wrought in the mind of the young painter. His hands were placed on his heart, as if to suppress its beatings; his lips murmured the name of Dolores, and tears moistened his eyelids. When the young girl had quitted the window, he remained for a long time immovable; at last raising his head, as if he had taken his resolution, he left the arbor, ascended the steps of the cottage, and softly opened the door.

Dolores was preparing the table for the evening repast; at sight of her lover, she uttered an exclamation of joy, and threw herself into his arms.

"How late you are," said she; "I was becoming uneasy."

Gonzales embraced her, without replying.

"What is the matter?" asked the young girl, starting back. "You are pale."

He sat down and took Dolores on his knees.

"They have discovered our retreat," said he; "the man who attempted to assassinate me at Brussels is here."

"Perez!—who told you so?"

Gonzales related what had happened at Master Krab's, and the conversation he had heard.

"You see," added he, "that I must renounce painting or you—the choice is made!" And running to his easel, where the St. Cecilia was exposed, he exclaimed: "I am no longer a painter; thou hast sacrificed to me rank and honor, Dolores—I will sacrifice to thee my art!" He pressed the picture to his heart, and touched his lips to it. "Adieu!" repeated he, "O, my admired one, who was to give me glory! adieu, my hopes! adieu, my dreams!" And seizing the canvass, he rent it in pieces.

Two years had passed away since the day when Gonzales had fled from Harlem, and Perez had continued to seek him everywhere, unavailingly. Taking refuge in the little town of Carigliano, in Italy, the lover of Dolores had been faithful to his resolution—he was no longer the painter Staube, but the basket-maker, Gonzales Cano. This metamorphosis had completely defeated the emissary of the Duchess d'Alcazzo; but it had been fatal to Gonzales.

When he had sacrificed painting to Dolores, he had not comprehended how cruel this resolution would become; the contrary sacrifice would perhaps have been more easy. The loss of his mistress would doubtless have been severe; but it would not have annihilated him; his grief would have found relief in art; it would, perhaps, in expression, have become genius, while now his love for Dolores was condemned to silence. It was only in reproducing the graces of the young Spaniard, in transferring her soul to the canvass, that Gonzales knew how much he loved her; the more beautiful and celestial he painted her, the more his love became revealed to him—for him, the pencil was a voice. So, since this voice had failed him, he knew not how to express his tenderness; words seemed cold to him; they were common to all, while his former language was his own! Thus compelled to be silent, his passion forgot itself; since he had no longer been constantly occupied with Dolores, he feared loving her less, and this thought disturbed him. He accused his heart of ingratitude, of insensibility; he interrogated it as a corpse, in which one seeks to find life. Unhappily, the more he thus tortured himself, the more he felt his heart grow cold. Dolores was always what he loved most in the world; but he loved everything less; there was within him, as it were, a bitter spring, which flowed incessantly and poisoned his joys; he felt a sort of powerlessness to desire and to will, which was nothing but the incapacity of happiness.

His material position added to his sufferings. He had been accustomed to the capricious labors of the artist, to easy earnings, and he wearied of the assiduous toil which scarcely brought him every day the means to provide for the morrow. Educated amidst studios hung with paintings, and accustomed from his childhood to brilliancy of colors, he felt his sight wounded by the nakedness of his new dwelling; the monotonous sadness of these whitewashed walls communicated itself to his whole being.

One day when Dolores had gone out to carry some women's work to the Countess d'Apano, who inhabited a villa near Carigliano, Gonzales seated himself alone on the threshold of his cabin. Since he no longer painted, his sole artistic joy was to contemplate the country, and to see the young Neapolitan girls on their way to the city with their baskets of fruit, or kneeling at the feet of the Madonnas. He saw there all that the Italian school has transferred to its painting; it was an immense picture, which comprehended all others, and in the presence of which he forgot himself for entire hours.

He had already admired it for a long time, when a sportive hand placed itself like a bandage over his eyes. The young man recognised it and kissed it. "Is it you, Dolores?"

"Yes, it is I, my Gonzales; but raise your head—do you not see by my eyes that I bring you happy news?"

"What?"

"O, you must wait; I have run hither; let me breathe, and give me a place near you."

Gonzales seated her on his knees. "What is it, then, joyous messenger? Let us see."

"You know that I have just come from the Countess d'Apano, and we have conversed a long time. She has informed me that the young girl who superintended her women has left her, and has proposed that I should take her place."

"You, in the service of the countess?"

"Why not?"

"Do you forget who you are, Dolores?"

"I am the beloved of a basket-maker."

He pressed her to his breast with a sigh.

"But this will separate us."

"Indeed! Do you think I forgot that, Signor Cano?—it was the first objection I made to the countess. 'Ah,' she replied to me, 'your husband writes well. I have seen the bills he sends his customers; the count needs a copyist; he will take him.'"

"And what did you reply?"

"I accepted."

"Can you think of it? We, attached to the household of the count—subject to his orders—almost his servants! I cannot consent."

"O, say not so, Gonzales! You will accept; for I desire it, and you will not refuse me. Do not have more pride than I, my love. What matters it whether you are the basket-maker Cano or the copyist of the Count d'Apano? There you will be happy; the yells of this poor cabin will no longer sadden your eyes; we shall inhabit that pretty cottage in the park, which we have so often looked at and coveted; you will live amid marble fountains, pictures, statues.

Then reflect, we shall secure for ourselves a refuge. If we are ever discovered, the count will protect us. O, do not refuse, I conjure you!"

"Who could refuse you?" said he, with enchantment. "We will go to the count."

The next day they presented themselves at the villa Apano, and found themselves face to face with the count and his wife.

"Here is your copyist and my housekeeper," said the latter.

Gonzales bowed; but his eyes, as he raised them, fell on a large picture at the extremity of the apartment.

"A Corregio!" exclaimed he.

Dolores turned pale.

"You are a connoisseur, it seems, signor. How have you learned to distinguish so well the touch of the masters?"

"By seeing them," replied Gonzales.

"And where have you seen their pictures?"

"In the merchants shops, and museums."

The count did not press him farther. He asked him a few questions, gave him orders, and invited him to take possession with Dolores of the dwelling he had destined for them.

But the sight of this painting had disturbed Gonzales to the depths of his soul. As long as he had seen only nature, his passion had been absorbed in an incessant contemplation of it—the sublimity of the model took away from him even the desire of imitation. On the contrary, the sight of this picture restored to him all his former inclinations; it was as a testimony of what art could do, a lesson which revealed the methods of attaining its object. His love for painting revived, increased by the constraint which had been so long imposed upon it. Often, at daybreak, while Dolores was still asleep, he would rise, creep like a criminal along the walls of the villa, open a window, penetrate noiselessly to the hall where the wonderful picture was exposed, and remain there, mute, with fixed eye, until the first sounds of morning compelled him to return. This visit each time redoubled his exaltation; he knew it, and could not refrain from making it.

These emotions soon seriously affected his health. The life of Gonzales had always been threatened, and the unhopèd-for joy which the love of Dolores had inspired had alone retarded the malady; happiness had been to him instead of health; but with the latter the prodigy ceased, and disease made rapid progress.

Dolores neglected nothing to penetrate the cause of this recent malady. She had redoubled her affection, she had questioned him—all had been useless; he had closed his soul upon his despair! As tender beside the young girl, he continued to smile upon her—but that pale smile which freezes. The latter relinquished the idea of obtaining from him a confidence which he seemed determined to refuse; but she began to scrutinise all his words and movements, hoping to discover, by means of watching, what he concealed from her.

One night she thought she heard a noise, and suddenly awoke—Gonzales was not there! Afrighted, she arose, calling him, and ran to the adjoining room; but she stopped, mute, on the threshold. Standing before the wall, which the moon was illuminating, as before a prepared canvass, Gonzales was making the gestures of painting. At intervals he drew back to judge of the effect of his picture. His brow shone with enthusiasm; his lips murmured broken words.

"Courage!—I have discovered the secret, Corregio. I will find out thine, Raphael—it is the same: to mingle the colors with a ray of sunlight. Look!—that is it!" He stepped a few paces backwards; his face became illumined with a celestial joy, and his hands were clasped. "At last, my God! at last," murmured he. He remained for a long time immovable; then raising his head, as if emerging from a profound reverie, he approached the wall, made a motion as if to draw a curtain over his imaginary picture, and advanced towards the other chamber.

What she had just seen had revealed all to Dolores. She resolved to save Gonzales at any price.

On the morrow she asked to see the countess. She found her conversing with her physician.

"What wouldst thou, my child?" said she; "and why dost thou tremble thus?"

"Signora," replied Dolores, "I come to confide to you a secret."

The physician was about to leave.

"Remain, Signor Juliano," continued she; "you also ought to know all."

Then, with downcast eyes, pale with shame, and with stifled voice, she related her love for Gonzales, how the latter had renounced his art, and how this resolution was killing him. When she had finished she clasped her hands, and letting her tears flow, added:

"Now have pity on him, and save him. I do not wish to be torn from him; but I wish him to live. You are powerful, signora; here, no one would dare offer violence to us. Protect us here, and I will be your submissive slave, and Gonzales shall fill your palace with paintings."

Dolores had fallen at the feet of the countess. The latter, trembling with surprise and emotion, attempted to raise her with gracious words; but the despairing young girl remained at her feet, repeating:

"Do not refuse me! O, do not refuse me!"

"Who would have the courage to refuse you, poor child?" said the countess. "Re-assure yourself; Gonzales shall resume his pencils, and you shall both find here a safe asylum. But rise, I entreat you."

"O no, no!" exclaimed the young girl, covering the hand of the countess with kisses; "let me thank you on my knees, signora. O, repeat to me that Gonzales may paint! It is his life, signora. You see, since he has laid aside his pencils, he is more feeble, paler each day; and if I should lose him—O, if I should lose him!"

"Do not fear it, child, we will save him; will we not, doctor?"

The physician made, with hesitation, an affirmative sign.

At this gesture, Dolores rose from her knees, upright and pale.

"Ah!" exclaimed she, "he is lost!"

"I have not said so," replied Juliano, rather embarrassed.

"He is lost!" returned Dolores; "your gesture has said it. O, do not conceal from me the truth! Is he not lost? You have not visited him for a long time; you have then given him up. O, my God, is there no hope? But this is impossible, since for many days he converses, he smiles—he is perhaps almost well." And as Juliano remained with downcast eyes, without replying, she resumed: "Ah, I remember now. It is said there are maladies in which the patient revives thus in the last moments of life. Is this the truth?"

"It is the truth."

The young girl fell on her knees again, wringing her hands; then, as if her heart refused to despair, she resumed:

"But now you know the cause of his malady, Signor Juliano. You are skilful; you will cure him. O, say that you can cure him!"

"It is too late."

Dolores uttered a cry. At the same instant the door of the adjoining room opened, and Gonzales appeared, with sparkling eye.

"Too late!" repeated he; "pencils, then!—give me pencils!"

"Ah! it is I who have killed him!" said Dolores, throwing herself into his arms.

"Pencils! pencils, before I die!" repeated Gonzales, wildly. "I have just seen Corregio—there, beside his picture! He has spoken to me! I also am a painter!" He attempted to step forward, but he staggered, leaned against the wall, and swooned.

He was carried home, where he soon recovered his senses—he was a prey to a burning fever. He wished painting materials to be brought to him—canvass, pencils, palette; all these he touched with infantile joy. He inhaled with delight this perfume of the studio to which he had been a stranger for two long years. When the easel had been placed beside him, he raised himself in the bed, entreated Dolores to sit at a little distance, and began to paint.

It seemed as if a supernatural power had descended upon him, and that he was acting under its influence, without being conscious of what he did. His hand neither hesitated nor trembled; the canvass beneath his pencil grew animated, as if by enchantment. The count and Julian, standing behind him, could not repress their cries of admiration; but Gonzales heard them not. With dishevelled hair and sparkling eye, he painted, singing the airs of his childhood, long forgotten, and now recovered, as if by a miracle.

Suddenly, in the midst of these songs, which seemed murmured by instinct, the favorite romance of Dolores was heard:

“I also love you, and for you will quit the chateau of the count. I was rich, I shall be happy; I was powerful, I shall be beloved.

“And care not that my forehead is whiter than thine—it will soon be embrowned on the mountain; care not that my hands are weak—they will be strengthened by labor; but look at my heart, Sanchez, for my heart is courageous and strong.”

The first verses had been chanted by the dying man as a vague reminiscence, but insensibly his souvenirs seemed to awaken, and he paused.

“It was Dolores who sang that at Harlem,” said he, “on the day when I promised her to paint no more.”

And perceiving the pencil which he held in his hand, he added:

“Unhappy one! I have broken my promise. Perez is coming—he will recognize us! Let us fly! let us fly!”

He made a movement as if to escape; the count and Julian detained him.

“There they are!” exclaimed he, “Dolores, conceal this canvass!—tear it—tear it!”

He made an effort to seize the picture; but hardly had his hand touched it, when it stopped, as if powerless to consummate this destruction. His arms stiffened in a gesture of grief and of prayer—he fell back with a sigh, and his eyes closed forever!”

He is above his enemies who despises their injuries.

THE ELECTRICAL EEL.

Of the singular powers of this wonderful creature much has been written, and some things said, which appear almost incredible. This fish abounds in the rivers of North and South Carolina, and many of its wonderful exploits are recounted and recorded there. In the waters of Massachusetts Bay it is so seldom seen that the following circumstance seems worth relating, and are in the narrator's own words. Capt. Walker, of Provincetown, recently, while running a schooner from that place to Boston, was overtaken by night off Cohasset Rocks, and was running into Boston Channel in the evening.

At about eight o'clock, it being very dark, and his vessel moving slowly in, he dropped over his board to ascertain the depth of water, and in slowly pulling in the line he felt something cold upon it, and thinking it might be a bit of kelp or rockweed, was about to throw it off, when it fastened upon his hand and coiled around his wrist. He endeavored to shake off the eel, when suddenly bringing its tail around, it struck his arm with considerable force, and gave the worthy captain such a shock as sent him reeling to the deck. Recovering a little, he proceeded to seize the fish and cast it overboard, when he received a second shock from the little battery that caused him to call for aid, uttering a scream that must have been heard for miles.

Determined not to be overcome by so paltry an object as a small eel, he proceeded once more to discharge his catch, but was a third time repulsed with a greater force than before, laying him prostrate at full length upon deck. His men immediately rushed to the rescue, and bore the captain, almost insensible, aft, where medical aid could be administered. Never having heard of such wonderful power of the electrical eel, the greatest consternation prevailed, and the vessel rushing on in thick darkness, they knew not where, the anchors were got out with much difficulty, and they waited impatiently the return of day, actually supposing some evil spirit had seized upon them, and that for the night they were to be the sport of their orgies.—Yarmouth Register.

MRS. PARTINGTON.

“How is your patience, doctor?” said Mrs. Partington, pushing up the window and thrusting out her head as Dr. Bolus rode by. It was at the time when the venerable Aims was just recovering from a protracted bilious attack, during which he had been so sick that his friend, the President of the Perpetual Life Insurance Company, had told his friends in confidence that he wouldn't insure Aims's life for fifty per cent. The doctor reined up, with a gentle “woa,” and replied that his patient was convalescent. The good old lady held up her hands. “I declare,” said she, with an expression of pity on her countenance that might have served as the capital stock of three modern philanthropists, “I declare I am sorry for it; but I dare say you can cure any body of convalescence if any body can.” The doctor construed the remark into an ironical reflection on his practice, and rode away rather petulantly and didn't look at the house for three days thereafter when he rode by.—Exc. Gazette.

THE MOTHER-IN-LAW.

BY SYBIL HASTINGS.

NEARLY three years passed subsequent to the marriage of Horace Adams before he took his wife and child home to the old homestead where he had spent the days of his childhood and early youth. During the period of her wedded life, and ever after the day which made her a widow, the homestead had been the abiding place of the senior Mrs. Adams, whose union had been blessed with but two children, both boys, the eldest of whom had died prior to his attaining his majority, leaving Horace the sole recipient of his mother's solicitude.

From her earliest youth upward, to the present period—something past the maturity of middle age—she had led a life of self-indulgence, which gradually matured into a spirit whose manifest arrogance of opinion and petty arbitrary sway over her own household became disagreeable and irritating in its daily exercise over the inmates who, either by circumstance or necessity, were compelled to find themselves domiciled beneath her roof. Time had softened in the recollection of the son the defects of his mother's character; their homes being widely separated, but for brief and far-apart visits paid by him to the paternal home, and in the tender pride with which he was wont to regard his young wife, the thought never once occurred to him of the vast difference between the two characters whom he was now about to assimilate in the close intimacy of domestic life. In the gay southern metropolis in which he had commenced business, under the patronage and kindly influence of a relative of his father's, he had met the gay girl, whose youthful fancy for the handsome young northerner had ripened into the halcyon love of a wife—the mother of his child.

Full of the sunshine of an affectionate spirit, laughing in the care-free gaiety of youth, were the dark eyes which wandered from the carriage window as, Horace Adams ended his journey homeward, in the shadow of the old pear-tree before his mother's door. But the owner of those gay glances beheld not the motherly countenance bending forward in cordial greeting from beneath that vine-wreathed portico which she pictured to herself for the last half hour of her drive—not even the hall door stood hospitably open to their advent; the roses of June scattered their white and crimson leaves over the well-worn door step, and the grass grew tall and untrodden to its base. The closed doors, the curtained windows, gave the house a deserted, lonesome aspect to the wife's eyes; but Horace Adams knew well the custom of the proprietor, and opening a small side gate in the low picket-fence, hedging in the front yard, he found his way to the other side of the house, where a column of smoke rose darkly up from the kitchen chimney towards the clear, blue, summer sky; and through the open door he beheld his mother within.

With a quiet, expressionless countenance she sat in the amplitude of her arm-chair vigorously knitting away on a stocking of almost interminable length, while she at the same time superintended the movements of a sober looking domestic, busied in the preparation of dinner. The swinging-to of the garden gate, followed by the shadow which fell upon the sunlit floor, prepared her for the frank, clear tones of her son's voice, speaking his cheerful greeting to herself. It was the shadow of a smile alone which crept across those thin lips, and lost itself in the premature wrinkles of her forehead. She thrust her knitting needles into the heart of the ball which she withdrew from the depths of her pocket, rolled it slowly up, and not until then did she follow her son through the house to the front entrance, whither he hastened to admit the travellers.

She had not half made the passage of the hall before a graceful, girlish figure bounded forward to her side; a pair of small, white hands, ungloved, and profusely decorated with sparkling gems, grasped her arm, and a face, from which fell back a quantity of long, dark curls, raised itself affectionately to her own.

Eleanor Adams, even in the confusion of the moment, experienced for the first time the chill with which a loving heart feels itself repulsed, as those frigid lips left a scarce perceptible impression on the brow which she touched. But there was a gratified expression in Mrs. Adams's eyes as she took, for the first time, her grandchild from its father's arms, and looked in approving recognition of the infantile charms upon its wondrous baby beauty, which almost reconciled the mother's heart to her own uncordial greeting; and the glance of rigid scrutiny which she turned upon its nurse, the old negress, whom she had brought with her from the south for the love which she bore her little nursling, and had borne herself, whom she also had nursed in her infancy.

From the bed upon which she had thrown herself as soon as she had disencumbered herself of her travelling dress, Eleanor cast a pleased survey around the cool, spacious chamber, to which her mother-in-law had at once consigned her, with an intimation of the near approach of the dinner hour. Dinah had looped back, by her directions, the voluminous folds of white muslin which draped the tall mahogany bedstead upon which she lay, the curtains from the windows, the sashes of which had been raised by the united efforts of her husband and Dinah—so long did they seem to have been closed as to forbid all belief in the free circulation of summer breezes and summer sunshine being permitted therein, to steal from the gloss of those white draperies, now floating idly in the breeze, or fade the bright hues of crimson and green which had striped the floor of that guest chamber for many a year. The baby lay asleep by her side, and Dinah was already busied folding away her wardrobe in the chest of mahogany drawers, almost black, and highly polished with age, the upper drawers of which were beyond even the reach of Dinah's long arms, unless mounted on stool or chair.

She had not more than half completed her toilet, before she called Dinah from the still half unpacked trunks, and despatched her to the front yard in quest of a handful of roses. Hitherto Dinah had gathered her mistress's bouquets from the prodigal flower beds of a southern garden; therefore, as her wont, she plucked the half-blown roses from the bushes, wholly regardless whether they bore buds or not which would blossom at some later period. Mrs. Adams, senior, met her coming through the hall, her arms laden with the rifled contents of her garden, and something like an exclamation of affright broke from her as she beheld the sacrilege which had been committed. Never before had mortal hands ventured to detach from those prized and cherished rose bushes more than a single rose at once, and that must be full-blown, short-stemmed, and barren of accompanying bud and leaf. The exclamation of terror ended in a brief, sharp reprimand that sent the affrighted perpetrator of the wrong with hurried footsteps and disturbed countenance to her mistress's chamber; but when she beheld the rapturous delight with which Eleanor received the brilliant colored and pure white flowers, she prudently forbore to disenchant her of her treasure by a knowledge of the rebuke which she had herself received for gathering them. So in utter unconscientiousness, Eleanor twined a white and bluish bud amid her curls, and fastening the lace which frilled her white corsege with another, went below. The sound of Horace's voice led her to the sitting-room, where she found him, together with his mother and another person, whose residence with her husband's mother was as yet unknown to her.

Rachel Gray—for this she was called—arose as Mrs. Adams named her in brief, abrupt words to Eleanor, and curtsied demurely to the graceful apparition which glided into their midst; then she shot a quick, penetrating glance from beneath the long, light lashes that habitually drooped low over the pale blue eyes, which brightened with a restless expression as they scanned the features of her aunt's guest.

"Come here, Mellie, and take your first good view from this south window of the beautiful Connecticut River, and acknowledge I have neither exaggerated nor overrated its beauties one iota," called her husband from the open casement, from which he was bending; and Eleanor did not notice as she joined him the chilling game which fastened itself upon her flower-wreathed hair, and leisurely surveyed the delicate robe in which she had attired herself; but Rachel Gray noted it all with secret satisfaction, and echoed a profound sigh after her aunt's when she turned to her from that critical observation of her daughter-in-law's toilet, observant of even the embroidered handkerchief which was thrust within her belt—an extravagance of which she, herself, had never been guilty.

"It is indeed charming! and," added Eleanor, turning to his mother, "I no longer wonder that Horace should have ever retained so vivid a remembrance of this pleasant home; I can but wonder that he could have ever found it in his heart to leave it with all the glad associations of his boyhood also encircling its precincts."

"I so endeavored to instruct my son that duty to him would be paramount always to pleasure and self-gratification."

"I can well believe it, my dear madam, knowing him as I now do," responded the wife with ready tenderness, while Horace patted her cheek, and called her some pet name, too low to be audible to the others.

"You will see, Rachel Gray, if dinner is prepared," said Mrs. Adams. "The minute hand is already on the stroke of one o'clock, and Horace has doubtless not yet forgotten the punctuality which, with some degree of success, I have ever maintained in my household." And the old lady glanced complacently about her as though she would call their attention to the order which was apparent in the very apartment in which they were assembled.

Truly, it was a pleasant room, with its wide, open chimney-place, and the base therein filled with the feathery green asparagus tops and glossy oak leaves, filling up the space intervening between the massive, burnished andirons; the cool, white matting spread upon the floor; the long muslin curtains, falling to the very floor, and the row of quaintly carved high-backed chairs ranged about the room. The green blinds were partly closed, and from the window at which they stood, the sunshine came in, softly tempered through the thick June foliage of the trees, while the drowsy hum of mid-day filled the air with a soft, monotonous melody. But there were no books upon the little table beneath the glass; only a ponderous volume, with "Holy Bible" inscribed upon its brown leather cover, lying on a small stand in a remote corner. A portrait, meant to represent the maidenhood of the mistress of the house, and perpetrated in brilliant hues, hung upon the wall; and just opposite, a no less execrable likeness of her son, which would have been unrecognized by his wife, had not the original himself pointed it out, with a mischievous smile.

"It will console you during my absence by its remarkable resemblance to myself, will it not, Mellie?" he questioned, laughingly, and for the first time there fell heavily upon Eleanor's heart a presentiment of coming loneliness and homesickness.

Horace marked the troubled look which became visible in that expressive countenance, and chided himself for the unpleasant remembrance which he had called to her recollection.

He was about absenting himself from their little circle, on affairs of much importance, connected with his business, which compelled him to go abroad for an indefinite length of time, which he consoled Eleanor with the promise of rendering brief as possible; and he had brought her north, with her little one, to become in the interval a resident beneath the shelter of his mother's roof, she being, like himself, fatherless, and yet more desolate for one so young without mother, brother or sister.

Something of the vast incongruity existing between his wife's tastes and habits, and those into which she was about to be brought into daily contact, now, for the first time, occurred to him, as he marked the vivid contrast which she presented to both his mother and Rachel Gray; but with the easy credulousness of affection, he never doubted Eleanor's power of converting, as she had hitherto been so successful in doing all things in conformity with her own inclinations. He did not realize that which to him were but girlish caprices and graceful foibles, would be looked upon by more austere eyes as grave offences, committed against the decorum and dignity of wife and motherhood, and moreover, that Eleanor now stood something in the light of a rival between his own and his mother's heart. Every caress, each loving word bestowed upon the young wife by her husband, she considered herself defrauded of by Eleanor. The grace which she soon imparted to the formal and elaborate arrangement of the pretty parlor, by a distribution of various trifles of books and bijouterie therein, were to her only a tacit rebuke of her own ability.

In spite of herself, Eleanor soon discovered that all her endeavors to please could not win one approving smile or friendly word; that while the beauty of little Carrie was a source of ill concealed triumph to the grandmother in exhibiting it to the neighbors, that she was none the less disposed to cavil at the extravagance of its richly embroidered frocks, most of which had been wrought by herself. But what perplexed and chagrined her most of all were the ceaseless reprimands which poor Dinah constantly incurred in doing her bidding, and which, with the garrulousness of her class, she did not hesitate to communicate to her mistress. However, for Horace's sake, these, the most palpable trials which she had ever known, Eleanor determined to overcome with a brave, hopeful heart, whose courage was born out of her tenderness for him.

Happily unconscious of the frequent cause which she gave for dissatisfaction through her very ignorance of the existence of many of Mrs. Adams's prejudices, Eleanor found great and exceeding enjoyment in the unrestrained freedom of a country life, which she was now for the first time permitted to enjoy. Absorbed in her own pleasant thoughts, she was blind to the interchange of all glances passing between Mrs. Adams and her parasite, Rachel Gray, when she would burst upon them with her apron laden with the wild flowers which she had rifled the woodlands of far and near, her cheeks glowing with exercise, her small hands sadly browned by exposure to the sun. And Horace, if he sometimes felt inclined to remonstrate with his mother for her ceaseless discouragement, and sometimes almost arbitrary remonstrances against those wild rambles which were rounding that slender figure into a more perfect grace, and filling the late languid limbs with an elasticity that argued well for the increase of physical health, was easily diverted from his purpose by a word or glance from Eleanor, who would not for the world have suffered herself to mar the harmony existing between mother and son.

Now the time drew near for his departure, and when it came, it found Eleanor, all softened and subdued as she was by grief, thoroughly prepared to appreciate any degree of kindly attention, no matter how trivial, offered by her who was the mother of that adored one; and with a lambent gentleness, Mrs. Adams did rouse herself to bestow for a brief season something of that womanly attention towards Eleanor and her child, which it would seem most natural for her to give. But the change was as transient as it was insincere; all Eleanor's tastes and habits rose in direct opposition to her own; and more than all else, Rachel Gray followed her like a shadow, taking a malicious pleasure in pointing out to her observation all the incongruities which existed between them.

The winds of autumn ever and anon hurled from the half barren limbs of the old pear-tree, before the homestead, the crisp and frost-bitten leaves, sighing drearily against the casement of Eleanor's chamber—the occupant of which lay rather than sat in the chair before it, with her poor aching head resting wearily against the window pane, great tears rolling slowly down her thin, white cheek, and suffered to break unheeded upon the window sill, even as the rain drops upon the glass.

Weeks had now elapsed since that miserable last day of summer, when the members of that household had been startled by a moan so appalling in its anguish as to echo forever in the memory of those who heard it. Hurrying from the dining-room to the parlor, which they had just quitted as Eleanor opened the morning paper, with a faint hope of finding the English vessel, in which Horace was expected home from England, telegraphed, Mrs. Adams and Rachel Gray beheld her sitting there, white and rigid as a statue, her dark eyes frightfully dilated and fixed upon the paper which had fallen at her feet. With a pale cheek and trembling hand Rachel Gray had taken up that paper, and read therein the loss of the vessel in which Horace had taken passage home, including all the lives but those of a portion of the crew.

They never heard but that one moan of almost more than human misery from her; only once in a while, when Horace's mother lay uneasy or wakeful during the dark, silent watches of the night, she fancied she heard the repetition of that sound coming faintly through the closed door from the chamber where Eleanor lay with her baby. But it was soon perceptible that she faded and drooped, instead of recovering from the heaviness and first bitterness of the shock she had sustained.

The mother's grief for the loss of her son seemed to have spent itself in a brief, passionate abandonment to her sorrow while she received the sympathy and condolences of her neighbors, and finally subsided into an emotion of secret indignation against Eleanor that she should appear to suffer longer or more acutely than herself. The agonized expression which would involuntarily contract the wife's features whenever any casual mention was made by his mother of aught appertaining to him, was to her a tacit rebuke of her less sensitive recollection, and she felt herself aggrieved by the wife in her manifestation of a more enduring sense of bereavement than she herself experienced. There was solace left to her in the daily routine of domestic life and its relations, but for the void in that widowed one, on earth there was no substitute.

Horace's loss, too, it was soon ascertained, had left his wife, with her child, dependent upon his mother's bounty; so entangled were his business affairs, and so little known to his wife and mother that they were compelled to leave their entire adjustment to strangers. Absorbed by her grief, Eleanor had as yet paid little heed to aught else. Always heretofore abundantly provided for, she could not readily comprehend how she could suffer, either from dependence or through actual want. While his mother was amply provided for and abundantly able to do for them, she could not for a moment doubt her good will towards the wife and child of her only son. No, the question never once occurred to her mind, nor, in truth, was it fully realized by Mrs. Adams herself until casually alluded to by Rachel Gray.

"Poor thing!" said that person, with affected sympathy, "no wonder she is pining and fretting herself to death, setting, as she has done, so high a value on the possession of worldly vanities and adornments."

Her companion looked up at once with ready attention, and Rachel Gray went on:

"Don't you think, aunt, that perhaps if you were to speak with her on the necessary change which custom requires in her dress, that she would be in a degree easily diverted from her present melancholy state? I, who was only a cousin to your poor son, have already worn black for him these six weeks, while Eleanor has as yet made no change in her dress, but, on the contrary, puts on the same attire which she was wont to do when he was alive and with us, apparently utterly reckless of what the world may say of such neglect shown to his memory."

"True, child—quite true. How could I, too, have been so forgetful? I must speak with her myself," answered her aunt.

And she had spoken with Eleanor that morning, who answered her only by a gush of quiet tears; and to her suggestion that Rachel Gray should go at once to town to make for her the necessary purchases, with a mournful obedient,

"As you please, mother." And Rachel Gray did as she was requested, and returned with her purchases—fabrics which were almost unknown to the hitherto elegantly nurtured child of affluence; garments whose texture the mother-in-law would herself have shamed to have beheld her son's wife in, had not the artful suggestions of her niece that Eleanor's previous habits required more costly attire than they were accustomed to wear, steeled her heart to all generous and womanly impulses. But the arrow which Rachel Gray barbed with petty malice for the heart of her rival, fell aimless against the wounded breast of Eleanor Adams; coarse and costly garments were all one to her then, in her bitter anguish, and the fresh burst of sorrow with which she had received them that autumn morning from the hands of Mrs. Adams, had been just as acute had they been selected by the same prodigal hand which had hitherto supplied her wants.

"You were right, Rachel Gray, there is a double cause for Eleanor's sorrow," said the step-mother to her niece, as they sat in the parlor below, while the unconscious origin of their misconstructions laid her head upon the rain-beat window pane, and hearkened with fainting heart to the dreary moan of the autumn storm.

"She is nothing but a child after all, aunt, and we must not be too exacting. What if we were to try how successful a little petting and humoring of her old fancies would be? I thought of this yesterday, when in town; and if you will be so good—if you will not think I was too forward, that I took too much upon myself, you will please, aunt, look at these handkerchiefs, which I took with the other articles, for her." And as she spoke, she took a small parcel from her work-box, and displayed a dozen of very delicate pocket handkerchiefs of the finest linen cambric, edged with a deep black border.

Mrs. Adams, after a critical examination, took them up, and, without speaking a word, ascended to the chamber of her daughter-in-law. Still Eleanor sat with bowed head by the window, while old Dinah, with her wishful, sympathizing gaze, turned towards her little Carrie, asleep upon her knee.

"I have brought you a little present, Eleanor," said the old lady, and for once she shaped her words and tones to a kindness that brought a wan smile to Eleanor's lip, and a vivid expression of gratification into her eyes, as she took the friendly offering which was tendered her, and strove to express her thanks in a voice that would have been cheerful had her self-command equalled her wishes.

"It was very thoughtful and considerate of Rachel Gray; for it is to her, and not to me, you are indebted for remembering your taste in such things," continued Mrs. Adams.

Eleanor glanced down at the deep black borders which edged the handkerchiefs, when her words and every expression of pleased emotion faded from her countenance at once.

Mrs. Adams attributed, most unjustly, the change, which she manifested to an emotion of dislike and annoyance which she experienced at being indebted to her niece, and she grew quite wrathful with her companion.

"Rachel Gray is a good and praiseworthy girl," she said, hastily; "and you would do well, Eleanor Adams, if you were to strive to imitate her in patience and submission. She, too, has been chastened by the Almighty's hand, where she, too, placed her earthly dependence; she, too, has come to me to live equally in want with you yourself, and deprived of her worldly maintenance; but Rachel Gray has never repined; by her meek and patient deportment, she has evinced her gratitude to God for the humble instrument which he has provided in myself to take care of the fatherless and the motherless. She has truly been to me a comfort and a dependence in my old age—not a burden, through ceaseless repinings and lamentations."

There was a brief silence; then Eleanor said, in a low, sad voice:

"I, too, mother, will try to be to you even as Rachel is, with my Father's help; but I am but a poor, weak child, and time I trust will aid me with an increase of strength."

"You are too much accustomed to consider yourself incapable of exertion, Eleanor," said Mrs. Adams, still too much excited by her previous words to be touched by the pathos of that voice. "It would be much better for you were you to exert yourself."

"O, believe me, mother! I have striven to endure patiently. You have heard no word spoken by me in rebellion against my unhappy destiny—you never will; grief, such as I experience, cannot spend itself in idle moans."

"You are not alone in trouble, Eleanor; you forget that I, too, have been deprived of my husband, and that in what you have been a loser I, too, am one for the second time. If Horace was your husband, he also was my son; but you arrogate to yourself all regret for his loss."

A wondering, incredulous expression came over her companion's countenance, as she spoke:

"What is it you wish of me? How am I to satisfy you?" she questioned, and for the first time the accents of that voice became slightly querulous, like an aggrieved child stung into momentary impatience by an exacting monitor.

It was the first symptom of rebellion which Eleanor had ever exhibited, and trivial as it was it fanned the spark of jealous tyranny in her mother-in-law's breast into a flame of passion.

"What is it I wish of you?" repeating her words, and concentrating all the indignation which she had ever entertained towards her into a hard, cold gaze fixed upon her victim's countenance. "It matters perhaps little what I wish, but let me tell you what I perceive, and what is quite evident to every one: You have taught yourself all through your life to believe that because you were young and pretty you were to receive nothing but indulgence, that you were to be fostered and cared for like a baby; and now that poor Horace has gone, and you find yourself without the means to gratify all your old foibles and extravagant fancies, you sit down and idly fold your hands under the cover of your tears, thinking no one will perceive that you have another cause to fret about equally with his loss."

Eleanor did not speak now when her assailer paused to take breath ere she proceeded; but the calm steady gaze of her dark eyes did not droop beneath those which met her own; they grew calmer and clearer, but yet more sorrowful, with each word. Only when Mrs. Adams proceeded to suggest the propriety of her giving up her child's nurse, and in very comprehensive language urged the apparent necessity of her taking the care of little Carrie upon herself, did she understand the exact meaning of Mrs. Adams's counsel to her to exert herself.

"Part with Dinah! Why, she has been with me since my earliest recollection! It would break the poor thing's heart—if it did not my own. Ask anything else of me but that; I cannot send her from me," was her answer.

"And I then am to understand that you not only refuse to comply with my wishes, Eleanor, but insist on forcing upon me as a member of my household a person who is not only personally disagreeable but very expensive to me?"

"Certainly not, madam; but as I cannot part with the faithful creature, I myself must go."

"And pray where do you propose going?"

Eleanor put her hand to her forehead and burst into a flood of tears. In that one bitter moment she realized the truth for the first time.

"True, I have no home to go to now. This, mother, is the only roof beneath which I have the slightest claim for shelter. But I beseech of you, do not turn away poor Dinah—Carrie will so grieve for her—Dinah will break her heart."

But Mrs. Adams was obdurate; for she beheld in Eleanor's persistency to retain Dinah only a direct opposition to her will. And Dinah went, yet with less agony, notwithstanding her manifestation of most acute grief, than her mistress herself experienced; for Eleanor now grew daily to a knowledge of the unloving hearts that surrounded her, and her friendless position.

The snow lay thick on the hillsides, and filled the valleys, while the ice sleeted the Connecticut and bridged it for many a mile. Christmas had come and gone, when Eleanor was aroused one bitter cold morning from her sleep by Rachel Gray, who stood by her bedside with a countenance expressive of unusual agitation.

"Eleanor! Eleanor! you must go to Aunt Martha; she is very ill; I don't know what can be the matter with her;—but she talks so strange and looks so very bad, she frightens me, and I dare not stay all alone with her."

Mrs. Adams had been indisposed for several days, but none of the family had considered her, any more than she herself had done, as seriously so. Eleanor's child had also been unwell for some time, and consequently fretful and troublesome in the extreme, particularly during the night, and Eleanor, upon whom its entire charge had necessarily fallen, with the dismissal of its nurse, was almost worn out with fatigue and the severity of a northern winter, which she for the first time experienced.

The rigid economy practised by Mrs. Adams in the family had deprived Eleanor of the only means of alleviating the discomfort which she experienced from the severe cold weather. Her sleeping apartment, which was sufficiently warmed for comfort during the day, chilled her pitifully when obliged to rise, as she frequently was, with Carrie, suffering with the restlessness consequent on teething. An ordinary degree of motherly forethought on the part of the mistress of the house would have seen that the young mother's comfort was better provided for; but although she strove to judge her neither too strictly nor severely, Eleanor could not but believe that through her mistress's positive orders was Betty, the housemaid, restricted from providing her with the requisite fuel to make comfortable that exposed and spacious chamber, in which she had been domiciled from that to her far off happy summer day.

During this night she had been even more disturbed than usual by Carrie's restlessness; and her head ached, her limbs were stiff and heavy, when she aroused herself to obey the summons.

Even Eleanor's ignorance as a nurse did not preclude her immediate recognition of the very serious illness of Mrs. Adams. With the departure of her physician, there was a strange alteration of the position of the different members of her household. In the young mother's distant chamber, Betty the housemaid watched over the little one, who queried impatiently for the indulgent parent, who came not as hour after hour wore away, and sank at last sobbing to sleep in the evening time.

And Eleanor Adams, whosefore lingered she far off in the chamber of that sick woman—that woman, whose petty exactions, whose continual reproaches had harassed her with perpetual unrest? The threshold of that sick chamber Rachel Gray had never once crossed since from its precincts she had fled affrighted early that day when Dr. Barnard, after an attentive survey of the patient's lineaments, pronounced her very ill of a contagious disease. From whence or where contracted none ever knew, but Martha Adams lay sick, almost unto death, for many days, deserted by every human being but her physician and one other—a woman, faded and blanched through great sorrow, sorrow which she had herself greatly contributed to increase, to but a shadow of the happy wife of her son, who had come to her home in the summer time.

Eleanor dared not incur the risk of carrying the contagion, to which she fearlessly exposed herself, into the child's presence, and day after day went by, while through the open door there came but an occasional laugh of little Carrie's to cheer the watcher's weariness. But there was a precious recompense preparing for Eleanor Adams. The questioning glance which the sick one at first turned languidly upon her, was softening in a grateful, trusting expression, which fell like a blessing on Eleanor's heart. At first she had fretted after her niece, and impatiently bade Eleanor summon her to her side; but when Rachel came not, when the truth gradually became apparent to her that Eleanor alone shunned her not, this change became manifest.

Paler and paler, thinner and thinner grew Eleanor, and like a restless spirit Rachel Gray flitted to and fro from the parlor to her own chamber, jealous of the care which Eleanor bestowed on her aunt, but unable to summon sufficient courage herself to brave the danger attendant on the duties of the sick chamber. With the hope of the prolongation of Mrs. Adams's life, which Dr. Barnard gave at length, after many tedious days, was the earnest recommendation to the young nurse to seek rest for herself immediately, so worn did she appear with the long confinement to which she had resigned herself. But Eleanor felt that not yet could she leave the side of the helpless invalid, that not yet was there another ready to fill her place; and still she watched beside and tended on the sufferer, heedless of the doctor's remonstrance.

A deathlike lethargy had followed the immediate violence of Mrs. Adams's disease, and Eleanor awoke from a brief slumber, into which she had unconsciously fallen by the bedside, to behold the sick one awake, and regarding her with earnest and apparent consciousness.

"You look tired, Eleanor," she faintly said.

"But I can soon rest, now that you are looking so like yourself."

"And that I had never again been but for you. Eleanor, come closer to me; give me your hand. I have not been what I should have been to you. God forgive me, and bless you!" And she lifted the thin, pale hand, which grasped her own, with grateful tenderness to her lips. One brief moment she held it there, then Eleanor felt that feeble clasp close convulsively about her own, beheld those dim eyes brighten and dilate in strange agitation, as they fixed themselves upon the dear beyond. She turned round to behold the cause of her agitation, put her hand feebly up with a faint low cry, and sank senseless upon the floor.

A manly figure stood in the doorway, with tears rolling slowly down cheeks brown with exposure and flushed with emotion. The lost had returned; the blue waters of the Atlantic had given up the treasure which Eleanor believed they had engulfed.

Sweet to Eleanor's heart was the recognition by Horace's mother of herself in tender love; but not until summer came round with its sunshine and soft breezes, could even her perfect joy win back the palest roses to her cheek. Horace was able, with little difficulty, to retrieve the loss he had sustained in his business. His mother never wearied of hearing the tale of his shipwreck and subsequent rescue by a foreign bound vessel, and repeating but for that trial, which had tried them alike so sorely, she had never learned Eleanor's worth and her own injustice.

Shortly after her aunt's recovery, Rachel left her home on a long visit to a distant relative, and the undisguised coldness of her aunt in parting with her, and the utter cessation of a further intercourse on her part, made it necessary for Rachel by accepting the first offer of marriage which she received to make for herself another home.

In all Connecticut, there is no pleasanter family circle than meets every summer beneath the roof where Eleanor Adams first learned to know and bear earth's troubles.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

A NEW VOLUME.

With the present number of our DOLLAR MONTHLY we commence the fourth volume of the work, under the most agreeable and successful circumstances. A rapidly increasing subscription list is an unmistakable token that Bal-lou's Dollar Magazine was a happy conception from the first, and that a resolve to supply a monthly literary work, that all could afford, is fully appreciated. As we said in our last number, probably there never was a similar work issued from the press, which in a year and a half reached to so extensive a list of subscribers.

Ten years ago, this work, with its hundred pages of reading matter per month, upon fine white paper and neatly printed, could not have been afforded for less than three dollars per annum; but improvements in machinery, and the principle of large sales and small profits, have done wonders, and we send it forth for one dollar per year, perfectly satisfied with the returns we realize. People in the same line of business say to us, "Too cheap! too cheap!—you will ruin our business!" We reply that the public, not they, are our customers, and it is the public whom we serve.

Let our subscribers and friends show their good-will by speaking well of us to others; and let it be known that such a work can be had for one dollar per year, and what sort of a work it is, and our list shall be swelled still more rapidly. Will not each of our friends try to send us at least one subscriber?

In the meantime we shall continue to improve and beautify the work, and the reader will observe that we are continually adding the names of new and talented contributors to the already able corps engaged upon the DOLLAR MONTHLY.

DO SOMETHING.—Every one can and should do something for the public, if it be only to kick a piece of orange peel into the road from the foot-pavement.

ONE MILE.—In playing a game of billiards a man walks upwards of one mile on an average.

COSTLY.—The expense of one trip of an ocean steamship is over forty thousand dollars.

THE LADY'S PAGE.

Mrs. Bolster, who has just commenced the life of an Avenoodle, in New York city, has added a "page" to her establishment. Pat Murphy, newly come over, a "breth of a boy," a second edition of the Irish giant, done up in a fine blue livery, with silver buttons, goes in for that line of character. The other evening, Murphy was told by the lady that she was "not at home to anybody." Among the dismissed callers was Mrs. Dudgeon, Mrs. Bolster's sister. The next day, when she learned to whom she had been denied, Mrs. Bolster informed the page that she was always at home to her sister.

Soon after imparting this information, Mrs. B. entered her carriage, with the new horses, and drove forth with the benevolent intention of "raking down Broadway" with the splendid equipage. During her absence, Mrs. Dudgeon called. "Is my sister in?"

"Sure she is, ma'am."

Mrs. Dudgeon walked in, and up stairs, and all over the house, without finding the lady. On leaving the house, she once more encountered the page. "What did you tell me my sister was up stairs for?"

"I told ye so, madam," replied the Hibernian, "because I had it from her own lips, that she was always at home for you."

Mr. Murphy is not so great an acquisition after all.

VICISSITUDES OF LIFE.—A curious rencontre happened to Douglas Jerrold on the first night of "The Rent Day." When he was a midshipman on board a man-of-war, he met in the same capacity, a lad named Clarkson Standfield. Sixteen years afterwards, these two sailor boys met on the boards of a London theatre; one the great scene-painter, and the other a successful dramatist.

SEA SERPENT.—The sea serpent has been seen off New Jersey; he was heading northeast and will turn up off Nahant, probably on the very day Col. Stevens reopens his splendid hotel.

SWARTS TO THE SWEET.—The sugar and molasses crop of Texas, last year, amounted to more than $800,000. It "takes us."

OUR PLACE OF BUSINESS.

The constantly increasing business of our publications has for a considerable time demanded of us increased facilities for the proper transaction of the same. This it was impossible for us to consummate in an old building like the one we have so long occupied; and consequently the proprietor has purchased a large and convenient site in one of the principal thoroughfares of Boston, No. 22 Winter Street, where he has erected a large, convenient, and especially adapted edifice, solely for the publishing of his papers and Magazine, and the various branches of business immediately connected with the same. The new publishing hall is now nearly completed, and due notice of removal will be given to our readers and the public. The building has been arranged and erected upon an entirely novel plan, peculiarly adapted to our purposes, under the supervision of John R. Hall, architect, Anthony Hanson, master carpenter, and D. H. Jacobs, master mason—three faithful and competent builders.

The entire basement, 132 feet deep by 28 feet in width, will be occupied by our twelve Adams presses, paper room, engine and boiler room, etc. The first floor, of the same large dimensions, and 14 feet in height, will be exclusively occupied as our business and publishing room, where will be found the cashier's office, chief book-keeper, mailing clerks, assorters, folders and packers' departments, and our own business office. On the second floor will be the editor's private room, proof-reading room, and composing, or type-setting room. On the third floor are the departments devoted to our corps of engravers, and the boxwood blocks, and the machinery and material for the engravers' use. On the fourth floor will be the designers' and gilders' rooms, with that of other finishers in various departments. On the fifth floor will be carried on the extensive business of our bindery—in the folding, pressing, trimming, sewing and embossing departments; while above all comes a large hall for the classification and storage of our bound volumes, and back numbers of Pictorial, Flag and Magazine.

With all these arrangements completed, we believe nothing is ventured in saying, that our establishment is the most extensive one devoted to the newspaper business, not alone in the United States, but in the world.

THIN SHOES.—Punch thinks that the feminine partiality for thin shoes arises from the feminine dislike to a thick understanding. We should think our fair countrywomen would not object to great souls.

A GENTLEMAN.

The old distich ran:

"When Adam delved and Eve span
Where was then the gentleman?"

In England they have peculiar notions respecting male gentility. A gentleman, with our British friends, is a man who unites to some advantages of birth, fortune, talent or position, those moral qualities which are adapted to the place he occupies in society, and manners which indicate a liberal education and training. The tact of the English people in this respect is very nice, and even the brilliancy of the most elevated rank rarely leads their judgment astray. Though George IV. was called by the "upper ten" the "finest gentleman of his kingdom," yet the masses by no means endorsed that opinion. Let a man of the highest birth step aside in conduct, in manner, or even in the etiquette imposed by his position, you will soon hear the popular remark, "Though a lord he is no gentleman." In this country a man is recognized as a gentleman, whatever his position or means, provided he is a true man—true to himself, true to his fellows. Wealth with us does not gild brutish manners, nor descent blind the popular judgment to individual defects.

FAT MEN.—Henry Giles says "that there is something cordial about a fat man; everybody likes him and he likes everybody." This is true; people "cotton" to the Falstaffs, and cut the "lean and hungry Cassiuses" of this world. There is a reason for this preference. Who ever heard of a fat man murdering a fellow-being, or getting his livelihood as a professional burglar or a highwayman? Two hundred and fifty pounds weight of flesh is ample security for good behaviour and a certificate of good character.

SOMNOLENCY.—A wag writes that somnolency may be removed, by involving yourself in a lawsuit endangering your whole property. So long as your case remains undecided, you will have little inclination to sleep.

CORONATION.—The emperor of Russia intends to be crowned during the present summer. The ceremony will be an imposing one.

LOCOMOTION.—In New York there are twenty four different lines of omnibusses, and five lines of city railroad, all doing a good business.

THE BATH.—Dr. Hall is inflexibly opposed to cold water bathing and hard water. Shuddering hydropathists must regard him as a heretic.

HOW HE DOES IT.

Bill Dibbles is a very well-dressed young man, moves in good company, drives fast livery horses, enjoys all the pleasures of the town that a gentleman may enjoy without derogation, and yet it is well known that he has just sufficient income to pay his hotel and laundry bills, and keep up his credit with his tailor. "How he does it" is a mystery to the great world of Boston, which is naturally bound to know everybody's business. Happening to be in Dibbles's confidence, we shall venture to reveal his secret. It is a very simple one, and may benefit some of the fast young men of this wicked generation.

Bill Dibbles's fortune, then, consists of one twenty-dollar gold piece. It is a real lucky penny. He has had it these three years—ever since he came of age, indeed. It is worth at least twenty thousand dollars to him. For instance, he goes into a stationer's to buy half a dozen sheets of paper; out comes the twenty-dollar gold piece to pay for it.

"Will you change this?" says Bill. "I'm sorry I've nothing smaller. Please give me gold and silver—I'm shy of paper money."

"Can't do it, my dear sir; haven't got the change in the store. But it's no consequence—any time when you're passing."

How carelessly Bill lounges into a confectioner's and orders a strawberry ice cream. The pretty girl at the counter is doomed to witness the exhibition of that inexorable gold piece, smilingly declines to change it; and Bill, invited to call and settle when he is passing, lounges out of the establishment as nonchalantly as he entered it.

Bill scorns to be reputed mean. When he is dining in company at Parker's, he always insists on paying his share, and out comes the twenty-dollar gold piece. Of course nobody can change it. Equally certain is it that the credit of a man who never has anything less than twenty dollars in his pocket, is beyond suspicion. For him the livery stable keeper puts the fastest nag to the best buggy; for him the bootblack puts an extra polish on the French calfskin; for him the artist in hair gives a more vigorous touch to his champagne fingers—they are all paid in the same coin: or rather by a sight of the same coin. What a contemptuous, sarcastic smile does Bill's aristocratic lip wear when he is told that they cannot change that twenty-dollar gold piece! How he pities some people's poverty! How he complains—the hypocrite!—of the annoyance these repeated refusals cause him! We verily believe that if he is ever married, that twenty-dollar piece will be tendered to the clergyman with a request that he will return half of it. Of course the clergyman won't be able to do it, and the gold will return to the pocket of Bill's white vest. If Bill isn't a financier, we don't know who is.

DOG AND MAN.

Reynolds, the prolific dramatist, once produced a musical afterpiece at Drury Lane, called "The Caravan: or, the Driver and his Dog." The music was good, and it had a profitable run. The chief attraction of the piece was a dog, named Carlo. One day, Sheridan, being then manager, went to see the performance of this wonderful dog. As he entered the green room, Dignum (who played in the piece) said to him, with a woful countenance:

"Sir, there is no guarding against illness; it is truly lamentable to stop the run of a successful piece like this, but really—"

"Really what?" exclaimed Sheridan, interrupting him.

"I am so unwell," continued Dignum, "that I really cannot go on longer than to-night."

"Is that all?" exclaimed Sheridan. "My dear fellow, you frightened me; I thought you were going to say the dog was taken ill!"

IOWA.—There must be "tall living" in Iowa. A friend writes from there, that going out a few days since a short distance from home, he found a six barrelled revolver, a hunting knife, a pair of boots, and the dead bodies of eight wolves laying beside them, indicating that some person had shot six with his revolver, destroyed two with his knife, and then became a victim to the remainder.

HAVANA.—The Cubans seem to be enjoying themselves. Paul Jullien and Patti reaped a rich harvest. The theatres are doing well, a gymnasium for ladies and gentlemen has been opened, Godard is still giving balloon ascensions, and a panorama of the burning of Covent Garden Theatre is on exhibition.

Will some one smart at figures tell us how Mr. Ballou can afford to give one hundred pages of reading matter (all of which he pays for), in each number of his Dollar Magazine, or twelve hundred pages of excellent and entertaining miscellany for one dollar per annum? There is but one other magazine in the country which equals Ballou's Dollar Monthly in circulation, nor is this to be wondered at while it is afforded at so low a price.—MacKies Democrat.

DIAMONDS.—Diamonds are looking up in Paris, having advanced twenty-five per cent. The Russian agents are buying them up for the ladies of St. Petersburg.

OFF WITH THE BEARDS!

This was the cry of Peter the Great of Russia, who, in a moment of listlessness, perfectly inexplicable, commenced a war on the beards of his subjects, which lasted more than sixty years. The illustrious legislator, soldier, ship carpenter and admiral, as the starting-point of his crusade, caused to be engraven in brass the following sentence—Boroda licknaja tiogota (the beard is a useless embarrassment). The great obstacle Alexiovitch encountered in his attempted reforms was attachment to ancient usages. This tenacity still characterizes the party of the old Russians—the Rascolniks; many of them, principally among the Cossacks, would prefer the loss of life to that of the cherished beard. Thus the common metaphorical expression in Yankedom, to signify to a man that he has been taken in, "you have been shaved," in Russia expresses the most terrible indignity that can befall a man.

Peter the Great seeing how much importance his subjects paid to the preservation of their beards, ordered them to cut them off. Did he wish, like an ancient legislator of imperious spirit, the enemy of half measures, to accustom his Muscovites to discipline by the severity of this initiatory sacrifice? However that may be, if Peter's prohibition were not inspired by this motive, he at least knew how to replenish his finances from the resistance he encountered. If you were a functionary of the court or city, a trader or a merchant, you were taxed, for wearing beard or mustachio, one hundred rubles—about eighty dollars; the citizens, servants of the boyards, paid about sixty rubles—say about forty-eight dollars; the inhabitants of Moscow, thirty rubles—about twenty-four dollars; while the peasants, every time they passed the barriers of a city, gave two denqui—about four cents. The receipt was a token, or coin, which it was quite well for those who had paid the tax to keep about them. Wo to the poor fellow who neglected to comply with the regulations! The officers of the guard were pitiless, and his beard fell under the huge shears with which they were armed. The white bearded senators of Rome, when their hirsute appendages were tweaked by the invading Gauls, suffered not more internal anguish than did the poor peasants who came to Peter's gate, glorious as goats, and went away like shorn lambs. There are fanatics in this country who would gladly see Congress come down as severely as did some of our colonial legislatures on the style of wearing the hair, and sweep away lovelocks, imperials and mustachios in one fell swoop. O scissors!

Catherine I. confirmed the edicts of her predecessor. In 1738 an ordinance of Peter II. permitted peasants and farmers to wear their beards, but the tax of fifty rubles for other persons was maintained under pain of penal labor. A ukase of the Empress Anne made the tax on beards universal, and increased its amount. Many left their country—flying like the hare—rather than give up their chin tufts. We doubt whether the attachment to this natural decoration of the human face divine ever led to such sacrifices among any other people. Peter III. was preparing to war against beards with greater ferocity, when Catherine II. deprived him of his throne of life, and restored to the nation the privilege of wearing their hair as they liked. The exiles, who had "tarried at Jericho," now came back to St. Petersburg and Moscow.

Is not the human hair regarded as the seat of honor? Many a man who has made no objection to losing his head, has enjoined it on the executioner not to injure his beard. The most daring thing that the First Consul Bonaparte did was to cut off the queues of his soldiers in Egypt. When we guarantee a man's safety, we promise that "not a hair of his head shall be injured." Yet how many of us seem to take an especial delight, like Peter the Great of Russia, in flourishing the shears and razor?

AFFECTING CASE.—The Dayton Gazette tells an affecting story of a farmer who, while selling a load of wheat at a dollar a bushel in that city, burst into tears. The owner of the mill was touched, and kindly inquired the cause of his grief. "Sympathy" was too much for him, and bursting into a tremendous "boo-hoo," he replied: "My son John could have got a dollar and seventy-five cents a bushel for this very wheat two months ago!"

HUNTING AND FISHING.—It is a canon of the Catholic Church, it is said, that hunters have generally been great sinners, and fishermen pious. Isaac Walton asks a blessing on all who are "lovers of virtue and go an angling."

PHILANTHROPY.—There are two kinds of philanthropists—those who talk and those who act: the former believe in good advice, the latter in dimes and dinners.

THE USE OF TRAVEL.—One of the most important uses of travel is not so much to make us know what we see before us, as what we leave behind us.

SMUGGLERS AND SMUGGLING.

All men are by instinct free traders, and there are few, except honest tradespeople, who do not sympathize at heart with smugglers, and secretly chuckle over their evasions of the revenue laws. This is particularly the case in Europe, where duties are oppressively heavy, where each state is surrounded by a cordon of custom house officers, and where, even, there are imposts levied on goods passing from town to country in the same state. As a matter of course there is a great deal of smuggling—excessive duties acting as a stimulus and premium on fraudulent dealers. In France the smugglers are particularly active, and the sympathy of the people materially aids them. Almost incredible stories are told of the ingenuity of French smugglers on the northern frontier. Some of the drivers of the diligences have been known to deal in double pannels, harnesses lined with lace, and cushions stuffed with costly fabrics. Beets have been hollowed out and filled with tobacco. We remember reading of a funeral procession, conducted in grand style, where the coffin was filled with cigars; and particularly of the passage across the Belgian frontier of a false general in full uniform, followed by his staff, all of them glittering with embroidery, and covered with ribbons and crosses, so that the custom house troops, drawn up in line, presented arms, and without instituting the usual search, allowed three carriages, filled with silks and smugglers, to pass their guard.

Most of the smugglers in France make great use of well-trained dogs, and their enemies, the custom house officers, follow their example. Packages of silks and lacings are lashed to the backs of these animals, and over them is placed a curious sort of defence. A two-tined steel fork is strapped on each side of the dog, the points projecting beyond his head, and the shafts, from his nose to his tail, furnished with long, curved, cutting knife-blades. Thus equipped, he is launched on his career, and goes directly to some point where he has been well fed and caressed, and where confederates are ready to receive him. The defensive armor worn by these dogs is a complete protection against any but a very well-trained dog. If an untrained mastiff attacks the smuggler's dog, he is almost sure to be spitted alive. An old, well-trained custom house dog, however, knows how to operate successfully. He attacks the smuggler's dog in the rear; catches him by the hind leg and holds him fast till his master comes up. The latter immediately kills the contrabandist's dog, and then cuts off one of his paws as a trophy, which serves as an evidence in obtaining the reward. The smugglers and their enemies also use dogs for another purpose. They attach themselves to the animals by stout cords or straps, reaching from their belts to the dogs' collars, and are thus dragged over the ground with much greater velocity than they could obtain by their own unaided efforts. In the vast plains of the Artois smuggling is ordinarily carried on by squads of cavalry, flanked by ahirmishers. When the mounted custom house official attacks their cavalcades, a murderous mêlée is not unfrequently the result.

The smugglers of the north of France live in troops and march in bands, each band having its leader, whose supremacy is based on innumerable proofs of intelligence and audacity. He is almost always what is termed in slang phrase, a "hard ticket,"—perhaps an old smuggler, who has learned how to baffle gendarmes and guards, and who knows how to tread the path the law has never discovered by night or by day. His followers place entire confidence in him, and surrender their liberty and fortune to his keeping; and these men very rarely betray their trust. A true and full account of smugglers and smuggling on the continent of Europe would be as readable and exciting as the most thrilling romance.

NO JOKE.—The Montpelier (Vt.) Freeman says that at a social gathering in that vicinity, lately, a young gentleman had the task of "getting a wife" imposed upon him during the evening's amusement, and with a young lady went through a mock ceremony, as they both supposed, of being married; but after the motions had been gone through with, it was discovered that the person who married them was a real justice, and the matrimonial knot could not be untied! The parties are satisfied with their bargain, but are considerably nettled at the manner in which they were launched upon the sea of matrimony.

BOOKSELLING.—The book trade of Boston has increased 25 per cent. over the average of the last five years, and the business for 1855 amounted to $5,500,000.

AWFUL.—Rogers, in his "Table Talk," has left on record that he saw several girls—mere children—going to the gallows for having participated in the Lord George Gordon riots.

BINDING.—Binding in all of its varieties neatly done at this office, at the lowest rates, and in the shortest period of time.

COULDN'T STAND IT.

A farmer and his wife of our acquaintance hired a respectable young man to work for them, and, as is usual in our agricultural towns, the employed dined at their table. The lady was very polite, and as the young man was supposed to be bashful, was constantly pressing him to take another cake, another slice of pudding, etc., etc. At last, one day, after the usual solicitations, to the reply, "Do have another piece of pie, Mr. —," he roared out, "No, I won't, I tell ye!—and ye needn't ask me. You'll spoil my digestion—you will. I've eaten 'bout twice as much as is good for me a'ready. Every day you've been comin' that game on me!—but I won't stand it; and if you don't leave off, I'll leave to once—I will. I s'pose you think I don't know anything about the organs of the stomach; but I've been to the 'cademy to quarters, and studied physiology, and I aint agoin' to kill myself for no white man or woman, if I du get sixteen dollars a month and board." It is needless to add that, after this explosion, he was never subjected to similar treatment.

THE REMAINS OF A HERO.—The remains of General Warren, who fell at Bunker Hill, were lately removed from the tomb under St. Paul's Church, to be deposited in the grave of the Warren family at Forest Hills Cemetery, Roxbury. The cranium was found in a state of preservation, and an aperture showed where the fatal ball had entered. The bullet, by the way, is still carefully preserved in this city.

SUCH IS LIFE!—The street philosopher saith, "The boy on foot cannot bear to see the boy who is riding. And so it is with envy of a larger growth. We are always crying out 'whip behind!' in the miserable hope of seeing some hanger-on, more fortunate than ourselves, knock off his perch."

A CHANGE.—They have substituted horses for mules on the Sixth Avenue Railroad, New York city. The long-eared quadrupeds will be glad of the change. They have departed; but they have left a good many traces behind.

BOUQUETS.—It requires art and taste to make up a beautiful bouquet. Without an eye for the harmony of color, the most beautiful flowers may be grouped together without effect.

THUS IT IS.—The heart that beats for no woman is a niche without a statue.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

We have seldom met in works of fiction with a more touching incident than the following, which actually occurred a few days since in our own State: A young man, who was convicted of bigamy at Newburyport last spring, lately served out the term of punishment for which he was sentenced. At the railroad station he was met by his first wife, who took him with her, gave him a new suit of clothes, and presented him with three hundred dollars, which she had earned since the period of his desertion. They left together for their former home, in New Hampshire. We cannot believe that the generosity, the truly Christian forgiveness, the rich confidence of this noble woman, will fail to redeem the heart of the erring man on whom these treasures were bestowed. Let us believe, for the honor of human nature, that this "angel of the household" will be rewarded, even here on earth, for her trust and her affection.

A DILEMMA.—When the ship Meredith was discovered to be leaking, an Irish sailor was employed at the pump—but first looked over the rail to see how high the water was on the side of the vessel. After pumping an hour, he took another peep over the side, and finding the vessel was four inches deeper than when he began, he shouted, "Arrah, now, captain dear, I shall soon pump the sea full at this rate; for I have raised it four inches already!"

LITERARY.—Surely, the lecturing mania is at its height. A lady in New York has been lecturing on dancing, with illustrations. She probably borrowed her idea from Dan Rice:

"You wheel about and turn about,
And do its so;
And every time you wheel about
You jump Jim Crow."

SPIRITUALISM.—Humboldt, the great German philosopher, is down on the spirit-rappers rather heavily. He writes that he has a "holy horror of pine wood spiritualism." Some things have been done in Boston that would make him open his eyes.

PAPER.—The cost of manufacturing a year's supply of printing paper for the United States, independent of labor and rags, is estimated at $4,000,000. This gives us a lively idea of the literary character of our country.

REFINED CRUELTY.—By the ancient laws of Hungary, a man convicted of bigamy was condemned to live with both wives in the same house. The crime was in consequence extremely rare.

Foreign Miscellany.

Pasteboard from beet-root is now manufactured in France.

Louis Napoleon's baby is enrolled as a grenadier in the guard.

The affairs of Italy were tartly debated in the Peace Congress, at Paris.

At the recent great naval review in the British waters, the Cukoo, a war steamship, was specially assigned for the use of the press.

The plate and other decorations of the table, now owned by the city of Paris, are said to be worth from eight to ten millions of francs.

The court of Rome is sedulously endeavoring to obtain from the government of Tuscany a concordat similar to the one lately granted by Austria.

It is said that Prince Oscar, third son of the king of Sweden, is to marry the Princess Mary of Cambridge, and is about to go to London to seek her.

Postage stamps, similar to those in England, France and America, have just been introduced into Sweden, and a universal rate of postage established.

France has been called on to interfere in Mexico, for the protection of the property of the Catholic Church, recently seized by President Comonfort.

England is at present distracted by a controversy as to whether Peann was or was not an honest man. That there should be a split about a pen is not very surprising.

Rabies, or hydrophobia, has got among the deer in some of the English parks, and it is feared, will depopulate them. Stainesborough Park, near Barnsley, has lost 100 head.

Among the victims of typhus fever at Odessa were, in one week, twelve army surgeons and four physicians, of whom two were Americans, who had made preparations to return home.

The number of students in the Russian universities has hitherto been limited by law. The Emperor Alexander has just signalized his zeal for the welfare of his subjects by removing this restriction.

The London News lately said in a leader on the adulteration of food, so common in the Great Metropolis, "with all the wealth of the world at our call, there are very few in this metropolis who can get a glass of pure water to drink or a bit of genuine bread to eat!"

Mr. Daniel Cameron, who was elected representative for the digging district of Woolshed, Australia, had the compliment paid to him by his supporters of having the horse he rode on at the time of the contest shod with shoes of solid gold. He was also presented with £1500.

The French paper La Presse has the largest circulation of any paper in France. It has never printed less than 9500 copies, and its largest circulation, during the revolutionary troubles of 1848, was 63,869 copies. Its circulation last year was 42,646 copies, or 16,352,498 stamped sheets, on which the stamp duty amounted to 1,226,606 francs, or nearly $250,000.

Italy has an area of 119,000 square miles, and a population of 25,000,000.

Sardinia's participation in the Eastern war has cost her about 75,000,000 francs.

The entire wealth of England is estimated at £3,700,000,000.

A poem on peace, published in St. Petersburg, praises all the combatants.

The Czar of Russia has taken off the prohibition which prevented the Russian nobles from visiting France.

There now remains in India but one native state of any considerable magnitude, that of Hyderabad, in the Deccan.

The Ottoman electric telegraph between Constantinople and Shumla is now open for the transmission of private despatches.

In 1825 the king of Sardinia decreed that no one should be allowed to read and write who was not in possession of 1500 livres—about $200.

Miss Hoemer, of Watertown, is now modeling at Rome a statue of Beatrice Cenci, as she appeared on the evening before her execution.

The Greeks are largely cultivating land in and about Jerusalem, planting olive and mulberry trees, and building silk mills.

The Emperor Napoleon has purchased an extensive piece of ground between St. Cloud and Mont Valerien, for the purpose of erecting a model farm.

A Swedish lady, described as possessing a beautiful voice, has been singing in the north of Germany, and is shortly to appear at the Opera, in Berlin, as Queen of Night in the Zauberflote.

Mr. Hawthorne, author of the "Scarlet Letter," being a guest at the banquet given at the Mansion House, London, recently, said he felt the ties between England and America were such as could never be broken.

The Irish hegira to America has again commenced, and crowds of "decently dressed and comfortable looking emigrants" are seen flocking to the seaports to embark for the land of freedom.

A tunnel under the Mersey, from Birkenhead to Liverpool is proposed. It would, as at present arranged, be about two miles in length, of which about three-quarters of a mile would be made under the river.

The Pinster Canal, which has been in course of construction for many years for account of the Russian government, is at length completed and has just been opened. This canal allows of uninterrupted communication between the Dnieper and the Bug.

Queen Victoria has commanded Mr. Bigg, the well known anatomical mechanician, to construct artificial arms and legs for nine Crimean soldiers, whose severe mutilation attracted her notice during recent visits to the hospitals of Portsmouth and Chatham.

Timber in France is dyed by various colors being mixed with water, and poured over by the root of the tree. The sap is the medium through which the fluid is conveyed. It forms a kind of delicate pump, up which the artery particles run with great rapidity.

Record of the Times.

There are twelve thousand Jews in New York city.

Bayard Taylor is engaged on a Cyclopaedia of Modern Travel, which is to be finished in June.

A little girl at East Boston recently died from the excess of exertion in jumping rope.

The Holiday Street Theatre in Baltimore has been sold to Mr. Greason, for $32,000.

Louisville, Ky., has voted by a majority of 805 to license tavern and coffee houses.

The manufacture of cotton seed oil has been commenced at Cincinnati, Ohio.

The citizens of Roxbury, Mass., are to be taxed $125,360 the coming year.

Over $1,700,000 are annually spent in New Orleans for lottery tickets.

The Fourierite colony, in Switzerland, is now broken up.

There are in the United States 715 churches belonging to the Quakers, and the number of attendants is estimated at 283,000.

A model judge "out South" forgot the day fixed by law for the court to begin on, and fined himself twenty-five dollars for the oversight.

A man, named Edward Caton, was fined $10 in Albany, lately, for attempting to commit suicide by jumping into the river.

The former residence of John Jacob Astor, in Broadway, New York, is in process of demolition, to make room for a brown stone structure.

Work has been resumed upon the fortification at Fort Knox, in Bucksport, Maine, under the superintendency of Lieut. J. D. Kurtz.

Tourists are arriving at Niagara Falls in large numbers, the hotels are filling up, and the place has resumed a summer-like activity.

The editor of an Ohio paper publishes the names of his subscribers who pay up promptly, under the head of "Legion of Honor."

The peasantry in some parts of France believe implicitly in sorcery, and there is no lack of designing knaves who turn their credulity to account by pretending to be magicians.

It is a good sign of the times that two commissioners from South Carolina are in New York, to examine the school system, with a view of establishing a similar one in their own State.

Advices from Turks Island and Key West represent the prospects for a bountiful yield of salt as unusually promising. One hundred thousand bushels is the estimate for Key West.

A boy and a girl, respectively six and eight years of age, who had been lost for upwards of ten days at Altoona, Pa., were recently found in the woods, dead, lying side by side.

Rev. T. H. Stockton, of Baltimore, proposes to publish the Bible in separate volumes—each of the inspired writers' productions being in a separate volume.

As nearly as can be estimated, the number of hats annually sold in New York is not far from 7,500,000, and the annual sales of this description of merchandize, exclusive of straw goods, amount to at least $8,000,000.

Relief continues to be sent to the unfortunate inhabitants of the Cape de Verd Islands.

During the past year the Am. Tract Society has received $943 10 in counterfeit money.

The contemptible crime of bigamy seems to be spreading over the country.

The old bell of the Philadelphia State House is now used for the fire alarm.

Hon. E. G. Squier has received the gold medal of the French Geographical Society.

A hollow tooth is defined by science to be an "aching void."

There are 66,162 volumes of public documents for three years only, in the Ohio State House.

Fast men, like fast rivers, are generally the shallowest, it is said.

Beware of letting stewed apples stand too long in glazed jars—they become poisonous.

Geometry doesn't teach us to square the circle of our acquaintance.

The Portuguese of New York have subscribed a sum of nearly $2000 for the benefit of their suffering brethren at the Cape Verd Islands.

Dr. Breckenridge says that it is the characteristic of Kentuckians not to promise much, but that they always perform what they promise.

Accounts from all parts of New Jersey agree in stating that the prospects of a large yield of peaches were never better than at present.

Common schools are rapidly increasing in North Carolina, and were attended last year by 120,000 scholars, against 19,000 in 1840.

The Zanesville Courier says it is reported that very great losses of sheep have occurred in Ohio this winter, and predicts that it will affect the wool crop.

Dr. Orville Dewey has donated the earnings of his last winter's lectures to his native village, to be expended in planting shade trees along its streets.

The town of Weonsocket, R. I., with a population of six thousand, has a banking capital of one million and forty thousand dollars—a capital larger, in proportion, than New York city.

What contributed most to bring Æsculapius into vogue as a physician, was his luckily meeting a man that his friends were going to inter, in whom he found some remains of life, and whom he restored to perfect health.

The American Publishers' Circular says that G. P. R. James, setting down into a steadfast admirer of free acres and broad fields, has invested largely in western lands, and remains for the present in the United States.

The Nashua Oasis says that one stove manufactory in that city is filling an order for 180 stoves to go to Turkey. The harems of the Sultan may yet enjoy the pleasure of eating food cooked on a Yankee stove.

At Hamilton, Canada, Mrs. McIntyre, a poor widow, recently recovered £100 from a wealthy merchant for the death of her only child, a boy of eleven years, who was killed by falling into a cellar belonging to the defendant, on a public street—there being no railing for the protection of passengers.

Merry Making.

Why is a joiner less handsome than his wife? Kase he is a deal-planer.

A grocer in Dublin advertises whiskey for sale, "drunk by his late majesty."

Why is a crack in the wall like Isaac Walton the angler? Because it's a fissure.

A servant girl left her place the other day, because she had to drink brown sugar in her coffee.

The man "who stood upon trifles" has been blown away.

Woman's "Empire State" is matrimony. Here she is always in the majority—always reigns and sometimes storms.

An Irishman trying to put out a gas light with his fingers, cried out, "Och, murder, the devil a wick's in it."

The man who took passage on the wings of the morning returned on the shades of night: He is doing well.

"The proper study of mankind is man," says Pope; but the popular study is how to make money out of him.

Why may a chemist and a mountebank both be females? Because one is an Ann Eliza (anal-ys-er) and the other a Charlotte Ann (charlatan).

To catch mice, place sweetmeats in your mouth on going to bed, and keep your mouth wide open. When you feel the whiskers of the mouse, bite!

A father being applied to for the reason of his son's absence from school, the schoolmaster received the following intelligent reply: "Kepe-athometogootaterin."

Doing unto others as you would have others do unto you—Neglecting to pay the barber for removing the beard from your face, and thereby shaving him in return.

A physician who was called to attend a rich patient, immediately said on entering the sick chamber, "My dear sir, allow me to examine your pulse,"—meaning pulse, of course."

An editor out West, who had been to see Macbeth performed, winds up a criticism on the play with "Shakspeare was a trump." The editor, we suppose, is a brick.

"Hans, what is the matter?" "De sorrel wagon has run away mit de green horse, and broke de axletree of de brick house what stands by de corner lamp-post across de telegraph."

Why are the ladies of the present day like the illies of Scripture? Because they "toil not, neither do they spin; yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of them."

There is a boy about town who is so cross-eyed that if he looks at a bottle his eyes act as regular cork-screws, and draw the cork instantan-ly. He always imagines his nose to be a big building around the corner.

A young lady who had not received so much attention from the beaux as her female associates, said to her lover, "I told them I would wait until the chaff had been blown off, and then I would pick up the wheat." Smart compliment, that.

What is the best drink for a soldier? March beer.

Why is a deputy sheriff like the first Roman emperor? Because he's a "seiser."

Sidney Smith says the Anglo Saxon race was made for two purposes—to manufacture calico and steal land.

The following question is now before the Tilletium Debating Society: "Is it wrong to cheat a lawyer?"

The doctor who operates for "cataracts" is going to Buffalo, to see if he can do anything for the cataract at Niagara.

We know a preacher who, when speaking, constantly hammers the desk with his fist, to rivet the attention of his audience.

A lady hearing that the price of tallow had risen in consequence of the war, exclaimed, "What! do they fight by candle-light?"

An honest Dutchman being asked how often he shaved, replied: "Dree dimes a week every day but Soonday; den I shafe effery day."

The man who "held an office" got tired and let go for the purpose of resting himself a short time, when the office got away, and has not been heard from since.

Jenkins says his brother, who edits a paper out West, is doing first rate. He has had two new hats within the past three years. Jenkins is inclined to take on airs.

"I say, Mr. Impudence, what are you doing with your hand in my pocket?" "I axes your pardon, mister, but in this here cold vether von scarcely knows were von puts his 'and."

New clothes are great promoters of piety. The young lady with a new bonnet or dress would not miss going to church for all the world.

A landlady in Philadelphia, it is said, makes her pies so light that her lodgers can see to go to bed without a candle, after eating a moderate sized piece.

"What a soft hand Judge B— has!" said a young lady, with whom the judge had just been shaking hands, to her father. "That's because it's been greased so often," growled the old gentleman.

"I am afraid," said a lady to her husband, "that I am going to have a stiff neck." "Not at all improbable, my dear," replied her spouse, "I have seen strong symptoms of it ever since we were married."

"Landlord," said an exquisite, "can you enable me to realize from your culinary stores the pleasure of a few dulcet murphies, rendered innocuous by igneous martyrdom!" He asked for baked sweet potatoes.

"Why don't you buy a thingumbob, and what-do-you-call-it your sidewalk with it every morning?" asked one neighbor of another. "Because I haint got no what's-his-name to buy it with," replied the neighbor.

A private of the Galway Rifles was recently standing sentry, when an officer, noticing that he had a black eye, charged him with having been fighting. "Please sir," the soldier replied, "was it not for that you engaged me?"

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

VOL. IV.—No. 2.

BOSTON, AUGUST, 1856.

WHOLE No. 20.

THE FAITHFUL HOUND.

BY EDGAR L. HAMMOND.

I HAD been absent from home nearly a week, collecting some old debts in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and having succeeded perfectly to my satisfaction, set out on my return—which I expected would occupy about two days—with a considerable sum of money in my wallet.

It was a fine evening in the early part of May, when I alighted from my horse at the door of an inn, where it was my intention to spend the night. It was a pleasant, comfortable-looking place enough, with every sign of neatness and thrift about it; and the prospect of a night's entertainment in such a place, after a long and hard day's ride, was by no means an unwelcome one. Landlord and hostler made their appearance simultaneously, and giving my horse to the latter, I requested mine host to provide me with an apartment, and let me have supper as soon as might be.

The first was at my service directly, and the second was promised in the space of a few minutes. The landlord conducted me to my room, and there left me to attend to affairs below, while I proceeded to cleanse myself from the dust of travel. A plentiful shower of cold water, a supply of fresh linen from a small portmanteau I carried with me, and a free use of that most convenient article, the clothes brush, soon combined to renovate my entire appearance; and thus refreshed, I descended the stairs to look after my horse.

A visit to the stable door assured me that he was well cared for, and in a few moments I returned across the yard to the inn door. As I did so, I observed a shaggy and somewhat gaunt looking hound sitting just by the sill—having taken up his station there during my visit to the stable. He was by no means handsome, for he was both lean and rough; but, accustomed by experience to judge of neither man nor beast entirely by smoothness of coat or shapeliness of limb, I looked for some redeeming quality.

It was there; and more than one, as I found. The gaunt limbs were sinewy and strong, the rough coat concealed a frame of iron, the head was well made, the countenance kind and good-tempered, the eyes fine, bright, serious and intelligent; and they watched me with a wishful, contemplative glance as I crossed towards the door. I whistled to him; he brightened up, wagged his tail, and rising, came to meet me. Just then, mine host appeared in the doorway.

"A fine dog, sir," I said, stroking the head of my canine friend; "a fine dog. May I ask if he belongs to you?"

"No, sir; I never saw him till yesterday," answered the landlord; "and then he came into the inn yard alone. He has made himself at home about here since then; but ask whom I will, nobody seems to know anything about him. A fine dog, doubtless, as you say, sir; though, to be sure, not the handsomest as ever was. Will you have supper now, sir? It is quite ready."

I went in, the dog accompanying me as far as the door, where he took his seat again. As I passed the threshold, an ill-looking fellow came out from the inn kitchen, and passed me, casting an evil glance at me as he did so. He was followed by a companion, of an appearance quite as unprepossessing as his own; and both went out.

"Who were those persons?" I asked of the landlord, as he led the way to the cosy little parlor, where my supper was prepared.

"O—Jack Brown, and one of his fellows," answered mine host; "a couple of the greatest rascals out of jail. I wonder what they are hanging about here for? Some mischief or other, I'll warrant me."

I had concluded my repast, and gone up to my bedroom, where I sat down by an open casement to watch, as I ever loved to do, the rising of the moon, when suddenly I heard the deep, angry growling of a dog, somewhere in the yard below. I looked down, but could see no dog about there. The hound which I had previously seen had disappeared from the doorway when I came up stairs. The sound that I heard now seemed, as I listened to it, to proceed from that part of the yard leading around the end of the inn; and now I had no doubt that it came from the strange dog. It continued for a moment or two, intermingled with two or three sharp, quick barks, and now the voices of men, uttering fierce threats, and not a few enraged oaths. The growls grew more angry, the voices of the men louder, when suddenly the landlord hastened out from the door, and around the corner.

"How now, Jack Brown, and you, Tom Hodge; what are you doing with that dog?" I heard him saying. "Better leave him alone, and clear out from this. I don't want you hanging round here any longer. Here, pup."

Shortly after, as the landlord came up stairs, and stopped at my door to see if I required anything, I asked him the occasion of the disturbance I had heard.

"O, the dog did not like Jack Brown's teasing," he said, "and so showed his teeth. The hostler said they had been tormenting him—Jack Brown and his companion,—and when he threatened to fly at them, they got angry. I should not have cared much," added mine host, "if he had given them something to remember him by—they deserve it."

It was perhaps half an hour after, when, sitting still by the casement, while the moon rose higher and higher, I saw coming into the inn yard, a boy, with a stealthy look about him. He looked about the place as he entered, and then walked slowly along and entered the door just below my window. Some few moments elapsed, and he came out again, followed by the hound, who kept close to him, smelling at something which the boy carried in his hand, and which seemed to be used to coax him along. They went together around the corner of the inn, and disappeared.

I sat two or three minutes thinking of the matter, and then, prompted by some suspicion scarcely defined at the moment, put on my hat, descended the stairs, and went out the door. Passing around the corner of the inn, I followed a path leading past the stables and the kitchen garden of the inn. This path lay across a large orchard beyond, and down by a brook running through the meadow farther on. The moonlight, though not very bright yet, slumbered here in a silvery twilight among the trees, leaving their shadows undisturbed below.

As I reached the orchard—which had no wall at the lower end—I could see through the trees down to the meadow; and there, crouched beneath a large willow bending over the brook, was a dark figure, which I took to be that of the boy; and that instant there was a dull splash in the water, as if something heavy had fallen in. I sprang forward to the spot, just as the boy had risen to his feet, and seized him by the arm.

"What have you been doing?" I asked, very sternly.

He started, and attempted to elude my grasp; then as I repeated my question, answered, in a half frightened, half sullen tone:

"Well, Jack Brown told me to do it!—and the dog didn't belong to any one."

I let go his arm, threw off my coat, and sprang into the brook, while he ran away. The water was nearly as high as my head here; and struggling in it, for life, was the hound, with a great stone, attached by a cord to his neck, holding him down.

In an instant I had seized the stone in both hands; and as I lifted it with main strength, the dog rose slowly to the surface, with feeble and convulsive efforts. Between being half strangled and half drowned, it was as much as he could do to crawl up on the bank, while I laid the stone there; and as I drew out my knife to cut the cord, he lay down exhausted upon the turf. Poor fellow! he licked my hand gratefully while I was doing it.

Some fragments of raw meat lay here on the grass. I understood now. The boy had enticed him hither with these, and fastening the stone to his neck while he was eating, had let the stone slide into the water, and so pulled the dog in after it. It was fortunate for the young rascal that he was not within reach of justice, or I should have administered it with compound interest then. However, as the hound was safe, I cared less about the matter; and that he was safe, there was no doubt; for after a few moments he arose, and moving off a step or two, slowly shook the water from his shaggy sides. Now I patted and caressed him, and with mute eloquence he returned my caresses, showing his gratitude in every possible way, for the deliverance he had received at my hands.

I took my coat on my arm, and together we proceeded to return to the inn. My canine companion and myself entered my sleeping apartment. There was a fire blazing cheerily on the hearth, and going quickly up to it, the dog laid down before it, and stretched himself out at ease, with his huge muzzle resting upon his paws, and his wishful eyes watching me.

It was not yet ten, but I was weary with my day's ride, and my wet garments were not over-comfortable; accordingly, I prepared to retire. The hound kept his place on the warm hearth. I thought he seemed partial to his quarters, and was inclined to let him stay; but willing to let him take his choice I opened the door, and called him towards it. He rose slowly, came forward a few steps, and then paused, looking earnestly in my face, with a glance that seemed to beg permission to remain.

"Good!" I said, "you shall stay if you like." I shut the door, the dog took up his station again by the hearth, and I betook myself to my pillow.

It was broad day when I awoke again, after a night of uninterrupted slumber; and the first thing my waking glances met was my friend, the hound, sitting quietly by the hearth, waiting for me to rise. I was glad to see him. The memory of the scenes of the previous evening inclined me to look upon him with affection; and I am quite sure he returned it, for he showed his sentiments to the best of his ability, in his dog-like but eloquent fashion. We bade each other a very cordial good morning, and then I proceeded to make myself ready for breakfast.

Meeting mine host below, I gave him an account of last evening's events, which considerably incensed him. Breakfast was ready, and as soon as I had despatched it, I ordered my horse to be brought round; for I wished to resume my journey as early as possible.

Meanwhile, the hound kept close beside me, wherever I went; and seemed, by his actions, to know that I was about to take my departure. I could not be insensible to the eloquent though mute signs of interest and affection which he displayed. As I mounted my horse, he looked up earnestly in my face, wagged his tail, and uttered a low whine. He said, in everything but words, "Take me with you."

"Landlord," said I, as I was ready, at the very last second, to ride off, "since this dog has no legitimate master, and for the protection you have afforded him you would henceforth have the right to that name, I am willing to pay you a fair sum if you will let me have him."

"Why, bless your heart!" answered the good humored host, "I don't know who's a right to him if you haven't; for didn't you save his life last night? He's yours, sir, if you will take him; and you are quite welcome to him."

With these considerations, then, the dog became mine, and I rode off, while he, keeping beside me, frolicked around at every step with unmistakable demonstrations of pleasure.

At noon we stopped at an inn to take a brief hour's rest and food, and were soon again on our way. I intended to ride no later than five or six o'clock; and, at that time, coming up to a pleasant, comfortable, cheerful-looking inn, I dismounted again. The landlord was polite, attentive—even eager, I thought, to please me. The attendants—though I saw but one or two—were civil and decent-looking; the accommodation all that could be desired. An excellent repast was spread before me, of which I partook with relish; and directly afterwards, visited my horse, in the stable, as was my custom. He was making a comfortable supper, and seeing him well taken care of, I left him.

Returning to the house, I missed my dog, for the first time that day, from my side. He had come out with me, but I saw nothing of him now.

"Where is he, I wonder?" I said to the landlord, who stood on the steps.

"O, he is somewhere near, I dare say," he answered, "and will make his appearance soon."

We went in, and presently I ascended to my chamber. The landlord soon after coming up, stopped in as he was passing, and I took the opportunity to ask him some questions concerning the neighborhood, which, though rather unsettled, seemed a pleasant one, with a great deal of fine scenery. He very readily entered into conversation, and soon, by a natural turn, my own journey, and several other general matters connected with myself and my business, were touched upon. Nodding towards a small table near, whereon my pistols lay, he said:

"I see you go armed. That is well in these times. Handsome little things; may I take the liberty to look at them?"

Of course I immediately passed them to him, remarking, as a caution, that they were loaded.

I remember that just then, a strange scuffling sort of noise somewhere outside attracted my attention, and I looked out to ascertain the cause. It continued for at least two minutes; but I saw nobody near, and heard no other sound. It ceased directly, and presently I forgot it.

An hour passed away, and I experienced some perplexity, and anxiety as well, concerning my dog, who had not yet made his appearance. The landlord offered to send a boy to look for him, and did so; but the boy, after being absent for some time, returned with no tidings of him. Hoping he would be visible by morning, I retired for the night.

I do not know whether my conversation with the landlord had anything to do with the matter, but my dreams were of nothing but robbery and murder. The moment I sank to sleep, the most frightful fancies ran riot in my brain; and scarcely two hours could have passed ere I woke shuddering from one of the most horrible dreams that ever haunted me.

It was about midnight. The full moon, shining through the curtained windows, filled the room with light; not a sound, save my own breathing, broke the silence. A cold perspiration covered me; for a moment I lay almost in a state of exhaustion, so terrible had been the agitation produced by my dream. Then, with the silence oppressing me, I rose from my couch. I put my hand under my pillow to assure myself that my package of money and my watch, which I had placed there before retiring, were still there—then laughed at myself for my excitement. Why did such ideas present themselves in this place?

I could very well reason my agitation away; but it was not so easy to compose myself to sleep again. Thinking I would sit up awhile, I dressed myself, and sat down by an open window, drawing the curtain partly aside. This window looked out at the back of the inn, and was directly over a low shed, the roof of which was not three feet below. As the house faced the southwest, the yard here was completely in shadow; but suddenly there appeared below some object which I could not mistake for anything else than my dog! He sprang over the low fence, ran across to the shed, and scrambling up over some casks that stood against it, reached the roof; another noiseless bound brought him to my window-ledge.

I was delighted to see him coming, as may well be imagined; but what in the world was the reason of his mysterious absence for so long a time? He uttered no whine of pleasure as he reached me, and sprang up with his paws upon my knees, to greet me; he was perfectly silent; he seemed to avoid making any unnecessary noise. But what was my astonishment to see that he was muzzled, and that about his neck was securely knotted a rope, the end of which dragged on the floor, and which had evidently been broken short off.

He had been tied up somewhere, and had broken the cord by main force. The muzzle—the cord—what were they for? Where had he been? Who had done this?—and what was the object? Now his sudden disappearance was accounted for. He had been removed by artifice—enticed or forced away; and by whom? A thrill ran through me; a lightning thought—a fearful thought—darted through my brain.

“Be quiet, sir!” I whispered to my dog. He crouched down.

Moving noiselessly to the table by my bed, I took up the pistols which lay there, and examined them—the balls had been removed!

And now the full danger of my position flashed upon me. I was in the very place against which my hypocritical host had warned me—a den of robbers! Now I remembered how he handled my pistols—it was then that the mischief had been done. Doubtless I might expect visitors ere long; for it was plain that there was a plan on foot to rob and perhaps murder me before morning. What was I to do? There was not a moment to be lost in escaping or preparing myself against an attack.

I saw that my door was securely fastened; then hastily and noiselessly proceeded to load my pistols. But a cunning hand had been at work—the ball pouch was gone! I stood motionless. I was alone—unarmed. I had no means of defending myself against treachery but my own strength. I resolved to hazard attracting the attention of those who might be watching, and make my escape. Crossing the room silently, I knelt down, and bidding my dog be quiet, unfastened the cord that encircled his neck, and removed the muzzle from his jaws. He licked my hand with tacit affection, and seemed to repress every sound, comprehending the nature of my position.

As I knelt, he suddenly started, and pricked up his ears; his glance fixed steadily on a point somewhere beyond me. I turned quickly. In the wall, close by us, was a door, which had been unnoticed by me before, so absolutely did it resemble a mere panel like the rest, and which was now slowly, softly unclosing. I was kneeling so near it that, as it opened and moved back, it effectually concealed me from the view of the one who was entering. My heart stood still. I pressed my hand hard on the neck of my dog, whom I felt ready to spring upon the intruder.

As I have said, I was behind the opening door. I waited to see the visitor pass the screen thus afforded.

He passed—cautiously—noiselessly; a long knife gleaming in his right hand—his back towards me. It was the landlord! Softly creeping toward the foot of my bed, which faced this secret door, and the curtains of which were closed. I rose softly to my feet, still restraining the dog's impatient eagerness. A board creaked under my feet—the murderer turned—beheld me, and sprang upon me with a savage cry. My hand slipped from the uplifted arm that I grasped; I was thrown down—the knife was uplifted! Swift, silent, sure was the dog's leap! His white teeth fastened in the assassin's arm, who reeled with the violence of the shock, and fell backward, his head striking the bed-post; and he lay senseless where he fell.

And the dog, the faithful creature who had saved my life when the murderer's steel was at my very throat, released his now harmless victim, and springing upon me overwhelmed me with passionate caresses.

I was saved! The man lay there without sense or motion, the knife still glittering in his clasp—a horrible object in the quiet moonlight flooding the room. Nobly had the affectionate animal beside me repaid me for the protection he had received at my hands.

And now, satisfying myself that the wretch was only stunned, and would soon revive, I hastily snatched my money and watch from under the pillow, and gathering the rest of my things quickly together, sprang from the window to the shed below, with my faithful dog, and reaching the ground, hastened towards the stable. One thing surprised me, that I beheld not a living soul—that the other inmates of the place, if there were any about, failed to have been aroused.

Through the silvery silence of the night we sped on. Along the road, here, there was not a single dwelling for miles and miles, and a strange and lonely ride enough did that seem to me, escaping from danger and death. It all seemed like some uneasy dream. I patted my horse, and gave a friendly and affectionate word to my faithful dog, ever and anon, and their companionship and mute sympathy cheered me. I had gone at a rather rapid pace at first, to get away from the proximity of that fatal spot; but gradually, as the distance from it increased, I somewhat slackened my pace; for I knew that my four-footed companions' must be wearied with the fatigue they had already undergone.

Suddenly, when I had reached, perhaps, to about seven miles from the inn, I heard sounds behind me that caused me to turn my head suddenly, and at the same time my dog sent forth a low, mournful howl, that chilled me. The sounds I heard were the rapidly approaching paces of horses, muffled by the turf; and there, not a hundred yards distant, were two horsemen flying along in the moonlight towards me.

I had not a doubt as to who they were—they were some accomplices of the landlord's, whom I had chanced to elude in making my escape; they were pursuing me, determined, I supposed, not to lose their prey. They were gaining on me at a rapid rate. If I had heard them sooner there might have been some chance for me; but, as it was, they had kept on the turf, so that their approach had been secret, and my situation was now one of undeniable danger. I had brought my pistols with me; but of what use were they, unloaded? I was in no position to contend with these two ruffians, probably well armed and prepared for a struggle. Resolved to try my speed against theirs, I tightened the rein, whistled to my dog, and almost flew over the ground, while my dog kept pace with me, looking up now and then at me with, I thought, a hopeless expression.

"Ah! my good friend," I said to him, "if flight does not save me, the noble deed you have done to-night will have been of no avail—you cannot save me again!"

It seemed as if he understood me. But he had no idea of dying then. He pricked up his ears—his eyes grew eager—a short, shrill, fierce bark issued from his lips.

It was of no use attempting to elude my pursuers. Their beasts were fresh—mine wearied by a week's travelling. They gained on me at every pace; I could hear the rapid rush through the air as they neared me. A hoarse voice called on me to stop—a pistol bullet whistled past my ear, through my hair. Another and another; but they missed me. And now my pursuers gained still more; they reached—passed me, and wheeling, intercepted my course.

Quicker than thought they had dropped from their horses, and seized my bridle reins. Instantly I dashed one of my pistols full in the face of the one on the right, just as the dog sprang upon him, and dragged him to the earth, where they rolled together in a death struggle. My heart throbbed exultingly as I saw the noble creature grasping with my assailant. A wild oath broke from the lips of the other ruffian. Aiming my remaining pistol at his head, I fired the blank powder charge and partially stunned him, at the same time striking my horse smartly, but trembling with fright, he refused to stir; and while the man evaded the pistol I flung at him, I received a blow on the head that struck me senseless from the saddle.

But that hour was not destined to be my last, as I found, on waking to this life once more, some twelve hours after, in a small farm house, lying not twenty rods from the scene of that night's attack, and where—thanks to the faithful, fearless creature who had twice saved my life at the peril of his own—I was enabled to listen to an account of certain circumstances, of which I had no remembrance.

It seemed that at about an hour, or thereabouts, after midnight, the occupants of this farm house were aroused by the barking of a dog without, and hastening to open the door, found there a large dog, seeming in great distress, his coat stained with blood and covered with dust, and two or three wounds visible in different parts of his body; that, resisting their endeavors to lead him in, he had, by his significant actions, induced them to follow him along the road some distance, to where lay the bodies of three men, in the middle of the road, while a single horse, apparently belonging to one of them, stood by the roadside.

Two of the men were quite dead—the blood flowing from a terrible wound in the throat of each. These wounds, on examination, were found to have been made by the fangs of a dog, which had fastened there, and met through and through the flesh. Well had the faithful brute preserved his master! The third, though insensible, was without wounds; his only injuries being a dislocation of the arm, and a severe bruise on the head, caused by some violent blow.

It is easy to supply the missing links. The dog, immediately on my being hurled from the saddle, must have left the man whom he had thrown down, and flown upon the other assailant, whom my pistol had already half disabled, preventing him from doing me farther mischief. In the throat of each he had torn great wounds, in his fury, that would have let out a score of lives.

He had saved my life. I can find no words to convey my feelings, as I think of the unshrinking courage and fidelity with which this noble creature protected and preserved me, when I was utterly at the mercy of the assassin; as I think of the death which he interposed his own life to avert from me.

Of the two ruffians who had attacked me on the road, strange to say, one was found to be Jack Brown, the dark-looking individual, who had figured somewhat in the first part of this story. He was a notorious character, and the accomplice of the landlord who had attempted my life, in many a terrible deed of crime. This landlord, who was found and arrested the next day at the tavern, was tried soon after; a trial in which such a record of guilt and blood was brought to light, as made people shudder. If he had succeeded in despatching me that night, I should not have been his first victim under that roof, nor probably the last. He was sentenced to be hung, and met his fate shortly after.

My noble dog recovered from his wounds in a few weeks, with careful nursing, and is now my constant companion; beloved, cherished and honored for his noble qualities, his affection for me, and that tender, unshrinking, courageous fidelity, once attested by such signal and never-to-be-forgotten services.

JUSTICE AMONG THE MOSLEMS.

It is customary in Turkey for the party which gains a case in a law suit to pay all expenses, this being considered the most equitable mode of proceeding, as the loser can ill afford to pay the costs of a lawsuit. On one occasion, an Albanian was brought before a judge in Constantinople accused of having stolen a gimlet of the value of about ten cents. The Albanian stoutly denied the charge, persisting in his innocence. There was no positive proof of his guilt, notwithstanding which, the judge was well convinced that the accused stole the gimlet. He therefore administered to him the oath, the last resort in such cases, which the Albanian promptly took, and in the absence of the usual proof, the case was decided in his favor; but the judge resolving that he should not entirely escape, assessed the costs at thirty cents, upon which the Albanian coolly took the gimlet from his pocket, and held it towards the plaintiff, exclaiming, "Here is your gimlet—now pay the costs."—Philadelphia Sun.

MORTALITY FROM THE PLAGUE.

Gibbon relates that in the reign of Justinian, in 529, a plague devastated the empire for forty-two years. During a portion of this time, when Constantinople was visited by the epidemic, ten thousand persons died daily. Two centuries later, two hundred thousand persons were carried off, in that capital, by another visitation of the plague. In earlier visitations many smaller cities were depopulated by it. The entire mortality, during the fifty-two years of plague, is computed at 100,000,000.—Burlington Sentinel.

The works of our mystical mannerists, who darken counsel by words without knowledge, resemble wet fireworks, which merely sputter and blacken paper.

CONSTANCY.

BY GERTRUDE DANBY.

Whate'er my changing lot
In this drear world shall be,
Should Fortune smile or not,
Mid all, I'll think of thee.

Though want and grief assail,
And I forsaken be,
I'll not my fate bewail,
But ever think of thee.

But then should Fortune's sky
Be clear and bright to me,
Be I exalted high,
Still I will think of thee.

Ah yes, as long as life
Shall heaven continue to me,
Mid joy, or woe, or strife,
I'll always think of thee.

THE THREE FRIENDS.

BY W. O. HATON.

ADELINE LEMAN, the only daughter of parents in affluent circumstances, was wedded in her twentieth year, to Henry Ferrison, a thriving young merchant. She had not been a spoiled, though an only child, and her heart had received as much schooling as her intellect. With a lovely person, an educated mind, and a warm and affectionate nature, she stood before the altar, a smiling bride; while the doting and confiding parents felt that a new and happy stage of their existence had begun—their daughter was the wife of one whose worthiness of the possession they fully recognized.

Ray Morville was the groomsman, a friend of Henry from their schoolboy days. Manhood had cemented the fraternity so early begun, and each regarded the other's welfare as his own. No brighter auspices seemed ever to have attended the wedded union of hearts; and tears of joy were shed by the two friends, at the consummation of a ceremony which, though in a certain sense it was to divide them, added a happy feature to their lives.

Henry was some ten years the senior of his wife. Of a sedate, matter-of-fact nature, his classic education had not turned his mind from the sphere of life to which his talents and tastes were the best adapted; and after graduating, he entered so energetically upon a mercantile career, that his business talents soon made him a successful and honored merchant. Liberal in his views, devoted to business, he was readily acknowledged to be a "good citizen," blameless, praiseworthy and judicious.

Ray Morville was of about the same age. He had not had the good fortune of a collegiate education, his parents having been poor; and when he left the city schools, he entered a counting-house. By his clerkship he supported a widowed mother and a sister. He had not the business faculties of Henry, though his perseverance was as great; and though ambitious of an equal fortune, he was self-reliant, and steadily refused the offers of aid from his friend.

One would have thought that of these two men, Henry would have been the gayer; yet it was not so. Ray's ever buoyant nature made him the soul of every social circle, and though not courting society like many of the ardent and frivolous, he was welcome whenever he appeared.

Why should he not be the pride of his mother and sister? What man like Henry Ferrison, could do otherwise than prize his friendship? And what young bride like Adeline, could help the kind regard she bestowed upon her husband's friend? Near neighbors, he was always welcome to their new home, after the usual bright and bewildering formality of a honeymoon travel.

But there never yet was a honeymoon which was all honey. The tired pair returned home, and now began the untried maze of sober, married life. Mr. Ferrison returned to his counting-house, and resumed his wonted absorption in business, with the added incentive of a wife and home to provide for. Mrs. Ferrison assumed the duties of the matron, and now that the bustle of the bridal journeyings was over, her cares allowed her time to reflect upon her new estate.

We have said, that of the two friends, Ray was the gayer. Both estimable in the general eye, Henry was indeed inferior to his friend in the charms of intercourse, without which, companionship, particularly that of wedded life grows dull if not unhappy. And Adeline had found, before her honeymoon tour was over, that there was such a thing as a monotony in love. Yet she was of no capricious mould, nor had she ever loved before.

Her husband was ever attentive, uniformly kind, and showed not the least abatement of his affection. Though absorbed in business abroad, when at home his enjoyment was evidently deep. Though grave, his sincere face was gentle, like his words; and if he could be charged with taciturnity at times, it was attributable to weighty concerns of business. He well and truly loved her.

Henry Ferrison loved her with a love, which, possessed by all, would make a much holier state of matrimony; true, constant, and unselfish. But he showed but little of the divine fire in that manner by which we are all endeared. It was too quiet, too calm, had too much of polished propriety attending it, too little impulsive unbending, to make it seem to his wife much more than an earnest attachment, enthralled, or fortified, by vows. And therefore it was that the hitherto inexperienced Adeline soon found how gravity and sameness will tire.

It was a relief to Adeline Ferrison when Ray Morville came, and he came often. Half the visits of husband, wife and friend were made in company abroad, and the world regarded them as socially inseparable. It was right and natural, considering all things.

"How different you are from my husband!" was the impetuous and pettish exclamation of Adeline, one evening at a party, which the inseparable three attended; but which, as it was particularly lively, seemed to be the less agreeable to the sober Henry, who mingled little in its liveliness, and had now withdrawn to a corner of the apartment, to converse upon stocks with a gray-headed merchant.

Adeline's remark was made alone, to Ray, who had been convulsing a group of ladies and gentlemen by a series of anecdotes and pleasantry, without effort, with a brilliant grace of style which formed their chief charm.

The particular fullness of her appreciation startled Ray Morville, and he understood the implied preference. As he stared, she colored crimson, for she had spoken involuntarily.

"I mean,"—she stammered, "that—he don't enjoy a little innocent gayety as you do."

"I know," said Morville, in the curious position of an apologist to a wife for her husband's taste, "that Henry does not relish sport as much as I do; in fact, he never did, when a boy; and perhaps it's as well; for it would be a pity to have two friends both fools. His talents are for more substantial purposes."

The reply exalted him more in Adeline's mind than ever, and half repenting what she had said, and too confused to say more, she observed an awkward silence, which permitted her to compare with still greater advantage to her companion, the contrasts of manner the two exhibited.

Raising her eyes, she saw that Morville was also suddenly musing, with his glance upon the carpet.

"He is thinking of what I said!" thought she; "and O, isn't there a difference? Poor Henry!" and she looked towards her unconscious husband, as he continued to discuss grave matters with the elderly gentleman, and felt conscience-stricken at not idolizing one, so good and kind, whom she affectionately esteemed—but did not love.

"Poor Henry!" The thoughts contained a volume of meaning. "Poor Henry!" Poor indeed, for he had lost his wife's love; or rather, he had never won it.

Ray Morville felt flattered by the remark of his friend's wife, but thought nothing more of it, till one evening he was pressed by Henry to accompany his wife to an approaching ball.

"I have an utter distaste for balls, Ray, but you know I could not be so selfish as to wish to deprive her of the pleasure."

Ray could not refuse. Mrs. Ferrison's glance showed plainly to him that she was pleased.

"Within a year after marriage!" thought he.

They attended the ball. During the whole evening, Adeline embraced every occasion to be with him; and the excitement of the time revealed her partiality so unguardedly, as could not but awaken his suspicions that a dangerous preference existed, that his friend dreamed not of.

"It must be my vanity, which makes me so ungenerous to her," thought Ray, as on the following day he revolved the scenes of the previous night. "She loves him, of course. He deserves it; and she is only naturally fond of the life to which she has been used."

And yet her image glowed in his mind almost constantly. "Beautiful! How gracefully she danced! What eyes and hair, and what a speaking face! Ah! Ray Morville, when will you get such a wife? It is a wonder that Henry does not abandon his gravity, and reflect from his face the light of her love. He ought to be all buoyancy and mirth. By the way, she spoke of Moore, last night. I'll get a copy for her."

She received the present with a look of singularly warm gratitude, and paid more attention to it than to her unsuspecting husband.

"You don't know how glad it makes me feel, Ray," said Henry, "when I reflect I have such a friend as you. You always make me so cheerful when you come, that I don't think we could get along at all without you."

"And wouldn't I be enough?" asked Adeline, coquettishly, and yet with a laughing indifference in her look, which was perceived, as she intended, by Morville, but not by her husband. She was growing bolder.

"You know, Adeline," answered Henry, with more than common quickness and fervor, "that I prize you above all others in the world. Without you, my dear," he added, in a calmer and graver voice, "there would be little for me to live for, indeed."

The thought cast an unwonted shadow over his sombre face. And the three were silent for a time—for three different causes.

"And now you are making little of Ray," after a short pause, said Adeline.

Her husband looked at her reproachfully, as if entreating her not to show such levity.

"Ray and I are old and tried friends, and no trifle could ever make us otherwise."

"Really, Henry, you are more romantic to-night than you were even in our courting-days," said the young wife, her tone being more significant than her words.

Her husband was silent. "'Our courting-days!' How lightly she speaks, of late; how triflingly!" An undefined feeling of apprehension stole mist-like over his spirit. Am I changed, or is she?

Adeline took up the volume of Moore, and carelessly turned over the leaves.

"Were you ever in love?" she asked of Morville, looking archly at him, and then significantly at her husband, whose eyes were downcast.

"Yes," answered Ray, glad of a chance to say something; "in love—with my mother and sister."

"And nobody else?"

"Never."

"And did your love for them ever make you feel melancholy?" she continued.

"Always cheerful—always delighted," said Ray, with animation—"but why do you ask?"

"Because they say love makes us sad, and I suppose that it must be the other kind—such as Henry feels, for instance, for some old sweetheart he has lost forever."

Ferrison did not even smile at the sally.

"For see," she continued, "how unhappy he looks, and even when he says he feels happy, he always looks mournful—a sign that he has a secret which he would hide from me. But I am not to be deceived."

"I never heard you speak so, before, Adeline," said Ferrison, in a husky, agitated voice; "pray don't, for I am not in very good spirits, really."

"This is the language, either of a heartless woman, or one who is utterly devoid of love for her husband," thought Morville; "else how could she speak what she must know gives him pain?"

Ferrison soon resumed, looking solemnly at his wife, as she still mechanically turned the leaves of the book:

"I know, Adeline, I think, why you speak so; I think you mean to rally me, because I am usually, always perhaps, so serious; I know I am; but then you ought to remember there is such a thing as being serious, without gloom or unkindness. It is true I have not been gifted with a great flow of spirits, nor can I boast of much address in society; but all I am, and all I have, I have laid with gladness at your feet. You know I have never uttered a harsh word to you—no, and I know I have never had cause, nor ever will. I wooed you honorably, and hoped and still hope that if a singleness and strength of love for you which cannot fail till I die, and a simple realization of all that I was supposed to be, will satisfy you, Adeline, you will not regret that you made me a happy man."

Agitation choked his utterance, and his tears fell fast.

"Now, if she is a woman, she will show it!" thought Ray Morville, himself having listened with moist eyes. The truth of what her husband said, and the anguish she did not think nor wish to have caused, thrilled into her soul; and as he proceeded, she trembled, changed color, and after vainly essaying to conceal her emotion, gave vent to it in a flood of tears:

"Yes, yes, Henry! I know it all," she sobbingly exclaimed, when he had finished; and running to him she embraced him. "There never was a better husband, and I did not imagine that my foolish talk would agitate you so."

Seizing the first opportunity, Ray withdrew. "Hers is a true heart, after all!" thought he.

Months elapsed before the memory of that evening lost its effect upon the young wife. It taught her to dwell more than she had been wont, upon her husband's really valuable qualities, and she prided herself upon the devotion which she showed to him.

Henry was happy—if possible, happier than before the first cloud had come upon his wedded love; yet his manner was, as of old—monotonously grave. He seemed to regard all things with a solemnity, which is considered by the world to be only expected from sickness, misfortune, or old age.

Moral worth is far from being the only object of uncorrupted love. And now returned, more obviously than ever, her appreciation of her husband's friend.

Her young heart yearned for some object that was not so constantly proclaiming itself to be ice; or, which, if there was fire beneath, required efforts of a torturing nature to thaw it out. In a kind of despair, her soul cried out for those little blandishments of manner, the varying ways and looks and acts, which, once endearing us, keep the love for their possessor forever fresh.

Morville, by his constant visiting and thorough familiarity with the nature and habits of both Adeline and her husband, could not but see that the union was virtually dissolved.

Trivial expressions, peculiar glances betrayed her to him, and he now began to criticise his own feelings.

"Does she love me? I ought to doubt it. Do I love her! O, no, no, no, impossible; and yet—she excites more tenderness in me, or at least I display it more than Henry, who says he loves her; and why should I doubt him? But my duty and my honor! He seems unhappy again. And she has grown so of late. Why should she be so cold to him, so cordial to me? No matter why! I must not dwell upon it, but resolve, whatever be my feelings or opinions regarding her, to stifle and to hide them."

It was easier for him than for her.

"I will do it," she exclaimed, one day, vehemently beating her brow in agony; "I love him, and I will let him know it. Better die than thus be compelled to hold silence, while my heart is frozen on one side and consumed on the other."

Taking up a pen, she addressed, in an unfeigned hand, the following lines to Mr. Morville, without signature; trusting to an opportunity to compare the writing, when he should show it to her as she expected, with other of her own, and leave him to decide whether she wrote it:

"If, by Hymen's stern decrees,
Two are bound, but only one
Basks in love's thrice blessed sun,
Frankness gives the spirit ease;
Else the lonely heart would break;
Hear me, then, for sorrow's sake!

Hymen gave me love—but I Cannot to his kiss reply;
Ice is there, and I am lost,
Circled by the arms of frost!
Give me consolation's ray;
Loved one! canst thou say me nay?"

He received it, and it confirmed what he had long suspected.

Now came a harder struggle for Morville. He must dissemble to both his friend and to his—dared he avow it to himself? ay—to his friend's wife, whom he loved.

True to an honorable resolve, when Adeline strove by every artifice in her power to ascertain whether he had received the missive or imagined who sent it, Morville was on his guard, and his evasive replies baffled her curiosity; but this only added fuel to the flame. She became the more eager to reveal herself to him. Still she hesitated, more from pride than fear, to make the great avowal; but love, and a desire to vindicate, in his eyes, her conduct towards her husband, caused the scales awhile to swing evenly.

The indifference to her husband, increasing and long continued, was shown more by Adeline's contrasted behaviour towards others, in the society in which they moved, and especially towards Ray, in her own home and everywhere abroad—rather than by any absolute designed injury to him. She gave him no preference, it was plain; and though his own languageless and motionless bearing might seem justly to incur and invoke indifference, yet he keenly remembered the warmth of her first attachment, ere he had not burdened her with his monotony, nor chilled her by his stillness; and his earnestness darkened now, indeed, into melancholy—then soon into a deeper part of sorrow's pit—to anguish and to woe.

"I love her, but she is tired of me!" said Henry to Ray, with a groan. "I thought I knew her heart or I never would have asked a sacrifice. O, Ray, Ray Morville! my good fortune has deserted me at last!" And he bowed his head on his friend's shoulder.

"Not so fast, Henry, the remedy is easy—at least you should try it. You know your reserve is irksome to her. Try and be more volatile—can't you?"

"Do you think that that would win her back?" asked Henry, looking up with the expression of a doomed man suddenly offered a gleam of hope.

"She has not to be won back, Henry, but to see some sign on your part, beyond mere formal duties, that you are as devoted as you wish her to be to you. Throw off this cold reserve, and put on plenty of boyish good humor. If I were a woman, and my husband should sit like a tombstone in the house, I'd break his heart, no matter if he did praise me when he spoke—his words would seem like a complimentary epitaph."

Ray assumed a jocularity he did not feel, and prevailed on his friend to make the attempt.

But it failed. Adeline wondered at her husband's unnatural liveliness, too forced to be mistaken for reality; and the sought response came not. She was still cold. He had frozen her into respect—and out of her respect she pitied him! She was herself to be pitied.

"I know that Henry loves me," she would bitterly reflect; "but all his worth and love are nothing compared with Ray. But Ray loves me not!"

The excitement of his mind threw Ferrisom into a brain fever. And was his partner at his bedside? It would be doing violence to a divine attribute of female nature to say she was not, as well as believing a character so eminently tender as hers. That very susceptibility of soul which made her husband's cold manner so fatal to their peace, now that he was on the couch of sickness, made her night and day a constant watcher.

Ray, also, was faithful to his bedside, and oft in the lonely vigils of night, they listened to the incoherent ravings of the slumberer.

Here the kindnesses of the steadfast friend to her helpless husband, made Ray still more loveable in the eyes of the wife.

Skillful treatment, and, perhaps more than any medical potion, the compassionate attention of Adeline, soon brought Ferrison to a state of convalescence. Ere this, however, was known to have taken place, one night, as the sick man was supposed to be in a deep slumber, or unconscious, if awake, Adeline and Ray were conversing together, in a low tone, as to his recovery.

"And what if he should die?" said Ray. "You would be wretched then."

The wife looked into his eyes with a fixed stare, and placing her warm hand firmly on his, replied: "For a time!"

"Always, Adeline."

"You are wrong," she said; "for I do not love him as perhaps I should. I cannot help it, Ray. I know he will go to heaven if he dies, but though he is so worthy, I should deplore him only as a friend. You know that genuine love cannot have two objects."

"But you have not two?" said Ray, anticipating, and half-dreading, yet wishing the avowal.

"I have but one—and that is you!" she faltered, hiding her face in tears. "O, Ray Morville, are you blind, or unwilling to believe it, when you have seen so much of me, and how differently I have regarded you? Forgive me! but my long suffering is my excuse for revealing what has seared my brain, and almost seemed to burst my heart, for many unhappy days!"

Honor! Friendship! How few know what you are! In Ray Morville's bosom you dwelt secure and stainless, and triumphed even over a love as pure! She had confessed, and he rejected her, with a heroism so sublime and mournful, that even she seemed unworthy of him then. Concealing his real feelings, he replied, taking her hand respectfully in his:

"I have long imagined this, and O, Mrs. Ferrison, heed me well! Do not any longer harbor any feeling save that of sisterly affection for me. It would be casting your life away upon a hopeless rock. Consider Henry, the ties of marriage, his love for you, and my friendship for him. Nothing but death, can obliterate that, though we should live for a century, and see all about us that was dear crumbling and deserting me in consequence. Go on, Adeline, in honorable union, without yielding to a sentiment which is fraught with sorrow and uselessness, and to which I cannot respond!"

He gently released her hand, and the wretched and now utterly despairing woman veiled her pale visage, and bowed her head upon her lap.

In his own agony, Morville arose involuntarily and paced the room rapidly.

"I must not let her know how much I love her. O, torture! It would kill Henry to know she loved another, and that other, me! his friend."

Henry grew well, but he was never happy more. He had heard all which passed at that frightful revelation, an invalid witness of his rich heart's bankruptcy. The great shock which stranded him forever, did not betray his knowledge of what had passed, till quick consumption carried his spirit again to the verge of death.

"My wife!—my friend!—let me take your hands before I die—join them," said the dying Henry. "I am going," he continued, with a faint smile, "where, in the midst of perpetual peace I shall watch over you. It is my wish that a union, which I feel my death is a boon to you both to create, will serve as no transitory blessing to you—as mine was; Adeline, love, I heard your avowal to Ray. I could not blame you. Mine was the deficiency, not yours. Love Ray, with a love as steadfast as his friendship was for me."

The three spirits clasped hands, and ere they were unlocked, death had gone away with one.

FORREST AND THE COLORED ACTOR.

Recently, our distinguished tragedian was playing an engagement at Baltimore. One morning, while at breakfast, the colored gentleman who waited on him thus addressed him:

"Massa Forrest, I seed you play Virginus de odder night—I golly, you played him right up to de handle. I tink dat play just as good as Hamlet. Was it writ by de same man?"

"O, no," said the tragedian, amused at the communicative spirit of his sable friend, "Hamlet was written by Shakspeare, and Virginus by Knowles."

"Well," said the waiter, "dey's bofe mighty smart fellers. Ise an actor myself."

"You?" said the astonished tragedian; "why, where do you play?"

"Down in de 'sembly rooms," was the reply. "Weese got a theatre, stage, and scenery, and dresses, and eberyting all right. We plays dere beautiful."

"What have you ever played?"

"Why, Ise played Hamlet, and Polonius, and de Grabe Digger, all in de same piece."

"How do you manage to rehearse?"

"Why, we waits till de work is done, den we all goes down to de kitchen and rehearses."

"But what do you do for ladies?" said Mr. Forrest.

"Ah, dar we stick! We can't get no ladies."

"Why, wont de colored ladies play?"

"O, no," said the colored actor, "de colored ladies tink it too degrading."

The great tragedian asked no more questions.

IMPROMPTU.

BY G. B. STAIS.

I love whate'er is beautiful,
 The summer flowers that fling
 Their perfume to the passing gale,
 The crystal mountain spring,
 The trees arrayed in robes of green,
 The sunlight on the sea,
 And insects glistening in its rays,
 Are beautiful to me.

I love whate'er is musical,
 In summer's genial hours;
 The breeze, that makes low melody
 Among the trees and flowers,
 The birds that trill their happy notes,
 The rills that sing in glee,
 The voice of youth in happiness,
 Are musical to me.

I love whate'er is innocent—
 A heart unstained by guile,
 Is more than simple beauty owns,
 And more than music's wile;
 'Tis a far richer offering,
 And prised far more shall be,
 Than what in life is beautiful
 Or musical to me.

THE WEDDING.

BY FREDERICK W. SAUNDERS.

It is possible it may not be known to the world at large that my friend and chummy, T. Tompkins, Esq., has been for a long time "paying attention" to a young lady of this city, Miss Mary Smithers, with the avowed intention of some day making her Mrs. T. Tompkins. But however ignorant the community generally may have been of this important fact, it was no secret to me, and I was therefore not so completely overcome and bewildered with surprise and astonishment as you yourself doubtless would have been, upon learning that matters were coming to a crisis.

It was morn. The glorious orb of day rolled in unclouded splendor through the azure heavens, flooding with its golden light the—the—the things. That is to say, it was not far from ten o'clock, A. M., when a slow and hesitating foot-fall was heard on the fourth flight of stairs leading to my room. I did not recognize the step—it was wholly unfamiliar; and I started with alarm to make my exit by the back way. But a moment's thought convinced me that it was not the tramp of a creditor; so settling back into my chair, I awaited further developments.

The faltering step paused upon reaching the head of the stairs, and many seconds elapsed before the door was slowly and hesitatingly opened and Tompkins himself stalked into the room. Without uttering a word, or raising his eyes from the floor, he marched across the apartment, seated himself in my extra chair, and in silence gazed fixedly into the empty coal hod. I was petrified with astonishment at this unlooked for change in his demeanor. That he, who was naturally the most impetuous of mortals, should have suddenly become so sedate, filled me with wonder; and I sat for some minutes gazing stupidly at him with my under jaw depending in a graceful attitude of astonishment. There was nothing about his person to give me a clue to the mystery. His face presented that total absence of any expression for which he is remarkable, and his listless air generally gave no token. As I was about to break the prolonged silence, he ejaculated, without raising his head or moving a muscle, the two words, "H've Jinx."

"What in the name of all that's sheepish and sulky, has come to you, Tompkins?" I inquired, hitching my chair round opposite my friend.

"Why, the fact is, I'm in—in trouble. No, I don't mean trouble exactly; what I mean is that I'm—I'm troubled."

"What is it, Tompkins? debts, creditors—anything of that sort? As far as money is concerned, you know you can always depend upon me for ten, twenty, or even twenty-five cents, in case of necessity."

"No, Jinx, 'tisn't anything of that sort," returned Tompkins, twisting uneasily in his chair for a few minutes; then turning very red in the face and making a strong effort, he placed his hands upon his knees in a determined manner, looked me square in the eyes, and stammered: "The fact is, Jinx, I'm going to be—you know—I'm going to be—what d'ye call it?—married."

And with the air of a man who has relieved himself of a great burden, he threw up his head and looked fixedly at me, evidently expecting some tremendous demonstration of surprise on my part. Not being in the least surprised, I made no such demonstration. But as he continued to fix his eyes upon me, I came to the conclusion, after a silence of several minutes, that it would be best to gratify him in that particular. So I ejaculated, in a tone betokening no particle of emotion:

"Pshaw! You don't say so?"

"Fact," he responded, with a shade of sadness.

"When is it to be, Tompkins? and what the deuce is the use of looking so sheepish about it?"

"Do I look sheepish?" he asked, abstractedly.

"Do you? Why, you look fitter to bleat and wear a woolly tail, than to sit there talking of marriage."

"I almost wish I was a little innocent lambkin, Jinx. It's a terrible thing, this getting married, I tell you. Not that I have any fears as to Mary and happiness and that. It's the fuss and confusion and everything, that's doing my business for me. I don't see how the women can stand it, for my part. But they do; they rather seem to like it, than otherwise. There's Mary and her mother and no end of old maid aunts, turning the house upside down with making lots and lots of lace abominations, and all manner of concerns, out of white cloth and things; you'd think they were going to establish a needlewoman's friend society, or something, if you were to look into the house. I wanted to make a sort of runaway match of it, and do the thing quietly; but Mary wouldn't listen to it; she wanted the affair to go off with clat, she said. After waiting all these years for me to come to the point, she was not going to have 'this thing done in a corner;' she wasn't going to hide her light under a bushel, nor a barrel either, not she. So I consented, and you see what's come of it. Instead of the quiet, comfortable time I expected to have with Mary up at the house, I can't catch sight of her five minutes at a time, day or night. And if I go to the house, they set me at work writing nonsensical notes to every man, woman and child in the United States, I believe, and running errands and things, and nose me about as though I was of no account, till I feel of about as much consequence as a little yellow dog that everybody thinks in the way. I s'pose things will get better when the thing is done, but they are getting worse and worse now. I wish I could take chloroform, or something, and stay so till it's all over;" and my poor friend again clapping his eyes into the coal-hod, began "sighing like furnace."

I felt for Tompkins, and would gladly have offered some consolation. But what could I say? Of what use were words, in a case like this, with the stern and impending reality staring him in the face.

"If there's anything I can do for you, Tompkins, you know no one would do it sooner."

"Yes, I know it, Jinx; you was always a good fellow," he returned with emotion, as he grasped my hand. "I s'pose there are a good many things you might do, if I only knew what they were. You see I'm green in this business. I never had any practice before, you know."

"Have you got all your little diddy fixings and things?"

Tompkins nodded.

"Then all you want is to have your friends there, and somebody to stand up with you, to keep you in countenance. I and the rest of the boys will be on hand, and everything will go off like a new broom. You'll get through it well enough, Tompkins, my boy," I added, encouragingly, hitting him a slap on the shoulder to raise his spirits.

"Mebbe we shall," he responded doubtfully, pushing his hat as far on to his head as it could possibly be made to go; and with a slow and lingering step, as though he were quitting his last stronghold of safety, he silently departed.

I saw nothing more of my friend for some days, but received quite a number of spasmodic notes from him, by which I learned that I was not only to "stand up with him," but to make my appearance early at the house of the bride's mother, to make myself generally useful, as circumstances might require.

Early in the afternoon of the appointed and important day, I placed a pair of new patent leather boots on the upper, outside steps of Mrs. Smithers's residence, and twitching the silver-plated bell-pull, was admitted. Great indeed had been the change since my last visit. The house had been literally turned out of doors, as Tompkins had said. New carpets had been put down and new curtains had been put up. New furniture had been put in in great quantities, and old friends had been put out in great numbers, because their advice had not been taken in the matter. Indeed, the whole interior of the house presented a scene of bustle and confusion extremely agonizing to a quiet single gentleman, like myself. With a sigh of pity for my poor friend, I instituted inquiries as to his whereabouts, and was shown up three flights of stairs to a little room on the fourth floor.

"Walk in!" responded a dismal voice, in reply to my "tapping at the chamber door."

Entering the room, I beheld dimly through a dense cloud of cigar smoke, the forms of Tompkins and our mutual friend Captain George Booth.

"How fare ye, Jinx, my boy? 'pears you've come to time, after all; we'd begun to fear you're going to back down," exclaimed Booth, extending towards me, through the smoke, a powerful paw, which I grasped and wiggled feebly for a moment. "How goes it, Tompkins? Why don't you spunk up, you great dough-head? The worst of it's over now," he continued, fetching Tompkins a series of pokes in the ribs.

"I dunno 'bout that; 'seasy nuf for you chaps to talk, coz you haint got to face the music. You see everything is so much different from what I had supposed, that it rather takes me down. I always thought that when a chap and a gal made up their minds to commit matrimony, they were the ones most interested, and the most important ones in the play, without it might be the parson. But 'taint so. There's Mary and her mother and all the family are tucked away in that little room, across the entry, in less space than would be allowed them in the State prison, while all the rest of the house is given up to accommodate other people. There's all the lower floor stripped of every particle of furniture, without it may be the carpets and curtains, to make room for callers in the evening, when for my part I'd give 'em fifty dollars apiece to stay away altogether. Then there's another room to hold Mary's—what do ye call it? you know, that French concern, things that her friends give her, and two more rooms with tables for the champagne and cake and stuff, beside a ladies' drawing room and a gentlemen's drawing-room, and I dunno what else. Then they've had to get all their feed out of the house, because the kitchen was wanted for something else. As for Mary, I shall have to get somebody to give me an introduction to her, I haven't seen her for such a while. She's been so busy racing about that she's used herself all up, and wont be fit to move for a month; and sights of people that I never heard tell of before are rushing in and out of the house as though there was a fire. If I was a stranger in the house, and didn't know anything about the circumstances, I should suppose that some two or three hundred friends of the family were going to get married to day, and that Mary and myself had come here on a visit and wasn't no ways welcome."

At this stage of my friend's lamentations, some one rapped at the door and informed us it was time to get ready to go to the church. Dropping our cigars and drawing on our white kids, we descended in our black dress coats and grass-colored breeches, to the parlor, where the female delegation was drawn up in battle array. The carriages were already at the door, and in mournful silence we commenced the embarkation. In the first coach rode Mr. T. Tompkins, Miss Mary Smithers, Miss Carrie Grummet, first bridesmaid, and Mr. Aristides Jinx, Esquire, first groom. The second carriage contained the bodies of Captain George Booth, second groom, Miss Angepina Something-or-other, second bridesmaid, Mrs. Smithers the mother in Israel, and old Uncle Somebody, who was to give the bride away; and this was the order of our going.

During the ride Mr. Tompkins maintained a profound silence, while his features assumed a deep yellow hue, or pallor, as he called it; and seated at the opposite extremity of the back seat, he seemed rather afraid than otherwise of his intended bride, who was herself deeply absorbed in the arrangement of her ribbons and laces. This conduct on the part of Tompkins was in startling contrast to the excessively fraternal manner in which Mr. Jinx conducted himself towards Miss Carrie Grummet, who for some cause or other nestled about very briskly indeed, though to do Mr. Jinx justice, that gentleman did not allow her much room to nestle in.

The church being situated at just no distance at all from Mrs. Smithers's residence, it is not surprising that we arrived at that sacred and dingy edifice in a proportionately limited period. It was an exciting moment as we alighted from the carriages amid a throng of noisy and tattered, though youthful exiles from the

—"Swate Emerald Isle,
Where there's no sarpinte to bite or beguile," and who cheered derisively as we entered the gloomy portal. The house was filled to overflowing with the friends of the parties, who with the customary impudence displayed upon such occasions, stared intently into the faces of the bride, the bridegroom and us their accomplices, as we trampled up the aisle. The shadow of confidence that poor Tompkins had until this time kept up, now completely deserted him as we got fairly into the body of the church. Still no serious misadventure occurred, if we except the fact that at the door Tompkins, doubtful who should go first, hesitated somewhat, while Booth and myself, anxious to set him right, gave him a push forward, both of which directing shoves coming at the same moment, caused him to nearly lose his equilibrium, recovering from which, he rushed towards the altar with such impetuosity that the bride elect was forced to almost run to keep up with her impatient lord, while we followed in a rapid, irregular single file some distance behind.

Half way up the aisle, recovering somewhat from his confusion, he checked himself suddenly, while Mary, herself rather bewildered and ignorant, of course, of his intention to abate his speed, shot quickly past him. Each perceiving the design of the other at the same instant, a change of plan took place, Mary halting while Tompkins accelerated his pace, when as a natural result, Mary being in advance, his foot came in contact with the hem of her dress, pinning it to the floor. A sharp, quick sound of rending stitches, a sudden bending backward of the bride and a halt of both parties, could of course result in nothing else than the sudden and violent bringing to a stand-still successively against each other's backs, of the rapidly advancing single file following in the rear. Disentangling ourselves from the confused mixing up of parties, we finally reached the chancel in somewhat more regular order, where Tompkins established himself on the left side, as was perfectly right and proper that he shouldn't.

The solemnity of the place, the expensive carpet, the venerable and high salaried clergyman in full canonicals, had a rather awe-inspiring effect even upon Booth and myself, though the girls behaved with heroic fortitude and appeared to be possessed of more presence of mind than usual. (There is nothing connected with a church, a parson or the marriage ceremony, that shall frighten your true woman, I promise you.)

As the clergyman in solemn tones commenced the service, Tompkins nerved himself for the undertaking, in which he was admirably seconded by Booth, who with his great thumb and finger bestowed a succession of pinches upon him "to put him in spunk and make him feel his oats," as he himself said in his coarse horse talk.

"Who giveth this woman to be married to this man?" asked the priest, in an impressive manner.

"I do," responded Tompkins, not rightly comprehending the question, and thinking he must assent to everything; and his agony was painful to witness when old Uncle Somebody hobbled up and performed the office of giving away the bride.

Again the service proceeded; hands had twice been given by the happy pair, when the clergyman paused, looking inquiringly at Tompkins, who being wholly absorbed in tracing with the toe of his boot the figures on the carpet, of course did not notice.

"The ring, if you please, sir," whispered the parson, after a silence of a minute or two.

"O! Ah, yes, the ring; certainly, of course," ejaculated Tompkins, with an amount of energy which the occasion by no means demanded; and with a sudden start, he dove the fingers of both hands into the corresponding vest pockets, thereby bringing both elbows into violent contact with the ribs of Booth and the bride, who stood close upon either side.

After a prolonged fumbling in the vest pockets, the search was transferred to the coat pockets, then to the breeches, and again to the vest, from which a small paper parcel was eventually fished up, and being clumsily unrolled by his white kid fingers, the desired emblematic hoop no sooner glittered in the gaslight, than with a light tinkling sound it rolled among the gaiter boots of the bridesmaids.

In dire confusion, Tompkins dove after his property, and would doubtless, like the woman in the Scriptures, have searched diligently until he found it, had not Mary, taking advantage of his stooping position, seized him by that portion of his dress coat which descends below the waist, and by a quiet though effectual movement brought him again to his feet and her side, when presenting the clergyman with a ring of her own, the service proceeded to a happy termination. And now commenced that unaccountable scene which may sometimes be observed upon the occasion of a wedding. No sooner is the ceremony completed, than a wailing sound is heard to proceed from behind Mrs. Smithers's handkerchief, whereupon the bridesmaids feel it their duty to grab hold of the bride with one hand, while with the other they apply a handkerchief to the facial regions, and clustering in a bunch about the victim, sob up against the sides of each others' heads. An audible buzzing arises from the people in the pews; the grooms fidget about, looking profoundly foolish, and Tompkins with a bewildering and misty conviction that he has somehow wrecked the happiness of the entire Smithers family, even unto the third and fourth generations, hastily approaches the parson and delivers an envelope, which that reverend functionary receiving with a smile and a bow, pockets with an air of satisfaction—though if the truth must be told, it is to be presumed he was less satisfied upon discovering what Tompkins also discovered the ensuing morning, that instead of delivering the envelope in which he had enclosed a twenty-dollar note, he had in his confusion unwittingly presented a similar envelope containing a severe letter from an old flame, in which she upbraided him for his inconstancy, and even went so far as to threaten "proceedings." However, that was no great misfortune; indeed, it was a positive benefit, being the means of saving a good ten-dollar note to Tompkins, for upon rectifying the mistake next day, he was struck with the idea—which had somehow not occurred to him before—that ten dollars was quite enough for a marriage fee, that any more was positive extravagance, which sum he accordingly paid.

The customary proceedings upon the evening of a bridal party are too well known to require a detailed account. We—that is, the principals and their immediate accessories—of course drove at once to the house of the bride's mother.

Tompkins and wife and the bridesmaids station themselves at the head of the reception-room, while Booth and myself station ourselves at the door, a span of impromptu footmen. A carriage drives up, another dittoes; the bell rings; more carriages come fast and faster; the bell rings incessantly, while the callers are led up by ones and twos and sixes, to be introduced to the bride, though they may have known her since she was a troublesome, hateful little girl; a few words, which neither understand, passes between them, and the callers debouch upon the floor. The rooms are filled to suffocation; there are no seats—of course, the people group themselves in every possible position; the confused and commingled chatter of female tongues, the flirting of fans, the shaking and dropping of handkerchiefs, together with the swaying and moving of the crowd, is bewildering.

The gentlemen bow and squirm and grin and talk contemptible nonsense, until a new phase is observable. Numbers of white jackets, each containing a "cullud pusson," rush hastily up and down stairs; a slight movement is perceptible near the door; the movement extends, the whole throng is in motion and rushing through the hall towards another apartment, where refreshments are laid out. Multitudes of champagne corks ricochet across the room, and a rattling volley, like feeble musketry, hails the entrance of the invaders; wine disappears, cake vanishes, grapes are nowhere, oysters ditto, ices are treated coldly, more wine passeth from sight, the chattering, the giggling, the buzzing waxes fast and furious. Suddenly a pause; "cullud pussons" again race up and down stairs, hats are brought, cloaks are brought, shawls are brought, everything is brought, a carriage rolls up, sable footman calls out from the door, "Mr. Queerquirk's carriage, sah," another and another follows, until none are left save the happy bride and bridegroom, their immediate family and Messrs. Jinx and Booth.

It would scarcely be of sufficient interest to the general reader to investigate thoroughly, and sift to the bottom the further events of the evening. Of course there are the lights to be put out, the tables to clear, the doors to lock and other trifles, but we will not pursue them. Let it suffice that Booth and myself adjourned to my apartment, where, feeling it our duty to celebrate the happy event, we sat up until a very late and noisy hour of the night, during which we punished at least half a dozen bottles of—of—cigars, from the effects of which we were sewed up with a severe headache all the next day.

It takes a lifetime to learn how to live.

SYMPATHY FOR THE FALLEN.

For my part, I confess I have not the heart to take an offending man or woman from the general crowd of sinful, erring beings, and judge them harshly. The little I have seen of the world and know of the history of mankind, teaches me to look upon the errors of others in sorrow, not anger. When I take the history of one poor heart that has sinned and suffered, and represent to myself the struggles and temptations it has passed, the brief pulsations of joy, the feverish inquietude of hope and fear, the tears of regret, the feebleness of purpose, the pressure of want, the desertion of friends, the scorn of the world that has but little charity, the desolation of the soul's sanctuary, and threatening voice within, health gone, even hope that stays longest with us, gone, I have little heart for aught else but thankfulness that it is not so with me, and would fain leave the erring soul of my fellow-being with Him from whose hand it came,

"Even as a little child, Weeping and laughing in its childish sport."
—Home Journal.

A SAD STORY.

The saddest story that we ever read was that of a little child in Switzerland, a pet boy, just as yours is, reader, whom his mother, one bright morning, rigged out in a beautiful jacket, all shining with silk and buttons, and gay as a mother's love could make it, and then permitted him to go out to play. He had scarcely stepped from the door of the "Swiss cottage," when an enormous eagle swooped toward the earth and bore him to its nest, high up among the mountains and yet within sight of the house of which he had been the joy. There he was killed and devoured, the eyrie being at a point which was literally inaccessible to man, so that no relief could be afforded. In tearing the child to pieces, the eagle so placed the gay jacket in the nest, that it became a fixture there, and whenever the wind blew, it would flutter, and the sun would shine upon its lovely trimmings and ornaments. For years it was visible from the low lands, long after the eagle had abandoned the nest. What a sight it must have been to the parents of the victim!—Herald.

UNEXPECTED RISE IN PRICES.

A gentleman with a simple mind the other day ordered a late dinner at Harris's, in Wilson's Lane, when a stranger entered at that moment, and took a seat opposite him. The good cheer superinduced a lively chat, and the stranger discoursed largely upon the high prices of food, and mentioned incidentally that a further rise was soon to be expected. Each of the feeders received the medallion-like ticket which told how much he had ordered, and the stranger, after hurriedly eating, paid and disappeared. The gentleman with the simple mind was surprised to hear of another rise in prices, and when he went to the counter to settle was still more astonished to find that rise had already commenced—for the stranger during the conversation had shifted the coins, taking his ticket (18 cents) and left him the other (37 1-2). This kind of rise in prices made him wish he had risen quicker himself.—Boston Post.

CROWNING OF THE MAY QUEEN.

BY FRANCIS M. CHEESBRO.

Come, sister fairies, come,
And weave a wreath of flowers,
Fresh from forest shade,
Sweet with April showers.
We'll sing and dance around,
A merry, happy band,
Joy and mirth we'll wake
With our fairy wand.

Of the sweet May flowers
A dainty wreath we'll bind,
To crown our lovely queen,
Fairest of our kind.
Each little fairy, come,
With dew-besprinkled feet,
A rosy offering bring,
Around this altar meet.

O, lovely fairy queen,
Receive our crown of flowers,
Bend low thy queenly brow,
Receive our simple dower.
Sisters, one and all,
Of our merry band,
Salute the Queen of May,
Queen of fairy land.

A LEGEND OF THE RHINE.

BY H. GILBERT.

"I know not how the truth may be,
I tell the tale as 'twas told to me."

I WAS spending a few weeks on the banks of the Rhine. Having plenty of leisure at my command, and entertaining a most hearty contempt for that system of "doing" sights, so prevalent among the would-be travellers of now-a-days, I had determined to spend some time with "mine host," who, by the way, was a perfect specimen of his kind, and to explore alone, and at my leisure, the principal spots of interest in the neighborhood. I love to wander in the woods, among the rocks and waterfalls, with my thoughts for my only companions; and here, the wild, romantic scenery, and the unaccustomed picturesqueness of the landscape, accorded so perfectly with all my feelings, as to bind me with a spell even stronger than I could have dreamed of. For days I had intended to depart, and for days I had been delaying my departure. I had wandered, day after day, in every direction, to every place which seemed to promise an adequate return in instruction and amusement, and day after day had I been charmed with new novelties, with new beauties. But I had, at last, nerved myself to leave all that had so strongly attracted me, and the next day but one was fixed for my departure. The next day, which was to be the last of my stay, I intended to pay a last visit to my favorite resorts, and to bid an eternal farewell to spots and scenes which had become, within the last week, as old familiar friends. Accordingly, early the next morning I started off. Absorbed in deep reflection, mingled with a quiet tinge of sadness, I wandered on, unconsciously, further than I had intended, and in a direction which I had never taken before. Suddenly, on looking up, I was startled at seeing immediately in front of me, on a broad plateau which overhung the waters of the "castled river," one of those ruined piles, which speak to us more eloquently than words could do of glories past away, and which, even in their decay and desolation, have about them something of grandeur and sublimity which insensibly commands our love and admiration. It was one of those, of which Byron has said :

"Each ivied arch and pillar lone, Pleads haughtily for glories gone."

Why this old ruin should have struck my fancy more than many others I have seen, I cannot tell. Yet, whether from the suddenness of the apparition, or whether the ruins were in reality grander or more picturesque than others of the kind, I know not, but certainly I felt, for an instant, emotions entirely new. I was soon lost in exploration. The roof and stairs of the high tower had fallen in, so as to give, as from the bottom of a deep well, an uninterrupted view of the bright blue sky beyond. A few timbers of the old drawbridge yet from their rusted hinges hung creaking on the walls. The old moat had long since been dry, and choked with weeds. In the court-yard, the rank grass and the thistle, with the deadly nightshade, held undisputed sway; and as I trod the long deserted rooms, the old decaying tapestry which still hung, tattered, on the walls, waved ominously, as if in horror of the desecration, and the high arched roof and vaulted aisles gave back strange echoes to my solemn tread.

Attached to the main building, but scarcely seeming a part of it, was what from its gothic windows I took to be a chapel. The ivy, like a tried friend in adversity, still clung to it lovingly, in its decay. Its rich, exuberant masses hung, drooping, from the walls, and where the roof had fallen in, the ivy, too, had crept over the roofless side, and hung in wreathing festoons to the very floor. The toad sat sweltering under the crumbling altar-stone, and the bat slept in the crevices of the mouldering walls. But what struck me most of all was a strange rent, of about a yard wide, in the two opposite sides of the structure. It seemed as if the building had been cut asunder in the middle, and the parts then separated. I spent some time in conjecture as to what might be the cause of this strange phenomenon, and at last, not being able to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion, I wisely determined to forget it entirely. Then I set myself to work to explore every nook and corner of the old ruin, and was still busily employed, when the stirring of the bats and the descending nightfall warned me home.

On my return, I related to "mine host" my day's experience, and inquired of him what might be the history of the old castle, for I was sure there must be some quaint old legend connected therewith.

"Ah, Mein Herr," said he, "there is indeed a legend connected with that old castle, and, in sooth, a strange and fearful one, but wait until after supper, and you shall hear it."

So, after a most glorious meal, for which my day's experience had given me an unwonted appetite, we took our pipes, and reclining on a large bench by the door, "mine host" told me the following tale, which, as I have forgotten the narrator's own quaint language, I will endeavor to dress up in a style of my own:

"Proud, stern and passionate was the old Count Von G. Full fourscore winters had blanched what still remained of his once raven hair, but the brightness of his yet piercing eye, and his stalwart form, which, still unbent, seemed but to scorn the weight of years, gave token that the fire of his youth had not yet all passed away. His nervous arm could still strike a blow which would not have shamed his younger days, and, sooth to say, few who valued their lives at an hour's purchase, would have dared a passage at arms with the old Count Von G. When he appeared in public, which happened but seldom, he was regarded by the peasantry with a mingled feeling of awe and terror.

"There was, too, a strange tale that once upon a wild, tempestuous night, a stranger dight in sable, coat of mail, with mailed head and visor down, upon a steed dark as the night itself, rode into the court-yard of the castle, and imperatively demanded to speak with the count. He was shown to the old count's chamber. Long and earnestly did they confer together, the stranger and the count, and an inquisitive menial, watching at the key-hole, saw the count, as he averred to the day of his death, sign a large strip of parchment with his blood. Immediately the stranger rose, took up the parchment, and folding it, deposited it in his bosom; then turning, and descending to the court-yard, he mounted his steed, and disappearing like air, was never seen more. Be that as it may, however, certain it is that all night long a red, unearthly light streamed from the old count's window, in the top of the tower, and tinged with its lurid glow the heaving waters of the dark blue river. And the old servitor often heard strange voices and sounds within, and as he heard, he crossed himself and prayed the Holy Virgin to deliver him from the power of all demons and evil spirits.

"But stern and mysterious as was the old Count Von G., there was one spot in his breast which was yet soft and green as in his younger days. Start not, gentle reader, when I tell you that the old count was in love—yes, desperately, passionately in love. Those fountains of his heart which he had thought long since sealed up forever, were re-opened, and the living waters gushed forth afresh. The pretty Therese, the loveliest maiden in all the country round, whose sparkling eye and whose cheek, which seemed as though it had stolen its color from the clouds of the morning, were the admiration of all the youths and the envy of all the maidens, had warmed his breast again into a fresh reviving life. He had met her in one of his rambles in the forest, and her rare beauty at once touched a chord in his breast which he had thought long since unstrung, while her natural grace of manner, and the quaint commixture of fearlessness and respect with which she answered all his questions, and which was so different from the undisguised terror which usually greeted his appearance, completed the charm. Long did he linger, as if unwilling to depart. Many an idle question did the pretty maiden have to answer, and when the old count turned to go, he had inwardly determined to transplant this woodland flower to blossom in his lonely castle, and to make her his bride the Countess Von G.

"But the French proverb says, 'L'homme propose, mais Dieu dispose;' and in nothing is this more true than in love affairs. The little winged god had determined matters otherwise, for, with a love quite as intense as the old count's passion, and far more deep and pure, did the pretty Therese love the young Paul Ebenhart. In fact, they were already betrothed, and an early day had been fixed for their nuptials. And her choice was not misplaced; for a brighter eye, a stronger arm, and best of all, a nobler soul, was not to be found in many a mile. He was handsome, too, and the neighbors used to say that a handsomer couple than Paul and Therese had not been known in the village within the memory of man. There was not a house in the village where they were not as welcome as in their own. All loved them, old and young. The young looked forward with anticipations of intense delight to Therese's wedding-day, and the old, the sick and the infirm prayed God to spare their lives to see their darling's bridal.

"A change came over the old count. He spent less time at home; he was more abroad. Many an hour which had formerly been devoted to solitary self-confinement in the mysterious solitude of his own apartment, now found him with most persevering assiduity threading the woodland paths where he had first met the pretty Therese. But whether she had an intuitive presentiment of his feelings, or whether it was merely that her inclination seldom led her that way, certain it is that the old count wandered, vainly, many a weary day, ere another opportunity occurred to him. At last, one day when he had almost despaired of ever meeting her again, and was wondering if it would not be his wisest plan to go home and forget her entirely, and he had almost determined that this should be his last search, when lo, on turning an angle in the road, he saw her directly before him. She was gracefully reclining in the shade of an overhanging tree. Her cheek was resting on her hand, her hat was thrown carelessly beside her, and the wanton wind was toying with the rich masses of dark brown hair, which fell loosely over a neck and shoulders white as the Parian stone, and almost hid from view a faultlessly rounded arm in its jealous clusters. She was reading some quaint old romance of days gone by, and it must have been a tale of love and sorrow, for ever and anon a deeper flush tinged her already rosy cheek, and a gentle sigh escaped her heaving bosom.

"Long and silently did the old count gaze. He spoke not, moved not, scarcely breathed, lest he should disturb so beautiful a vision. He feared to see it vanish like a dream of an enchanted land. His wild love came quickly over him with tenfold power, and in the uncontrollable emotion, he made an involuntary step forward, which startled the maiden and caused her to look up. She seemed at first confused, but quickly recovering her self-possession, she bowed and rose to go. But the count detained her, and without any preparation, with a fervor and an eloquence well worthy of his youthful days, he poured into her ear his all-consuming passion. So startled and astonished was the maiden, that for some moments she could not comprehend his meaning; but as the truth suddenly flashed upon her, the rich blood suffused her face and neck for an instant, and then as quickly receded, leaving her as pale as a marble statue. She tottered, and would have fallen, had not the old count caught her in his arms. Immediately recovering herself, however, she boldly confessed her love for another, rejected his suit, and before he could detain her, she had vanished in the woods with the speed of a startled fawn.

"Motionless stood the old count until her retreating form had vanished. He had never dreamed of the possibility of a refusal. That he, whose high descent might match the noblest in the land, and of whose ancestral tree even princes might be proud, should be refused, and that, too, by a simple peasant girl! His whole spirit rose in arms, at the indignity. In violent agitation, he retraced his steps towards the castle, muttering with an oath, as he went, that Therese should be his bride!

"It was night. Moody and dull, the old count sat in his chamber. It was a quaint old room. The walls were hung with sable velvet, interwoven with tracery of gold. Around him lay massive tomes, with clasps of brass, mingled in strange array with implements of many a curious device. The floor was inscribed with many a mystic circle. A small furnace and crucible, with which he seemed to have been experimenting, were on the table before him, but now the fire was flickering low with an expiring flame. But he heeded it not. His head had sunk upon his breast, and he seemed lost in intense thought; and ever and anon he muttered to himself brokenly, as if in sleep. Suddenly he started up, and rang his bell violently. Scarcely had its last tones died away, when Gotthart, his old servitor, stood before him.

"'Gotthart,' said the count, 'thou knowest the pretty Therese, the beauty of the village?'

"Gotthart bowed.

"'Wouldst thou not like her for thy mistress, Gotthart?'

"Gotthart was astonished; but he knew his master too well to manifest any surprise, so he merely bowed again.

"'And she shall be!' cried the count. 'Listen, Gotthart: I love the maiden. I have loved her long and madly. To-day I told her all my love. She refused my hand, rejected my suit; to my face, she told me that she loved another! And now, by all that's good, mine shall she be before to-morrow night shall pass away. Dost hear, Gotthart? She must be mine! It matters not how, yet mine she must be! There are retainers enough in the castle.

Take them and go; and comest thou without her, thou knowest the rest. Now go; leave me!"

"Gotthart bowed and retired, and the old count was once more alone.

"We will pass over the sudden disappearance of Therese, and the terrible sorrow which, on the morrow, pervaded the whole village. It is not with that, that we have to do. Suffice it to say that the old servitor had proved himself capable of his mission, and that ere morning dawned, the pretty Therese was brought a prisoner to the castle.

"The nuptials were to take place on the following evening. A monk had been procured from a neighboring convent, and a bridal robe had been hastily put together by some of the female servants of the castle. The other preparations were but few. The menials of the castle were to be the only spectators. There was to be no pomp, no ceremony. There was to be no gorgeous bridal train, no joyous revelry, no merry dance, no music, and no song. It was to be only a quiet sacrifice of a sad, despairing victim.

"The captive spent the livelong day in prayers and tears. But the weariest day must come to an end at last, and as Therese sat by the window, and saw the great red sun sink down behind a portentous looking cloud, which was slowly looming up in the western horizon, she felt that her hour had almost come. Silently and unresistingly she submitted to the attentions of the maidens, who had come to deck her for the sacrifice. Calm and pale she stood, until the last fold was arranged in her snowy dress, the last flower tied to her raven hair!

"It was a fearful sight to see that young maiden, as she stood before the altar. Her glossy hair fell over a neck and throat so pale, that you scarce might tell where the satin dress met its snow-white marble. All traces of tears had been swept away, and as she stood, so pale, and yet so calm and firm, there was a strange expression in her eye, and a stern compression of her bloodless lips, which bore the token of some firm resolve. As she stood there, under the dark shadow of the old count's sternness, you might have thought some woodland flower, pale with cold, was peeping out from under the snows of winter.

"But the ceremony commenced. The deep, dark cloud, which had hung over the horizon at sunset, was pregnant of an approaching storm. The distant thunder muttered incessantly, and the lightning flashed with a lurid glare through the dimly lighted chapel. The first big drops were already falling heavily, one by one, upon the vaulted roof, mingling their pattering with the deep low growl of the approaching thunder. But they heeded it not. Uninterruptedly the ceremony proceeded, until the monk addressed to Therese the question whose answer was to bind her with the bond which no man may part asunder, when, to the astonishment of all present, turning her dark, wild eyes full upon the count, in a voice firm, indeed, but deep and unearthly, as though it might have been from a tomb, she answered:

"Thou hast torn me from my friends, my home, my kindred. Thou hast brought me here, before this altar, to pledge to thee that faith, that love and that obedience which I have vowed irrevocably to another. Thou canst do with me as thou wilt, yet, know, proud count, who warrest thus on women, that never, before God, will I be to thee a willing bride. And as God is my judge, before whom I stand, I summon thee to appear ere long before his bar, to answer this foul wrong which thou hast this day done to a weak, defenceless maiden."

"For some moments, all was still. The menials were horrified at her temerity. The count himself was disconcerted. At last he broke the silence.

"Mind not the silly, prating child, Sir Monk. She knows not what she wishes. Proceed! I may not brook delay."

"I may not, my lord," replied the monk. "In such a case, the laws of our holy church forbid it."

"And what care I for your holy church, Sir Monk? or for her laws?" replied the count. "I have sworn that this maiden shall be my bride to-night, and so she shall! Proceed, or it may not be well with thee!"

"They heard not the deepening thunder, as it advanced nearer and nearer. They marked not how the lightning shone at every flash with a ruddier glow.

"I may not, my lord," replied the monk.

"Thou wilt not?" asked the count, as a fearfully indescribable expression crept over his features.

"No, my lord."

"There was no answer. With one stride, the old count reached the monk. There was an uplifted hand, a blow, and the white-robed priest sunk quivering to the floor beside the altar, while a small crimson tide welled from his lips, and trickled in a dark, ominous stream slowly down the chancel steps.

"Aghast with horror, pale as sheeted ghosts, the trembling throng of menials stood in silence rooted to the ground. The old count, himself, stood as if petrified. Therese was white and motionless as a marble statue. The silence was so deep and awful that each drop of blood, as it fell trickling to the ground, sounded like iron hail. So dumb, so horrified, stood the affrighted throng, that they heard not a deep, dull, rumbling sound, as of distant thunder. On it came, nearer and nearer, till, with a flash which seemed as though the heavens had burst into flame, and with a crash which seemed to vibrate to the centre of the solid earth, it burst upon the castle. All fell in terror to the ground. How long they lay, they knew not; but when they rose, they found the walls of the chapel torn asunder in the manner described. The old count disappeared, and could nowhere be found. One of the menials asserted that, as he fell, he caught a glimpse of a coal-black steed, with fiery eyes and mane of flame, with a rider in a sable coat of mail, dash in at one side of the chapel, as its walls opened, and seizing the old knight by the waist, and placing him before him on his steed, disappear at the other. Be that as it may, the old count was never seen again. When they raised Therese, they found that life had fled. Every effort to restore her was unavailing.

"After the strange events of this fearful night," continued "mine host," "the castle was soon deserted. The ghost of the monk haunted the chapel, and ever on a stormy night, amid the howling of the wind and the pealing of the thunder, strange sounds were heard, as of the trampling of a fiery steed upon the chapel floor. The menials soon fled in terror. No one could be found to live there. After its desertion, the old castle gradually fell into decay. But tale and song, from aged sire to son, have still preserved its terrors; and even now, the belated peasant hurrying home at nightfall, often sees strange shapeless forms, and hears unearthly sounds, and, shuddering, he crosses himself and hurries on. And he would be, in sooth, a brave man, who would venture to pluck at midnight a leaf from the ivy which grows within that haunted chapel."

FACE, QUEEN ELIZABETH'S FOOL.

The professional "fools" by whom our ancestors were so much amused, were characterized as much by impertinence as wit. To put one person out of countenance afforded mirth to the rest. The womanly vanity and queenly pride of Elizabeth shrunk from these rude rebukes. She would not allow her fool, Face, because of his caustic vein, to enter her presence; but once being persuaded to have him in, "Come on, Face," said she, "now we shall hear of our faults." "I do not," he replied, "talk of that which all the town talks on." She never probably ventured to repeat the experiment.—Camp and Court.

ANECDOTE OF JEREMIAH MASON.

The late Mr. Mason, says the Boston Journal, was something of a giant in physical as well as mental proportions, and in youth must have possessed a powerful frame. While in the strength of early manhood, Mr. Mason happened one very cold day to be driving along a road in the country, half-buried up under buffalo robes, and looking rather insignificant to the casual observer—at least, so he appeared to an impudent teamster who approached in an opposite direction, occupying so large a portion of the road with his team that passing was a difficult matter for another vehicle. As they neared each other, Mason politely requested the teamster to turn out and give him room, but the saucy varlet, with an impudent look at the apparently small youth, peremptorily refused, and told him to turn out himself. Mr. Mason, who instantly perceived there was but one course to pursue, quietly stopped his horse, laid the reins over the dasher, and began to roll down the robes, at the same time drawing up his legs and rising gradually from his seat. The teamster silently watched these movements, but as the legs obtained a foundation, and foot after foot of Mr. Mason's mammoth proportions came into view, a look of astonishment, like a circle in the water, spread over his hitherto calm face, and with a deprecating gesture he presently exclaimed: "That'll do, stranger—don't rise any more; I'll turn out!"

Mr. Mason soon had the track to himself, and our bewildered teamster drove off at a brisk pace. "Creation!" said he, as he touched up the off leader with his whip: "I wonder how high that critter would have gone if I hadn't stopped him?"

PRICE OF OLD ALDERMEN.

A good thing is going the rounds about one of our new aldermen, which is related in this wise:

The grand jury summoned Ald. — before them, for the purpose of asking him some questions. He came before them, and the following conversation occurred:

"Ald. —, has any one ever offered you any money, in the shape of a bribe, since your election?"

"Yes, sir."

"Who was it?" said one of the grand jury.

"Mr. —."

"How much did he offer you?" inquired one of the other jurors.

"Twenty-five dollars," responded the alderman, with a curl of his lip.

"Did you take it?" said the foreman.

(Emphatically)—"No, sir!"

Mr. —, the briber, was sent for.

"Mr. —, did you offer Ald. — twenty-five dollars as a bribe for voting so and so?"

"Yes, sir."

"Did he take it?"

"No, sir."

"Why didn't he take it?" said one of the jurors, much surprised.

"Well, he said that he couldn't sell himself for twenty-five dollars, as that was the price of old aldermen—the new ones range higher!"—New York Despatch.

Money is well spent in purchasing tranquillity of mind.

A DREAM.

BY I. W. GANTON.

The night was fair, the gentle winds
Came sighing o'er my head;
And in their cadence seemed to sigh
A requiem o'er the dead.

I laid me down upon my bed,
And tried in vain to sleep;
For silently the tears rolled down
My pale and careworn cheek.

At length sweet slumber closed my eyes,
And to my restless brain
There came bright visions of the past,
Bright hopes to cheer again.

There stood beside my little bed
The idol of my youth,
The being whom I fondly thought
Was heaven, virtue, truth.

He clasped my hands within his own,
And placing on my cheek
A kiss so warm, I almost thought
Past days had come, so sweet.

I started from my restless sleep,
With a wild, joyous scream;
But ah! the treasured one had fled,
'Twas nothing but a dream.

THE BELT OF WAMPUM.

BY MRS. SOPHRONIA CURRIER.

AMONG the many legends I had the good fortune to hear from the lips of the old Indian, who, a year or two since favored our settlement with a visit while on a pilgrimage from the far west to the forests and prairies which had once been the hunting grounds of his fathers, none interested me more than his account of the feud which years ago existed between his people and a neighboring tribe of red men.

I wish I could repeat the legend in the lofty, impassioned style of the old Chippeway, but an attempt to do so would be futile; and my readers will understand how greatly the interest of the tale will be diminished, by the manner in which it is related.

Of the bitter hatreds and jealousies his people had ever cherished for their neighbors, said the old Indian, none had been so inveterate and absorbing as that which was felt for their brethren, the Hurons. The feud had its origin in the rivalry of the two young and beautiful wives of a mighty chief whose hunting grounds stretched from the Great Waters to the bay of Manitou. The chief was an old man and childless when he brought the young squaws to the wigwams he had built for them, and he promised to her who should first bare him a son, the sacred belt of wampum, which, it was believed, the mighty Manitou had given to the mother of the red man, and that her boy should sit in the lodge of his father, when the old chief went to the spirit-land. But, unfortunately for the old man and his people, on the same morning came the two young squaws to the wigwam of her lord, and placed upon the furs on which he reclined, each, her babe; and the two bright-eyed, dark-haired boys were equally healthy and promising.

Bitterly then the old man repented his promise; and his heart murmured: "Better that my people had been conquered by their enemies, than that their old chief should cause dissension among them!" But he kept his grief in his heart, and spoke kindly and hopefully to the women; and taking the little boys in his arms, he stretched the same great hand over the heads of both; and while a real peace succeeded to that forced calmness, he said in a prophetic tone, that the warring winds should aid those young saplings to beat each other to the earth, and that the sun would help them to drink up the dew and the rain, each from the other; but as they had but one root, so, when many moons had passed away, should they lift but one summit to the sky.

The young squaws, however, heard not the words of the chief, nor observed the kindness of the regard he bent upon his children. Regardless of his presence, they stood with eyes distended, and lips apart, glaring upon each other with the ferocity of wolves. There was no look of triumph on the face of either, only implacable hatred and revenge were there. Each was sensible that she could claim nothing that her rival was not entitled to; and without extending her hand for the belt of wampum, or making a request for her boy, the young mothers silently took their babes and returned to their wigwams. Time passed away, The old chief, too feeble longer to lead forth his people to war, sat in his wigwam, smoking the peace-pipes his sons had fashioned and ornamented with the eagle feathers they had scaled the precipices to gain, wrapping himself in the warm, rich furs, and feasting on the tender meats his boys had taken in the chase. His eye was darkened, and his ear was heavy, and he failed to perceive that though the youths were not destitute of filial affection, rivalry and hatred for each other, as much as anxiety for his comfort, excited them to such deeds of daring as distinguished them among the boldest hunters of the tribe. And their father gave his blessing equally to both, and the rival wives could not complain; for no sooner had one sat down an the turf beneath the oak tree which sheltered the lodge of her husband, and began to chant a song in praise of her boy, than the name of her rival's son, joined to some deed of prowess, would fall on her ear, and palsy her tongue. So the old man knew not what discord was in his family, and slowly and gently, as if borne in the arms of peace and love, he passed away to the land of the blest.

Seven days and nights sat the rival wives in the wigwam of the dead, tasting but the morsel of food necessary to support existence, and uttering their loud lamentations; but their eyes were not so blinded by tears that they did not see the handsome belt of wampum which the old chief had hung on the wall of his lodge when he brought home his young wives, and which had been designed for a present for one of them; nor their thoughts so entirely buried with the dead, that they forgot the council had met to deliberate which of the two sons of the old chief should lead forth the tribe to the chase and to war. Yet neither dared stretch forth her hand to that coveted belt, nor carry to the council a plea in favor of her son; but on the evening of the seventh day of the mourning of the women, and the deliberations of the men, when no signs of the termination of either appeared, Ojibway, one of the two rival youths, armed with his war club and his hatchet, entered the wigwam where his mother sat, with her garment disarranged and her hair dishevelled, and seizing the belt of wampum, bound it about her waist, and leading her forth from the lodge, he confronted the band of braves, who, fearing some mischief, had risen from the council, and followed him to the wigwam.

Some admired the daring courage of Ojibway, and arranged themselves about him; and others, sympathizing with Huron in his disappointment and rage, drew near him, silently; but their brows were clouded and their hands clenched. The two parties thus formed, were very nearly equal, both in numbers and strength, and all were armed with their war clubs, for it had been expected that the termination of the affair would not be bloodless; but the good sense of the old men, for the time, prevailed, and one after another dropped his weapons to the earth, and stood with folded arms; and the rival youths, after one glance at each other, the meaning of which was unmistakable, simultaneously stretched forth their hands, the one towards the west and the other towards the east.

"When three moons shall have passed away, my people!" said Huron to the band who had gathered around him, "your chief shall sit in the lodge of his father!"

"Short time for the crow to usurp the nest of the eagle!" said Ojibway.

And so they parted; but neither of the two youths ever returned to the lodge of his father. The smoke from the wigwam of Ojibway rolled up through the feathery branches of the tall evergreens which bordered the beautiful Chippeway, or, as the young chief and his people called it, the Ojibway; while Huron, believing he should thus secure to himself the favor of the Great Spirit, built for himself and his mother a dwelling on one of the Manitou islands. No nearer than on the very confines of their hunting-grounds were the cabins erected, lest, so the young chiefs declared, the smoke from their wigwams should mingle. But fearful were the struggles between the two tribes which were called after the names of their leaders, and well sustained were they on both sides. At fearful cost, however, to the chiefs; for as it was an understanding among the two nations, that should the family of either chief become extinct, the people would again be united, the concentrated effort of each tribe was exerted for the extermination of the family of its rival.

Again and again was a prisoner of war, whose heart grew soft at the dreadful death with which he was threatened, sent back to his people with the weight of a solemn promise of treason to his chief, resting on his soul; and the straying papoose was pierced through the heart by an arrow, no one knew from whose bow shot; and the canoe of the young squaw, which her husband had seen her, with gay song and merry laugh, guiding up the stream, came floating idly down the current, while the joy and the hope of the young chief returned no more forever.

Many handsome braves were born both to Ojibway and Huron, yet neither left but one descendant, and the fate of their successors was no better than their own. * * *

So many moons had passed away, that the Indians no longer told their number; but that belt of wampum still hung in the wigwam of the Ojibway chief, and still the Hurons fought for it with unabated ardor.

The present chief of the last mentioned tribe was a young man, the tallest, handsomest and bravest, so even his enemies admitted, who could be found in the whole country between the Big Sea Water and the land of the Cherokees; and he and his people confidently expecting to obtain a final victory over their enemies; and for the first time during their existence as a separate tribe, the heart of the Ojibways softened.

Their chief was an old man, and feeble from grief as well as age, and though when he spoke it was the voice of Manitou to which his people listened, his words gave them no encouragement. Since his two sons, still but boys, had fallen beside him in battle, and the hopes of the old chief could rest only in a fair and beautiful daughter, another spirit seemed to have entered into the heart of the once brave warrior.

"Ojibway has buried his head in his blanket," he said to his people when they had entreated him to lead them forth to meet their enemies, "but the voice of the Great Spirit has reached him. The old man will die in his wigwam, and the belt of wampum he has bound around his daughter, will be given to the bride of the young Huron."

But when the young and gentle Mee-no-na suddenly and mysteriously disappeared from her father's wigwam, the old man rose from the earth, and, as if the weight of years had been lifted from his shoulders, stood erect among his people, and such a look had come over that calm, passionless face, that the fiercest and most savage of his tribe dared not lift their eyes to his countenance, much less endeavor by their words to incite him to deeds of vengeance.

Most likely he had, for the moment, forgotten the prophecies he had uttered, or, as wise men have sometimes failed to understand their own predictions, saw not how his words might agree.

"The Ojibway has said it," muttered the old Indian; "when Mee-no-na goes to the land of the blest, she travels not alone; the Huron walks by her side and bears for her the furs and the wampum her people have given her. The old men of the two tribes shall watch the death-fires together, for anger and hatred for each other shall dwell in their hearts no more forever."

And the old warrior took down from the wall of his wigwam the charmed bow which the chief of his people could bend but once in his whole lifetime, and the sacred arrow which was never drawn at a venture; and motioning to his braves that they were not to follow him, walked forth from his lodge to meet the young chief of the Hurons. His warriors looked doubtfully and inquiringly on each other, repenting the deception they had suffered to be practised on their good chief; since, instead of inciting him to lead them forth to meet their enemies, it had only led him to expose himself to danger; but the wily Kenabeek, a young, smooth-tongued brave, who had aspired to the hand of the beautiful Mee-no-na, and who, though his suit had been rejected by both her father and herself, felt confident of final success, at length broke the silence.

"Shall we see the young sapling whose branches might stretch far and wide till they overspread the hunting ground of our people," he said, "up-torn by the roots; and sit beneath the naked boughs of the old oak which can no longer shield us from the sun and the rain, till the whirlwind shall dash it upon our heads?"

Seven days and seven nights passed, and the warriors assembled again at the lodge of Ojibway. There was a mixture of joy and grief on their countenances; for there could be no doubt now but the old chief had gone to the kingdom of the blest, and the following day a new chief was to be chosen; but as the fire was kindled, and the first notes of the death song rose on the quiet air, the old Indian stood among them.

No one asked of his journey, but every one saw that though he thirsted no more for vengeance, grief sat heavily in his heart; and the Indians dispersed silently to their dwellings. Some days after, they learned, from the lips of a bard, and the story was heard with rejoicing, how the old chief and the Huron had met.

When the good Ojibway went forth from his lodge, so said the bard, the hand of Manitou smoothed the path for his stumbling feet; and on the seventh day of his journey, as the sun was sinking in the west, the old man saw, within stretch of his feeble arm, the form of his enemy, reclining upon the earth, in undisturbed repose.

Well knew Ojibway how unequal the contest between him and the young man must be, but he scorned to take advantage of the situation of his enemy; and he uttered the fierce war whoop while yet his bow hung by his side. The Huron started up, grasping his mighty war club, and echoing that wild cry in such a deep, sonorous voice, that, the bard declared, the forest swayed to and fro, as if a whirlwind was sweeping past; and then cleared, at a single bound, the space which divided him from his enemy.

For a moment the two warriors gazed in silence on each other's countenances; the one with feelings of veneration and respect, and the other, who saw no guilt in the handsome face before him, with an affection almost paternal.

"My father!" exclaimed the Huron, at length, and he flung his war club from him with such force that it buried itself in the earth; and the old chief, turning his face towards the setting sun, shot the last of the sacred arrows—the gift of the first Ojibway to his people—towards the west. The bow snapped asunder as the shaft sped through the air, and though for many and many a year after, the hunter sought that sacred arrow, it was never found.

The wars of the two tribes were ended, and the chiefs sat down upon the ground together, and gathering up the red clay, fashioned peace pipes, the fumes of which went up together, till the evening star looked down from the sky and the whippoorwill sang from the depths of the forest. And then Ojibway thought of the lost Mee-no-na, and her bright eyes, and her voice so low and sweet, and the old man's lips quivered as he spoke of her to the Huron. The young chief gave no answer to the father's words, he only laid aside his pipe and listened; but when the old man, worn out with his long journey and his grief, wound his blanket around him and slept, the Huron sprang to his feet, and never did deer more swiftly fly from his pursuer, than did the young man from the side of Ojibway.

When the old chief rose with the sun the next morning, he was surprised but not alarmed, to find himself alone. He could not, he believed, have been mistaken in the character of that young man, and could anything have consoled him for the loss of his daughter, and the speedy extinction, as he thought, of his family, it had been the knowledge that his people would have the brave Huron for their chief instead of the artful and wicked Kenabeek, who aspired to become their leader.

Silently, it has been said, the Indians dispersed to their dwellings, on the return of the old chief to his lodge, though Kenabeek wished to have a consultation with them. The course he had taken to incite Ojibway to renew the war with the Hurons, namely, the abduction of his daughter, had never fully met with their approbation; and when they looked on that gloomy, sorrowful countenance he had brought back to his now desolate lodge, his people bitterly regretted that he had suffered such wrong, but Kenabeek had declared that the place of Mee-no-na's concealment should become her grave should his treachery be revealed to her father; and the threat stopped every mouth.

It was on the evening her father returned to the lodge, that the gentle Mee-no-na, looking out from the rocky cavern where she had been placed by the wicked Kenabeek, and thinking of the morrow, which, she was assured by her captor, would be the commencement of what was far more terrible to her than the captivity she was now enduring, and revolving in her mind which would be preferable, a union with that base man, or a leap down that fearful precipice before her, and a plunge in the dark stream at its base, when the light, quick dash of oars fell on her ear. It was not the canoe of Kenabeek, nor was it the hand of an Ojibway which plied the oar, her practised ear well enough knew.

Like a winged arrow the canoe shot forward, and Mee-no-na saw in the bright moonlight the tall, dancing feathers, the strings of wampum, and the rich bracelets of a stranger chief. She started back into the cave, but not soon enough to escape the glance of the stranger. That glittering belt of wampum, and the beautiful form which he had been told it encircled, had, at length, met his gaze; and the young chief of the Hurons, mooring his canoe, sped up the precipice, and stood at the entrance of the cave.

A single glance at that noble, handsome countenance showed the young maiden she had nothing to fear; and when his voice, soft and sweet as the song of the spring bird, told of his friendship with the old Ojibway, and his power to love so gentle and beautiful a being as fame had said Mee-no-na to be; and how, believing the good Manitou could not have called one so young and lovely to the spirit land, for seven days and nights he had sought for her to ask her to become his wife. The young girl, trembling and blushing, came forward and stood beside him, and soft as the gentlest wind sigh were her words.

"The canoe of the wicked Kenabeek is on the stream. The Ojibway will give his daughter to him who will deliver her from the power of the base man, and carry her to the lodge of her father; and Mee-no-na could love her deliverer."

The young Kenabeek was a brave warrior, and the pride and boast of his tribe, though he was feared and hated rather than loved. His fame had reached the Huron, and the young chief was glad that his rival would be no mean antagonist; and after one glance of deep affection at the maiden, he disappeared over the edge of the precipice.

Mee-no-na listened, but the shout of defiance and the answering savage yells, might, could anything do so, have waked the dead. The contest was brief, but fearful. There was a heavy splash in the water, and then the death chant rose up loud and wild on the evening air.

Silent and sad on that night, sat the old Ojibway in his wigwam. His head was bowed to the ground, and his thoughts had gone, and his life seemed passing to the land of spirits; but as the daylight dawned in the east, a low, sweet voice called him back to earth, and his darling Mee-no-na and the brave Huron stood before him, with their hands joined together, and love and joy beaming from their countenances.

And then the old chief saw how the prophecies he had uttered should be fulfilled; and he rose up from the earth and blessed his children, and before many days had passed away, the old men of the two rival tribes repeated that blessing, buried their war clubs and their hatchets, and smoked the calumet together.

I'LL SEEK THE FESTIVE HALL.

BY MARTHA CLAXTON.

I'll seek the festive hall to-night,
And strive to drown in mirth
The lonely thoughts which every hour
Within my heart find birth.

I'll seek the festive hall to-night,
Where gay hearts aptly meet,
Where witching music and the song
Keep time with flying feet.

I'll seek the gay and courtly throng,
And mingle in the dance,
Nor even to the gloomy past,
Cast one reflective glance.

Yes, I will mingle with the gay,
And smile at grief and sorrow;
Life cannot always gloomy be—
There'll come a brighter morrow.

THE DESERTER.

BY HORACE B. STANFORD.

WHILE I was stopping at Port Mahon, a circumstance happened there which is worth relating. A friend, named Collins, was with me at dinner one afternoon. It was in the summer of 1842, and towards the latter part of the month of August, if my memory serves me rightly. At any rate, the grapes were ripening and we had some noble ones upon our table. As we arose from the board our host asked us if we were going up to the barracks. We informed him that we had made no arrangement of that kind, and asked him if there was to be any unusual parade.

"Why, yes," he answered, with that peculiar Dagonian shrug of the shoulders and twist of the features, "there is to be something that we have not had before for more than a year. A deserter is to be shot."

Collins was "up and dressed," in a twinkling for going; but I had but little inclination that way. Only about a month before, I had seen three Bedouin Arabs decapitated at Tripoli for the crime of treason, and I had no desire to see any more blood shed after such fashions, and so I told mine host, whom we always called Old Joe—and that was the only name I ever knew him to possess.

"I suppose, now, you would rather see that deserter escape, than not, eh?" said Joe, looking me sharply in the face.

"If his only crime is desertion, of course I should," said I.

"Well, that is his only crime; and more still:

His mother used to live over towards Atalaya, on the southern coast, and was sick. Philip wished to see her, and they would not let him go, so he made his escape. This he has done three times, and now they have tried him and condemned him to be shot. The last time they took him, they found him by his mother's bed. He had thrown off his military garb, and assumed the dress of a common peasant."

"It's rather hard to shoot a man for such a thing," said I.

"Ay," returned Joe, with the old shrug, "I know it; but suppose soldiers could be their own judges of when they might leave—why, we shouldn't have a soldier in a month, you see, they must stick up to the rules, and so poor Philip Cervera must be shot. But I suppose you would like to have him escape."

I assured the host that I should. He gazed very carefully about the room, and then stepping close to me he said, in a tone almost reduced to a whisper:

"Then come up to the parade ground. Just come up and see what you can see. Come."

I knew from the man's manner that something out of the ordinary course of such events was going to happen, and I told Collins I would go with him. The host was soon ready, and we accompanied him to the barracks. They are at the upper end of the town, at the Place d'Armes, the buildings forming one bound of the wide enclosure, while the other sides are bounded by a high, thick wall. As we reached the place, we found the regiment to which the deserter belonged just forming. Joe pointed out to us the spot where the execution was to take place, and thither we bent our steps. This spot was close by the high wall upon the east side of the enclosure. A stake was driven firmly into the ground, within a few feet of the wall, and half-a-dozen soldiers with a corporal were there to guard the premises.

Ere long the regiment was ready; the band struck up a mournful dirge, and the procession commenced to move. First rode the officers of the staff, then came the band, and then most of the regiment following. Behind these came the six men who were to shoot the deserter, and next came the deserter himself. He walked between two sergeants, with his head bowed, and his arms pinioned behind him. Following him were four men bearing a rough coffin; and, last of all, came the company to which the deserter belonged. It was a mournful scene. The soldiers walked with slow and measured tread, and even the very horses seemed to have imbibed the sad spirit of the occasion.

The procession marched wholly around the place, and as they approached the spot where we stood, the staff and band filed off, and the regiment was drawn up in a semi-circular form before the stake. Then the deserter, his attendants and his company marched up close to the place of execution. I now had an opportunity to see the face of the prisoner. It was sad and gloomy, but ever and anon, as some movement occurred near him, he would start with a sudden energy, which I thought indicated some hope. He would look quickly about him—see the cause of the noise, and then sink back with an expression of agonizing disappointment.

At length the colonel rode up and waved his sword towards the poor sergeant who had been appointed to conduct the fatal work. The prisoner looked up and saw the colonel, and with a frantic movement he rushed towards him.

"Senor colonel," he cried, sinking upon his knees, "I am not guilty! I never belonged to your regiment! I am not a soldier! God knows I never wore a uniform before!"

"Away with him!" cried the colonel, impatiently.

"Will you not listen?" the poor fellow urged, louder than before. "Never, never, never was I a soldier!"

"Carry him back," ordered the officer to the sergeant who had come up. And then he added to the prisoner, after the sergeant had raised him up: "Why do you still persist in telling such a falsehood?"

The fellow would have spoken, but the colonel waved his hand impatiently, and he was led away.

"That has been his plea ever since they brought him back," explained Old Joe to me, as they led the condemned man towards the stake. "He swears he was never in the army before—that he never had a musket in his hand—and he pretends not to know any of his old companions. When they call him by name he makes strange of it, and tells 'em he never saw 'em before."

"Why, that is a curious plea," said I, "for a man to make, who, you say, has been two years in the service."

"Very curious," returned the host, with a shake of the head which seemed to leave room for doubt concerning his meaning.

But we conversed no more, for our attention was now turned to the prisoner. The rough coffin had been placed against the stake, and the condemned caused to kneel thereon. The priest now approached him and knelt at his side.

"My son, remember the fate of those who die with a lie upon their lips," commenced the fat churchman. "Ere you die let us have the truth. Why did you desert your post?"

"I did not," persisted the youth; but his tone was lower now, and there was a shade of hesitation.

"I will not urge you," the priest resumed, "for of course you know; but still your assertion is strange and unaccountable. Your companions all know you—your officers swear to your identity, and I recognize you as one who has been often with me in our church with your company."

The colonel had drawn near, and he listened attentively to the words which now passed between the condemned and his spiritual director. The latter urged the youth several times more to make a full confession, but the same assertion was persisted in. The colonel shook his head and turned away, and in a moment more the six soldiers who held the loaded muskets approached the spot. They trembled some, but their step was firm, like men who have resolved to perform a terrible duty unflinchingly.

The priest asked no more questions. The prisoner had made his confession, and it remained only for the holy father to pray, which he did quickly and methodically. The sergeant, holding a watch in his left hand, and a heavy pistol in his right, now approached and directed that the prisoner should be blind-folded. The bandage was passed over his eyes, and then secured to the stake so that he should not dodge his head. At this juncture I asked mine host if they only had six men to fire. He informed me that that was all they ever employed for shooting a deserter. Three of the guns were loaded with balls, and three with blank cartridges; and when they fired they moved up and placed the muzzles of their pieces to within two feet of the condemned man's head.

The priest had arisen and moved back, and the colonel had ordered the sergeant to proceed.

"God have mercy!" uttered the unhappy youth. Until this moment his whole frame had been nerved up to an anxious listening attitude, but now his muscles relaxed, and with a deep groan he gave himself up to his fate.

The sergeant had spoken the word "READY," but before he could proceed there was a movement near the centre of the long line of men, and in a moment more a soldier broke through and rushed to the spot where the condemned was bound.

"Hold!" he shouted, as he reached the spot, placing himself between the prisoner and the executioners. "You would kill an innocent man! I am Philip Cervera!—I am the deserter, as you think! Look at me—look at me!"

All was confusion for a few moments; but the officers soon succeeded in restoring order.

"It is! It is! It is Philip!"

Such, and various other exclamations fell from the lips of those who stood around. As soon as I could gain a view of the face of the new-comer, I found that he so nearly resembled the prisoner, that I should not have dared to venture even an assertion upon the identity of either. They were of the same size, the same form, and the same features. In fact, one was the exact counterpart of the other.

The colonel leaped from his saddle and hastened to the spot.

"I am Philip Cervera, Senor colonel," the new-comer cried out. "Do you not recognize me?"

The commandant gazed first upon him and then upon the prisoner, and at length he said:

"By our lady, but this is most strange. Sergeant, what think you of it?"

"Why, sir," returned the man thus addressed, touching his cap, "I don't know. I think I should have to take their own word for it."

"You are right, sergeant. At any rate, you may unbind the prisoner."

The youth was unbound, and then the two were caused to stand up together. The new-comer had on the very clothes in which Philip had deserted, and when some of his companions were called up, they readily swore that he was the man. Some were sure that he was the man, while others could not decide between the two; but not one now swore to the identity of the prisoner.

The colonel reflected upon this a few moments, and then ordered both the men to be conducted to the barracks.

Collins and myself accompanied our host back to his house. We tried to get him into conversation on the way, but he was moody and silent, sometimes answering in monosyllables, but entering into no conversation.

"It was after dark, and Collins, the host, and myself were playing a game of billiards, when the door was opened, and in walked one of the men whom we had seen at the Place d'Armes; either the deserter, or the other one, and I could not tell which. He sprang forward and caught old Joe's hand.

"I'm free!" he cried.

"And where is Jo—a—Philip? Where is Philip?" the host asked.

"Locked up in the guard-house. They would have shot him to-day, but he claimed a trial, for he assured them that he could prove that he was carried away against his will."

"And when will they try him?"

"To-morrow."

The host now came forward, and introduced the man to us as Joseph Cervera, and also informed us that he was the one we had seen bound to the stake. We found the young man to be intelligent, and well versed in conversation; and from him we learned that the man who had come to save him was his twin brother. We asked him several questions about the desertion, but he gave us indirect answers, and the subject was dropped. He only informed us that as soon as his brother had sworn that he was Philip Cervera, and announced that he was ready to stand the trial, he, himself, had been set at liberty.

It was about ten o'clock when Collins and I retired, and it was sometime ere we fell asleep. How long I had slept I cannot tell, but it must have been past midnight, when I was awakened by hearing voices below. I listened, and could plainly distinguish the voice of our host, though I could not hear what was said. In a few moments more he came up and entered our room. He noticed that I was awake, and asked me if we would lend him our hats and cloaks a little while without asking any questions. I told him yes, though I must say that I broke the promise on the very next moment by asking him what he was up to. He shook his head and said perhaps he would tell me sometime.

In fifteen minutes after this, I heard some one go out by the back way, and then all was still. I remained awake nearly an hour after this, but heard nothing more. The clock below struck two, and in a few moments more I was asleep again.

When we went down in the morning, we found old Joe alone. I asked him where Joseph Cervera was, but he only shook his head in answer. After breakfast I was on the point of going out, when the host called me back.

"Look ye, senor," he said, in an eager, earnest tone, "you know so much already that I shall feel safer to confess to you the whole, for were you to tell one word of what you have seen here, it might ruin me. You will be secret. You know the young men, and you cannot wish them harm."

I promised, and he proceeded.

"The mother of those two young men was my sister. She died over a week ago. Philip was in the army, and Joseph was at home. They were twins, as you were told last night. Philip wished to be with his mother when she died—it was almost a monomania with him—but this could not be allowed. So he ran away. He was brought back, and ran away again. And this he did the third time. That was Philip whom we first saw at the stake! He had arranged with his brother for escape. Joseph was to prepare himself with all the necessary instruments for freeing himself from his shackles, and for cutting his way from prison. He knew just where he would be confined, and consequently he knew what he would need to help him in escape. With these tools concealed about him, he came, as you saw, to take his brother's place. He is a bold, dauntless, reckless man, when only self or the safety of a friend is concerned, and I believed he would succeed. You know how Philip was released, and how his innocent brother was accepted in his place. Ha, ha, ha, they let the deserter go, and took an eel in his place. Joseph had his irons off within half an hour after dark, and in an hour more, he had two of the iron bars removed from the back window. At ten o'clock he crawled out; let himself drop upon the ground, and then scaled the wall. He came immediately here, and I at once called his brother, and helped prepare for making a final clearance. Your hats and cloaks served to help them by the sentinels, and ere I left them I saw them on board a felucca, below Georgetown, bound for Toulon. They are out of sight of land long ere this. Now you know all; and I know I may trust you."

Hardly had he ceased speaking when six soldiers entered the bar-room. The deserter—Philip Cervera—had escaped! Had we seen anything of him? No. And the soldiers went away.

When I went out I found soldiers moving in all directions, and many times I heard the same question repeated which had been asked at Old Joe's. But the deserter was not found. Search was also made for the one who had come so near being shot on the day before, but they could find him no more readily than they did the other.

NEW LOCOMOTIVE POWER.

If all the alleged inventions of modern ingenuity were genuine, and available, civilization would be far in advance of its present limits. A correspondent of an English paper states that a French gentleman has discovered the secret of compressing electricity—thus controlling a power far greater than any heretofore brought into use. It requires, he states, neither machinery nor combustion; and a vessel propelled by it will skim the water like a bird, and at the rate of sixty miles an hour. It is said that in the course of a series of experiments which were tried at Vincennes, a small mortar was fired by the inventor, at the rate of a hundred shots a minute, without flashing, smoke or noise.—Bunker Hill Aurora.

Sin is never at a stay; if we do not retreat from it, we shall advance in it; and the farther on we go, the more we have to come back.

THINK OF ME.

BY M. L. W. CURRIER.

Think of me, dearest, when night has come,
And shadowed the bright green earth,
When earthly feelings have fled from thy soul,
And heavenly thoughts have birth,
Then think thou of me.

Think of me too when thy heart is sad,
When the world looks most cheerless and drear,
When thy dark, sparkling orbs grow restless and dim,
Or saturated with the bright, pearly tear,
Then think thou of me.

But not when thy heart beats proudly and high,
Would I ask you to then think of me;
But when a soft voice would console thy lone heart,
Then, dear one, remember thou me.
O, then think of me.

When sorrow is yours, then, then would I stand
In the place of a dear, cherished friend,
And strive with thy darkness at every lone hour,
Life's brightness and beauty to blend,
Then think thou of me.

ALMOST A HEROINE.

BY EMILY R. PAGE.

PRETTY Miss Anderson had just emerged from the petty thralldom of boarding school—that nursery of shallow affectation in which she had been taught waltzing, lacing, attention to externals, a moiety of French, fashionable piano thrumming, and a great deal of elegant frivolity. Common sense and the English language had been mutually neglected. Reading of the pseudo-sentimental stamp comprised her literature, and every pernicious habit and influence had combined to bury the one solitary talent which she by nature possessed.

From this hot-bed of folly, hallowed by fashion and parental delusion, issued Miss Anderson, at seventeen years and a month, full of foolish romance and artificial ideas of life, imbibed from mistaken training; and with a simpler, and that species of uncertain carriage supposed to be elegant, she slid out, in the exact angle prescribed by Monsieur the French dancing-master, and took her first step in the genteel world.

This first step, unfortunately, brought her in direct conjunction with an empty headed and empty pocketed young gentleman of the school denominated fast, who rejoiced in flashy waistcoats, broad plaids, and superlative lengths of galvanised chain. He swaggered at trotting-matches, stalked at billiard-rooms, and ogled at theatres with the perfect sang-froid of the bravest, and yet, to make a disagreeable exposition of facts, his unfortunate pocket rarely boasted advance capital to the amount of a shilling, and many were the confiding landladies, tailors, and washerwomen, who had cause to deplore their too ready reliance upon his fair promises and prepossessing exterior.

This uncomfortable state of purse—this perpetual vexation of being “hard up,” compelled our hero to look about him for some more settled and secure means of living than that for which he blessed luck at the gaming-table. On reflection, as nothing else seemed to indicate fairer for his future ease, he resolved to purchase freedom from pecuniary annoyance at the altar—in other words, to marry some genteel estate in the country, or equally respectable establishment “up town” (no matter if encumbered by worse than Petruchio’s shrew), which should enable him in future to carry his head above even high water mark; and to the accomplishment of this intent, he bent all his energies.

In an evil hour, his eye fell upon our languishing debutante, and he straightway proceeded to lay determined siege to her heart, having first ascertained satisfactorily that the “plum,” which was authentically ascribed to the plethoric Capt. Jacob Anderson, her father, would eventually drop, ripe and plump, into her expectant lap; therefore it became at once his design to secure to himself this figurative receptacle of the golden favors which he felt would indeed prove to him the lap of fortune!

He found little labor in capturing the citadel of the young lady’s affection. How should he—since there was no resistance, and he suddenly discovered himself master of the field without a struggle? “Lightly won, lightly prized,” was the air of victory, whistled carelessly between puffs of offensive smoke, as he resumed the jaunty tip of his hat and swaggering gait, which, out of fond consideration for his future prospects, he had forborne while playing the escort to the lovely Miss Anderson (feeling that, had not his present comet a golden tail in prospective, he would hurl it derisively back to the sky from which it had dropped, almost unsolicited, upon him); but a renewed pressure of the solitary sixpence in his attenuated pocket-book convinced him that he could not afford to indulge his very natural sentiments of disgust, and he prudently resolved to patronize the fortune which seemed thrusting itself upon him, and, if fate had determined to place him on the list of the uncomfortably rich, it could in no extremity be more inconvenient than his present condition of opposite uncomfortableness!

Upon this he paused, resigned, and allowed himself to dwell fondly upon the projected renewal and enlargement of his plaids, the widening of his weed, and the addition of a ponderous seal to his attractive chain, all of which, and many more shades of improvement, would attend upon his approaching change of station.

As he crept into his narrow attic, and bestowed himself under a dirty counterpane, still encased in coat and boots, he viewed his coming princeliness with the eye of anticipation, and gloated tipsily over the realization, for he could see no end of brandy smashes stretching away, steaming and hot, into the infinite distance!

As he attended Miss Anderson in her daily walks, doing the amiable with heroic grace, he reflected how rapidly they would resolve themselves into the one grand, crowning walk to church; and immediately his mouth watered with a foretaste of the rich old wines which would sparkle at the wedding banquet!

As he handed Miss Anderson to a seat in his phaeton (such occasions invariably denoted a successful night at the dice-box!) ambition whispered rare prophecies of the splendid turnout which he would soon be able to display, to the astonishment of “the boys,” and the envy of Tom, Dick and Harry, who now sported their respective nags, and looked with compassionate contempt upon his utter inability to retain possession of a fine trotter, purchased the season previous! Here a smart crack of the whip, of rather too professional a tone to be practised in the feminine presence, announced his exultation in view of such a triumph, while imagination even hinted at fancy stables and a stud!

As for the lady herself, who was destined to confer all these rational enlargements, she was too giddy with the consciousness of a real lover, and the rapture of being exalted to the position of an actual heroine of romance, to feel a suspicion that she could be second to anything else in the devotion of her adorer; and, as she had been schooled to believe herself created for the distinct purpose of being married; both appeared in a fair way to idolize each the darling project of their lives—she a husband, and he a fortune.

But the wooing did not prosper! Old Jacob Anderson was not the man to be deceived by false pretences; and when he surprised Mr. Emanuel Zephyr (so read our hero’s card—pardon, reader, that we have so long neglected a nominal introduction) at his daughter’s feet, he instantly expelled him from his house, with a peremptory command never to enter it again, and a timely warning never to dare the effrontery of another approach to his daughter!

Emanuel muttered extravagant curses upon the "meddlesome old cur," as he strode down the street, and Amantha Ann, in tears and despair retreated to her chamber, to pine in secret over her cruel fate, and meditate daggers and the poison-bowl—those tragic benefactors to love-lorn maidens oppressed by unrelenting fathers.

In the morning, however, as a billet from some mysterious source appeared attached to her window blinds, and on opening which she joyfully recognized the somewhat uncertain signature of her Emanuel, her feelings suddenly underwent a very material process of change, and she decided to live, for his sake, and trust to time for the abatement of the paternal severity! The note, written in the most impassioned style of superlatives, assured her in one breath that he could not tear her image from his soul—he could not exist without her; and in another, implored her to take pity on his breaking heart, and consent to see him once again, for the last time, if it must be so, that he might at least have the sad satisfaction of bidding her farewell; and ending by appointing a time and place of meeting in a very rational manner, and cheerfully recommending her to hope for the best—all would yet be well!

Miss Anderson compared notes with a score of her favorite novels, whose Amantha Anns were cruelly placed in scenes of even direr tribulation than her own, and yet who invariably appeared upon the concluding page satisfactorily married, amicably reconciled to obdurate parents, and felicitously happy; and she could not fail to regard her lover's final assurance as prophetic. In the full strength of this confidence, she stole forth to the romantic clandestine meeting, which she was a little disappointed in being obliged to enjoy by gaslight, instead of the more appropriate rays of the tender moon universally accorded to such occasions.

Emanuel received her rapturously. Two or three turns up and down the retired street he had chosen, sufficed to unfold his plan of action, which was nothing less than the felonious design of carrying off the bride of his heart without the consent of her natural guardian (since it was folly to indulge a hope of obtaining it!) This added the final touch to Amantha Ann's cherished conviction that she was indeed a real heroine, and it was therefore jointly arranged that they should be prepared for flight on the following evening.

Emanuel, greatly solicitous of the paternal blessing (knowing that through this lay his only present means of paying his respects to the paternal coffers), charged her in advance with the doubtful embassy of conciliating the offended parental majesty, and obtaining the all-important pardon, as soon as they twain should have become one flesh—tenderly assuring her that he could not live, in a state of alienation from the father of his adored (thinking it unnecessary to reveal the reason why!) and laying to her vanity the flattering unctious that the veriest heart of stone could not resist the eloquence of her entreaty, if she but besought with tears! This she determined to do.

"Papa cannot refuse his forgiveness when he sees how devotedly Emanuel loves me, and how noble and ingenuous he is." "The old bear won't hold out long when he finds the business is over," were the respective reflections of the ardent couple, as they parted lingeringly on a shady corner—he having first suggested and effected a very affectionate exchange of rings, which might have been premeditated on his part—hers being a real diamond, while his was merely a block of first water glass, in very suspicious cutting. At all events, it seemed a happy move for him, as an immediate disposal of it for genuine bank notes resulted in extreme repletion of purse, and great consequent self-indulgence, which, however, proved eventually very treacherous to his interest.

Miss Anderson's blissful visions of elopement were somewhat marred that night by the intrusion of a frightful monster, which appeared, with glaring eyes and savage teeth, to claim her in place of her darling Emanuel, and which finally resolved itself into a hideous dragon, and was on the terrible point of flaying her alive, and devouring her by inches, when she awoke in a cold perspiration, and found it was morning!

For a moment, her resolution to elope was a little shaken; but the reflection that this was the last great test of her affection, and especially that it was in itself the feather's weight which would turn the balance and place her beside the brilliant Paulines and Cynthia Elizabeths of pasteboard and muslin existence, overcame even her superstitions, and she was again firm. And arranging her wardrobe and collecting her jewels, as the Lady Blanche or the Countess of Blouse had done, on the day of flight with some chivalrous peasant or banished prince, she prepared to follow in their shining wake!

The appointed hour at length arrived, but Emanuel did not. Impatience gave way to fear in the mind of the watcher when an hour had expired, and yet he did not come; but at that very moment, had she possessed the Asmodean optical power of penetrating bricks and stone, she might have beheld him in one of the chief saloons of the city, tipping his glass with a very peculiar looking one-eyed gentleman, whose intimacy he appeared to enjoy, and carelessly regarding a fabulous bet on the result of the game then in hand, while the vicinity of corks and empty bottles indicated that they had already imbibed as much as was necessary for the stomach's sake! But this rare virtue of vision she could not command, and suspense was torture.

Two hours waned, during which the wretched Miss Anderson had passed through every successive stage of agony up to the final point of despair. Meanwhile Emanuel was making many attempts to ascend the genteel street which contained the imposing "stone front" of his future father-in-law, and which treacherously rose before him in continuous steps, upon which, if he set his uncertain feet, they immediately vanished into thin air—bringing him in contact with an opposing lamp-post on one hand, or a stubborn brick wall on the other, with a violence proportional to the height of the step he attempted.

Reaching the house at last, which stood a little isolated from its neighbors in solitary grandeur, he staggered to the wall, and essayed the preconceived signal upon the lady's chamber-window ranging in the second story. In a state of sobriety, this might have been safely attempted, as our hero had himself satisfactorily tested; but now, alas, at every fresh effort, the fickle window eluded his reach—now mounting to the extreme angle of the pointed gables, now playing undignified antics across the grave expanse of brick, and now indulging in animated hide-and-seek among its lively fellows!

But Emanuel still persevered, with a misty consciousness that fortune, fast horses, and an infinitude of champagne bottles waited upon a successful tap of the flighty casement. His steadfastness was rewarded, for at length the giddy object of his pursuit inclined to something like its proper position, and he instantly made a rapid plunge forward, with a triumphant "Hic—old fellow, I—have you now!" But the deceitful window played him false—his hands slipped from their straining grasp upon the naked wall, precipitating him, with a terrific crash, headlong through a lower casement, against which he had unwittingly leaned.

In his rapid descent into the interior, he was thrown in painful contact with some resisting substance, which subsequent revelations proved to be the depository of the family silver, with an alarm-bell attached, which immediately sounded a sonorous peal that might have awakened the dead—throwing our hero into a state of doubt as to whether he had not suddenly fallen upon the deck of some steamer outward bound, just thundering forth its brazen note of departure!

"My plate! my plate! thieves! thieves!" roared the frantic voice of the excited captain, from the parlor above—rolling his vast rotundity from a comfortable position upon his favorite sofa, and shuffling as rapidly as possible to the scene of action, heading a promiscuous group from the region of the kitchen, armed with pokers, carving-knives, or whatever description of weapon could be soonest secured.

Rushing down upon the fated door, they forced an unanimous entrance; and the light of the foremost taper discovered the supposed burglar bungling and groping, with the utmost drunken gravity, for the delusive window—the scene of his late disastrous ingress—through which he no doubt meditated a safe retreat.

"Seize him—bind him—call the police!" shouted the infuriated proprietor of the assailed treasure. "I'll teach you the cost of invading my premises, you house-breaking rascal!" was the parting assurance, as Emanuel, pinioned and guarded, was dragged away in speechless terror.

Amantha Ann was discovered to have fainted, and was conveyed insensible to her chamber—in which state she found it proper to remain during the entire night. She subsequently revived, however, to learn by the evening paper that one Emanuel Zephyr was that morning examined before the police court, and convicted on the double charge of drunkenness and attempted burglary—and again relapsed into insensibility. She eventually returned to a permanent state of consciousness, and begged to be permitted to share her dear unfortunate Emanuel's captivity; but as this touching request was not granted, she subsided into a gentle melancholy, passed her time in solitude, and was observed to walk often along the smooth borders of the Frog Pond, with no apparent object, gazing intently into it.

As she continued to survive, however, alarm for her safety abated, and in proportion as this anxiety decreased, her former habits resumed their ascendancy. True, Miss Anderson had romantically resolved to cling to her lover through evil and good report; but on reflection, finding that none of her approved heroes were convicted of the grossness of drunkenness, she finally abandoned him to his convict dress and prison fare, in place of ideal plaids and fancy wines, and consoled herself with a more respectable, but not more disinterested suitor, who happily met the entire approbation of the eccentric Captain Anderson, and who ultimately succeeded to the care of his treasury, and assumed the control of his deposits and percentage.

A GOOD NAME.

BY MARTHA W. CANTON.

Some speak of riches and their worth,
And some of lofty fame;
But still, of all earth's precious stores,
Give me a bright, good name.

Give me a name, though adverse winds
Howl loudly round my head,
That will not die when I am gone,
But still an influence shed.

Give me a name that cannot die,
When I am laid to rest
Upon our common mother Earth's
Cold, damp, and cheerless breast.

A name that all will loudly praise,
A name that all can love;
One that will brightly shine on earth,
And brighter grow above.

When I shall sleep within the tomb,
O, may my name remain;
And oft be spoken of by friends,
As one without a stain.

THE BROTHERS.

BY EUSTACE KINGMAN.

JOHN and Bertrand Scott were brothers in name and by birth; but no two strangers coming from opposite parts of the earth, could have been more different. John was a wild, restless, daring fellow; full of life and spirit, yet, with a woman's tenderness in his heart. He went through the world, sowing his gifts of cheerfulness, love and benevolence broadcast. Halleck's lines describe him best:

"A kind, true heart—a spirit high,
That could not brook and would not bow,
Were written in his manly eye,
And on his manly brow.
Strong sense—deep feeling—passions strong,
A hate of tyrant and of knave,
A love of right—a scorn of wrong;
Of coward and of slave."

Bertrand Scott was the reverse of all this. He was mean, vicious and creeping. Always in sanctimonious garb, and with sanctimonious face, and a quiet, stealthy pace, that came upon your most secret and sacred hours, his sleek, black garb suggested the idea of a great, shining, black beetle, of that sort which you cannot kill without treading upon them. At school he was the one who won all the boy's marbles, and in the endless "swapping" of knives and playthings, Bertrand, somehow, always came off best. Still as he was never known to fight, nor to be recognized openly in a quarrel, it was not easy to fix a dishonorable character upon him; while John's impetuous spirit was ever offending and yet ever forgiving and forgiven. For boys intuitively love and honor a generous nature; and they felt the difference between John's heartsome—yes, that is the word, no other describes it—his heart-some ways, and Bertrand's fawning and creeping manner, long before they could analyze their characters, and make the distinction in words.

When they left college, John decided to become a physician, and Bertrand a merchant. Each seemed instinctively to grasp the mode of life which would best develop their innermost qualities; and each carried out in his professional or mercantile life the promise which the boy and the youth had successively given.

When mere boys, at school, both had liked best a gentle little girl, Anne Avelin, who was a great favorite in school, from her lovely and amiable disposition. She was not handsome, nor strikingly interesting even. She was merely sweet and good, and made every one love her by her uniform self-abnegation, and her desire to please.

Too gentle to dislike any one, Bertrand found it very easy to persuade Anne that he was one of the most perfect youths of his time; and although she preferred John's open ways and blunter speech to Bertrand's smooth and specious words, yet she did not suspect that a bad heart lay under that smooth and sleek exterior.

We believe in the dignity of human nature, until we wake up to some deception practised towards ourselves. It is a part of almost every person's youthful creed; a beautiful illusion which it would be pleasant to retain through life; a thing to which we build monuments, and plant statues, or set them upon pedestals; and by-and-by we go and sit down at the base, and weep bitterly over the fall of the hero or the demi-god, which our own hands raised.

Anne was some years in finding out how far her statue was from perfection; and when she did discover it, it was too late. She was vowed to its worship for life! She was married to Bertrand Scott. And for him, she had slighted John's great and noble heart, which had beat for her alone, from the time when he lifted her over the streams and brooks, and gathered the violets for her, in fields that were purple with them now, in his memory!

Bertrand knew it all the while. He knew that John would have died for the gentle Anne, whose presence in a home he would have thought so inexpressibly dear, and whose life he had already hoped would flow side by side with his own. Yes, Bertrand knew this, and more. He knew that Anne loved John best, in her inmost heart; and he knew, also, that it was a suspicion of something wrong in John, which he himself had planted in her mind, that closed her heart against that large and noble nature and made her speak words that grieved and surprised John beyond measure. He had thought that Anne loved him, in her quiet, calm way, just as he had always hoped that a wife would love him, softening down the angles of his own restless nature, and refreshing his senses with the simplicity and beauty of her own.

How well he bore the disappointment, may be inferred from the fact, that Dr. Scott remained unmarried. He had thought of going away to a distant town; but he had too many friends at Ludlow, to permit him to carry such a plan into operation; so taking an office at a long distance from Bertrand's habitation, he sat down before his solitary fire, and gave his first and last tear to the remembrance of Anne Avelin.

His door opened softly, and Bertrand, with the cat-like tread which distinguished him, entered. His coming on that evening, was peculiarly annoying to John. He could hardly touch the hand which his brother extended; and he pretended to be studying from a book which he held in his hand; then, ashamed of even that small subterfuge, he flung it on the floor with a violence that made Bertrand cower away from him.

"My dear John," he said, "you are so very startling in your movements—I came in to ask you what provision you had made for our father. Can you have him under your care? Are you going to keep house?"

John eyed him for a moment, almost fiercely.

"Father in need of a home, Bertrand! Is not the house in which you live, my father's house? Can he not live in his own house, or do I understand you rightly, that he seeks to change?"

"Don't ask so many questions at a time, John, please. The fact is, that father—in short, he has been in want of money, and I have advanced it from time to time, until—until the house is all that I have to show for my liberality."

John looked at him until he was evidently disconcerted under the gaze. Bertrand resumed:

"You see, John, that I need to make some alterations in the house, to suit my present means of living—not that I really make money—I don't wish to have you to think so—but you know a great deal depends in mercantile life, on making a show. Now here are you, happy dog that you are," and he affected a laugh, "can sit here unmolested, and make money without spending it."

"And can, therefore, take my dear old father into my kennel, you think, do you?"

Bertrand quailed again. He was decidedly opposed to John's taking this view of the matter. "It was not convenient for him to allow separate apartments for his father," he said, "and he needed all the room for new improvements, and in short—"

"In short, you are a knave!" exclaimed John.

Bertrand started, for his own deeds had not yet assumed quite that color in his own mind. John was so abrupt! Really he wished that he would try to be more considerate of his friends' feelings. And he was so truly fearful that his startling manner would be a bar to his practice.

Bertrand had mounted his old hobby of disinterested friendship again. He had won his wife by it—he now hoped to gain a home for his father, by parading it before John. As well might the slimy sea-weed that crawls at the foot of the great rock of Gibraltar seek to draw the rock into the ocean depths, as for him to influence a nature like John's.

"I can make you no reply, Bertrand, until I have seen father. I will then see you together, and arrange some plan. I have an engagement, now," he continued, looking at his watch.

"O, I do not think, really, John, that it will do for you to name anything of the kind to father. He is very nervous and irritable. He needs your medical aid. I do think, brother, that you ought to get married and take him home, where you can watch his disorder."

"And you have chosen the time when he was ill and disturbed, to take his home from him, and turn him out of doors!"

"Dear John, do not be so absurd. Anne is not well, and it must be unpleasant, you know, for father to be smoking in the house; and—"

"Leave me!" said John; and Bertrand did not wait a second bidding. That voice meant something more than met the ear.

The next day, Mr. Scott, against Bertrand's express command, visited John alone in his office. It seemed that he had been inveigled into buying shares in an imaginary stock company, and had been induced to suppose that Bertrand had stood between him and certain ruin, on account of this very transaction. Under this impression, and grateful to his son for securing him against destruction, he had thought it a light compensation, to sign the deeds which gave Bertrand all his property. The house Bertrand had appropriated to his own use, the rest of the property was invested in his business; and his father stood a penniless and heart-broken man. Bertrand's wife was kind and affectionate to Mr. Scott, but her husband did not like to see the old father whom he had injured; and he would like better that he should be with John. He told Anne that it was the wish of his father and brother to be together, and Anne acceded, though feeling deeply hurt that she was not permitted to administer to his declining age.

Dr. John thought long and deeply upon this double instance of Bertrand's duplicity. The thought of Anne sacrificed to this selfish being, was torture enough; but when his poor old father was immolated, too, upon the same dark shrine, and his own expectations cut off, to feed his avarice, he could not bear it.

And yet there was no remedy but patience; for his father's own hand had signed the deeds, and he could not by any alchemy be turned into an insane man, although a highly injured one. So, at present, the doctor contented himself with finding a pleasant and cheerful boarding-house for his father, and trying to believe that sometime or other, the brave knight will appear, who is to "—ride through the hills,

To the wide world past the river,
There to put away all wrong!
To make straight distorted wills,
And to empty the broad quiver
Which the wicked bear along."

Mr. Scott murmured a little, at first, at the change, for he had become so accustomed to Anne's little attentions, that he knew not how to dispense with them. But he soon became reconciled, when his landlady's sister, a bright-eyed widow, took upon herself the charge of waiting upon him.

At first, John had insisted, as a matter of common justice to himself, that Bertrand should unite in paying his father's board; but after awhile, even that was denied, and the whole expense fell upon the elder brother.

John had never seen Anne, since the day on which she refused him. He could not see her married, and afterwards it was not easy to make the first visit at her house. Bertrand, too, had chosen to employ another physician, and that circumstance, of course, precluded him from visiting there. He sometimes heard of Anne, as being ill and low-spirited; but it was from strangers, not Bertrand, that he heard it, and the brothers now passed each other in the street without speaking.

Bertrand had made his improvements in the house, had furnished it magnificently, and was now preparing to give a party, the costly elegance of which should astonish every one.

Many were invited who did not even know the Scotts by sight. Others who knew and respected John, went from regard to him, not dreaming of the rupture between the brothers. A few old, retired merchants, who received cards for themselves and families, concluded to go because their young people would enjoy it, and they could have a nice chat with their old friend, Mr. Scott. So Bertrand Scott succeeded in astonishing them, but not exactly in the way that he expected. Champagne, velvet carpets, gas-lights and oyster patties were not things to astonish these people; except that some of them wondered if Bertrand Scott wasn't going to fail. "It had a look like it," said the old stagers who know how these things are done.

Anne moved about in her half-sad, quiet way, wishing that her father-in-law and John were there to help her entertain those dreadful people. She, poor child, knew nothing of the late difference. Even Mr. Scott's going away was represented by her husband as an act of his father's own seeking; and Anne had grieved that the dear old man could not make himself happy with her, when she loved him so much.

Bertrand did not fail, however. He went on, accumulating his thousands, while John was slowly, but surely, working his way to distinction, if not to wealth. His thorough attention to business, never being absent from his office unless obliged to leave it, drew the attentive regard towards him of certain ancient families, whose physician having lately died, they were desirous of replacing him by the best in practice; and Dr. Scott soon found himself feeling aristocratic pulses, and prescribing for aristocratic nerves.

Once there, in the bosom of this charmed circle, his fortune was made. One thing was wanting, however, as the lady of the honorable Mr. Wise told him—and that was a wife. The lady had two daughters past thirty. They would not have refused the doctor, now, but in their youth, those men who would have liked them, were kept off by their fear of refusal; for great and powerful Mr. Wise could not be approached by common suitors for his stately daughters. So they let their "young affections run to waste," enclosed them with an iron fence of pride, and at thirty, they dropped all the music, and poetry, and romance of life, and became eager seekers after society and scandal, and encouraged the attentions of those whom once they would not have thought worthy to touch the tips of their aristocratic fingers.

The lady's remark did rouse John, but not exactly as she intended. It made him look in oftener upon one of his patients, a cross, irritable old gentleman, whose gout was at times unbearable to himself, and whose temper was always unbearable to others. When in his worst fits, he abused everybody, the doctor and all. All except his daughter. Her cheerful way of talking to him, her constant, unvarying care of him through his spasms, and her bright, smiling face, and ready, willing hand, were all too valuable to him, to have him chase her from the room as he did every one else.

Charlotte Lester was blessed with strong health, strong nerves, a strong constitution and a strong mind. She had none of the nervous attacks which characterize a fine lady. Not that she did not take thought and care for her health; and she was worth all the care which she took of herself. She was not one of that class that wear paper shoes, and dance till morning, and eat oyster suppers at all hours of the night, and lie in bed all day afterwards. She knew the value of her health, and she preserved it as one would a precious jewel. Almost all the young ladies round had been ill, and called in Doctor Scott; Charlotte had never been able to get up even an influenza for the purpose.

But her father was taken ill; and insisted on sending for the new doctor; and Charlotte's heart beat a little quicker than its wonted tone, when, day after day, the manly and noble form of John Scott brought a light and beauty into her father's sick room. She listened to his finely toned voice, as it poured forth a full stream of conversation, that kept the sufferer from even thinking of his pains, for hours together. She looked at his broad, open brow, his cheek brown with exercise in the open air, and the heavy waves of dark hair which shaded his temples. She looked still more at those great brown eyes, so sparkling, yet so soft in their expression—and there! we might as well tell the whole truth—Charlotte loved the doctor, before he—indifferent old bachelor that he was—ever thought of her.

She loved him, but she did not pine nor grow pale. She did not write poetry, nor talk to the stars. That might be the natural and inevitable expression of some hearts, but it was not hers. She dressed her hair as tastefully as ever, wore her most becoming gowns, and was as bright, as rosy and as cheerful as her nature dictated.

But all the time, like Desdemona, she could not help wishing that "Heaven had made her such a man," as Doctor John; and yet she treated him as frankly as if no such wish had ever entered her heart. It was not in John Scott's nature, however, to watch such a woman long, without acknowledging her worth; and by-and-by, he became suddenly aware that she blushed deeply, whenever he entered the room. He thought how handsome it made her rather plain face, and what a sweet expression, after all, there was on that plain face. John had been a worshipper of beautiful faces; but Charlotte Lester's face had something above beauty.

He went oftener after this; indeed Mr. Lester could not do without him; and one day, when the patient was asleep, the doctor and nurse entered into a mutual engagement to unite their services; and when he awoke it was to find that he had a son added to his family, if he chose to consider him as such. Mr. Lester was so happy that he forgot his gout for the rest of the day; and Charlotte looked perfectly radiant.

It was arranged that Mr. Scott and Mr. Lester were to occupy apartments in the house that was now to be the doctor's home. Each of the fathers was to have his own separate man-servant, and to be perfectly independent of the family. It was Charlotte's plan, and was quite successful. The two old gentlemen thus preserved the greatest possible freedom in all their arrangements, and left the rest of the family equally so in their own. How happy was Mr. Scott, to find himself once more in a home. Charlotte's attention to him was her crowning perfection in her husband's eyes, and even her own father, exacting as he was, was pleased to see her ministering kindly to his old friend.

Alas, for poor little Anne Avelin! She found, too late, that her choice had been a fatal one for her own happiness. There was a heavy failure, a violent, self-inflicted death, and then Bertrand's name was spoken of no more. Anne found a home with the doctor, where he and Charlotte gave all the consolation which their tender hearts could suggest; and in time her tears were dried. She has found a new home with one whom she thinks has no equal except Dr. John.

UNFEELING.

A distinguished member of the Legislature was addressing a temperance society, and he got rather prosy, but showed no disposition to "let up," though the audience "waxed thin."

Finally, the presiding officer got excited, and repairing to a friend of the speaker, inquired how much longer he might reasonably be expected to speak. Whereupon the friend answered he didn't know; when he got on this branch of the subject he generally spoke a couple of hours.

"That'll never do—I've got a few remarks to make myself," said the president; "how shall I stave him off?"

"Well, I don't know. In the first place, I should pinch his leg; and then if he would not stop, stick a pin in it."

The president returned to his seat, and his head was invisible for a moment. Soon after, he returned to the "brother" who had recommended the pin style of treatment, and said:

"I pinched him, and he didn't take the least notice at all. I stuck a pin in his leg, but he didn't seem to care a darn; I crooked it in, and he kept spouting as hard as ever."

"Very likely," said the wag; "that leg was cork!"—Taunton Reporter.

THE POET'S DIRGE.

BY T. W. MEACHER, M. D.

O, when my breast its final rest
Shall seek in happy realms above,
When free from care and dark despair,
My weary soul shall sweetly share
The scenes of endless love:

Then make my grave by the briny wave,
Beside some cavern deep and lone,
Where man can bring no venom'd sting,
But where the sea-birds nightly sing
My dirge in sorrow's tone!

There lay my head, when I am dead,
No step shall seek the lonely spot—
Let none prepare to record there,
A stone to breathe with flattery's air
A name to be forgot.

Let none retrace with solemn face
The joys of sunny hours fled,
When through the maze of pleasure's ways
My steps from sound discretion strays,
By youthful passion led.

But this I claim, that when my frame
Shall cease this weary, earthly strife,
One sigh sincere—one heartfelt tear
From memory's fount shall then appear
From one I loved in life!

THE STUDENT'S RESOLVE.

BY GRACE FLETCHER.

"LEONARD," said Mrs. Hastings, entering her room with the air of one extremely fatigued; the person addressed, a tall, fine-looking young man, raised himself from his lounging position on a sofa, took his eyes from the book he held in his hand, and turned them towards his mother; "Leonard, your cousin Helen is coming this evening." A shrug of the shoulders announced that Leonard had not lost the sense of hearing. "So attend to me," remonstrated his mother; "there you are reading again."

"I will attend to you with pleasure," replied her son, rising to his feet, "but I was not aware that so unimportant an event required an unusual degree of attention."

"Surely you must know, Leonard, that I have been making preparations for her all the week, and I have now got everything unpacked and put away except a large box of books which I intended arranging in her cases this morning, but Ann has just brought me word that the cook has scalded her hand, and I shall have to go down to the kitchen, so I want you to assist me a little."

"What, in getting the dinner?" inquired her son. "Really I should be very happy, were not my skill confined to consuming rather than preparing edibles."

"Pshaw! I wish you to arrange those books, for I shall have no time. You are so fond of reading that I should imagine you would like the employment."

"Arrange a woman's library! Sentimental novels, albums, keepsakes, and five-volumed romances! Mother, you have sufficient ingenuity in devising punishments to fit you for a grand inquisitor. However, I obey."

So saying, he proceeded to the room designated by his mother, where, in a large box before a bookcase, lay rather an extensive collection of books. The room itself was an extremely pleasant one. Large and airy, the windows curtained with lace, the floor covered with a soft, delicately tinted carpet, the walls adorned with a series of excellent engravings and one or two paintings, a piano occupying a recess, a bird-cage hanging in the window, it seemed as pleasant a retreat as weary mortal could inhabit.

"Fond of birds," said Leonard, glancing at the cage; "always my aversion, except those gorgeous-winged beauties which keep perpetual silence. A canary is a deafening little pest. Italian songs, eh?" picking up a sheet of music from the piano; "probably Miss Helen manufactures her own Italian. Let me see her books." Opening the case, he drew forth a volume of the Scottish Chiefs. "Just as I supposed," he said with a half smile; "music, birds and romances are a woman's constant associates. What comes next? Byron, with a mark at the 'Two Foscari!' You improve, Helen; I expected to hear you quote the 'Hours of Idleness' to me. Faust? and in the original? Ah, a blue! I fancy I see her. Tall, straight, inky fingers, eyes in a 'fine frenzy rolling,' hair in disorder! I must lock up my books when I go down, for I can't afford to have them spoiled by a woman's molesting fingers. Abbot's Napoleon, and pretty well thumbed too; a hero worshipper, eh? I'm agreed, provided she don't mistake me for a hero. Shakespeare, and underlined, as I live! This is more promising. Bulwer—there's the woman again—and Dickens too. I'll wager that this Dombey is blistered at 'little Paul.' Just as I expected. A girl never reads Dickens without making it a point to shed tears. Mrs. Tighe's Psyche—that's good again. Intellectual Philosophy! You must be a curiosity, my cousin, if your books are the index of your intellect. What's this? English history—Hume—unread, I'll wager. I never saw a woman yet who knew anything of history but what she learned in Scott's novels. Well, well! I shall never finish my own reading, if I am to make comments on all these literary treasures; so mount up, poetry and prose, history and historical novel, to your places all, and let me entreat you so to enchant your mistress that she shall not attempt to enchant me."

And with a sigh of relief, Leonard resumed his lounge and his book until summoned to dinner.

"You will be here to receive Helen?" said his mother, as she saw him preparing for a stroll when the meal was over.

"Not I, in faith. She will be expecting to see me, and be arrayed in smiles and armed with soft speeches for an attack on my fortress. No, let me see her when she does not anticipate my coming, and I warrant I shall take her at a disadvantage."

"You are uncharitable, Leonard," said his mother, with a smile.

"Uncharitable! A woman should never talk of charity until she makes her acquaintance. Don't scold, mother, I'm off; make my apologies to the fair Helen, and say that business deprived me of the pleasure of forming her acquaintance this evening. I shall see her in the morning."

And see her he did—do not you also, dear reader?—standing yonder, on tiptoe, in the broad window-sill, feeding her birds and whistling to them like a school-boy; an unfeminine accomplishment this, perhaps, but one in which Helen Grafton was proficient. Her light, elastic, graceful form, raised to its full height and not then attaining woman's middle stature, her short, thick curls clustering on her neck, her bright eyes raised, black and laughing, to her feathered pets, her full crimson lips, now puckered for a whistle, now opening with a song or a laugh, she seems altogether unlike either a blue or a sentimental damsel, but still to Leonard Hastings, who is pre-determined to find fault, seems something worse than either.

"A romp—a young Amazon!" he muttered, as he came slowly up the garden-path. "I detest a hoyden, but if I let her see it she will probably settle into a Madonna-like repose, which in her would be still more unendurable. Ah, Fanny, you have spoiled me for all woman-kind!"

This pathetic exclamation, which was uttered with a sigh so deep that it almost realized one's idea of a groan, requires, perhaps, some explanation.

Leonard Hastings, who was now about twenty-three, had at the age of seventeen imagined himself to be desperately enamored of one of his only sister's school-friends, who was about five years his senior. Like all boys of his age, he fancied his destiny was fixed by the first glance he caught of Fanny's eyes, and forthwith began to make himself appear excessively foolish. He wrote "sonnets to his mistress's eyebrow," poems to her eyes, odes to her golden curls, engraved her name on every tree within the circuit of his walks.

Now Fanny Gray, besides being engaged before she met this passionate youth, and therefore fancying herself secure, had a spice of the coquette in her disposition, and seeing the impression she produced, she sang to him, played for him, waltzed with him, rambled in the moonlight by his side, and finally listened to his declaration of undying love (which she wrote that night to her lover was filched partly from Byron, partly from Hamlet, and in part from the stilted style in which he had ranted since he knew her) with a laugh, avowed her previous engagement, and called him a silly boy. The epithet stung him, and venting his rage only in the words "false girl," uttered in a tone and an attitude worthy of Forrest, he left her. For weeks, he found his sole enjoyment to consist in repeating, "Frailty, thy name is woman!" and in destroying those poetical effusions which had lately cost him so much time and trouble.

Coming finally to the deplorable conclusion that his heart was broken, he took to Byron collars and heavy sighs, allowed his curls to grow long, and made an ineffectual effort to cultivate a moustache, which he fancied would impart an interesting pallor to his complexion. At college he recovered his spirits sufficiently to allow him to acquit himself creditably, studied law for a time after graduating, but finding that his heart was in danger of repairing the rupture it had sustained, he abjured Blackstone, returned home, revived his taste for sentimental and pastoral poetry, and resolved to spend his life in seclusion.

In this state of inglorious ease he had lived for several months, when the death of a relative imposed a new care on his mother, and Helen's appearance seemed likely to interrupt his schemes of indolent solitude. Having by dint of great effort transformed himself into a woman hater, he had resolved to dislike her; and though his first view of her convinced him of her beauty and graceful ways, he fortified himself still more strongly in his resolution to find fault. Accordingly, when introduced by his mother, he made her a Sir Charles Grandison bow, inquired after her health in the stiffest manner, as though his words were stayed with whalebones, remarked on the beauty of the weather, and taking up his favorite book, began reading.

Now Helen, having heard not a little of his story before her arrival, was neither disconcerted nor vexed by his want of politeness, but taking her work, seated herself by her aunt and began chatting in the most confidential and coaxing way in the world. Leonard's book puzzled him that morning; he could make no sense of it; and his mother being called from the room by household affairs, he found himself ere long engaged in a conversation with his cousin, more entertaining and less pedantic than any he had held with a woman for years. Not that they did not talk on his favorite topic, books, but that meeting a taste as delicate, a critical judgment as accurate as his own, he did not, as he was wont, offer his opinions as though they were Median laws and undisputable, but found himself yielding and complying before he was aware.

Asking her at last to sing to him, when she chose a song which Fanny had often warbled, he did not agonize his face, as had been his custom, "into more lines than are in the new map, with the addition of the Indies," nor, clapping his hands to his ears, rush frantically from the room, but standing quietly at Helen's side, began to have a dim idea that perhaps there were more Fannies in the world than one. What it was that induced him as he left the room to exclaim, "a heart as sound as a bell," with an inexpressible expression, I am puzzled to say. He found, however, that his solitary pursuits began to grow wearisome; even Spenser and a seat in the grass under his favorite elm, once his bean ideal of happiness, made him uneasy and discontented. He came at length to the conclusion that it would be an act of charity to sound Helen's understanding, to find wherein she was deficient, and endeavor to supply her defects by his own superior wisdom.

He commenced, therefore, to catechise her, but found to his surprise that in his favorite subjects she was as well versed as himself, and that her knowledge of abstruser topics was not so limited as he had thought to find it. He discovered that he had an original mind to deal with, many of whose workings were to him incomprehensible. The more he studied it, the greater was his puzzle; and he gave up his laudable efforts at improvement, with a conviction that though he did not fully understand her, he understood well that he was at last utterly, irretrievably, passionately in love—a love that was no more like his former romantic, boyish fancy, than Fanny's blue eyes were like Helen's dark irids. With this important fact presenting itself to his consideration, he set about removing any unfavorable impression he might have produced on his cousin. He read to her, talked in a new style altogether, and never doubted that he was making rapid inroads on her heart.

"Shall I read to you, Helen?" he asked one day, when he found her intent upon her needle-work.

"Yes, if you will lay aside Thomson and find Miss Barrett."

"What shall I read?"

"Whatever you please; there is no choice in Miss Barrett's writings."

"You are enthusiastic, Helen. For my part, I prefer the 'Seasons.'"

"Because you are a Vandal, a Goth. But go on reading."

The piece Leonard selected was, "He giveth his beloved sleep." As he finished the second verse, he stopped.

"I can imagine," said he, "what you would give to your beloved, Helen. 'The poet's star-tuned harp,' would you not?"

"No, certainly not," she replied, without lifting her eyes; "but finish your reading—we will talk afterward."

A sweet, full-toned voice, a deep appreciation of what he read, gave Leonard's reading a peculiar charm which lingered after he had concluded. Both sat silent for a few moments, when Helen asked suddenly:

"What have you done all your life, Leonard?"

"All my life!" he answered, laughing; "why, in the earlier part of my career I cried, laughed, kicked, and performed various other gymnastic exercises, to the great benefit of my constitution."

"I mean since you returned from college."

His reply was not delivered as confidently as it had often been before, for he had an intuitive impression that Helen would not approve it.

"When I left college, I commenced studying law, tired of it, and am here."

"And why did you tire of it?"

"My dear cousin, law is a series of petty artifices for evading truth; lawyers are devoted to chicanery and trick."

"I beg your pardon. Brougham is a lawyer, and Webster another."

"Exceptions prove the rule, Helen."

"I do not believe that. But what have you done at home?"

"Read poetry, wrote it sometimes, and lost myself in reverie."

"And you are contented?"

"Contented! with this lovely scenery around me, this most glorious sky over my head, the water's rippling music in my ear, with you beside me, Helen? With my books, I should be contented to dream my life away here. You look grave, Helen."

"I should not, perhaps," she answered, "for it is not my future you speak of. But it is not thus I should spend my life, were I a man. You asked me if I would endow my beloved with the poet's gifts. No, I told you. I would not while the 'senate's shout' lay still beyond."

"I thought, Helen, that you liked poets."

"And so I do. I admire no man more than him to whom God has vouchsafed the gift of song. But my admiration does not extend to those whom the world miscalls poets. The essence of poetry is sublimity, is it not? And tell me if it be not more sublime to rush forward in the race of true ambition, to reach the goal most surely and swiftly, and earn a name among the great, than to sit idling and dreaming in beautiful solitudes, scribbling pastoral idyls. Poetry! I like the poetry of action and feeling. And how can a man write the poetry of action while he is inactive? how the poetry of feeling when, apart from the world, his emotions are morbid, his passions unhealthy?"

"Then you do not think a man should be a poet?"

"Yes; but not a mere rhymers, a versifier. His poetry should be that of energy, ambition, action. Repose is the luxury of age; action, the duty of the young. Shame on the man who wastes his youth in dreaming! he robs his age of its most precious privilege."

"You are severe, Helen," said Leonard, rising slowly and with a white face. In an instant Helen was at his side.

"I beg your pardon, Leonard," she said softly. "I have been talking of what I know nothing. I am very sorry."

"You have spoken only the truth," was the slow answer.

"I have offended you, Leonard—pray forgive me."

"Not offended, Helen, but wounded me deeply."

He was gone before Helen could reply. For several days she saw him but little. His mornings were spent in his own room, and if he joined her as she sang in the twilight, he made not the most distant allusion to their conversation. He called to her one morning as she ran past his window, and in a moment was at her side.

"I leave this afternoon, Helen," he said.

"Where are you going?"

"To the city."

"And why?"

"To go to work—to retrieve my past errors—to make myself worthy of you, Helen."

Helen's color changed, and he went on, speaking passionately and fast.

"I will not say I love you, Helen, for you cannot but know it. I will not ask you to promise yourself to me, for no one can feel more deeply than myself how unworthy I am of such a promise. Your eyes tell me that when I prove myself capable of amendment, you will not reject me. God bless you, Helen!"

Once more a student, Leonard's progress was rapid. Independently of his great natural abilities, which were capable of attaining their object in any case, his love threw a radiance across his way which dispelled every shadow. He began his career anew, with the hope of pleasing and winning Helen. Long before the task was accomplished, ambition had become its own "exceeding great reward." Labor grew sweet for its own sake, and his chief regret in looking back at his past life ceased to be that Helen was still beyond his reach, but that he had wasted in inactivity the time which would have enabled him to gain her without a new effort. And when, his probation ended, he was acknowledged the most promising lawyer of his day, he felt that even had Helen been out of the question, the consciousness of his powers which he had gained would have amply repaid him for every exertion he had put forth.

From this time, his progress was rapid. Called from one post of honor to another, his course was marked by a straightforward uprightness that met approbation from men of all parties. Directing his energies to the furtherance of right and justice, his eloquence became a weapon, broad as the shield of Hercules, pointed as St. George's lance, in the defence of liberty and law.

Not till then did he renew his suit. He had seen Helen, but not often, since he had first left her, and never had he renewed the subject then begun, for he had determined not to approach her until he had abundant proof of his fitness.

As for Helen, she had changed but little in Leonard's absence. No woman learns that she is beloved without becoming more lovely, and she, in the transition from seventeen to twenty-two, had but perfected her beauty. Watching his course with a pride that not even his mother's could surpass, she had the additional satisfaction of knowing that hers had been the power which had roused him from his lethargy—awakened that noble ambition without which man is but a mere machine.

"Have you seen the evening papers, Helen?" asked Mrs. Hastings, approaching her niece with them in her hand. They contain the announcement of the close of the legislative session and one of Leonard's long speeches. He will be here to-morrow, probably."

Taking the papers and retiring to her favorite seat in the garden, Helen just avoided meeting Leonard, who, having started for home in the morning, had just arrived, dusty and tired, and impatient to learn his fate. Short, therefore, were his affectionate greetings to his mother, and hasty his replies to her congratulatory questions. Learning Helen's occupation and whereabouts, he sprang down the path in pursuit, and drawing the paper gently from her hands, playfully bade her listen to an oral report on a more interesting topic.

"You were my incentive, Helen," he concluded, after a hasty sketch of his conduct. "But for you I should still have been dreaming under these old elms, and since you have thrown me upon a rougher path, may I not hope that you will at least share it with me?"

And Helen's answer came, clear and distinct, and like Fame she smiled approval, and Leonard, clasping her in his arms, cried, with Harley L'Estrange: "Blessed be the woman who exalts."

AUNT LIZZIE'S COURTSHIP.

"Why, you see, when my man came courtin' me, I hadn't the least thought of what he was after—not I. Jobie came to our house one night, after dark, and rapped at the door. I opened it, and sure enough there was Jobie. 'Come in,' sez I; 'take a cheer.' 'No, Lizzie,' sez he, 'I've come of an arrant, and I alwus do my arrants fast.' 'But you had better come in and take a cheer, Mr. W——.' 'No, I can't. The fact is, Lizzie, I've come on this ere courtin' business. My wife's been dead these three weeks, and everything's goin' to rack an' ruin right along. Now, Lizzie, if you're a mind to have me, an' take care of my house, an' my children, an' my things, tell me, and I'll come in an' take a cheer; if not, I'll get some one else tu.' Why I was skeer'd and sed—'If you come on this courtin' business, come in. I must think on't a little.' 'No, I can't till I know. That's my arrant. And I can't sit down till my arrant's done.' 'I should like to think on't a day or two.' 'Now you needn't, Lizzie.' 'Well, Jobie, if I must, I must—so here's tu ye then.' So Mr. W—— came in. Then he went after the squire and he married us right off, and I went home with Jobie that very night. I tell you what it is, these long courtin's don't amount to nothing at all. Just as well to do it in a hurry.'—New York Mercury.

Every woman is, or ought to be, more or less a child of beauty, and her occupations should not degrade her into a drudge.

CURRAN.

One morning, at an inn in the south of Ireland, a gentleman travelling upon mercantile business came running down stairs a few minutes before the appearance of the stagecoach, in which he had taken a seat for Dublin. Seeing an ugly little fellow leaning against the doorpost, with dirty face and shabby clothes, he hailed him and ordered him to brush his coat. The operation proceeding rather slowly, the impatient traveller cursed the lazy valet for an idle, good-for-nothing dog, and threatened him with corporal punishment on the spot, if he did not make haste and finish his job well before the arrival of the coach. Terror seemed to produce its effect; the fellow finished the coat and then the trowsers, with great diligence, and was rewarded with sixpence, which he received with a low bow. The gentleman went into the bar, and paid his bill, just as the expected vehicle reached the door. Upon getting inside, guess his astonishment to find his friend the quondam waiter, snugly seated in one corner, with all the look of a person well used to comfort. After two or three hurried glances to be sure his eyes did not deceive him, he commenced a confused apology for his blunder, condemning his own stupidity; but he was speedily interrupted by the other exclaiming, "O, never mind, make no apologies—these are hard times, and it is well to earn a trifle in an honest way—I am obliged to you for your handsome fee for so small a job—my name, sir, is John Philpot Curran, pray what is yours?" The other was thunderstruck by the idea of such an introduction; but the drollery of Curran soon overcame his confusion; and the traveller never rejoiced less at the termination of a long journey, than when he beheld the distant spires of Dublin glitter in the light of the setting sun.—Mackenzie.

ETIQUETTE OF VISITING CARDS.

When you drop your piece of pasteboard anywhere, even in the very genteel neighborhood, let it be a piece of pasteboard, and nothing more, except in being engraven with your name and address. Do not, at any rate, let your card be enamelled. The enamel is prepared from lead; and the process of applying it is stated, on good authority, to produce paralysis of the hands, and other miserable complaints, among the poor people engaged in this ridiculous manufacture. A shiny card imparts no lustre to the name upon it; but communicates an appearance of vulgar glitter to the table or shelf whereon it is deposited. If you rejoice in polish, concentrate that quality on your manners, conversation and boots. In case you feel it absolutely necessary to display your taste in your visiting cards, have them embossed; and then it will be as well also for you to wear lace-collars and shirt-cuffs of the same material. But eschew those cards that are enamelled, and which, to the enlightened eye, are glazed with what may be called a shine taken out of the health of unhappy victims afflicted with palsy and colic.—London Punch.

A young person thinks it enough to do right. As he grows older, he finds it necessary to satisfy others that he has done so. Much of the time that might be spent in doing well must be used in securing evidence that we have not done ill.

LINES

Written to accompany a gift of Longfellow's Poems.

BY D. C. STURGES.

Take thou these pages:—and if grief oppress
Thy heart,—or if thy soul be full of joy—
Or if to pensiveness thou dost incline—
Or if thou lookest with tear-blinded eyes
Upon the past,—or on the future gaze—
Their melody shall wait upon thy thoughts
With gentlest ministrations! Thou shalt find
Thy sorrow chastened into happy tears;
And joy shall like a lunar-rainbow crown
Thy brows with richer beauty. Pensiveness,
That like an autumn twilight fills thy heart
With shadowy enchantments, shall be turned Into an angel presence, bearing peace!
As the spring calls up the buried flowers,
So shall these songs call up thy buried past,
Making its memory beautiful—like flowers!
Great thoughts are here, thoughts which give such a light
As that which kissed the pallid brow of Christ!
Music is here,—rich as the voice of God;
And if thou bringest an attentive ear,
Thou shalt hear revelations. Listen, then!
Is music not the bride of prophecy?
The swift intelligence that waits on love
Delights in harmony. Poet and seer!
These are the wedded oracles of Heaven,
To whom the future lies in lucid light!

THE GOVERNESS.

BY MRS. MARY MAYNARD.

"SHALL I open the window and let in the sunshine, Miss Mary? You will die if you sit here moping and fretting in this dark room."

"No, thank you, Jane. I am coming down to receive a visitor presently, and I prefer this room as it is."

"But you don't know how it breaks my heart to see you so sorrowful. All the fretting in the world won't bring the master back, and yet you let the grief wear your life out."

"I shall soon be better, Jane; only don't tease me any more just now, for I have some papers to look over, and I cannot talk to you. You had better go down and tell the cook to prepare a luncheon for a gentleman who has had a long ride this morning."

"I wish you would eat something yourself, Miss Mary," grumbled Jane, as she left the room.

For a few moments Mary Stanford sat motionless, with her hands pressed tightly over her eyes, as if to shut out light, and thought, and the remembrance of her sorrow; and then she arose, and with a determined expression on her pale face, and in her sunken eyes, she approached a desk, unlocked it, and drew forth a large package of papers. She shuddered as she touched them; but the time had come when all finer feelings must be banished, and business—the cold, calculating business of the world—must be attended to.

We must now leave her, bending sadly over her task, and give her a fuller introduction to the reader.

Her father, Thomas Stanford, Esq., or Squire Stanford, as he was most familiarly and commonly called, was the only son of John Stanford, who had descended from a long line of Stanfords, all rich farmers, and dwelling in that beautiful county, commonly called "the garden of England." For three generations the heirs to the Stanford estate had been "only sons," and as each father in turn had left it to his child, enriched and improved by good management and care, it was not to be wondered at that on his death-bed John Stanford left his son a richer inheritance than had ever belonged to any one of their forefathers.

But alas! for the honor of the old name and the old family, Thomas Stanford proved himself unworthy of the trust committed to his charge; and scarcely was the body of his deceased parent consigned to the grave, ere he commenced a course of dissipation and extravagance that must have scattered the largest fortune in a few years. Twelve months after his father's death, he married a beautiful girl; but whose chief charm, in his eyes, was her fortune—a very handsome one, by the way—and when united with her beauty and amiable disposition, ought to have made him a happy man. But increased wealth gave increased motives for expenditure, and his poor, neglected wife soon had reason to repent her marriage with one who had captivated her fancy and not her judgment.

Their beautiful home was a rendezvous for all the wild, careless young reprobates in the neighborhood, who found it exactly suitable to their taste and their convenience to "drink Stanford's wines," to "ride Stanford's horses," "eat Stanford's good dinners," and to be waited upon by "Stanford's servants." And even the penniless younger sons of some of the neighboring nobility did not think it beneath their dignity to hunt, to gamble, to drink with "Squire Stanford,"—even sometimes to borrow an "odd fifty," well knowing that their careless host would never demand payment.

Poor Mrs. Stanford dragged out a miserable existence; outwardly surrounded with all life's comforts, inwardly pining for rest and quietness. Of four beautiful children, one only remained to bless her with its innocent love and fond care-es; and when, after thirteen years of misery, she was about to leave the scene of her wretchedness, the thought of this child and her uncertain fate, was all that could bring back her thoughts to earth.

She died, and for a time there was peace in the noisy mansion; and Stanford shunned his dissolute companions, and wore some outward appearance of regret; but when the first shock was over, he stifled the reproaches of conscience by plunging deeper than ever in those intoxicating pleasures that eventually proved his ruin. Gambling had become his favorite passion, and nothing but his skill and extraordinary success could possibly have enabled him to keep up the appearance he had always done, or surround himself with those luxuries that were necessary to his very existence. He had his little girl instructed by competent teachers, but kept her entirely secluded, rarely seeing her himself, and never allowing strangers to behold her if he could prevent it.

His affairs gradually grew from bad to worse. He was deeply involved in debt, and having always despised agriculture, and neglected his estate, he had no resources when once his money was spent. The estate itself was deeply mortgaged, and for several years, Thomas Stanford's life was a miserable struggle to keep up appearances and baffle creditors.

Meanwhile, his daughter was growing up to womanhood, and not all her seclusion or retirement could prevent the neighbors knowing that she, who should have been the heiress of the beautiful old estate, was both lovely and amiable, though dowerless and unprovided for; and deep was the sympathy felt for the motherless daughter. But Mary sought no one's society; absorbed in her cares and anxieties, she sighed not to mingle with those happier than herself, and was content to hide herself from the sight of inquisitive eyes, within the walls of her beloved home, occupied in devising plans for counteracting the destructive effects of her father's misguided course. But an end was most unexpectedly put to all her hopes and fears relative to her unfortunate parent. Thomas Stanford left a boon companion's house late one night, more than half intoxicated, and at noon, next day, was carried to his home a mutilated corpse!

Poor Mary! It was but the realization of her worst fear, and though stunned by the shock, it could scarcely be said to be unexpected by her. She shut herself up in silence and darkness, to indulge, undisturbed, her feelings of horror and grief for her parent's untimely end; but the imperative call of business summoned her from this solitude, and she at once found herself called on to superintend the arrangement of affairs, thrown by carelessness and neglect into almost inextricable confusion.

Thomas Stanford had made no will—at first, considered somewhat strange, but when his accounts were examined more closely, not to be wondered at. Dissipation and extravagance had left him nothing to bequeath, and as Mary turned over pile after pile of unreceipted bills, bonds and notes, the conviction came gradually upon her that she was utterly destitute. It needed but one more blow, and her cup of sorrow was full; and that blow was not long in coming.

Pale, harassed, and worn out with care and anxiety, she met her lawyer on the day the reader is first introduced to her. Even he, cold-hearted old man as he was, was touched with the sad and careworn look of his young client, and hastened over the unpleasant details of the late Squire's affairs as quickly as possible.

"And now, my dear young lady, I must hasten to the conclusion of my errand, and fulfil a promise I made to a friend of yours."

"A friend of mine, Mr. Thomson? I know very few people, and fewer friends."

"You know Sir Thomas Dashwood's son?"

"To my sorrow; but I trust he is not the friend you allude to?"

"It is, indeed; and though a person little used to love affairs, I am commissioned to make you an offer of his hand and heart."

"Is this an insult, Mr. Thomson?"

The young girl was very pale, and there was something in her tone that startled the old man.

"My dear lady, you must not be too hasty. Young Dashwood makes you an offer that half the girls in the county would jump at. It is disinterested, too; for I suppose you know in what position he stands in regard to this house and property, and all it contains?"

"What can Gregory Dashwood possibly have to do with my father's house?" And even while she spoke a conviction of the truth caused her to tremble and sink half fainting into the chair.

"For many years your late father had no claim on this property whatever, and at the present time Gregory Dashwood is the owner of every inch of land, every animal on the place, every article of furniture in the house, the pictures, the plate, and even your jewelry and ornaments."

For a few moments she sat gazing on her companion, as if stupefied with the overwhelming intelligence he had communicated; then came the full sense of her position, and with it courage and strong resolution to meet her fate. Rising, with dignity, she bowed to the old lawyer.

"Our conference is ended, sir. Had I been aware of my true position, it would never have taken place."

"One word, Miss Stanford, before we part: What answer shall I take back to the young gentleman whose proposal I have laid before you?"

The angry color flushed the girl's fair face, and her dark eyes flashed, as resting her hand on the door, she turned to her companion:

"Tell him the daughter of the man he robbed and murdered despises him and his offer; that sooner than become his wife she would beg her bread from door to door, or be the willing slave of the hardest taskmaster; and tell him," and here she lowered her voice until it was a harsh whisper,—“tell him that with his ill-gotten gains he will receive the orphan's curse.”

Five minutes after, Mary lay fainting and insensible on her chamber floor, but ere the sun rose on the morrow, the last of the Stanfords went forth from the old mansion a destitute and penniless orphan.

In a splendid chamber of Sir Thomas Dashwood's magnificent country house, were seated two persons in deep conversation—they were the heir and Lawyer Thomson. The young man was negligently dressed, but there was enough of studied carelessness in his attire, to display the foppish follower of fashion. The costly dressing-gown and richly embroidered slippers, the downy sofa cushions and the embroidered handkerchief, were in keeping with the well-known character of the man; wealthy, effeminate, with luxurious tastes and no principle, caring for no one's sacrifices so that his comforts were not abridged, for no one's feelings, so that his whims were not thwarted.

At the moment he is introduced to the reader, Gregory Dashwood was in a most ungovernable fit of passion; and even the old lawyer drew back in alarm at the fearful change that came over his companion on hearing the history of his unsuccessful interview with Mary.

"And that is the return for all my patience, for all my anxiety about that haughty beauty? but she shall learn that I am not to be thwarted so. Fool that I was not to have turned old Stanford out long ago, and then her father's authority would have compelled that proud girl to listen to me!"

Gregory Dashwood felt very irritable, and as a soother, he sprang up hastily from his seat, and opening a closet, poured out and drank off several glasses of wine.

"Help yourself, Thomson," he at last said, setting the rich stand and glasses on the table, and walking hastily up and down the room.

The exercise gave him resolution; for, with an exclamation that caused Mr. Thomson to spill the wine he was in the act of carrying to his lips, the young man stopped before him, saying:

"She shall be mine in spite of all her daring speeches and proud scorn! I swear she shall! and I will never rest until my oath is fulfilled."

"I should advise you to be satisfied with what you have got, and comfort yourself with the thought that, if she has scorned you, you have consigned her to poverty." And Lawyer Thomson held up his third glass of wine, and admired its bright sparkle as the light shone through it.

"What is all of old Stanford's property to me?" he asked, as he turned from a long gaze out of the window. "Look there," he added, drawing aside the curtains, and pointing with his white hand to the magnificent landscape beyond. "Think you the heir of yon broad acres cares aught for the paltry farm of the old spendthrift? You might know me better, Thomson. But I love that proud, pale girl, and at this moment would sacrifice half my inheritance could I make her mine."

"The greater fool you," said the old lawyer, angrily. "Why did you not strive to win her good will, instead of making her hate you, by leading her father to destruction? You have destroyed your own plans by your headstrong foolishness."

"It was your advice, and to you I am indebted for my good fortune," was the still more angry answer.

Lawyer Thomson went away highly displeased, while Gregory again flung himself on his velvet couch to deliberate on the most effectual method of getting the orphan into his power.

Pity that so fine a face should become wrinkled and prematurely old by such wearying and perplexing thoughts; pity that such a bright intellect should become enfeebled and debased by the destroying influence of profligate habits; pity, ten thousand pities, that the glorious, the immortal soul, once innocent and pure, should become sullied, darkened, perhaps lost, through a blind and headlong pursuit of pleasure!

"I have heard of a governess to-day, girls, that will suit us admirably," exclaimed Mrs. Bancroft Adams, as she entered her daughters' room on her return from paying some friendly visits.

"Who is she?" "Where did you find her?" exclaimed both the young ladies at once.

"My friend, Mrs. Lapointe, heard of her through some acquaintance of hers, in some out-of-the-way place down in Kent; and as she knew we wanted a governess, she let me know at once, and I have sent to secure her."

"Is she young?" asked both the daughters in a breath.

"I don't know, I am sure; some poor farmer's daughter, I believe; educated altogether beyond her station, and now obliged to get her own living."

"O, some great awkward country girl, I suppose," said Miss Sophia Adams, turning to her mirror, and finishing the arrangement of her numerous ringlets with much satisfaction.

"With such a healthy red face that it will be perfectly distressing to look at her," drawled Miss Almira Adams, gracefully falling back on her couch, and holding her salts in her hand for fear she should require them.

"Never mind, so as she has not got red hair," laughed Miss Sophia.

This was a very spiteful speech, for Miss Almira's great trouble in this world was the color and quality of her tresses.

"I hope she will have decent looking hands and feet; for if there is one thing I dislike worse than another, it is a coarse fat hand and a great clumsy shoe."

Now if Miss Almira's obstinate red locks gave her endless trouble and anxiety, not less did Sophia's provokingly plump fingers occasion an endless annoyance to their fair owner.

The former spent two-thirds of her pocket money in procuring the most celebrated preparations for the improvement of her hair; the latter almost ruined herself in the purchase of kid gloves and satin slippers. But alas! for their laudable endeavors, the ungrateful tresses of the one persisted in standing up rough all over her head, or hanging in ragged looking curls on either side of her face; and the equally obstinate hands of the other continued to burst through all restraint, and at last began to grow purple, as if with suppressed anger at such treatment. These unceasing annoyances had a very injurious effect upon the temper of the young ladies, and materially assisted time in robbing them of their youthful charms.

Mrs. Bancroft Adams was a widow, and having four daughters to dispose of, and not a very large fortune at her command, she very wisely disposed of her house in London, and took up her residence in a fashionable resort for aristocratic invalids, where the beauty of the scenery was only surpassed by the beneficial effects of the Springs; where there were delightful opportunities for fishing or flirtation, for following the hounds for a day, or securing an eligible partner for life.

Mrs. Bancroft Adams was a most admirable manager, and with her very moderate fortune she contrived to keep up a very extensive appearance, so much so that most persons believed the Misses Adams to be almost heiresses. But in spite of all the traps and snares laid to catch unwary partners, the young ladies were still single, and likely to remain so. Of course this only relates to the two already introduced to the reader, the remaining pair being yet confined to the school room, and not supposed to indulge in anticipations of partners and pin money.

Now Mrs. Bancroft Adams might have lived forever at this fashionable idling place, and been no nearer the accomplishment of her object than at first, but for one lucky circumstance—she had an aunt, and this aunt was wealthy, rheumatic and fanciful, and annually made her niece's house her home at the season when the Springs were the gayest. In addition to her wealth, her rheumatism and ill temper, this lady was the widow of Sir Richard Walbridge, and a sort of female guardian to the young heir of Walbridge Manor, who, though several years past his majority, still showed his uncle's widow the same attention, respect and obedience he had rendered her in his boyhood. And if there was one weak spot in old Lady Walbridge's heart, it was love and admiration for the handsome young man, who was unto her even as a son.

As the young baronet always accompanied his aunt in her annual visit to the Springs, and spent the principal part of his time in Mrs. Bancroft Adams's pretty parlors, it was the means of bringing that enterprising lady under the notice of many who otherwise would have remained in blissful ignorance of her existence. When the party from the "Bancroft House" were seen on the beach, or enjoying the afternoon promenade in the "Avenue," all were delighted to claim acquaintance with the fortunate Mrs. Adams, as such an acquaintance was certain to lead to an introduction to Lady Walbridge, and from her to the handsome young Sir Richard, on whose arm the old lady always leaned.

At the time when this interesting family were introduced to my readers, they were busy in a thousand preparations for the expected arrival of their annual guests; hence the anxiety about a governess to take care of the two wild young hoydens in the nursery, who were Lady Walbridge's special aversion, and who repaid her dislike with interest whenever opportunity offered. Then the young ladies had quantities of mantua-making and millinery to attend to, in expectation of the approaching gaiety; and the great chamber had to be newly furnished throughout, as such changes pleased their visitor when abroad, however averse she was to making them in her own beautiful home.

Amid all this confusion, the arrival of the new governess was anxiously looked for and impatiently hurried. But alas for the disappointments we meet with in this world, scarcely had the stranger entered their doors ere the whole family would have given half they possessed to have found some reasonable excuse for hurrying her away again. The most hideous monster entering their home could not have caused more dismay in the hearts of the Misses Adams and their mama, than did the coming of that beautiful governess.

"She can't stay here, mama, that's certain," said Miss Sophia, as the three met in conclave soon after the stranger's arrival.

"But I have no time to look up another, and you know how Laura and Julia will act when Lady Walbridge comes; besides, there's such quantities of sewing to be done that I really do not think it best to send her away, setting aside offending Mrs. Lapointe, after she has taken so much trouble for me. O no, it will never do to let her go away; the only thing we can do is to keep her shut up in the nursery all the time they are here. You know Aunt Walbridge never goes there."

"O, she will be sure to go if we don't want her to," exclaimed Almira, crossly.

"I think mama's plan the best after all; so don't look so sulky about it, Mira, even if she is beautiful, and has magnificent hair."

"I'm sure she is not such a beauty as all that, even if she has white satin hands and a foot like an opera dancer," was Almira's cutting reply.

Poor Mary Stanford! her office was no sinecure in the establishment of Mrs. Adams; but, strange to say, from the two youngest she received the only comfort her situation produced. Completely fascinated by the beauty and winning manners of their new governess, Laura and Julia Adams yielded her obedience and respect, such as they had never before condescended to bestow on any one; and under her careful training and instruction, they no longer filled the house with noise and confusion, but studied and played as young ladies should.

Had it not been for her unfortunate good looks, Mrs. Adams could have found it in her heart to love the new governess, who had wrought so agreeable a change in her hopeful daughters; but it was out of the question to encourage so dangerous a rival to her older girls, consequently the lonely orphan was kept constantly employed in the children's room, and treated almost like a prisoner.

To one accustomed to freedom, such treatment would have been intolerable; but Mary Stanford had always been a recluse, and though she had a few recollections of stolen freedom, as will appear presently, yet on the whole confinement did not affect her very severely.

The intermediate time between her father's death and when we again meet her, had been passed at a quiet country parsonage, where her time had been fully employed in taking care of half a dozen little children, and nursing back to health their invalid mother. Having become necessary to the comfort of the family, she would probably never have left them, but for that "destiny" that Byron speaks of, that takes away our right or power to do always as we wish. This destiny came to Miss Stanford in the shape of the dissolute Gregory Dashwood, who having discovered her retreat, commenced a series of persecutions that eventually drove her away from her kind friends—a course of conduct that occasioned her much suffering at the time, but which afterwards proved to be the best thing that could have happened to her, and the very worst for the success of her enemy's plans.

True, all looked dark on her first arrival at "Bancroft House," but hope did not desert her even under her accumulated discomforts, and she still looked forward to a brighter day. The Misses Sophia and Almira would fain have gratified their ill nature and jealousy by openly displaying their dislike to the beautiful governess; but there was something in her manners, her voice, her dress, and her stately, reserved air, that forbade all freedom, and kept them well in check.

Their only satisfaction was in keeping her so busy that it was next to impossible to find time to attend to her own attire; but with all their contrivances, the beautiful braids were still wound gracefully round the loveliest head in the world; the same black dress was still worn with the same matchless ease and elegance; and worse than all, the little white hands became even smaller and whiter the longer their mistress was a prisoner.

"I never did hear the equal of that girl's impudence," exclaimed Miss Almira, as she burst into the room where her mother and sister were very busy in putting up muslin drapery on an old-fashioned square bedstead.

"What is the matter now?" asked the mother.

"Why, you know they are coming to-morrow, and here is my blue dress not done; and that girl, with all the airs in the world, says that she has more to do now than she can do, without neglecting the children. And when I told her she must leave everything, she had the impertinence to say that she certainly should not undertake it." And quite out of breath and temper, Miss Almira sank into a chair and cried for vexation.

"Why don't you do it yourself, or wear another to-morrow?" asked Sophia, highly amused at her sister's vexation.

"O, you know I like blue so well, and I left this to the last so as to get the prettiest pattern, and now that lazy thing won't help me to finish it. It is too bad!" And Miss Almira's tears streamed afresh at the annoying thought.

"There, don't be such a baby, for pity sake. Red hair is bad enough, but red eyes are dreadful." And Miss Sophia indulged in a hearty laugh, while her sister flounced out of the room in a towering passion.

The long talk of visitors came according to appointment, and were met by the mother and daughters with overwhelming kindness, and the most officious display of respect. Even Miss Almira was all smiles and blushes; for happily she had taken her sister's advice, and the much coveted blue dress adorned her little pinched figure.

After seeing his aunt safely installed in her new home, the young baronet took leave of her and proceeded to his boarding place, leaving the young ladies in ecstasies at the "great improvement in his looks," and "the elegant taste he always displays in his dress," "the rich tinge of brown on his cheek," and "the delightful set of his Paris coat."

"Yes, he looks very well," said Lady Walbridge, with a little laugh to herself. "Love agrees with him, I think."

"Love! Why, aunt, who is he in love with?" exclaimed all three ladies at once.

"O, I don't know much about it; but I suppose you will find it all out some time, girls; so give me my embroidery frame and my bag of silks, and don't talk any more about my nephew.—Have you got a governess to keep Jack and Tom in order?" she asked, after a few minutes' silence, during which the young ladies had been deliberating on the news they had just heard.

"O yes," said Mrs. Adams; "and they are so improved you would hardly know them."

"Bring them down," was the laconic reply.

And forthwith the young ladies with the masculine titles were brought down and presented to their relative, who laid down her work, took off her spectacles, and drawing them close to her, examined them very minutely with her little black eyes.

"Very much improved, I must say," was the first remark. "Who is your governess?" she added, turning to her niece.

"Only a poor country girl that a friend recommended to me," was Mrs. Bancroft Adams's answer, as she mentally framed some excuse for complying with the next request.

"I should like to see her, only I know she must be as ugly as sin, or you would not take her." And then the old lady laughed her little laugh.

"O no, indeed, ma'am, she is not ugly," said Julia, eagerly.

"She is very pretty indeed, ma'am," said Laura.

Lady Walbridge, evidently pleased at the change in their manners, asked them to sit down beside her and wind her silks, and tell her all about the new teacher.

Burns says our best laid plans are apt to become disarranged, and daily experience proves the truth of his assertion—at least, Miss Almira Adams would have willingly joined in the poet's opinion. It was vexatious, after all her trouble and pains, to find her deep laid schemes thus cruelly frustrated. In vain were all her studied charms, her well learned quotations, her blue dress and her bluer ribbons; there was not a hope left to cheer her that the young baronet might yet be hers; and the more she reflected on what Lady Walbridge had said, the more gloomy became her prospects.

It was well for all parties that the young lady did not know the exact state of the young gentleman's love affairs; but of that, we shall give more hereafter.

With the true spirit of a philosopher, after her first ebullition of disappointment, Miss Almira consoled herself that "nobody knew of that disappointment; and if she could not catch Sir Richard, there were other young baronets equally rich, if not equally handsome." And so she put on a brighter blue dress and adorned her "rosy locks" with wreaths of "forget-me-not," and seated herself in the drawing-room with her vinaigrette and the last "Lady's Own."

For several days after her arrival, Lady Walbridge made anxious inquiries about the "governess;" but finding that she was to be invisible, she very quietly walked up to the school room one morning, and surprised Mary in the midst of writing-books, slates, grammars, samplers, dictionaries, etc., not to mention half a dozen cambric handkerchiefs she had asked Sophia to hem for her on the previous day, and which she very unceremoniously told the young stranger to put down.

"If you are going to sew for me, do something that will help me. I have just commenced a slipper for my nephew, and you may take the mate if you will. I suppose you can embroider?" she asked, looking with much complacency on the fair young face that flushed and paled under her searching glance.

Mrs. Bancroft Adams's exclamation was a strange mingling of horror and astonishment, as two hours afterwards she opened the school-room door and beheld her titled relative in close conversation with the dreaded governess; each busily employed on the dainty, fancy work in her hand, while the little girls were attentively studying their tasks. Remonstrance was useless; so she could only shut the door, and walk tragically into her daughters' room, and inform them of their defeat.

"Just as I said," exclaimed Almira.

"Did you ever know such a provoking old thing?" echoed Miss Sophia. "The next thing she will have her down in the parlor to play for her."

Faithful prophet! That very evening the old lady desired that Miss Stanford might be summoned to the drawing-room, and for two hours the beautiful girl sat at the instrument playing piece after piece to gratify her new friend. One drop of sweet alone remained in the cup of the baffled schemers—not a visitor came in during the evening, and Sir Richard was otherwise engaged, and could not come to call on his relative.

The next morning Lady Walbridge expressed it as her opinion that the children and their governess ought to go out into the air more than they were in the habit of doing; and as there was no time like the present, they had better go at once.

"Poor sickly-looking things! shut up in a nursery forever; and that pale girl, too! They must not stop in another hour." And in her excitement about it, the old lady made a mistake in her pattern.

Mrs. Adams made so many excuses that at last the children were compelled to remain at home; but Miss Stanford "must go;" so poor Mary mechanically put on her bonnet and mantle, and obeyed the command.

A great change had come over the governess since the arrival of the new guest at Bancroft House. The children hardly understood her, so strangely did she look and talk at times; and then the blunders she made in their lessons, the mistakes in her sewing; it was unaccountable. And there was as puzzling things happened that the little sharp eyes did not spy out; the trembling of the little hands that held the velvet slipper; the sudden start and quick throb of the heart at the sound of a strange voice; the tears and sobs that were smothered in the pillow, lest watchful ears should hear; the sigh of mental anguish, and the convulsive clasping of the thin, white hands.

Slowly and unheeding Mary Stanford wandered along a quiet, shady path that led to the grounds of a neighboring gentleman; and as she walked, tears, bitter tears, rolled down her cheek and fell on her gloved hand. It was a bright sunny morning—the prelude to a very warm day; but the flowers bloomed brightly by the wayside, and all nature looked fresh and beautiful after the pleasant showers on the previous evening. The young girl alone looked sad as she slowly pursued her way, musing on the thousand disagreeables that she was called on daily to encounter.

She had been out nearly half an hour, and was in the act of turning to retrace her steps, when she suddenly encountered the hated figure of Gregory Dashwood standing directly in her path. For an instant she was paralyzed with terror and surprise, and then summoning courage, attempted to walk fast, but was instantly prevented by his catching her hand forcibly in his.

"You shall not escape me this time!" he exclaimed, savagely. "I have had too long a search to lose sight of you again; so keep quiet and listen to what I have to tell you."

Useless command to tell her to "keep quiet!"—she could not have spoken then if her life depended on the utterance of a word.

"I have sworn you shall be my wife, Mary Stanford—sworn it when I loved you! I have you now; but I will yet keep my oath to punish your obstinacy. Do you hear me?" he shouted, enraged at her silence and deathly look. "Do you hear me, I say?—you shall be my wife!"

He wrung the hand he held with such an agonizing pressure that the spell that held her was broken, and she screamed aloud with almost maniacal violence.

Again and again that fearful sound rung through the hills and woods around, but ere the last echo died in the distance, a third actor appeared on the spot. Three hasty steps brought him to where they stood, and it needed but one glance at Mary's face to make him catch her in his arms, to tear her from the clasp of her insulter, and to strike him to the earth.

"Mary! my Mary!—found at last!" was the rejoicing, thankful exclamation of the stranger, as he gazed on the pale features resting on his bosom.

"Quite a romance, I declare," said Mrs. Bancroft Adams, as the whole party were gathered in her parlor that fine summer's morning; "but I should like to know where you first became acquainted?"

"Our first meeting was a very sad one. Miss Stanford was at her mother's grave, almost the only place she visited outside of her father's house." And the young baronet tried to compose the joyous expression of his countenance into more solemnity, and failed.

"Was Miss Stanford the lady you meant, aunt, when you said Sir Richard was in love?" asked Almira, who could not yet believe the new state of things was possible.

"I did not say he was in love positively, and certainly I did not allude to Miss Stanford, not being aware they had ever met before to-day."

That evening Mary walked with her lover in the little garden of Bancroft House, and all the mysteries of their separation were talked over and explained.

"I have searched untiringly for you, and had almost given up the hope of ever finding you; but it appears that your enemy had better success—there, don't tremble," he continued, as Mary clung closer to his arm. "You are mine now, and the blessed privilege to protect you is mine, also."

Mary Stanford remained at Bancroft House until Lady Walbridge departed for her own beautiful home, and then the fair orphan accompanied her as the betrothed wife of Sir Richard.

It was a new and delightful life she now entered upon, worth living seventeen unhappy years to enjoy. The perfect elegance and repose that surrounded her in her kind friend's home suited the calm, peaceful tastes she had imbibed in her unhappy childhood. The watchful, tender care of the good old lady was grateful to the heart pining for a mother's love; and the devotion of her lover filled up the measure of her happiness.

We will not enter into the particulars of the wedding, which was celebrated at Lady Walbridge's house, and in a style of splendor suitable to the rank and wealth of the bridegroom. The bride was magnificently dressed, and looked "angelic," as an enthusiastic young lady was heard to remark. It is as well to mention that this young lady was accompanied by her lover, and consequently had no cause to find fault with the bright prospects of our heroine. Some others were not so well pleased, and not a few were known to have said that "Miss Stanford was altogether beneath Sir Richard," and that "it was a very unsuitable match," and that "it was just like one of old Lady Walbridge's notions," and many other kind comments, not one of which ever occasioned the principal parties concerned a serious thought. Nor was there much disappointment manifested when Mrs. Bancroft Adams begged to be excused from attending the ceremony, her whole household being plunged in the depths of the most delightful confusion in preparing for Miss Almira's marriage with "Gregory Dashwood, only son of Sir Thomas Dashwood," the good lady wrote to her astonished relatives.

Mary shuddered, and felt half inclined to acquaint poor Almira with her lover's real character; but Lady Walbridge would not allow of any such interference.

"All the girl wants is to get married; she has no heart to break, and I can imagine no severer punishment for him than to be tied to such a wife. Of course he thinks she has money, and that disappointment will not add much to his happiness."

Mary could have found it in her heart to have pitied them both; but she knew her kind intentions would be suspected, and prudently allowed things to take their own course.

Our story is almost finished. Sir Richard never ceased to rejoice over the happy chain of circumstances that had blessed him with so good and beautiful a wife. Mary was happy in her married life; so happy that the sad events of her childhood and youth seemed like some forgotten dream in the blissful reality of the present. For fear our readers should doubt this, we will give them one more scene in the life of our heroine.

It was a smiling June morning; the blue sky looked bluer than common, the flowers smelt sweeter, the birds sang more cheerily—at least, so thought the beautiful young mistress of Walbridge Manor, as she slowly wandered through her magnificent gardens, watching the childish antics of a merry, golden-haired little fellow, who walked steadily by her side one moment, the next was wildly chasing the little birds that fluttered among the flowers. But hark! The mother hears advancing steps; and calling the little one by her side, they hurry through the gate and across the lawn to meet "papa," who advances with his bridle carelessly hung on his arm, and his pet, "White Star," beside him. With screams of delight, the little fellow strove to free himself from the detaining clasp and rush into his father's arms, which he at last succeeded in doing.

"What beautiful flowers, Richard! Where did you procure them?"

"They are quite a new species, I believe," laughed the young husband, as he placed some of the drooping crimson buds in his wife's beautiful hair. "I heard of them yesterday, and rode over to the 'Cypress Hollow' this morning to find them for you. You ought always to wear flowers in your hair, May, they become you so well."

"Thanks—first for the kindness and then for the compliment."

Lady Walbridge looked more lovely than ever as she blushed beneath her husband's admiring gaze.

"And now my boy must have a ride." The father placed his little son carefully on the saddle, and the whole party re-crossed the lawn, while their merry laughter sounded pleasantly on the air, long after they were out of sight.

Reader, my heroine had been married five years.

SLEEP.

Observation and scientific experiment constantly confirm the fact that the brain is nourished, repaired, during sleep. If then, we have not sleep enough, the brain is not nourished, and like everything else, when deprived of sufficient nourishment, withers and wastes away, until the power of sleep is lost, and the whole man dwindles to skin and bone, or dies a maniac!

By all means, sleep enough, give all who are under you sleep enough, by requiring them to go to bed at some regular hour, and to get up the moment of spontaneous waking in the morning. Never waken up any one, especially children, from a sound sleep, unless there is urgent necessity to do so; it is cruel to do so; to prove this, we have only to notice how fretful and unhappy a child is, when waked up before the nap is out. If the brain is nourished during sleep, it must have most vigor in the morning, hence the morning is the best time for study; then the brain has most strength, most activity, and works most clearly. It is the midnight lamp which floods the world with sickly sentimentalists, false morals, rickety theology, and all those harum scarum dreams of human elevation, which abnegate Bible teachings.—Dr. Hall's Monthly.

We are but passengers of a day, whether it is in a stage-coach, or the immense machine of the universe. Then, why should we not make the way as pleasant to each other as possible? Short as our journey is, it is long enough to be tedious to him who sulks in his corner, sits uneasy himself and elbows his neighbor to make him uneasy also.

UNITED, WE ARE ONE.

BY MRS. M. J. WISEMERE.

'Twas Heaven that willed it, 'twas Heaven did control,
The strong fate that bound us soul unto soul;
United, we are one, in hand, home and heart,
Thus loved, and thus loving, O say can we part?

As the oak and the mistletoe, thus let us be,
We'll cling closer on nearing the shadowy tomb;
Calmly we'll sail o'er life's turbulent sea,
And fearlessly enter the portals of gloom.

Soul unto soul, heart unto heart,
United our beings—mingled our breath;
Thus loved and loving, we never should part,
But remain as in life—undivided in death.

SERPENT CHARMERS OF EGYPT.

BY DR. J. V. C. SMITH.

THOSE who have travelled in Egypt have generally had opportunities for witnessing the extraordinary influence which certain Arabs have over the serpents of that country. But it is a hazardous undertaking to relate what is actually exhibited in the valley of the Nile, on account of the difficulty of having it believed.

People are apt to disbelieve any and every account which finds no parallel in their experience. Hence, in relating the truth in regard to the magnitude of three stones laid up in the western wall of the great temple of the sun, at Baalbec, several accurate travellers lost their reputation.

No one could credit it, that single hammered blocks, sixty feet, sixty-two, and a third sixty-eight feet long, by twelve in width, were ever quarried by human hands, and if they had been, it was not possible to have elevated them to the positions they were represented to occupy.

One oriental explorer, it is said, actually omitted to mention the colossal stones of the temple at all, to save the work he had written from being condemned as absolutely false, which was the fate of his successor, on the same ground.

But since the facilities for visiting remote regions of the old world have rendered ancient ruins of the East comparatively easy of access, thousands of Europeans and Americans have surveyed the vast edifice of Baalbec, on the magnificent plain of Cœle-Syria, and bear witness to all that led to the condemnation of early travellers, because they simply published what was positively true; yet, because their readers had not seen with their own eyes, they had the effrontery to maintain their stories were Manchester narratives.

So of the Paylli, or snake charmers of Egypt. From the earliest periods of written history, the feats of these men have been recorded, down to the present year; and whatever is related, if it deviates from the common experience in the town or country in which the relation is examined, the reader invariably condemns it as not only untrue, but outrageously so. In other words, a fact becomes a great lie.

Herodotus was familiar with the marvellous power of a particular class, under the name of Paylli, who could handle venomous reptiles with impunity. From his time to the present, the secret has been handed down from generation to generation, and bids fair to be transmitted to a remote future.

Those most expert in snake-charming, were Libyans. But instead of being confined to the Libyan desert, they are now to be found on both sides of the Nile.

An interesting memorial of the skill of the Egyptian Paylli may be found in the 7th chapter of Exodus, 10th verse:

"When Pharaoh shall speak unto you, saying, show a miracle for you: then thou shalt say unto Aaron, take thy rod and cast it before Pharaoh, and it shall become a serpent. And Moses and Aaron went in unto Pharaoh, and did so, as the Lord had commanded; and Aaron cast down his rod before Pharaoh and before his servants, and it became a serpent. Then Pharaoh also called the wise men and the sorcerers; now the magicians of Egypt, they also did in like manner with their enchantments. For they cast down every man his rod, and they became serpents; but Aaron's rod swallowed them up."

This, therefore, is eminent authority to show the attainments of the Paylli as long ago as when preparations were making for the escape of the Jews from their hard bondage in that ancient seat of early civilization. Tradition actually refers to a miserable Arab town on the Libyan bank of the Nile, in Upper Egypt, where Pharaoh procured the snake charmers to confront Moses.

That serpents possess the innate faculty of inducing animals to come directly within their grasp, requires no corroboration. Birds, rabbits, etc., are destroyed by them, and were it not for the power which has taken the name of charming, it would be literally impossible for a creeping reptile to seize prey that could outfly or outrun them, on the slightest alarm.

But when the fact is viewed in another light, that certain half-civilized Arabs and African negroes can use serpents precisely as they manage their destined prey, it creates a feeling of astonishment.

By invitation, the writer dined on a certain occasion with a medical gentleman whose house was without the wall of Cairo, and located in a large garden, in which were the plants, shrubbery, etc., peculiar to that section of the country. He mentioned as something of a temporary drawback to the pleasure otherwise to be derived from the garden, that two large serpents had taken up their residence in it, and he should be obliged to call a snake charmer to remove them.

He was asked particularly if he had confidence in them. He said their power was unquestionable, and admitted of no doubt whatever. Through him, various facts illustrative of the habits of some varieties of serpents were obtained. It is not uncommon to come suddenly upon a huge snake coiled up under some article of bed-clothing, or lying on a mattress. How they got into the house so stealthily, is often a wonder to the inmates.

Sometimes a wound from their fangs follows a sudden surprise; but if not irritated, on perceiving themselves unwelcome guests, they slide away into some opening in the walls or floor, if not instantly killed, to reappear again under similar circumstances.

The same gentleman informed me, that a few weeks before this conversation, a professed snake charmer was bitten by one of his own serpents, which he was exhibiting, which is one of the most common exhibitions in the Nilotic cities; and although the fellow was excessively alarmed, which prompted him to have medical aid almost instantly, so rapidly was the venom taken over the system, he died very soon in spite of all the remedies prescribed.

A common variety used by the Paylli, are speckled adders, from a yard to nearly four feet in length. Some are very slender, not much larger than ordinary whip lashes, from one foot to two feet long. Then there are larger, clumped snakes, somewhat resembling the rattle snake. And they were all represented to be poisonous, which I was quite willing to take for granted, for nothing would make one's hair stand on end quicker than seeing one of them snap his jaws, hiss, and thrust out a long forked tongue, which moved like a flash of light.

Large serpents they averred could be commanded just as well as small ones, but they were too heavy to carry about. With small ones they could present a greater variety of astounding feats. Snake charmers carry their pets about in baskets with a hinge cover. When one is wanted, they set down the basket, run one hand in among the squirming contents, and feel out the particular one they wish.

A portly Arab of about fifty years of age performed as many horrible manœuvres, as my nerves could bear at one sitting. His son, a small boy of about ten years, could handle the imprisoned snakes with the same impunity as the father.

"I've learned him how to do it," was his observation, when translated into English. The masses of Egypt look on with all the distrust, fear and horror that travellers do, when the Psylli are handling their snakes; and they invariably concur with the declarations of English, French and Italians, who reside in Egypt, that the art is confined to a distinct set of Arabs. Whether they are all of one family stock, branching off into uncles, first, second and third cousins, is more than I could ascertain. In the instance under consideration, the father assured me that he taught his son.

This same Arab laid a serpent about a yard in length on the deck of the boat; stroking out its rigidities or semi-coils, till it was straight as a walking stick. When that was accomplished, he turned round to me and renewed the conversation. On withdrawing his attention, the snake raised its head some six inches, the forked tongue darted out, and its eyes glistened like two diamonds, which induced me to step a little further off. At this, Mr. Arab turned his head round to the snake, and shaking his finger, and muttering some strange words, the reptile dropped his head flat down to the plank again, as it was before. This was repeated, and might have been a part of the play, though it seemed quite incidental.

Again, he took half a dozen or more snakes—handed to him by the little boy, who ran his hand down under the lid and took them out—which were of unequal length, and held them in one hand by the middle. They were heads and tails, and in an instant, their twistifications, hisses, and efforts to escape, were more terrific than the heads of the Gorgon sisters.

Next, with the other hand they were stroked out parallel to each other, like threads in a skein. Being soon quiescent, as though bereft of volition, he put them round a man's neck in a single knot, as a handkerchief is often tied. Instantly, on letting go, they were roused to intense activity, and the reverend gentleman who had the surprise visitation of a coil of writhing venomous serpents round his neck, for such was the quickness of the Arab's movements he had tied the knot before there was time to suspect a trick of the sort, begged, as did myself, to have him take them away. That same gentleman is a resident of Cambridge, and no doubt has a vivid recollection of the circumstance.

A very disgusting, and it seemed to me, a dangerous trial of his skill was putting the head of one of his serpents into his own mouth, and forcing it in coil after coil, while the reptile evidently was resisting with all its force. Both cheeks were enormously distended, the tail protruded beyond the lips, and then, taking it by the extreme tip, the whole was slowly withdrawn.

The Arab proposed that I should accompany him the next day, out into the margin of the Desert of Arabia, in the neighborhood of Karnak, where he proposed to convince me that no preparatory education of the serpents was necessary, in order to bring them into control.

"I will make a noise and they will come to me from all directions, and I can make them mind as these do."

But expressing my satisfaction with his ability in the line of his profession, thus far, I chose not to take my chance in the midst of a congregation of unknown serpents, which would come at his bidding.

Several mysterious feats of legerdemain, in which serpents form an essential part, are daily practised in the streets of Cairo, that put at defiance the best specimens of jugglery witnessed here or in Europe, and rendered the more puzzling because they are executed in broad day on the bare ground.

It is not worth while to discuss the question, how the Psylli are able to accomplish these singular, and certainly very dangerous exploits. They certainly do it, and no other persons have succeeded in the attempt.

A favorite opinion is abroad, that the tubular fangs through which the poison flows from the sacs in which it is secreted, into the puncture, have been extracted. The fangs are not taken out; it is the boast of the exhibitor that they remain intact, and they roll back the lips to show that they are so.

That no kind of drugging is necessary, or undertaken, is based on the declaration of the Karnak Arab, who wished an opportunity of demonstrating the fact, by taking me with him to the Desert, to prove what he had asserted. No researches of naturalists have yet detected the method of controlling the natural propensities of these universally dreaded reptiles.

Residents of the highest qualifications for conducting philosophical inquiries, have left Egypt no wiser than when they entered it, on this track; and we are compelled to acknowledge from personal observation, the Psylli are in possession of an art, or a specific branch of science, of great antiquity, which modern science with all its appliances has not been able to explain.

I MISS THY FAREWELL KISS, LOVE.

BY LEUT. HOLM, U. S. N.

My bark awaits thy shore, love,
The morning sun beams o'er the sea;
It glides the ocean wave, love—
I wait a last adieu from thee.

Hark! a strain of music wild
From the restless, heaving billows,
Wooes me, ocean's saddened child,
To their witching, wavy pillows.

Seemeth it like death to part—
Smile on me but once again!
That were Lethe to my heart,
Robbing absence half its pain!

Isabel—my worshipped idol—
All the world of love to me,
Hopelessly locked in her castle,
Could not e'en my banner see.

That was why she did not grant me
One fond, lingering, farewell kiss.
Cruel guardian! now I warn you,
You will, ere long, rue all this.

I miss thy farewell kiss, love!
Again my bark is on the sea—
The breezes swell the sails above—
My "merric men" obey but me.

To-night the moon is veiled, love!
My bark rides 'neath the shady lee—
Thou in my arms, imprisoned dove,
Shalt bound across the waves with me.

STORY OF A STAR.

BY RICHARD CRANSHAW.

It twinkled and glittered in at the window on the child, as she lay watching it and pondering upon it, and weaving all sorts of strange fancies within her little brain as to its probable history; and it seemed, as she gazed fixedly upon it, as though it were actually laughing in huge enjoyment of her bewilderment. It winked and glittered up there so far, far off, until her eyes ached and became heavy, although sleep did not appear to weigh upon her eyelids, as she still wonderingly watched the beautiful light, shining in at her chamber window.

Twinkling and glittering, it at length began slowly and gradually to descend from its dark blue home, and seemed to be actually approaching towards her, downwards, downwards through the clear night sky! And, O wonder! as it came closer and closer, she saw that it became a starry ornament shining upon the brow of a bright angel, whose white fleecy wings cleaved the air towards the little window of her room, and who, a moment after, stood silently gazing upon her by her bedside, with a sweet smile hovering upon her lips, and a mild radiance beaming from her beautiful eyes.

And her old friend the star glittered through the little room brighter than ever, and she looked enraptured upon the angel countenance by her side, and then upon the gemmy ornament shining so lustrously above her head. She read nothing but love for her in the eyes fixed upon her, and knew that no harm could befall her from so holy and so gentle a being as was this sweet spirit of the star.

The angel spoke to her:

"Does Minna wonder at the star leaving its home in the sky, and descending to stand beside her little bed, while the hum of the surrounding city is hushed, and while the soft mantle of night has fallen upon the dim looking houses and the peaceful streets? Minna remembers the green grave that stands under the old tree near by her father's country home, beneath whose mound she has been told a sister was laid long years ago? That sister is now her own angel guardian, hovering ever near her—by the crowded wayside, and by her sleeping pillow; in her hour of gleeful joy, and when her knee is bent in holy prayer. She will be always there, silently watching over her, and her voice will only be heard to approve a kindly deed or virtuous resolve, or else to warn her beseechingly from the path of evil. Her tongue will be mute to all save her she guards, and she alone will feel the sweet reward of peace which she bestows upon her. Would Minna know her name? 'Tis Conscience!"

Voices in the silent air repeated, "Conscience!" The summer winds wafted it to and fro. Whispering echoes marmored it around her. The very moonbeams seemed to write it in lines of silver upon the wall. She never could forget it—that listening, awe-struck child!

The angel spoke again:

"When my voice shall be unheeded, and my darling grows weary of her guardian's watchful love, then, and not until that hour, will she sadly turn her face away, and take her flight from her forever! Let Minna treasure this within her heart, and seek to always win the presence of her spirit friend—of her angel sister—of her conscience!"

The child raised her hands in silent prayer that this friend might never, never leave her. A brighter light seemed to shine from the twinkling star, and a sweeter smile to play upon the angel's lips as she did so.

"Minna shall look upon some of the windings of the great path of life, and let her treasure up the lesson of wisdom which is learned from these pictures of the world around about her. Come with me; fear nothing—come!”

So saying, the bright being held out her hand to Minna, and she found herself, she knew not how, flying with the fleetness of the wind through the ambient air, and with no more effort than if she still reclined upon her own soft bed at home.

Midnight and darkness were around them, but the star on the angel's forehead shed a bright light on all around them, and the child saw that they were standing in a miserable room. A little boy of about her own age knelt by the side of his wretched bed, and though no sound came from his lips, the tears rolled down his cheeks, and his little heart seemed overwhelmed with some great sorrow, as it heaved in the fullness of his grief.

“He prays for his wicked father,” whispered the angel. “Let us see him at this same moment and behold the effect of his child's prayer.”

Midnight and darkness again wrapped all objects in obscurity, but as the radiance of the star made all things visible, a far different scene was spread out before them. They stood in an abode of luxury. Soft carpets lined the floor, and gorgeous pictures hung upon the painted walls. Great mirrors reflected back each other's light, and ornaments of costly value stood around them on every side. For a time the child gazed upon the scene with delighted eyes, but then, turning towards the spirit, she would have questioned her as to their coming thither. The angel pointed mutely towards the door, and as she did so, the sound of a stealthy footstep was heard in the hall without. A figure whose face she could not see, enveloped as it was in some dark substance, stepped cautiously into the room, and by the light of a dark lantern looked curiously round about him.

His purpose could not be mistaken, but he turned away contemptuously from the ornaments around him and muttering to himself in a low tone, left the apartment as noiselessly as he had entered. The angel beckoned to the child to follow, and Minna saw that he ascended the staircase in the hall, and she also saw with a shudder that he drew from his pocket a something that gleamed, and advanced with it firmly grasped in his hand. Following closely to him, they saw that he entered a handsome chamber, and from various drawers and other receptacles which flew open at his well-skilled touch, proceeded to take articles of value and place them noiselessly in a canvass bag which he had brought for the purpose.

He ransacked everything upon which he could lay his hand, yet still appeared unsatisfied. At length he approached towards an adjoining room, and as he opened the door and threw the light of his dark lantern around, he saw that it was the sleeping-place of a child. It was a fairy-like bower, and every object suggested the innocence and purity that dwelt therein. The fleecy curtains of the little couch were like clouds encircling a slumbering cherub, and the moonlight shed a halo round its head that might be likened to rays of softened glory.

Softly, almost with reverence, the man with robbery and even murder hanging over his guilty soul, approached towards that infant's couch, and looked upon it there, as it slept on in unconscious security. One little arm was extended upon the soft white coverlet, and the red lips were just parted enough to show a row of white pearls nestled away there between them. The flaxen ringlets lay like golden threads extended upon the pillow, and a smile was breaking over its face as the midnight intruder gazed spell-bound upon it.

What thoughts are stealing through his mind, as he looks so steadfastly and yet so gently upon the sleeping child? Is the image of another, like even unto this—as holy and as beautiful as this, before him? Do his thoughts wander towards the little one who has so often nestled close to his heart, in the wretched home of poverty and sin wherein he dwells? Who shall know the workings of that human heart in which all good is not yet stifled?

List! The lips of the slumberer move, and as the ear of the man catches the sound of the one word uttered, the two invisible listeners see that a tear trembles for a moment, and then rolls silently down his rugged cheek. It is the simple name of “father” which has fallen from the child's lips, and this is the talisman which has unlocked the closed up heart and caused the precious tears of repentance to flow in rich and bounteous floods. Minna heard the angel's voice:

“The child's prayer is answered. The untutored lisping of the infant, perchance, has saved the immortal soul of that deeply erring father! Blessed is the pure offering from the lips of innocence, and more acceptable than that which arises from altars of gold and from the midst of temples wrought in grandeur, and towering loftily towards the clouds!”

They saw that he went upon his way, nor touched an article from that splendid dwelling, but left as stealthily as he had entered. Said the angel to the child:

"He goes with a resolution within his heart to strive and sin no more, and he does it for his child's sake!"

The veil of night appears now rent asunder. The pair are standing, still invisible, in the midst of a busy crowd. Each hurries on his way, and little heed is taken by the passers-by of a blind beggar, who stands with mutely outstretched hands imploring charity by the wayside. His locks are silvered with age, and the hand of Time has deeply lined his aged face, and touched with palsied finger the hand once nerved with the firmness of manhood. His only companion was his dog, and the creature ever and anon gently licked his master's withered hand, as though to assure him that he had yet one faithful friend in the helplessness of his old age. The old man patted him kindly, and murmured: "Poor Tray! poor Tray!"

A great confusion, and cries of "fire!" are heard on every side. The crowd becomes dense, and the old man is jostled and pushed this way and that, until at length he loses his feeble grasp upon the dog, who is in a moment borne with the crowd until he has lost all traces of his master. The unfortunate old man, when he found that his dog was indeed lost beyond doubt, could control his feelings no longer, and tears gathered in his sightless eyes and rolled down upon his withered cheeks.

"Why, how now, father! What's gone amiss?"

A hearty, whole-souled voice that! It is a young sailor, who has seen with pity the helpless old man standing there, and who now approaches and lays a rough but kindly hand upon his shoulder.

"Lost your dog, have you? Well, that's bad; but never mind, don't take it so to heart, for look ye, I'll get you another! So cheer up, old mate, and if you'll just make a stanchion of my arm, and give the word where to go, I'll tow you there in a jiffy!"

The young sailor gave his honest arm to the old man, and proceeded to lead him towards his home, directed by his blind companion. His open, frank countenance glowed with the satisfaction that always arises from a kindly deed, and it was a beautiful sight to watch him, as he measured his own firm step to the slow and cautious footfall of the sightless old man.

They proceeded along the street, and the angel and child followed closely on their path. Wind-ing through dense alleys and over rotten pavements, past time-stained and tottering buildings, they at length reached a crazy wooden tenement, filled full to overflowing with poverty-stricken humanity, and here it was the old man stopped, saying here he was, at home.

"Home!" repeated the young man in a low tone. "He has not always seen such days as these, and this is but a sorry place to end them, poor old soul!" Then in a louder tone he bade him lead the way to his room, "and then," he added, "we'll see whether your old days can't be brightened up a bit."

They mounted the rotten staircase until very near the top of the building, and the old man opening a door in the darkened passage, ushered the stranger into a clean but wretchedly furnished room, where he saw with surprise that a young girl was seated sewing.

"This, sir, is my daughter," said the blind man. "My old age would have been indeed dark and desolate had it not been lighted with the sweet sunlight of her presence. Ruth, this is a kind gentleman who has seen me safely home, for poor Tray is lost, and but for his aid I might have wandered away, no one knows where."

The young girl lifted her eyes to his face, and holding out her hand, said:

"O, sir, you have been very kind, and though we can give you nothing but thanks, you will be rewarded in the satisfaction of knowing you have done a kindly action, and God will bless you, sir, for it. Be assured he will."

He had not spoken a word since his entrance into the room, but had taken her proffered hand mechanically and stood, as in a trance, gazing upon her face.

"You have not asked the gentleman to be seated, Ruth," said the old man. "Wont you take a chair, sir?" and he pointed with his staff in the direction of the seat his daughter had just arisen from, and was the only one in the room.

"Ruth!" mused his unconscious listener. "That name and that face! What dream is this which has come over me? Tell me," addressing the old man, "what is the name you bear?"

"For long years past, I have been known only as 'Blind Simon,' but once, when fortune smiled upon me, and the world around me was not hid as it is now in darkness, I was called Simon Tremain."

He could not see the emotion depicted upon his listener's face, nor the start he gave at the name he uttered, but the young girl saw it, and looked with surprise at him. Mastering himself by an effort, as if speaking to himself, he said:

"Many years ago, I knew a youth by that name. Tremain—George Tremain, I think it was."

"Ah!" said the old man. "Did you then know my poor boy? He ran away and went to sea when but ten years old, and it was but a short time after—let me see, it must be fifteen years ago—I received a letter from the captain of the vessel saying that my unhappy boy had fallen overboard in a gale of wind and was lost. This child was then scarcely three years old, and she of course remembers nothing of it, but many a tear have we both shed over my lost boy—her unknown brother, who was drowned at sea."

There was silence in the apartment and both the young girl and her father shed tears at the recollection, while the stranger said nothing, but let them weep awhile before addressing the old man again. In a low tone, he spoke:

"There have been times known when men have fallen overboard and been given up for lost, that some stray log of timber or a fragment of wreck has proved a means of safety. There have been times known when men have been picked up providentially by a passing vessel and gone to distant countries, from whence all communications with those at home have miscarried or been lost. I knew of such a case as that, when the person was taken to the East Indies, and then after shipping as a sailor on board of the vessel that saved him, sailing for years to the very town where his relations lived and never knowing anything of their existence. He had travelled to the home of his boyhood and had been told that they had been long gone from their old habitation, and every one of them was now no longer living—all had died."

He paused for a moment and wiped the perspiration from his forehead, while the old man sat as if turned into stone and in the direction of his voice.

"Once, this same young man—he might have been about my age—arrived in port, and passing along the street, assisted an old man who had lost his dog—much as you have done, mate," he added, seeing a movement as if the old man was about to rise. "He assisted him, I say, and saw him to his wretched home."

The old man had risen in great excitement, and stood with his hands stretched out before him, and trembling in every limb.

"Arrived there, he heard the story told of his own loss, and a moment after found him clasped to the heart of his sister Ruth, and of the old man who had dandled him upon his knee a little helpless child. Sister! father! don't you know me? O, tell me! don't you know me?"

They were all clasped close in each other's arms, and human hearts felt for a time nearly the spirit felicity of the spheres above! The old man raised his sightless eyes towards heaven, and murmured forth: "This, my son, was dead, and is alive again; was lost, and is found. Blessed be the name of the Lord!"

They are now seated in a loving group, and the angel and child still lingers, unwilling to leave the presence of happiness like this, when a rattling as of a chain ascending the stairs draws their attention. A scratching noise is heard at the door, and as the young girl opens it, in bounds the delighted Tray, whose instinct had been his sure guide to his old master's home. He is soon nestled lovingly down at the old man's feet, and the home group is now quite complete.

Again all was darkness. The child looked round and saw that the light of the star gleamed in the far off distance as though her companion and guide was leaving her.

"Remember," came a voice from the obscurity, which she recognized as that of her spirit friend "remember what you have this night seen, and let the lessons be treasured up within your heart. Remember, also, that my eye is upon you, and my voice will be near you in the hour of trial. Farewell now, Minna, farewell! Farewell, my darling."

The voice became more and more distant, and fainter came the words—"Farewell, Minna! Farewell, Minna!" She stretched out her hand to wave it towards her departing friend, and as she did so she touched her mother's face bending over her little couch in her own well remembered room at home. The morning sun was shining brightly in at the open window, and her mother's voice was calling to her—"Minna! Minna! my darling!"

It had been all a dream; but with happy dreams like this, she felt she could have wished to dream and dream forever!

"HOBSON'S CHOICE."

The expression, "Hobson's Choice," is proverbial both in Europe and America. The story of its origin is thus stated: Thomas Hobson was a celebrated carrier in Cambridge, Eng., who to his employment in that capacity added the profession of supplying the students at the university with horses. In doing this, he made it an unalterable rule that every horse should have an equal portion of time in which to rest as well as labor. Hence, he always refused to let a horse out of his turn, however desirous the applicant might be of choosing for himself. Hence the saying, "Hobson's Choice, this or none."

Let your expenses be such as to leave a balance in your pocket. Ready money is a friend in need.

THE WANDERER.

BY CHARLES E. LAMSON.

I have travelled long and wearily,
Have moved with weakening pain,
With woes that press me heavily,
And I long for my home again;
I long for the smile of love
Which waits for me at home,
And I pray to Him who rules above,
To guide me while I roam.

I've gazed on sunny isles,
In the genial, southern seas:
I've felt the power of witching smiles
From maids who smile to please;
I've gathered rich, ripe fruits,
And gorgeous, fragrant flowers,
And wildly followed gay pursuits,
To while my pain fraught hours.

But I long for the foaming brooks
Of my rocky, northern land;
Not sunny smiles, nor witching looks,
Nor palaces so grand,
Shall banish from my memory
The spot where once I played—
Where birds in heavenly euphony
Sung anthems while I prayed.

When I was young, a sinless child,
Nor aught had learned of vice,
But gently prayed, all pure and mild,
For the pearl of greatest price;—
I'll ever cherish that dear spot,
Where I was blest and pure,
Where sin had caused my soul no blot,
Nor woe could long endure.

But now I roam o'er glittering seas,
And hills and green-robed isles,
And fan my brow with southern breezes,
Or bask in sunny smiles;
Yet unto me a still small voice
Bids me remember home,
Remember loved ones would rejoice,
When I had ceased to roam.

THE FAVORITE DAUGHTER.

BY CARRIE A. EMERSON.

"Come away from that window, my love," said Mrs. Arlingham to her daughter, a little child of four or five years old, as she was balancing herself on the window-sill, at the imminent danger of falling out on the pavement below.

The child did not obey; and placing herself in an attitude of even greater peril than before, she continued to excite her mother's fears in a way that denoted nothing less than a wilful and obstinate spirit.

Mrs. Arlingham descended to entreaties.

"Do, my love, come away with mother; Jane has been making candy in the kitchen. Come, Bessie, be a darling, and come away from the naughty window."

The "naughty window" still held the "darling" unmoved, at the mother's distress; and it was not until Jane was called up, with a tray of the "linked sweetness long drawn out," that Bessie condescended to make terms with her mother, at the cost of making herself sick. In a few hours she was so ill that the physician was sent for, and nauseous drugs succeeded the sweet morsels which she had so eagerly devoured.

Mr. and Mrs. Arlingham were almost distracted. It was their youngest child, born after their other daughter had attained her thirteenth year. They had both done their best to spoil Bessie; and indeed the friends of the family, and the servants also, were not slow in helping them in this laudable undertaking. Flattery, fine clothes and sweetmeats were administered alternately, as she demanded them. Her mother spared no pains nor expense in robing the little figure which, under her load of finery, looked really ridiculous. One could hardly help laughing to see the airs which she put on, when dressed out for exhibition. While the elder sister, Lucy, was clad in plain, sometimes even homely garments, even when grown a young lady, the little one sported laces and jewelry with an air which would have credited a finished coquette.

At ten years old, she was not less unmanageable than at four. Her will was law in the household, and the mother submitted, and required every one else to submit to her caprices. The father, now that the novelty of her infant powers had ceased to influence him—had begun to question whether they had done wisely; but even he did not dare at present to make any change in the ruling dynasty.

At fifteen, Bessie was in person charming, almost beyond description. Nothing could exceed the beauty of her complexion, the brilliancy of her eyes, nor the elegance of her figure; and yet she was but a spoiled beauty, after all. Mrs. Arlingham coveted for her daughter, even at that age, a prospect of marriage which should eclipse those of all her companions; and had even fixed upon the youth who should have the happiness of being her son-in-law. This was the only son of the wealthy Colonel Bryan, whose education was now being completed in Paris, and who was expected home early in the spring.

Lucy Arlingham was now twenty-eight years of age. Simple and unassuming in her manners, self-denying and self-sacrificing, trained from her thirteenth year to give place in everything to Bessie, and to make all things subservient to the "darling's" whims, Lucy had little time to cultivate her heart and affections in any other way. She had contrived, notwithstanding the scanty schooling which she had received, to pick up a very respectable stock of practical knowledge. Her constant care over Bessie had developed the finer qualities of her nature, by exercising her patience and self-control. Her industry had been brought into active exercise by the repeated calls upon her time in fashioning and perfecting Bessie's wardrobe, for even Mr. Arlingham's well-filled purse could not answer all the demands for that purpose, unless something was effected by home industry; and the wilful girl would not tax her own powers, but called on Lucy to exercise her taste and skill at all times for her adornment. And so Lucy's youth had gone by, and with so little of the usual stimulus belonging to that golden season, that she had absolutely touched the "outer circle of old maidism," as Bessie mockingly told her.

But down deep in Lucy Arlingham's heart, unknown to all, and almost unconsciously to herself, she cherished a tender remembrance of an evening, over which ten years had swept their shadows without effacing it. Ten years is a long, long time for love to exist without something on which to feed. Even woman's devotion would sometimes fail, if put to such a test; and Lucy might have been pardoned, if she had lost her trust in man's love.

Ten years before, when she was only eighteen, Leonard Ashley had met her at one of the very few parties which she was allowed to attend. It was a children's ball, at which Bessie made one of the greatest attractions, in a dress of elaborate workmanship which cost Lucy many a headache in embroidering. Lucy herself had decked the little five-year old fairy, and then had just time left to smooth her dark brown locks and put on a simple white muslin dress, without even a brooch or a flower in her hair; and had the privilege of standing nearly the whole evening, to see her well-dressed associates taken out, set after set, to dance, without seeming to bestow a thought upon her.

It was near the close of the gay scene, and the children were preparing to go home and yield up the hall entirely to the grown up people, when Lucy felt her arm gently touched, and a voice whispered in her ear:

"Ask your father to let you remain longer. Tell him I will see you home quite early."

She turned to see the playmate of her infancy, young Ashley, who had just returned from a long voyage. He had just entered the ballroom, and was delighted to see his old playmate looking as serene and good tempered, as, when a child, they had sailed tiny ships in the same stream together.

"Come, come, hurry up, Lucy," said her father; while her mother cried out: "How inconsiderate, Lucy. Bessie will certainly take cold if you keep her waiting here, after dancing."

Lucy had not danced yet—so she was in no danger; but as she stepped up to her father and preferred her request, Mrs. Arlingham began to deny it for him.

"What nonsense is this?" she said. "You will be wanted at home to see to Bessie, she is so excited, poor thing."

"Now, Sophia," said her husband, "I shall insist, to-night, on Lucy's staying. She has had no dancing, no pleasure to-night, and Leonard Ashley is the son of an old friend and—yes, Lucy, go back into the drawing-room; he is waiting for you now."

Lucy thanked her father with such a grateful, happy look, that he inwardly resolved that her opportunities for pleasure should be increased hereafter; nor did he repent indulging her now, even though his ears were pained by his wife's loudly expressed disapprobation during the ride home.

"No one but Lucy can manage Bessie when she is tired," she said, "and I really think you ought to have taken her home."

"Wife," said Mr. Arlingham, "did it ever occur to you that we are gratifying Bessie's temper at the expense of Lucy's health and peace?"

"I cannot say that it ever did."

"Well, then, it is high time that the matter was brought up for your consideration. I begin to see it, and I am sorry to see it too."

A few such conversations as this irritated Mrs. Arlingham considerably; but before even this one had ended, Lucy's heart was beating time to a happier measure than that which the ball-room music was bringing out. She heard Leonard Ashley's whispered sentences, in the dance, and the bright color came to her cheek and the light to her eye as she listened; and when at length the party broke up, and he left her at her father's door, he exacted a promise from her that she would not be married until he should return from the voyage on which he was immediately to sail. It was all that he said. He bound himself by no promise, although Lucy did not perceive that she alone was pledged. She gave the promise, and when she parted from him, she truly felt that she was his, and that he also was hers. She did not realize the distinction between the two. It was the old story of woman's unsuspecting, unselfish trust. With her, it was a matter of unquestioning doubt; and she gave up her whole heart to the new and delicious feeling of security in another's love.

She did not see him again; but when she knew from the papers that he had sailed, she did not require his presence—for her promise, and his implied love, sat lightly at her hitherto unsought heart, and she moved round like one who had received a new revelation of life. Her father secretly wondered why Lucy's step was so much lighter and her cheek and eyes so much more brilliant, when Bessie's demands upon her became every day more frequent. Her mother, absorbed in the petty details of Bessie's frivolous life, took no notice.

"Is Lucy always going to play second fiddle to that child?" said Mr. Arlingham, bluntly and somewhat roughly, one day when Bessie had taxed her sister to the utmost of her strength and energies.

"How coarse you are, Mr. Arlingham," said his wife. "You do not expect that Lucy, at her time of life, should be petted as we pet a child like Bessie."

"Bessie is not a very young child, now," he answered. "I think you said she was twelve last week, and you dress her even older than Lucy dresses at twenty-five. I do think, wife," he continued, "that we are making too great a distinction between our girls—greater than even their respective ages warrant. Bessie is not too young to yield up some of her baby privileges, and Lucy is not too old to expect some affection from her parents. Lucy is as childlike in her obedience, as affectionate in her disposition, as she was at Bessie's age. We must not make such a difference between them."

Mrs. Arlingham wept and Bessie pouted, and Lucy begged her father privately not to fret about her, for she was quite happy; and so things went on in the usual way, Bessie always being in the ascendant.

Leonard Ashley had been absent ten years, and Lucy Arlingham had reached her twenty-eighth year. She had changed, however, but a very little. There was a darker shadow on her brown hair, which the sunlight did not now turn into gold, as formerly; there was a depth in the clear eyes, that told of a fuller experience which those added years had brought to her; and the lines around the mouth—that unfailing tell-tale!—had deepened a little. But in all other things she was the same sweet, simple, unaffected Lucy of ten years ago, sacrificing herself every day for Bessie's pleasure, and looking for respite and reward only to the hope—now growing dim and troubled—of Leonard Ashley's return. She had heard from him occasionally. He was in South America, prosperous and happy. He wrote her those ambiguous letters which men, who do not wish to commit themselves, can write, demanding her love, reminding her of her promise, but never saying in direct terms the words which would have made her so happy—"I am coming home to marry you, Lucy!" They would have made her happier, not because she had any doubt of his love—no such doubt had ever crossed her mind since that memorable evening—but Lucy had often heard expressions that ranked her as an "old maid," and she felt that one who had so monopolized her youth as Leonard had done, was bound to let her show to the world that it was not an unused gift that she had rendered to him.

In those ten years, she had had more than one opportunity to make a happy home for herself, away from the domestic servitude which began to hang heavily upon her as Bessie advanced in years and importance; but she steadily clung to her first attachment, and hoped on, hoped ever!

It came, however, at last—that hoped-for arrival! And Lucy was the first person that Leonard Ashley sought. She was keeping house alone that day, for the rest had gone to a fair, ten miles off, and would not be back until late. How thankful was Lucy for this day's respite! From early morning, when she had arranged Bessie's chamber after her departure, she had given herself up to the delightful consciousness of freedom—freedom to walk unmolested in the garden, to read over Leonard's letters, to think of him, hope for his return, to live over again the "long, long ago," and all this without her mother's sharp voice calling her to do something for Bessie. It was a day to be remembered, even had the event of Leonard's return been struck out of it. But, as if all pleasant things were to be crowded into the limits of a day, Lucy had scarcely seated herself by the vine-covered window, after her early tea, before a horseman galloped up to the gate, and notwithstanding the complexion, bronzed as it was by the sunny climate of the South, she knew at once that it was Leonard.

What passed that evening, assured Lucy that she had not misjudged his sincerity and fidelity. He was her lover now, if never before—claiming her heart with all the impassioned fervor which had strengthened under southern suns, and renewed by the unchanged beauty which he had sometimes feared those long ten years had overshadowed. No! time had passed so lightly over her, that the lover's eye did not even detect those minute changes which were really there—and the light of happiness abundantly atoned for them, even had they been apparent to his loving gaze. There was no reservation now. He offered her his heart and hand, and wished her to name a day, as his stay would necessarily be short. When the arrangement was made known, on the return of the family, Mr. Arlington showed great joy, his wife exhibited a silent indifference, and Bessie absolutely took it as a matter of injury to herself.

"I thought," she said, "that Lucy would have waited until I was married, and then, perhaps, some old widower would have taken her. I do not remember Mr. Ashley. What is he like, Lucy?"

Lucy's heart was full of the bright, handsome, manly looking lover from whom she had just parted, and she described him in the most glowing terms she could bring herself to use. Bessie glanced towards her sister's plain dress, and smiled; but as she raised her eyes to her face, she could not help noticing the radiant beauty of her eyes and the heightened color of her cheeks, while her father said, earnestly: "Why, Lu, you are really handsome, after all!" After all what? Lucy might have questioned, but she was too happy; and after helping Bessie to disrobe, in her ample chamber, with its subtle perfumes and manifold appendages, she retired to her own little room which was now filled with a purple and golden radiance from the wings of the Angel of Love. She slept—and her dreams were all tinged by that beautiful light; she woke—and almost questioned her identity with the happy being who had laid down and dreamed of Leonard Ashley. Bessie was sulky all day, at Lucy's evident happiness. Mr. Arlington had refused her a dress which she had desired, inconsiderately giving as a reason that Lucy's marriage would require all his spare funds; and he further increased her ire, by giving Lucy a large sum to purchase all that she required.

Two or three days passed, before Bessie would come down from her pedestal of pride enough to meet Leonard Ashley. On the fourth day, she went into the parlor where he sat waiting for Lucy to get ready to go out with him.

Bessie, who was dressed with the most elaborate care, was really very gracious. "Mr. Ashley, I suppose; my sister will soon be ready," was spoken in a most bewitching lip, and with a grace that bewildered Leonard, accustomed as he was to Lucy's quiet ways. He had not time to answer her, for sweeping past him with a wealth of ringlets mixed up with a profusion of brilliant flowers, and sprinkled all over with the sparkling of eyes and gems, as it seemed to him in that brief glimpse, she left the room before he had time to think whether there were wings growing on her shoulders or not. It was strange that he did not speak of this casual meeting to Lucy.

After this, he was standing at a corner of the street, talking with a friend, when the sound of a horse's hoofs rang on the pavement, seemingly close to his side. He started just in time to receive a bow and a smile from a radiant looking creature, the very counterpart of the angel in Mr. Arlington's parlor.

"That is Bessie Arlington," said his friend, laughing at the wondering gaze which Leonard sent after her. "She should be called Belle Arlington, for she dances, sings, or rides away all the hearts within her reach."

"She is very beautiful!" said Leonard, rather in the form of questioning than remark.

"Very; but to my mind, Lucy Arlington is worth a hundred of her. Why, what ails you, Ashley? Has the fair horsewoman ridden away with your heart too?" said his friend, as Leonard left him suddenly and dashed down the street to Mr. Arlington's, intending to be there to assist her in dismounting, as he had noticed that she had no companion except a very small boy.

He arrived in time. Lucy stood at the door, looking very lovely in her simple white morning dress; but Leonard saw only Bessie, with her magnificent black plumes shading a cheek bright with triumph, as well as exercise, for she had looked back and seen him leave his friend, and had divined the reason. He lifted her in his arms from the horse, and she looked into his eyes with a glance that thrilled him through every vein. She too saw, what she had not before noticed, that Leonard Ashley was far beyond any man she had ever before seen, in personal advantages. The noble figure and the bronzed countenance were great attractions, and the foreign air completed the charm. She stood leaning against the gate, playing with her gloves and riding-whip, while Ashley made his morning salutations to Lucy. He was absent and confused, and Lucy innocently thought that it was because he had not formally received an introduction to her sister. She therefore gave him one, but it did not seem to dispel the embarrassment, and the interview ended awkwardly enough; and Ashley, after a few words to Lucy, walked away.

Why did Bessie linger so long at the gate, looking after him, when Lucy, his own betrothed, went quietly into the house as soon as he turned from the door? Mr. Arlington met Bessie in the hall, as she went to change her dress, and she was like one walking in a dream, so absorbed was she in thought.

"Bessie has more heart than I gave her credit for," he said inwardly. "This parting in anticipation from Lu, makes her quite grave and thoughtful." He should have seen her, as she walked up to her glass when she entered her room, and then dashed herself down on the bed, burying her face in the pillows, and scarcely restraining the cry of anguish that rose to her lips.

Bessie was very young in years, to feel so acutely; but remember she was a hot-house plant, grown in the atmosphere of flattery, and she developed accordingly as she had been forced into premature growth of passion and will.

Lucy found her thus; and as Bessie never had any particular diffidence in making her wishes known, her sister had very little difficulty in extracting from her the cause of her tears. She seemed to have as little sense of another's rights in this, as, when a child, she had clamored for and obtained every object belonging to Lucy, however dear they might be to the latter, either as keepsakes or bought with her own money. She looked to see Lucy melting away into compliance with her absurdity now, as she used to in her childish days. For once, Lucy's thoughtful and grave look baffled the spoiled girl. "I will send father to you, Bessie," she said simply, and began to leave the room. Somehow the lock of the door eluded her touch. The chamber was whirling round and round, and Lucy's eyes assumed a strange and wild look that frightened Bessie out of her selfishness for a moment. Before she could make up her mind to approach her, however, Lucy had sunk on the floor.

Mr. Arlington was in his own room. He heard the fall, and ran in. Lucy was insensible; he took her up, laid her on Bessie's bed, and sent for the doctor. Bessie was now thoroughly frightened, and her father sent her down stairs, while he strove to recover Lucy from her long swoon. It was a great while before she revived; and the doctor was satisfied then, from her appearance, that she had received some great mental shock, and he told Mr. Arlington so.

As he left the house, he encountered Leonard Ashley, and told him his errand at Mr. Arlington's. Stung to the soul by his momentary faithlessness to her whose ten years' devotion he had thus rewarded, he walked hastily to the house, and demanded to see Lucy.

"I fear it is better not," said her father, "at least until I apprise her. She is yet quite weak."

He opened the parlor door, and motioned him to go in. Leonard started on entering. There sat Mrs. Arlington and Bessie, and near them

Colonel Bryan and a finished Paris dandy, who was making the agreeable to Mr. Arlington's daughter. The fellow was handsome and well dressed, and half an hour had made Bessie change her opinion of "that rough South American savage" in favor of the lighter graces of Augustus Bryan. Leonard saw enough in the brief interval between his entrance and Mr. Arlington's return. He flew to Lucy's bedside with almost a feeling of horror that he had so nearly forgotten his allegiance to that devoted heart. Ten days from that time, they were on their way to South America.

It was not until they had been many weeks at sea, that Leonard demanded, and Lucy related her interview with Bessie on that evening when he found her so ill.

"So the spoiled baby even cried for your lover, Lu, did she? as well as for all the rest of your property. Didn't I get an escape from her? I tell you, honestly, Lucy, her eyes so fascinated me on that day when she fell into my arms from her horse, that I scarcely knew what I said or did. Isn't she well matched with that Frenchified fop, who will give her all the love he can spare from his own sweet self?"

"We will talk no more about it, Leonard. My youth has been sacrificed to Bessie—my life spent in vain endeavors to serve her. Some day she will perhaps be purified by affliction as I have been. Then she may know, and then only, what has been suffered for her, and by her."

HOW TO GAIN REPUTATION.

A French author finding his reputation impeded by the hostility of the critics, resolved to adopt a little stratagem to assist him in gaining fame and money in spite of his enemies. He dressed himself in a workmanlike attire, and repaired to a distant province, where he took lodgings at a farrier shop, in which he did a little work every day at the forge and anvil. But the greater part of his time was secretly devoted to the composition of three large volumes of poetry and essays, which he published as the works of a Journeyman Blacksmith. The trick succeeded; all France was in amazement; the poems of this "child of nature," this "untutored genius," this "inspired son of Vulcan," as he was now called, were immediately praised by the critics, and were soon praised by everybody. The harmless deceit filled the pockets of the poor poet, who laughed to see the critics writing incessant praise on an author whose every former effort they made a point of abusing.—Daily Bee.

Earnestness is the root of greatness and heroism. "They are in earnest," and not "They are only joking," is the epitaph which history has inscribed in letters of light, or of blood, on the tombs of her illustrious—the heroes, martyrs and teachers.

CHILDHOOD SCENES.

BY BLANCHÉ D'ARNOISE.

The tide of memory sweeps along—
Now backward rolls, to life's young spring;
While time and death drift slowly on—
A song of childhood's days I sing.

The guileless days of childish glee,
Those winsome days of summer hours,
When hope was busy as the bee,
Life's path lay through a vale of flowers.

Afar, yond, o'er the fields, where ran
Through tell-tale grass a limpid stream;
By mossy stone its fountain sprang—
A diamond set in emerald sheen.

That haunted spring—O years ago,
Three sisters clustered by its wave;
Where are they now? E'en one is gone,
And one is tottering toward the grave.

Yes, haunted was that tell-tale stream,
By three bright, joyous, happy girls;
Anon, gray hairs usurped the gleam
Of their bright, bonnie auburn curls.

Our mother, whose high, stately mien
Subduing time could scarcely bow,
Now slumbers in yon churchyard green,
And spring's soft turf waves o'er her brow.

Our only brother long hath died:
Deserted is our home of yore;
How often, often have I sighed—
That homestead hall is ours no more.

The sod is deepening in the glen,
Spring beauties with bright violets glow;
But ne'er the sisters three again
Will haunt the nook where wild flowers blow.

Thou happy home of childhood's days!
Deserted for life's thankless call—
Ah, how my yearning spirit prays
To breathe once more in homestead hall!

THE SCHOOL MISTRESS.

A TRUE STORY OF NEW ENGLAND LIFE.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

MAY KING was giving her last farewell to the little school in Alvord, where she had taught for three years. Her eyes were wet with tears, and her voice choked with emotion, and yet there was a deep undertone of happiness, that told of the "coming time." May King was about to be married; the inevitable fate of all school teachers; for what reasonable man does not know how beautifully such an occupation develops the love, the patience, the self-sacrifice, and more than all, the self-government which are so excellent in a wife!

She felt sad in parting from those pure, young, loving natures; from the twining arms that had so often been about her neck; from the sweet eyes that had brought happiness to her heart so often—and as her dewy glance sought their faces, she wondered if, in this uncertain world, any other love would ever come up to her, so sweet, so pure, so untroubled, again! It was too late to dwell upon it; for, winding through the trees that shaded the grassy lane beyond the school-house, she saw a form approaching, and knew it was that of one with whom she was soon to leave Alvord, probably forever.

A hasty kiss to each—a few sobs from one—a flower from another, and tears from all, closed the parting, and soon she was treading the green lane that led to her home, with the young minister by her side.

A few weeks latter, and she departed with him to the Far West. No flower-strewn path had Lewis Kenneth chosen; no bower of roses wooed him; no high ambition stirred his peaceful soul. He sought only to rear the standard of his Master, in that moral wilderness, and draw the straying ones under its protection. A log hut was his parsonage, a room guiltless of plaster, or of floor, except the earth, was his study, and the rudest and most uncultivated were his hearers. If he ever sought or wished for another lot, it was for May's sweet sake; but he looked into her tender, loving eyes, and saw that she was happy, even here.

A few years, and he saw how much two could do towards softening and refining the mass. His own example and his wife's—their gently persuading manners, and their perfect unselfishness, had done wonders;—and perhaps just at that time, Lewis would not have been tempted away from his chosen field. If he had a pang of regret, it was when his little Lewis was born. He looked at the child's future, and for a moment, he wavered; but it was the thought of all others, that he must not indulge, that of leaving his charge, now that he had buckled on his armor, and vowed to stand by them; and he conquered it at once.

After Lewis's birth, they enjoyed a year and a half of happiness, so serene, so utterly independent of all mere external sources, so fraught with a sweet consciousness of the freedom and beauty of their relation with those whom they came to serve, that May almost trembled to think of it, lest the cloud should overshadow them too soon. Her inward foreboding proved too prophetic. Her husband contracted a fever, while visiting some far away parishioners, and died in three days. It was hard to leave that dear form in the forests of the West, and feel that never again might she visit the grave beneath the giant branches that overshadowed it; but May gathered up all her strength, mentally and physically, and went back to Alvord. Here, in a few weeks after her return, another child was born; and although her father would gladly do all that he could for the helpless widow and orphans, May resolved that the moment she could leave her little one with safety, she would go back to her school. Another teacher had supplied her place, and now she, too, was to tread the same path in which May had preceded her; and fortunately, the application was not made too late.

Resolutely putting down her tumultuous grief, she went back to her employment. The children had grown almost out of her knowledge, and many were added to the school; but all seemed to love her, and to feel that one who moved about in her black dress so quietly, and wore such a sweet but mournful smile, must not be rudely disturbed. Still May loved best to see them glad and happy, and in a few weeks of self-discipline, she learned to bring a brighter look into the little school-house; and to diffuse a sense of happiness about her, more suited to the young and joyous natures of her pupils.

In her father's house, the advent of the two little ones was a great happiness. Anne King was older than May, and to her heart, once saddened by a secret woe, the children came like a mighty blessing, drawing out the springs of hidden love within her, and diffusing over her lonely life a beauty and a grace she had not dreamed of knowing again.

To the other brothers and sisters of the same family, the little Lewis and his baby brother were sources of unqualified pleasure; while Mr. King would delight in their sports, and bring up all his forgotten baby-lore to amuse them in their mother's absence.

The six school hours were, therefore, saddened by no anxiety for her children, and she grew to be almost happy. The memory of the dead, the thought of the resting-place of Lewis beneath the forest trees, the fear that she might not live to take care of his children, sometimes troubled the current of her life with a passing gloom, but hope and trust were still strong at her heart. Health and strength followed in their train, and she bore life with a feeling of entire resignation, if not of happiness.

There was not a heart in Alvord that did not love May Kenneth. She was not beautiful—that is as the world deems it—she was not highly talented, either; but there was a charm in her unconscious goodness that was better than beauty or talent. It is not to be supposed that May could have this quality of drawing hearts towards her, without being sought again as a wife. Her first offer came in such a questionable shape, that she hardly knew whether to consider it as such or not. Stephen Atherton had arrived at the ripe age of forty five, without any apparent intention of marrying. Bachelor habits were stamped upon his household, his business, his very air, as he walked the streets; firm, precise and unyielding. He wore a wig, and the wags of the village affirmed that his mustaches were fastened to his collar and moved with every turn of his head, in unison with the "dicky" itself.

Mr. Atherton was in love with May Kenneth, that was evident. He had been in love with her, years ago, as May King. He had loved Anne King, too, and he had been a flirt from his youth. Few of his loves had been returned, for all knew, that above all creatures in the world, he had loved himself. His intense selfishness had made him a bachelor. He had not heart enough to ask a woman, boldly and fearlessly, to be his wife, and to make up his mind to bear her decision like a man, even if she denied him; but he had ever fluttered round from flower to flower, trying to pique one woman into loving him, by heartless attentions to another, and flying off to a third, lest that other should feel too much encouraged to hope for the honor of being Stephen Atherton's wife.

Now that May King had returned, and he felt that she could only be too happy to become that envied woman, he commenced anew his attentions to her, drawing the notice of others towards them, by attending her to school in the morning, and walking that way again, at the hour when she would be ready to dismiss her little troop.

It was very unpleasant to May, and she had done everything which she dared, to prevent it. But he seemed to exult in the notoriety it occasioned, and smiled when his acquaintances congratulated him on his good fortune. "Rather the lady's good fortune," he said, "I flatter myself that the widow would consider herself quite happy; but I assure you, that my mind is yet hardly made up."

He was on his way to the school-house, then; and met May just coming out. She felt vexed and angry, for she had just received a letter which had demanded some reflection, and she could not bear the self-satisfied and assured air which Mr. Atherton had put on.

As usual, he walked by her side, and as usual, also, his conversation was of love. In vain May hurried along; in vain she looked over her letter; he was not to be turned aside. At last, with a strong effort, for her manner piqued him into a more hasty demonstration than he would otherwise have made, he said :

"Mrs. Kenneth, were a man who prizes your character to offer himself to you, would you marry again?"

"What right have you to ask?" she said.

"The right of a former interest in you, perhaps to be renewed again," he answered.

"I do not admit any former interest; you gave way to a little affected passion. I never believed in it."

"You do me wrong. I did really like you once. It would be easy for you to make me like you again."

"Don't try to, Mr. Atherton. It would not repay you for the trouble."

"You cannot mean that. There are many who would be easily caught with less."

"Very well, I am not one of them, nor will I interfere with their claims. Good morning," and May opened the gate and walked in without a word.

Mr. Atherton stared in blank dismay. He followed, and found her in the parlor.

"Mrs. Kenneth, did you mean what you said just now?"

"I have almost forgotten it. What was it? I presume I meant it, I always mean what I say."

"Did you mean to refuse me?"

"Having heard no offer, I could not do that."

"I was willing that you should consider it as such; and I ask you again, if you have any objections to me."

"None in the least. Why should I?"

"Then you will marry me. I knew, I felt that you would."

"A little too fast, Mr. Atherton. I did not say that. Stop until I call my sister, and if she has no objections to make—"

"Mrs. Kenneth! I beg, I entreat—"

Anne King stepped into the room with the stateliness of a queen.

"Really, Mr. Atherton," she said, "I did not know, when you were making proposals to me last night, that you were only rehearsing for my sister's benefit."

Mr. Atherton's face would have been a treasure to a painter, at that moment. Such confusion he exhibited, that May's kindly nature was really touched. But Anne was perversely disposed to annoy him.

"What a perfect waste of eloquence you bestowed on me, Mr. Atherton; notwithstanding my former experience of your fickleness, I really thought, last night, that your character as a male coquette was rather mending; and perhaps I might have taken you, after all. But I resign you to poor dear May. I would not come between her and her happiness;" and with a graceful laugh, she left the room, from whence Mr. Atherton glided out, evidently thinking less of himself than he ever did before.

That evening, before the story could be circulated, he offered himself to Miss Cynthia Hanson, and was accepted. May earnestly entreated Anne not to speak of the matter, but she thought it quite too good to keep, and the next week, Mr. Atherton was many times asked, which of the Kings had accepted his homage.

It would be useless to mention the disappointment of the apothecary, the lawyer and the new doctor, who each in turn were brought to acknowledge May's power. She turned a deaf ear to all, even to Mr. Octavius Bond, the dry goods merchant, who perpetrated the most distressing lines ever inscribed to "Dearest May." It was remarkable, too, that each followed the example of Mr. Atherton, after refusal, and was straightway engaged to some other lady.

"It must be a comfort to you, May," said Anne, "that you have helped to bring so many people together, and make them happy."

May began to be very tired of all this. She was human, too, in spite of the cruel heart-aches she had caused, and the remembrance of a smile which had been given her, in one of her little Saturday afternoon excursions, which she was in the habit of taking for Lewis's and Charlie's health, after the school was over for the week, often came back, and was as often driven away.

But the smile was seen again, and this time the gentleman found some one to introduce him; and thereupon, the acquaintance ripened into friendship; and then Mr. Easton brought his pretty daughter, and begged May to consider the child's orphan state, and to be a mother to her, and to allow him to become a father to her poor fatherless boys. May listened, and promised to think of it, and as Anne proposed to take him herself, in case her sister should not, May did think of it; and like all other affairs of a similar nature, it ended in wedding garments.

"Did sister Anne, remain an old maid?"

"Hush, child! that is not the name, now. Miss Anne King remained single until she found, or thought she found, a counterpart of her respected brother-in-law. Then she departed from her vow of perpetual mourning for the lost one of her youth, and she now rejoices in the care of a family, bequeathed to her by the late Mrs. Butler, and counting almost as many as that of the martyr, John Rogers."

THE LOST HOME.

BY CHARLES H. LAWTON.

The old home, my dear old home,
Where I played in early childhood,
The vine-clad house where my mother dwelt,
Near the fragrant, green-robed wild wood,
Has passed away, and strangers dwell
Where once I played all gladly,
And others claim those grand old trees,
While I am gazing on them sadly.

'Twas there my good old father died,
There angels called my brothers,
There fell asleep my brothers' brides—
What sorrow was my mother's!
There died my brother's little girl,
The laughing, blue-orbed Mary;
And strangers now possess the haunts
Where played that little fairy.

There, too, were born my best loved ones,
The laughing girls and boys,
Who cheer their father's careworn heart
When adverse fate annoys;
And there first breathed a loving one,
Who's cheered my weary hours,
With soothing voice and gentle words—
Affection's odorous flowers.

'Twas there with kind solicitude,
Guarding a lovely child,
My sister passed full many a year,
In pure affection mild.
So wonder not I love the spot,
And love those fine old elms;
I've ever loved them, ever shall,
Till the grave my form o'erwhelms.

And while through distant scenes I pass,
I'll heave a longing sigh
For the dear old home forever gone,
And will ye wonder why?
When ye think of the many ties that bind
My heart to the dear old spot,
A pitying tear mayhap you'll find,
And say we wonder not.

STREET ROMANCES.

BY ANNE T. WILBUR.

On the first floor of a house in the Place Royale there lived, twenty years ago, two single ladies—sisters. Martha and Angelique (these were their names) had been old maids for a long time. They had, in common, a pretty little fortune, a comfortable apartment, two cats, two dogs, a parrot, and a library containing "The Imitation of Christ," the "Life of the Saints," and three or four hundred volumes of old romances. Their peaceful existence was spent in playing at piquet in the evening with a bachelor neighbor of mature age—M. Labiche,—and in the day-time, in reading these three hundred romances, which they knew by heart. The habit of always revolving in the same circle, and of constantly feeding their imaginations with the same romantic adventures, had identified, as it were, these good ladies with the heroes and heroines of these books, incessantly perused and re-perused; they knew them, they loved them, they talked of them as of old friends.

Such were the occupations of these two old maids, and their daily conversations, which the jests of M. Labiche, their neighbor, sometimes caused to degenerate into quarrels. M. Labiche was an honest man, who had not much to do but to pretend to look after his nephew, a gay student; and not being very romantic, to amuse himself with joking his two neighbors. When he entered their room, after the usual compliments, he would inquire, with an air of interest, about the affairs of the hero or heroine, then the order of the day.

One beautiful sunshiny day in spring they went out to take a walk with M. Labiche. There was a crowd on the Boulevards and at the Champs Elysees. Some rope-dancers were performing their tricks in the open air, gipsies were telling fortunes; Punch was attracting the passers-by around his booth; players on the harp, violin and clarionet, and singers with guitars, were parading on the avenues.

"How many mysteries in all these shattered existences!" said Miss Martha, raising her eyes to heaven.

"How many romances!" added Miss Angelique. "How many adventures could these people relate, if they would tell us how, descending from step to step, they found themselves one day, with guitar or violin in hand, on the street pavement!"

"Love may have caused the misfortunes of some," resumed Miss Martha.

"Love or perfidy," returned her sister, "the treason of friends, and perhaps cruel and barbarous parents."

"You are doubtless in the right," exclaimed M. Labiche. "All those personages are romances in themselves. That songstress with the harp, for instance—I will wager she is a daughter of the Great Mogul."

"Why not?"

"This is not a supposition—it is a fact. This young lady has sought refuge in the Champs Elysees of Paris, after having escaped from a convent, in which the Great Mogul, her father, had confined her."

"Convents in Mogul?"

"That is not more extraordinary than to see a Frenchman in China. As for that Hercules who is balancing a chair on the end of his nose, I have heard say he was the younger brother of the Shah of Persia, proscribed from his cradle for his political principles—a species of Persian Iron Mask.”

“Look!” said Miss Martha, pointing him out to M. Labiche, “see that eternal musician in the alley at the left, loaded with instruments, who with his head, feet, hands and knees plays all at once the flageolet, the harp, the tamborine, cymbals, and another instrument of his own invention, composed of a quantity of bells attached to the two branches of an old pair of iron tongs. Look at that old man,” continued Miss Martha; “what ingenuity! How many piquant adventures does that inventive mind allow us to suppose! How many misfortunes do those wrinkles and white hairs announce!”

“And that great red nose,” replied M. Labiche; “what an incalculable number of bottles of wine drank in times past!”

“You have no soul,” said Miss Angelique.

Martha and Angelique pouted at their neighbor all the rest of the evening, which did not prevent M. Labiche from paying them a visit on the afternoon of the next day. The weather was very pleasant, and the two sisters were at work beside a window opening on the square; the subject of romances had not been alluded to, and M. Labiche was relating some political news, when a female voice was heard, accompanied by the notes of a guitar. The two sisters rose at once, as well as their neighbor, and perceived on the square, opposite the window, a street singer, whose face was concealed by a black lace veil. The voice which escaped from beneath this veil was not wanting in sweetness and a certain melancholy charm. Martha and Angelique exchanged a rapid glance.

“This woman,” said Martha, “with a noble figure and touching voice—”

“She wears a veil, which proves that she dares not show her face,” replied M. Labiche; “she is probably ugly.”

“You are insupportable,” exclaimed Angelique. “On the contrary, I will bet she is young and pretty, and if I dared, I would have her called in.”

“What hinders you?”

“I fear your raillery and your smiles, which might annoy this young person, evidently fallen into misfortunes.”

“I promise not to open my lips, and to keep my face concealed in my hat. But I can do better; shall I go home?”

“No, remain; your word is sufficient.”

The two sisters called their domestic, and gave her, speaking both at once, orders to go in search of the veiled songstress. An embarrassing silence afterwards reigned in the room. Martha and Angelique were not without apprehensions as to the result of their experiment. From the window they saw their domestic approach the singer and speak to her; then the latter turned towards the window, made a sign with her head in that direction, and approached with her guitar under her arm. When she appeared at the door of the parlor, Martha said in a voice of emotion, “Please to enter, miss, or madame, for we do not yet know which of these titles belongs to you. Enter without fear; you are surrounded with persons who compassionate your misfortunes before knowing them.”

As she spoke thus, she darted a severe glance on M. Labiche, to remind him of their agreement, and recognized with pleasure that the countenance of her neighbor was irreproachable.

“I thank the ladies for the interest they are pleased to manifest in me,” replied the singer, uttering a sigh.

“Believe it is not a simple sentiment of curiosity which animates us,” exclaimed Angelique. “Your appearance—your manners— But first sit down and allow us to offer you some refreshments.”

After having declined for a long time, the songstress at last consented to take a glass of sweetened water. She then raised her veil and showed a charming countenance, which could not have seen more than twenty years.

Martha and Angelique with difficulty suppressed an exclamation of joy; and both cast a triumphant glance on M. Labiche, who contented himself with bowing slightly, as a confession of his defeat.

“Just Heaven!” said Martha, “how happens it that with so much beauty and talent—for you sing like an angel—we see you reduced to your present sad condition? I bless the Providence which conducted you to day beneath our windows; for you will surely not refuse to narrate to us your misfortunes; and I hope that if we cannot put a period to them, we can at least alleviate them by our consolations and our cares.”

The songstress sighed and raised her eyes to heaven.

“Alas! ladies,” said she, “there is, I believe, no person in the world who has the power to render me less unfortunate than I am. But the interest which you manifest in me is too precious for me to refuse a narrative which may touch your compassionate souls. You shall learn the misfortunes of a young girl who is the victim of a barbarous prejudice.”

The two sisters exchanged a look of commiseration, and drew their seats nearer to each other. M. Labiche installed himself comfortably in his arm-chair to listen. Then the woman, after having put her handkerchief to her eyes, commenced thus :

"I have already told you that you see in me the victim of a barbarous prejudice."

"I understand," exclaimed Angelique; "your friends attempted to compel you to take the veil in a convent."

"Not so," replied the singer; "in the religion I profess we have no convents. I am English, and my parents educated me in the Protestant faith. I fear this avowal, made here, and to persons whom I suppose profess the Catholic faith, will deprive me of a part of the interest you have been pleased to manifest in me."

"Why so?" said Martha, earnestly. "We are all children of the same God, and tolerance is the first Christian principle."

"I thank you," resumed the woman; "you revive my courage. You know then that I am English; at my birth the name of Lucy was given me. My father, Sir Thomas Brown, a distinguished officer, having lost an eye in the war, was much affected by it—because being by nature very sensitive, he feared he should not be able to please any lady, and that he would be married only for his money. He therefore swore, being one-eyed, to marry only a one-eyed woman, which proved the elevation of his sentiments." Martha and Angelique testified their approval of this resolution by a murmur of assent. "My father therefore espoused my mother, who, by chance, had but one eye. Nevertheless, I came into the world with two."

"And two very fine ones," observed Martha.

"You are very kind; I have always been told that my right eye was like my father's, and my left like my mother's."

"Let us see," said Angelique.

The two sisters arose at once to look more closely at the eyes of the singer.

"In fact," said Martha, "one is a little darker than the other."

"I will pass over these details. I grew up; a splendid education was given me; and my father, who, it was said, had never done anything at the right time, lost his fortune just as I became of a marriageable age. Nevertheless, a young man presented himself as a candidate for my hand. Arthur Lyons (this was his name) adored me; and, for my part, I was much pleased with his attentions, when he suddenly disappeared, leaving me a letter, in which he informed me that a marriage was henceforth impossible between us, and that he was going to the continent with death in his soul.

"Pardon my emotion," resumed the singer, wiping her eyes. "After so many years, the remembrance of the flight of my lover is as painful to me as at first."

"That is very natural. But so many years you say; how old are you then?"

"Twenty years, three months and some days; and I was eighteen when my lover disappeared. It is then but two years since; but you know time seems long to those who suffer and sigh. I resume the thread of my narrative: My father, indignant against Arthur, ascended to the garret to take his sabre, which was rusty. He sharpened it, and set out in pursuit of Arthur, taking with him my mother and myself. Judge of the horror of my situation. We traversed all France without finding my lover. At Lyons, alone, we were informed that a man, whose description resembled Arthur, had just set out in the diligence for Marseilles. My father took a post-chaise, and we reached Marseilles at the same time with the diligence. The man whom we were pursuing, left the carriage; he wore green spectacles. My father, blinded by fury, and believing that Arthur had got on spectacles that he might not be recognized, precipitated himself with rage upon the stranger. They fought, and my father received a severe wound in the breast.

"My mother and myself were uttering frightful cries, when suddenly eight or ten men rushed out from behind some rocks, seized the stranger and myself, and placed us in a boat, which carried us to a xebec, anchored at a little distance. It was manned by Algerine pirates, who had carried their audacity so far as to make a descent on the coasts of Provence. The pirates treated us kindly; but I had the chagrin to see my companion, whom I should have said was not Arthur, fall in love with me. 'You comprehend,' said I to him, 'that after the sword-thrust you gave my father, I could not favor your suit; and besides, I am engaged to Arthur Lyons.'

"'Arthur Lyons?' exclaimed he. 'I knew him at Paris.'

"I must tell you that my companion in captivity was a dentist by profession. My lover, when he saw him, had been on the point of setting out on the enterprise of a man in despair. Unable to console himself for my loss, his plan was to go to America, in order to descend alone in a small boat, the cataract of Niagara. 'If I survive,' said he, 'I shall attempt to descend the rapids of the Ohio in a bark canoe, then the falls of the Meschabebe, and by risking myself thus successively in all the cataracts of the globe, I shall at last succeed in putting a period to a life which has become a burden.'"

"Poor Arthur Lyons!" exclaimed Angelique. "What a romantic soul! But I cannot comprehend how, loving you to such a degree, he could have forsaken you."

"You shall soon learn," resumed the singer. "My grief at this sad intelligence may be more easily imagined than described. I passed my days and nights in tears. But suddenly a ship belonging to the French navy chased us, and, to avoid her, the xebec directed its course towards Egypt, where we were sold to some merchants who were going in a caravan to Suez. The pacha of this city bought the dentist and myself. He was a brutal man, who summoned us to his presence, and learning the nature of my companion's profession, sent for his prime minister, who had a fine set of teeth, and demanded a proof of his skill in extracting one. My companion had his case of instruments in his pocket, and easily succeeded in taking out two of his finest teeth. The poor fellow fled in terror."

"You are a skilful man," said the pacha, to my companion. 'Unfortunately, your talents cannot be useful to me; for I rather need new teeth, as I have long had but one.'

"I can easily satisfy you, my lord, provided I can procure the teeth of a hippopotamus."

"For several days the pacha was in conference with my companion. One evening the latter came in search of me."

"You comprehend, beautiful Lucy," said he, 'that I cannot long remain at the court of Suez, since I have made the prime minister my enemy. I have therefore sought means to fly. The pacha is persuaded that, in order to fulfil my promise to him, I must have the teeth of a hippopotamus killed during the full moon. I shall set out to-morrow morning, with some slaves, to give chase to these animals; and this is my plan: We shall kill a large number of hippopotamuses, whose teeth I shall keep; afterwards, I will escape from the vigilance of the slaves, traverse Africa on foot to the Cape of Good Hope, and there embark for Europe with my treasure, which I now lay at your feet; for I hope, beautiful Lucy, that you will consent to fly with me.'

"It is impossible," replied I. 'After the sword-thrust you gave my father—'

"He grew angry, and loaded me with invectives, which did but confirm my refusal. He set out the next day as he had announced, and it was then, to amuse himself while awaiting his return, that the pacha summoned me to his presence, and after asking me various questions with regard to myself, announced his intention of espousing me that very evening. Imagine my despair. I went away in tears, and was calling death to my aid, when a slave, who had been attached to my service, approached and told me in the negro dialect, that he was interested in me and would save me, if I would confide in him. He was an old man of sixty, who sometimes played the guitar for the amusement of the pacha. I could not comprehend how he could be useful to me; but the event proved that I was right to trust in him. After dinner the pacha summoned me to his presence."

"This evening," said he, 'I shall espouse you.'

"I was ready to faint at this declaration; but remembering the counsel of the slave, I said:

"I am very much flattered by the honor you intend conferring on me; but in my country we do not marry with so little ceremony—it is customary, at least, to have a little music in honor of the occasion."

"Why did you not tell me this sooner?' replied the pacha. "Let some one go in search of my chapel-master, Solsirepifpan."

"This was the name of the old slave. He presented himself with his guitar."

"Play us something immediately," said the pacha to him; 'and if you do not succeed in amusing me as well as this lady, I will have your head cut off!'

"Solsirepifpan bowed, and after having drawn from his guitar a few chords and graceful preludes, commenced a melancholy air, which the pacha accompanied by beating time with his head and foot. By degrees his motions slackened, and he ended by falling asleep on his cushions. No one, it will be imagined, dared to disturb him, and I returned on tip-toe to my room, saved for this evening, but not without uneasiness as to what might happen on the morrow. In fact, the day following I was again summoned to dinner, and at the dessert I said to the pacha: 'My lord, shall we not have a little music this evening, also?'

"The pacha immediately sent for his chapel-master, uttering the most frightful oaths that he would not suffer himself to be surprised by sleep this evening."

"Solsirepifpan appeared with his guitar, besides, a pair of cymbals which he fastened to his knees. The pacha, who had never seen the like, opened his eyes wide, looking alternately at the guitar and the plates of copper, with whose noise he seemed to be fascinated. Half an hour had not passed away, when, as the evening before, he was overcome with sleep."

"On the third day I was again summoned, and as before, Solsirepippan was sent for at my request. He presented himself with his guitar, cymbals, and Chinese bells on his head. The astonishment of the pacha was at its height when he heard the noise made by these three instruments. As before, he fell asleep. The next day Solsirepippan added to his orchestra a tamborine, which he played with his heels."

"But," said Angelique, "one would think you were describing the old musician we saw yesterday at the Champs Elysees."

"That is he of whom I speak," she replied.

"And how came this man in Paris?"

"That you shall learn in the sequel."

"But," resumed Angelique, "Solsirepippan is as white as you are, and you said he spoke the negro dialect."

"He is nevertheless not a negro; he is a white Ethiopian, who had been taken prisoner in his youth by the troops of the Pacha of Suez. He belonged to one of the first families of Ethiopia, and had been invested at his birth with the dignity of murse, one of the most considerable in the country. But to resume my narrative: On the fourth day, my old friend—for I shall henceforth give the musician this title—said to me, 'I am at the end of my science, for you comprehend that one man, were he twice a murse, cannot play on more than four instruments at once. I have therefore taken measures to flee.'

"'But how shall we escape the guards who surround the palace?'

"He drew me into his room. 'Every evening,' said he, 'I rehearse at this hour the piece that I am to play the next day, and all the guards abandon their posts to listen at my door. It only remains for me to assemble them there this evening, and detain them some time. I have taken my measures for this.' In fact, by an ingenious combination, he had attached his instruments to each other by threads connected with a small cord, which terminated in a large round box, similar to our turnspits. While I was looking at this mechanism with astonishment, he opened a large wardrobe, in which he had had the precaution the night before to shut up the pacha's favorite monkey. My old friend took the monkey and put it in the box. The animal, affrighted, began to move its paws; the box immediately turned, and there was a frightful hubbub of cymbals and Chinese bells. I could not help laughing; but my friend, always full of prudence, raised his finger to recommend silence, and soon murmurs were heard behind the door, indicating that the guards were assembled there. We then descended by a window, opening on the gardens, and after having cleared a low wall, soon found ourselves without the suburbs of Suez."

Here she paused to take breath, and to drink a glass of sweetened water.

"How many adventures!" said Martha; "and yet there are persons who will not believe in romances!"

Meanwhile the singer, who had just risen and was approaching the window, suddenly exclaimed, "There he is, ladies!"

"Who? Are you speaking of Solsirepippan?"

"No; but look! It is he, below there, on the square."

She pointed with her finger to a young man in a blue spencer, with a piece of black taffety over one eye, who had before him a little table with the paraphernalia of a juggler. The young man having turned at the exclamation of the songstress, hastily folded up his little table, placed it under his arm, put his cups into his pocket, and rushed towards the house.

"Thank Heaven!" exclaimed he, as he entered the house, terrified, and without saluting anybody, "I have found you in time, Miss Lucy, Come quick—let us fly—the danger increases every moment!"

As he spoke thus, he took by the arm the singer, who seemed to have fainted, and attempted to drag her to the door.

"And who are you?" exclaimed the two ladies. "Why are you carrying off this young person? What signifies this violence? Barbarous ravisher, whither would you conduct her?"

The young man with the black taffety swallowed, as if through absence of mind, the glass of sweetened water prepared for the songstress.

"I would conduct her to the Persian ambassador!" replied he.

"We will not suffer it!" exclaimed Martha and Angelique. "Help! Here, M. Labiche! Jeanne Marguerite, shut the door! Help!"

"Stop," said the singer, with a tremulous voice, at the moment she was about to disappear on the stairs. "No noise, or you will ruin me! This young man is my deliverer!"

"What a singular adventure!" said Martha, who knew not what part to take.

The young man re-appeared at the door of the saloon, and whispered mysteriously to the two ladies, "I am Arthur Lyons!"

"It is enough to distract one!" exclaimed the two sisters.

They put their heads out of the window, and saw Arthur and Lucy enter a hackney coach, which drove off at a gallop. It will be readily imagined what was the subject of the conversation for the three persons remaining in the saloon.

"What can this mystery be, and what new danger threatens Lucy? Why has Arthur come here to carry her off, dressed as a juggler, and with a piece of black taffety over his eyes? Shall we never again see this young Englishwoman, and never learn the sequel of her history?"

Nearly two hours had passed away since the abduction, when, to the great surprise of everybody, the young man with the taffety reappeared at the door of the saloon.

"Ladies," said he, "I come to apologize for the hasty manner in which I entered just now; but time pressed. Now, my dear Lucy is out of danger, and I can give you all the explanations which are your due, for Lucy has informed me of your kindness to her; and since you know a part of her story and mine, I hope to be able to prove to you that Arthur Lyons was not born to the humble profession which he is practising at this moment; I am not a common juggler, and if you will deign to accord to me a little of that interest which you have manifested in my unfortunate love—"

"Certainly, Mr. Lyons; we are anxious to hear you. But begin by accepting a few drops of kirsch, which will not be too much to restore you after the terrible emotions of this day."

A servant brought the young man a glass of kirsch, and he then commenced his story:

"You must not be surprised if you find now and then some incoherences in my narrative; this proceeds from a blow I received in the head in descending the cataract of Niagara in a frail canoe of bark. I loved Lucy, and had obtained the promise of her hand, when I made this painful discovery, that the father of my beloved was a rascal, who had trifled with me. You see why Lucy's delicacy should have prevented her telling you this. My despair at this separation was so profound that it inspired me with the idea of putting an end to my life. I therefore sought death in perilous enterprises. Having passed over to America—after having revealed my project to the dentist, with whom you are already acquainted—I commenced by descending the cataract of Niagara in a light bark canoe. It was its very lightness that saved me. It swam like a cork, and I experienced no other injury than a blow on the hand received from a rock at the surface of the water. I risked my life with the same success on all the rivers of America, and at last becoming more obstinate as I found death more difficult, crossed over to the continent of Africa. One day as I was suffering my canoe to drift down the river Pongoi Pongo, I saw a man running on the shore, pursued by negroes and crying for help. With two strokes of the oar I reached the bank. The fugitive sprang into my bark, and we regained the middle of the stream. Our boat rapidly descended the river, and was soon beyond the reach of pursuit. But what was my astonishment at recognising in the man whom I had just saved, my Parisian dentist. He related to me the facts you already know, and added that having killed many hippopotamuses, he had attempted to escape from the servants of the pacha, to reach the Cape, and thence pass into Europe.

"This intelligence, as you may imagine, at once changed my plans. Determined to find Lucy at all hazards, I abandoned my canoe and a part of my money to the dentist, and returning by the bank of the river, at last fell in with the negroes, and offered to accompany them to the pacha, in place of the man who had escaped. After a three days and three nights' march, we entered the city, and I was conducted to the presence of the pacha. I found him enraged at the departure of Lucy. He received me with a shower of blows. Forgetting all prudence, I replied sharply. A violent quarrel took place, and exasperated in my turn, I took him by the throat, and as he was about to have struck me with his poignard, wrested it from his hands, and plunged it into his breast. He fell dead at my feet! I seized his clothes, turned his turban over my eyes, and went out with a confident step. No one thought of stopping me, and I was far from Suez before the murder of the pacha was known.

"To prevent being traced by the people, who might have been sent in pursuit of me, I crossed the Red Sea by swimming; then passing through Arabia, Persia and Mogul, returned to France, after having narrowly escaped death twenty times, and practised all trades to obtain a living. I at last adopted the profession of a juggler, for which nature had given me an especial aptitude. By an unexpected chance, I found Lucy, with her faithful musician, on a steamboat which plies between Smyrna and Marseilles. We returned to Paris together, and here new misfortunes awaited us. My family, blinded by the intrigues of an elder brother, who wished to have my property, had proscribed me, so that I am compelled to continue my profession of juggler. The father of my mistress, Sir Thomas Brown, who recovered from the wound he had received, was seeking his daughter to shut her up in a convent. Fortunately the Persian ambassador, with whom I had become acquainted during my travels, offered me his protection, and it was to his hotel, beneath the shelter of his flag, that I conducted my mistress this morning, at the moment when the agents of the English embassy were about to seize her. Our project is to become naturalized Persians, that we may henceforth live in safety. I will add that the letters of naturalization must be now ready, and are but to be signed. The old chapel-master, Solairepifpan, has installed himself at the Champs Elysees, where you have met him more than once. As for the dentist, he became my friend, though he would have carried off my Lucy from me; he returned six months since, after a shipwreck, in which he lost his whole cargo of hippopotamus teeth, and is selling on the Place de la Bastille little packets of Persian powder, which he himself manufactures of charcoal from Yonne."

The two sisters, after thanking the young man for his politeness, and asking him numerous questions, consulted together a moment, and said, "I suppose, sir, that after so many misadventures, it would be a great pleasure for all four of you, the chapel-master, the dentist, Miss Lucy and yourself, to meet. My sister and myself will be happy to be spectators of this re-union, and if you will permit us to invite you to dinner to-morrow, this would be in our eyes the most agreeable conclusion of your narrative."

The young man overwhelmed her with thanks and apologies.

"No excuses," said Miss Angelique. "As Miss Lucy and yourself are this evening to become naturalized Persians, there will be no longer any danger in this dear child's appearing in the street. So we shall rely upon you, and will ourselves invite the chapel-master whom we already know."

"I ought to inform you," said Arthur, "that he is deaf, and that his misfortunes have rendered him cross and crabbed; I think he is somewhat in love with Lucy, though from delicacy he has concealed this hopeless passion."

"Poor man!" said Angelique.

"As for the dentist, I shall myself have the honor to bring him and introduce him to you."

At these words, Arthur saluted them twice in the Chinese fashion, holding his arms and the forefinger of each hand elevated above his head; for which he apologized, saying that it was a bad habit which he had contracted during his travels. He afterwards saluted them properly and went out in the European manner.

"Ouf!" said M. Labiche; "there is no end of that. Do you believe a word of what this fellow has told you?"

"How incredulous you are!" exclaimed the two sisters. "And is there anything in this narrative more incredible than what we read every day in the most celebrated romances?"

"I pass over the story of the songstress, although it is very improbable; but as for the young man, allow me to say that he tells stretchers. Do you believe, for example, that he swam across the Red Sea, as he says?"

"The Jews formerly passed over on dry land. Besides, Sir Arthur took care to inform us that he had received a blow on his head, which accounts for any incoherence in his ideas."

"Parbleu!" exclaimed M. Labiche; "if anybody's head is out of order, I know whose it is."

"Why do you not say at once that we are old fools?" exclaimed the two sisters. "It would be doubtless useless to ask you, who do not believe in romances, to dine with us to-morrow; you would not do us this honor."

"Heaven forbid!" exclaimed M. Labiche; "your stories would destroy my appetite."

"Well, our hero of romance can dispense with the presence of your austere countenance, and I hope they will but eat the better for it."

"Great good may it do them!"

At these words, M. Labiche took his hat and cane, and went out with a furious air.

Preparations for dinner commenced the next morning early. The fine linen damask, the massive family plate, long lying unused in the closets, once more saw the light of day; the kitchen was crammed with provisions, among which was an enormous tart of sweetmeats Miss Angelique had prepared with her hands.

Towards noon, the sisters dressed themselves to go out. Their object was to invite the chapel-master, otherwise the musician of the Champs Elysees.

"We may not meet him," said Miss Martha; "perhaps he will not have come out to-day, and we do not know where he lives."

"In this case," replied Miss Angelique, "Sir Arthur would himself take the trouble to go in search of him."

Their toilet finished, the two sisters took a carriage and directed their course towards the Champs Elysees. It was not without a lively sentiment of joy that they perceived, from afar, the musician in his usual place, and laden with his extraordinary instruments.

"I shall never dare to speak to him first," said Miss Angelique.

"Nor I," said her sister; "this old man inspires me with so much respect; besides, I do not know how to address a muree."

"Nevertheless some one must commence!"

After a long hesitation, Miss Martha approached the musician without quitting the arm of her sister.

"Noble muree," said she to him.

But the hubbub of the cymbals, the Chinese bells and the tongs was such, that the old man appeared not to hear her. Then Miss Angelique touched his shoulder, and the musician turned his head in that direction.

"Noble nurse," resumed Miss Martha, "we are sent to you by old friends, to invite you to come and dine with them this evening."

"What?" replied the musician, with a movement of the body which caused all the bells to jingle; "will they pay for the dinner? Good! I suppose it is my friend the tow-eater who has invited me."

"Yes, respectable old man, some friends wish to dine with you. They will expect you this evening at this address," giving him a card, "at six o'clock. Do not fail to be there, noble nurse."

A considerable number had gathered around these three personages.

"Madame," said an old gentleman to Miss Martha, very politely, "tell us, if you please, what is a nurse?"

Miss Martha had forgotten the explanation which they had given her the night before, but she retained her sang-froid and replied:

"Sir, is it possible that at your age you are ignorant of these things?" And leaving the old gentleman motionless with astonishment, she re-entered the carriage with her sister.

"I confess," said Angelique, "that I was not much pleased with this old man. He seems to me to have contracted very bad habits, and I even thought I smelt wine."

"It is poverty," said Martha.

Reasoning thus, the two sisters returned to the Place Royale.

The guests were punctual to the rendezvous. A little before six, Sir Arthur arrived first, giving his arm to Lucy. Both wore a turban with a crescent, which they took off to salute their hostess. The young man still wore the piece of taffety over his eye. The two sisters embraced Lucy affectionately. She was indeed charming in her turban.

"Allow me to introduce to you our friend the dentist Theogenes," said Arthur; "the destroyer of hippopotamuses and the companion of all our misfortunes. Theogenes, dentist to the prime minister of the late Pacha of Suez!"

As he spoke thus, Arthur pointed to a tall, light complexioned young man, who held in his hand a little leather cap, resembling the coiffure of German students.

"Ladies," said Theogenes, modestly, "my long voyages have made me acquainted with the customs of good company in the five quarters of the globe. How shall I salute you? In the Ethiopian or Chinese manner? Do you prefer the Caffre salutation or that of the natives of the Sunda Islands, who whirl round three times?"

"In any mode you please, sir," said the two sisters.

"Then I will give you first the Turkish salutation and afterwards the French."

At this moment, a noise as of quarrelling was heard in the ante-chamber. It was the musician, who had arrived, and whom the servant had obstinately refused admittance, because of his long beard and his want of neatness. The ladies went out to meet him and invited him to enter. The old man, surprised to find himself in the midst of persons whom he did not know, looked around him, as if seeking some one with his eyes, and murmured:

"Where is the tow-eater?"

"He is coming," replied Arthur.

Notwithstanding this assurance, the man appeared uneasy and took refuge in a corner. Suddenly returning to his fixed idea, which was to find his friend, he exclaimed in a loud voice:

"Why, then, is not the tow-eater here?"

The two sisters had left the room and did not hear this cry of distress. Theogenes seized the old musician, flattered him, instructed him, and succeeded in quieting him. He was powerfully aided in this enterprise by certain inviting odors issuing from the kitchen. Dinner was announced. Arthur hastened to offer his hand to Miss Angelique; Theogenes followed, giving one hand to Miss Martha, the other to Lucy. The musician came last, asking no more explanations since he had comprehended that they were about to dine. On seeing the table copiously garnished, he began to whistle softly, in sign of satisfaction. Miss Martha looked with astonishment at Sir Arthur, who said in a low tone:

"It is the sacred whistle of the Ethiopian nurses, prescribed by their religion before each repast."

They seated themselves at the table; the cheer was delicate, and the wines choice. The guests complimented the mistress of the house.

"During my long residence in China," said Theogenes, "I ate delicious swallows' nests, but they are not to be compared with this vol au vent."

"How, sir," asked Miss Angelique, "have you been in China? Your friend, Sir Arthur, did not tell us that!"

"It was because he had not time to give you all the details of my history; but I have lived in Peking, where they eat broth with slender sticks, which makes me very awkward in using a spoon."

"With sticks?" repeated Miss Angelique, in astonishment.

"That is not extraordinary there, because they bring up their children early to perform tricks. If I had some stocks, it would be the easiest thing in the world for me to show you how they eat broth with them."

Miss Martha, who had a desire to see such a prodigy, said to Theogenes:

"Will knitting-needles do instead?"

"Very well; but it is a pity you had not thought of it sooner, for I have finished my soup."

Sir Arthur rose, and taking his glass, cried:

"Ladies and gentlemen, I drink to sensibility, to that noble sentiment which opens our hearts to the love of our neighbors, and our ears to the recital of their misfortunes! If we are assembled here after so many trials, the noble nurse, the charming Miss Lucy, Theogenes and myself, if we are seated all together at this hospitable table, we owe it to the angelic sensibility of these two excellent ladies. Ladies and gentlemen, to sensitive hearts!"

All the glasses were emptied at once, and even the two sisters, though they were not in the habit of drinking wine, did honor to the toast, with evident emotion. There was then a moment of silence. The nurse seemed entirely to have forgotten his friend, whose absence had at first made him so uneasy. He ate and drank with a sort of enthusiasm, smacking his lips after each draught. Miss Lucy, on her part, though with a modest air, did justice to the feast. Suddenly Miss Martha, to re-animate the conversation, addressed herself to Sir Arthur:

"Sir," said she, "I have not yet learned the reason why you constantly wear that piece of taffety over your left eye. Can you have lost it?"

"I might reply that I had lost it," said Sir Arthur, "but that would not be the truth. If I have hitherto worn this piece of taffety, it has been that I might not be recognized, but now that I am a naturalized Persian, I may show my face uncovered." Then taking off the taffety, he exclaimed, in a tone of solemnity: "Sun, I have too long contemplated thee with but one eye! But there is nothing like having two eyes, whatever the infamous Sir Thomas Brown may say."

"Ah, my friend," said Lucy, devouring a chicken-wing "you forget that you are speaking of my father!"

"I respect that one-eyed man," replied Arthur, "though he little deserves it; but what do I see now that I have my two eyes? It seems to me our unfortunate friend Theogenes is falling into one of his fits of melancholy."

In fact, Theogenes had for some time kept his eyes obtinately fixed on a lacquered tray ornamented with Chinese paintings.

"Sir," said Miss Angelique to him, "why do you look at that tray with an air so sad?"

"Alas," sighed Theogenes, "do not ask me! You re-open the most cruel wound of my heart. Among the paintings on this tray, I see the representation of a young Chinese lady, and this charming figure reminds me— But why recall these sad remembrances amid the joy of a feast! Rather let us imitate this good nurse who does not cease to fill his glass and empty it with equal philosophy. In the name of heaven, take away this tray from before my eyes, if you would not have me expire with grief!"

Sir Arthur eagerly removed the tray, and addressing the two sisters, said:

"To efface the sad impression caused by the misfortunes of our friend Theogenes, and as a substitute for the story of his love which he will relate to-morrow, I will ask these ladies permission to sing them a song."

Permission was readily granted and Sir Arthur gave a song which he had learned of the negroes, and in the chorus of which Theogenes, Miss Lucy and the nurse joined. The latter committed several errors in the words, but he developed a superb bass voice, and accompanied himself by striking with his knife on his glass, as did also Lucy, Sir Arthur and Theogenes. In the midst of this confusion, the door opened suddenly and M. Labiche appeared on the threshold, where he remained for a moment immovable as a statue.

At the arrival of M. Labiche, the chorus suddenly ceased; the nurse alone, plunged in a sort of ecstasy and with his eyes fixed on his glass, repeated with enthusiasm the third couplet, attempting to imitate the negro accent. As for the two sisters, it is impossible to paint their confusion. M. Labiche advanced, and fixing his eyes on Arthur, exclaimed:

"On my word, now that this graceless fellow has laid aside his taffety, I recognize him; it is my nephew!"

"His nephew!" said the young man, with a tragic air; "I am Sir Arthur Lyons, English by birth, as true as that these are Miss Lucy, the daughter of Sir Thomas Brown, and Theogenes the dentist and destroyer of hippopotamuses of the Place de la Bastille. This man appears to have evil intentions towards me, but I place myself under the protection of the Persian flag, and if I am driven to extremities, will embrace Islamism."

"Heavens!" exclaimed the two sisters; "what does this signify?"

"It signifies," resumed M. Labiche, "that my nephew, whom you see there, is no more English than I am the Grand Turk, and that he has been telling you nonsense for two days past, with the assistance of his friend Theogenes, who is called Theogenes no more than you are, and this lady, whose titles and qualities I can guess." Then facing his nephew, he added: "Is this the way you employ your time, instead of pursuing your law studies? How you have abused the sensibility of these two excellent ladies by disgracing yourself as a giggler and telling them a thousand ridiculous stories, and that in my presence! What, you dared assert that you had descended the Falls of Niagara in a bark canoe, assassinated the Pacha of Suez, crossed the Red Sea by swimming, and killed thousands of hippopotamuses?"

"It was not I who killed them, uncle, it was my friend Theogenes."

"Out upon your hippopotamuses!"

"Uncle," said Sir Arthur, "you have exceeded all bounds with Theogenes. He is a lawyer of the highest order and will soon be a magistrate. Your inconsiderate language may cost you dear."

"Three grounds of accusation," resumed Theogenes, counting on his fingers: "First, abuse and disrespect towards a magistrate at table. Second, excitation of hatred and contempt for a class of society, the hippopotamus hunters. Third, damages to the trade in horn snuff boxes."

"Stop your nonsense," said M. Labiche. "As for our Miss Lucy, if I am not much mistaken, her graceful person was represented to us by one of our most celebrated dancers of La Chaumeres, probably Mademoiselle Pomponnette, or Mademoiselle Perce Orcille."

"Neither Pomponnette nor Perce-Orcille," replied Lucy, with a graceful courtesy, "but their rival, the amiable Mouche-a-Miel, if you please."

"Let us leave this barbarous guardian to the bitterness of his evil thoughts," said Theogenes.

"I dare not curse him, but I dare fly from him," said Mouch-a-Miel.

After the departure of his nephew, Theogenes and Mouche-a-Miel, M. Labiche dropped upon a seat, a prey to a fit of laughter which lasted a good quarter of an hour. The two sisters comprehended that they had been the victims of an atrocious mystification. They pouted at M. Labiche for a fortnight. But one rainy morning ennui compelled them to return to their cards, and a game of piquet reconciled them.

THE INTREPID PASSENGER.

BY LIEUTENANT MURRAY.

I TOOK passage from Liverpool on a fine looking English liner, and we hoped to make the run to New York inside of twenty days. It was during the Irish exodus, which was at its height some five years since, and we had at least two hundred passengers of that nationality in the ship, with about twenty cabin passengers. The ship, however, was a large and well found vessel, and I saw no reason, on a casual examination, why she would not prove reasonably comfortable. I had made the outward trip in a steamer, and chose a sailing vessel on my return, for sake of the variety it would afford.

Scarcely had we discharged the pilot and fairly laid our course, before I saw unmistakable evidence that in my choice of a vessel I had probably been unfortunate. From a somewhat extensive experience with the sea and the belongings of a ship, I naturally found myself at the outset inclined to observe the character of the captain, officers and crew to the safety of whose management so large a number of human beings had entrusted themselves. The captain alone seemed to possess a degree of intelligence which his station demanded, while of his mates I saw not one who looked outwardly as though fitted for a station of trust. Indeed, the first officer I was satisfied was three fourths intoxicated from the very outset, and continued so to the end of the voyage.

The crew were honest enough, as such ships' companies go, and under proper lead and discipline would doubtless have done well under any ordinary circumstances. To balance this apparent want of excellence in the crew and officers, the ship itself was a staunch eight-hundred ton liner, of fine model, nearly new, and this only her second voyage. Everything about her worked easily, and she steered like a pilot-boat. Consoling myself with these reflections, I resolved to be watchful and hope for the best, but would much have preferred to be on dry land to taking passage in a ship the skill of whose officers I distrusted.

The cabin passengers were soon pleasantly acquainted with each other, and the time passed agreeably for some eight days in the playing of games, cards, chatting, etc. I was particularly pleased with the appearance of one couple, a lady of some nineteen years, and a gentleman of perhaps twenty-two. From casual observation, I could easily make out a story connected with them. The lady and her father, a wealthy

New York retired merchant, were on their way home after a few months' travel upon the continent, and the young gentleman, also an American, who had doubtless made their acquaintance somewhere abroad, was returning in their company exercised with the tenderest sentiments towards the daughter. Further than this, it was also easily discernible that the father from some cause looked coldly upon the advances that were respectfully but tenderly made by the young lady's companion.

On the passenger list, displayed in the cabin, the young man's name stood plain Mr. Hammond, and without making further inquiry of the other than simply to settle the name and identity of each, we had, with travellers' privilege, fallen into an agreeable intimacy with each other, as well as the rest of the cabin passengers. Young Hammond seemed to be seriously affected in his spirits after a few days of the passage had transpired, evidently on account of the restraint which the father's coolness placed upon his intercourse with the lady already referred to, and who on her part, at least, exhibited the most lively interest in his pleasant attentions. With unobtrusive perseverance, he was still her companion at her morning and evening walks upon the deck, and by his pleasant and intelligent conversation seemed to make himself agreeable at times even to the father.

Mr. Edwards was an individual of much character, evidently proud of his daughter, whose appearance showed her to have been reared in the most aristocratic manner, and I could easily divine that it must be from want of property and position on the part of young Hammond that his suit did not thrive with the father. All this at the time was of course but surmise on my part, but it was true, as I have since then chanced to discover.

It was a very fresh morning on our tenth day out of port, when Mr. Edwards and his daughter finding the weather rather too bolsterous for comfort upon deck, were about to go below. Young Hammond was regretting this, as it would deprive him of the few moments of private conversation which he had anticipated at this period, and which could hardly take place in the somewhat crowded cabin. Captain Goss had for some object gone quite forward, and with one arm resting over the starboard cat-head, was making examination of the ship's "fore foot," when suddenly the cry of "man overboard" started us all, and looking forward to where the captain had just stood, we observed that he had disappeared.

Instead of either of the ship's officers immediately taking matters in hand, there at once arose a Babel of voices, each one suggesting some expedient, and two or three foremast hands jumping into a quarter boat, began to prepare for lowering it into the sea. I hastily looked towards the first mate; a glance was sufficient. He seemed to be stupid, either half drunk or feigning it. Perhaps he did not know what to do; if he was as stupid as he appeared, this was the case. I saw young Hammond seize hold of the after booby-hatch, and together we threw it into the sea, while he exclaimed:

"Never fear, Captain Goss. We will pick you up!"

"Let go the gripes of that boat," shouted young Hammond in a tone of command such as we had not yet heard on board. "No boat can live in this sea."

The men instinctively obeyed, and seemed at once inspired by the confidential tones in which they were addressed.

"Cast adrift a dozen of those life buoys," continued he who had thus unhesitatingly taken command of the ship.

"Ay, ay, sir," said a score of ready voices.

"Now lay aloft, one of you, and keep the run of that hatch;" for we could already discover the captain making himself fast to it by means of his neckcloth and handkerchief. "Mr. Reed," continued young Hammond, addressing the first mate, who seemed to partially arouse, "all hands on deck, sir; call up the watch."

"What would you do, sir?" asked the mate respectfully, for spite of the apparent impropriety, he was awed into obedience by the prompt manliness of young Hammond.

"We must work the ship to windward and come down upon him. Brace her sharp up, and bring her close by wind. With a will, sir, with a will—there's no time to lose."

Whether the obvious propriety of these orders struck the mate, I cannot say; but they were instantly obeyed. Young Hammond himself, seizing a deck trumpet, issued the necessary directions in detail, and with that firm and calm decision that inspired every soul with entire confidence. The ship was at the time of the accident under double-reefed topsails, reefed courses, jib and spanker, running at the rate of twelve knots, the wind abeam; consequently, before these orders were accomplished, the hatch on which the captain was floating was nearly two miles dead to windward of the ship, which had drifted to leeward.

As we have seen, the sea was too rough to lower a boat, and the only chance, therefore, of saving the captain was to work to windward of him; and now it was that our intrepid young passenger exhibited a skill and ability in handling the ship that amazed the oldest tar on board. He accomplished it in beautiful style, while the mates and men obeyed him without a moment's hesitation. Before the ship was hove about, the captain was on the weather quarter three miles distant. We could not fetch him on the next tack by nearly a hundred yards, but as we passed, we could see him distinctly amid the breaking spray, and young Hammond jumping into the main shrouds, hailed through his trumpet:

"Hold on, captain; we'll be back in a few minutes."

Whether he could hear these encouraging words or not, he understood the motions of the ship perfectly, and taking off his tarpaulin which fastened beneath his chin, waved it over his head! Another tack of three miles, and we weathered him.

"Haul up the mainsail," was the brief, prompt order of young Hammond at the appropriate moment.

"Ay, ay, sir."

"Throw the main topsail to the mast now, Mr. Reed."

"Ay, ay," said the mate.

And the ship drifted gradually down upon the captain.

"Range along here, a dozen of ye, on this lee side, with lines and hooks, to grapple the hatch," ordered Hammond.

"Ay, ay, sir," was the intelligent answer of the men.

"Two of you rig a running bowline, and stand by to throw it round the captain. Steady, now, steady all of ye."

He was implicitly obeyed. In ten minutes after, Captain Goss was safely in his cabin, and in a few hours was again at his station on deck.

The moment that Captain Goss was carried below, young Hammond walking towards the first mate, handed him the deck trumpet, to signify, in nautical etiquette, that he once more yielded him the command; but as he did so, there arose from the entire company three deafening cheers for his gallantry and the skill he had displayed, that made the ship fairly tremble in every timber!

"By the heavens above us," said the mate, as he took the insignia of his office, "you are a man, every inch of you, and there's Jack Reed's hand upon it, be ye who you may!"

Young Hammond made no reply, but gently sunk into his former position, and returned to the cabin.

I know not what passed between him and

Captain Goss, but I overheard the end:—"Not ten men in the British service could have saved me, though from the first moment I heard your voice on deck, I knew there was a hand on board that understood what was necessary."

As much as the manliness of young Hammond's conduct delighted me, its result upon Mr. Edwards was to me quite as gratifying. There was no longer any coldness on the part of the father of that beautiful girl towards her new friend. Both father and daughter had witnessed the entire scene which we have so hastily described, and young Hammond was admitted to their confidence and intimacy, as he also became the idol of the whole ship's company.

The confidence thus remarkably inspired ultimately resulted in an engagement which terminated in a most happy and appropriate marriage.

Arrived at New York, after we were dressed for landing, and as young Hammond was handing Miss Edwards over the ship's side, I observed that he wore the undress uniform of an officer of the United States Navy!

A SOLDIER STORY.

During the late Mexican war, the veteran General Riley, since deceased, was ordered to lead the storming party at Cerro Gordo. During the war of 1812-15, Gen. Riley had been shot in the throat, and consequently had a peculiarly strange intonation. He was ordered to storm one of the batteries of Cerro Gordo, and when his command was mustered, was thus addressed by his second in command:

"General, I do not think we can take this work."

"Think! You are not paid for thinking."

"But sir," said Col. B., "we can't take it."

"Can't take it—you have got to take it."

The old general put his hand to his belt, and pulling out a paper, said: "Here, thir, ith General Scott's order in black and white to take the infernal thing."

And they did take it.—N. Y. Sun.

GOOD USE OF THE LANTERN.

A conductor of a train on the Indiana Central Railroad, recently, says the Dayton Gazette, expecting the approach of another, went forward to give warning. It was night, and his lantern went out just as he heard the train rapidly approaching. As the locomotive came up, he seized a club and threw it, but the missile glanced off from the engine, without making a noise perceptible even to himself. But seizing his lantern, he hurled it at the lantern of the passing locomotive, just as it came opposite to him. Fortunately he hit it. The crashing glass and the extinguishment of the light startled the engineer. A sharp whistle was heard—the brakes were shut down—the train stopped. Everybody was safe, when, but for the throwing of that lucky lantern, scores might have been killed or wounded.

SORROW AND CONSOLATION.

BY W. M. LATIMER.

From the drear, the misty darkness,
Of the night in which I stand,
Listening to the pattering raindrops,
Making music through the land,—

Comes a voice, whose mystic meaning
Strikes my heart with awe and pain;
For I know the light that glimmers
On my path shall fade again.

Nature hath her songs of warning,
Which the saddened heart must hear;
Kindly singing of the shadow,
Ere the shadow draweth near!

Woe are they who take the warning,
Nerving up their souls to bear
All the sorrow, all the anguish,
Stooping never to despair!

Faster, faster fall the raindrops;
Not a star is seen above;
And the great night seems to shudder,
Like a heart shut out from love!

See! the stifling mists are gathering,
Ghostlier, ghastlier than before;
And the wind moans like a Lazar,
Spurned and cursed from door to door!

But I know the dreary darkness
Soon will blossom into day;
Crowned shall be the mists with splendor;
Kissed the night's white tears away.

Then the day shall stand in glory,
Smiling from the orient hills;
On his face such radiant beauty
As a tranquil spirit fills.

Now I list in vain—the voice is Dead, that smote my spirit so,
And the sunny tides of gladness
Flood me with their golden flow!

I have read night the shadow,
And the voice not heard in vain,
And I trust the light will glimmer
Somewhere on my path again!

THE SILVERSMITH.

BY WILLIAM B. OLIVER.

"THE experience of a human heart!" That would indeed be a history to read in our best hours. So much that is unreal, so much, even of pure and good feelings, are covered and concealed in our hearts' experience, that one who would give truly that experience to the world, would be doing the world a great and incalculable service. Nor can we suppose that the coarser and harder exterior may not sometimes cover the experiences of hearts that are warm in affection, and noble in goodness.

I thought so, at least, when I passed the window of Andrew Elliot's shop, last summer, and heard the soft word and pleasant tone in which he responded to the harsh and uncouth words of his sister, who was arguing with him upon some point of their domestic economy, and upon which she was soon joined by another sister (a duplicate of the former), at whose appearance Andrew seemed mechanically to give up the contest.

Andrew is a silversmith, and has a little unpretending shop, in a most unpretending street. His two maiden sisters manage his house, which is under the same roof with his shop; for Andrew is a bachelor, of some sixty years old, and still he is the youngest of the three, and the two ladies consider that they have a perfect right to manage him as they did, when, as a boy, he yielded to their stern and harder natures.

In his youth, Andrew was a gentle and confiding boy. Handsome he never was, but still, there was a soft and tender nature within him, that shone out of his kindly blue eyes, and gave something of character to features not otherwise attractive.

But when Andrew was twenty years old, the house in which he lived caught fire. His mother, a feeble, sickly woman, was sleeping on the second floor; and Andrew, whose room was above hers, ran down stairs, after all others had forsaken the falling building, and rescued his mother from the flames which had already caught her bed.

His face was deeply scarred, and his hands severely burned in the attempt; and the scars still remained on his neck and brow, a monument to his real bravery and filial devotion, but an enduring addition to his original ugliness of countenance, which can never be effaced.

Judith, the elder sister, was originally very handsome, but the traces of a haughty and imperious temper have marred her face more effectually than Andrew's scars; while Mabel, whose strength of mind consists solely in opposition, wears a fiercer look even than her sister.

Still, the two resemble each other so much, that the very children of the neighborhood can only distinguish them after a long observation, and as I said before, they are really duplicates, being twins, and some two or three years the seniors of their brother.

A few months ago, Andrew became acquainted with a widow lady by the name of Manners. She had one child, a boy of fifteen, who was desirous of learning the trade of a silversmith; and Andrew Elliot was recommended to her, as in all respects a suitable person to take charge of a fatherless youth like Julius Manners. A few interviews with the mother interested and pleased Mr. Elliot so much, that he was, for once, carried out of his usual modest and retiring disposition, and for the first time in his life he dared to tell a woman that he loved her.

Not without some encouragement on the part of the lady, was he brought to this; but Mrs. Manners was so thoroughly pleased with his calm good sense, his kindness to her fatherless boy, and his evident admiration of her own beauty and lady-like deportment, that Andrew, still dreading the effect of his uncomely scars upon her mind, offered and was accepted, upon the strength of her palpable liking for him.

With a heart overflowing with joy and gratitude inexpressible, Andrew returned to his home to make known his intentions to his sisters. The two grim dragons who guarded his household, were sitting at that moment, in full discussion upon the character and manners of the person who had just given their brother the only glimpse of true happiness which had ever yet brightened his life.

He had entered the room, with his plain and disfigured face almost glorified by the rapture which had lighted up his heart with a strong and holy flame. He was arrested at the very moment of his entrance, by Judith's hard and cold voice, uttering the severest judgment upon the being who had just blessed him with her love. Mabel was opposing her sister, as usual, but while she opposed her upon one point of Mrs. Manners's character, she maliciously alluded to something still more glaring, which Judith had not, in her eagerness, observed.

"It can't be that she likes Andrew," said Mabel, after Judith had expressed her opinion that she did, "for I have seen her time and again, go into Mr. Anderson's store opposite, and stand and talk with him by hours together."

"O," said Judith, "she only did that to catch Andrew's eye! Well, I hope he won't be such an old fool as to take up with her. It would be hard times, Mabel, for you and I, if Andrew does go off and get married."

"No danger!" said Mabel, "he is too old to think of such a thing, now."

Yes, Andrew was old, but he had grown old in providing for and maintaining these very people who were now grudging the single ray of sunset upon his declining day, and as he stood there and listened to the ungrateful twain, he felt even that one ray was falling off from his silvery locks, into the dark abyss beneath; and that his last forty years of undiminished toil, and the loneliness which he had ever bitterly felt, he was to let this drop also, like every hope which he had ever coveted in life. He thought of years gone by, when it would have been sweet to know himself beloved, when he had dreamed of being a husband and father, and rejoicing in those ties, which every one around him seemed capable of drawing to their hearts, while he alone must give them up, because of his uncomeliness.

And now that he was old and gray, and the hand of affection could minister to him, and would do so in spite of his disfigured countenance, the miserable temper of these women would snatch the joy from him, before he had even learned how sweet it would be to him.

He had so long bent unrepiningly under this domestic thralldom, that he had not the courage to stand under its tyranny, nor to break the chains.

There was a very little shame in Mabel's face, when she was aware that Andrew had heard her; but none in Judith's. Indeed there was a malicious joy there, as if it would be pleasant to her to mar the pleasure which she really believed that her brother might feel at the evident liking which Mrs. Manners had for him.

The old ladies were not bitter from any early disappointment of affection. They had not even that hackneyed excuse; for no one had ever tried to win hearts whose possession could only entail mortification, disappointment and misery upon the unlucky wight who should have been so unfortunate as to have fancied them. They were bitter by nature, and they made themselves more so, by annoying every one whom they supposed was in any degree more fortunate or better liked than themselves.

Hence their dislike to Mrs. Manners. On her part, there was a feeling of reverent love towards Andrew Elliot for his guarding care and strong, almost paternal interest for Julius who was now safely sheltered under the roof of the silversmith, and liking his occupation and his master, with an earnestness and good will that argued well for the future. On Elliot's part, he was greatly impressed in favor of the boy. With the old ladies, it was different. Julius was the son of the woman whom, as the probable wife of their brother, they could not abide.

When Andrew summoned courage to tell them the truth, it was ludicrous to see how they were affected by the discovery. Judith spoke first.

"And aren't you ashamed, Andrew, to come and tell us this thing when you are so old? If you had taken a wife when you were a young man, it wouldn't have been so bad; for then you were only ugly, but now you are old and ugly, too. Set you up with a wife indeed!—I say again, I'm ashamed of you."

Mabel's attack was different.

"And what do you think of doing with us? I suppose when madam comes, that we shall have to flit away. Well, we can go to the work-house, and no thanks to you either. After we have taken care of you for so many years, to be turned away in our old age!"

And thus, day after day, poor old Andrew was obliged to hear all that his sisters chose to inflict upon him. At last he mustered courage to tell the widow what it was which troubled him.

"Leave them to me," said she, "I will engage to manage them," and Andrew, weary of the many late contests, gladly gave up his responsibility. Mrs. Manners was a wise and sensible woman. She learned enough of the case to know that had Andrew possessed a little more spirit, he would have ruled his sisters better; or at least, that they should not thus have domineered over him. She resolved to hold the ascendency over them, and yet not by violence either.

As the wedding day approached, Andrew feared some violent outbreak on the part of his sisters; and he besought Mrs. Manners to allow him to send for an upholsterer, instead of going herself to superintend the making of the curtains and carpets, but in vain. She would go herself and encounter them openly.

So she went the morning following, and met Miss Judith in the hall. "Good morning, Miss Elliot," said Mrs. Manners, "I have come to make my carpets, and hope you and your sister will assist me in planning them; they are such difficult figures, that I know I cannot do them without your help."

This was a successful opening; for Judith, proud of being consulted, was quite gracious, and showed her into the parlor, where only an hour ago, she and Mabel were consulting to keep her out altogether.

Mabel came in with her malicious looking face, and beckoned her sister away. The widow got up from her low seat, and stepping forward, said:

"O, Miss Mabel, I am so glad you have come, I cannot decide about these curtains, and I want the benefit of your taste."

After all the opinions were given, Mrs. Manners reversed them all, in favor of her own, and that with such tact that they were not at all aware that she had differed from them.

"Stay to dinner with us," said both the sisters at once, "Julius will be so pleased!" And thus entreated, Mrs. Manners staid, and surprised Mr.

Elliot when he came in at noon, by her apparition at the dinner-table.

It must not be supposed that she quelled the dragons at once. Sometimes the old temper would flame out, and they would both throw out something even before her, about their brother's choice not being just to their minds; but generally the way in which Mrs. Manners met their sneers, would send them away pleased with her and with themselves. Mrs. Manners did not keep house, nor had she since her husband's death, for a friend of her youthful days, struck with pity at her desolate lot, had kindly offered her a home. It was not a rich or fashionable home, but it was better. It was comfortable, pleasant, neat—and moreover, it was ungrudging in its hospitality to the widow and her son. Nor was the benevolent owner without her reward, too; for the sunny temper of mother and son brightened and cheered a house, which without them would have been lonely and dull. The transfer of Julius to the house of the silversmith had not been effected without many tears on the part of the mother and her friend Mrs. Wilmot, for he was the life of the dwelling.

And how would Mrs. Wilmot get along without her friend? Poor Mrs. Manners felt really bad about leaving her, even to go to a house of her own; and she spoke to that effect.

"A house of your own, my dear Mary!" said Mrs. Wilmot, "how will it ever be a house of your own, with those two old she-dragons holding guard over you?"

"I have promised Mr. Elliot that I will tame the dragons."

"And you really expect to do that, Mary! Well, you are a bold woman if you do. For my part, I would rather enter the cage of wild beasts than Julius read about the other night, than to encounter those two old women. But when do you leave me, for I must make up my mind whom to adopt in your place?"

"Don't adopt another woman, Lizzie! Take a man next time. He will not be so ungrateful as I am, to leave you alone."

Julius, too, feared that his mother would experience some difficulty with the dragons, as Mrs. Wilmot called them. They had been tolerably kind to him; but he could not but see how they domineered over his poor old master.

There came a night of festivity to the inhabitants of Longville. The old pastor, who for so many years had ministered to their spiritual necessities, was about to receive a token of his parishioners' esteem, in the shape of a donation party. As the little village had but one church in it, of course the whole town was invited to participate, and people who had not been in any company for the last ten years, perhaps, were getting up their old fashioned finery, and preparing for the pastor's festival.

Judith Elliot declared that for one, she would not be such a fool; and out of sheer opposition, Mabel said she would go; and many and various were the old brocades and stiff and scanty old style Florence silks that she displayed to the wondering eyes of Mrs. Manners; who kindly offered her assistance in modernizing the ancient relics. Mabel, for once, yielded, merely out of spite to her sister; and from two dresses which happened to be alike, one of Mabel's and one that she had preserved carefully, as having belonged to her mother, Mrs. Manners manufactured a handsome skirt, large and full enough to please the modern taste.

From a short velvet cloak, which had been also their mother's, she selected sufficient to form a basque; and from the loads of Brussels lace, and fringes and cords, she found plenty of trimming materials. Another set of white laces of a superior quality was made over into undersleeves and collar, which Mabel, herself, starched and ironed with a peculiar finish, such as these modern times are unable to imitate. The cap was Mrs. Manners's chef d'œuvre. The rich, old point lace was of great value, and she arranged it beautifully. Those who had never seen Mabel Elliot in full dress before, would not have believed their eyes when they saw this elegantly dressed lady enter the pastor's rooms that evening.

Perfectly satisfied with her own appearance, she felt quite gracious, and she accepted her brother's arm (while Mrs. Manners, dressed in a simple white dress, was hanging on the other), and with a smile on her faded but still good-looking face, she really looked passably handsome.

At least Deacon Hapgood thought so. He had liked Mabel when he was a young man; but her proud temper had prevented him from offering her his hand.

Now, as she came into the room, with such a gracious smile, he thought that she would look well at the head of his table, and he would certainly think of it! And think of it he did, for the next day she received his offer, and I need not add that she accepted it. Old as Mabel was, and withered as she looked, she had a heart somewhere under the surface, and it came right side up on that occasion. Still, I am conscious that, as a true relator of facts, I cannot say that there was a great deal of love between the two. The deacon needed a wife to keep his household in order, and Mabel Elliot would have married anybody, if she thought she could spite Judith.

Judith was provoked enough that she did not go to the party herself. She had no doubt that the deacon would have chosen her had she not refused to go; and she kept poor Mabel awake all night by telling her of sundry talks which she had with the deacon last year, when he half proposed, but she did not encourage him at all!

It is a well known fact that joy beautifies even an ordinary face. It did part of this work for poor old Mabel Elliot. It was joy to feel that she was going to leave Judith; and yet she thought she should miss contradicting her. But never mind, she said to herself, there would be plenty of opportunities for that, by-and-by, when the arrangements were all made, and Judith should come to visit her in her new home.

Andrew's obligations to Mary Manners, for being the means of Mabel's marriage, were unbounded. "Only do the same with Judith," said he, "and we shall be happy enough. Still, one is better than two." And while he was speaking the words, the kindly old man's heart smote him, for were they not his own sisters?

"Well, well," said he, "we are none of us perfect; and I never will say a word against Judith's remaining as long as she pleases, poor, unhappy old girl! Mary's sweet ways must be a benefit to her, I do believe."

Mabel was married first. Andrew said she was the eldest, and should have the right of precedence. She did not quite relish this compliment to her years, and she retorted upon him by saying, "Yes, age before beauty!" Andrew did not care now.

A few days after the deacon carried off his prize, Andrew and Mrs. Manners were married in the little church, by the kind old pastor, who blessed the pair with more than his usual fervency. He felt that it was really a great thing for Andrew Elliot to marry. He had so long been considered as one out of the pale of the holy institution, on account of his appearance, that it was a pleasure to see him lead up the pleasant-looking widow, who looked as if she loved him with her whole heart. And so she did; and as he had predicted, she did his sister a great good, unconsciously to herself. She succeeded in smoothing off the rough angles, and what could not be smoothed, she threw the broad mantle of her beautiful element of charity over, and hid them as much as possible from the outer world. And Andrew, how inexpressibly sweet is life to him now! His step is lighter, his countenance glows with health and pleasure, his whole soul, evidently, has had a renewing from the sweet relations in which he now stands, all the more sweet, because hitherto unhopd for.

CICILY—A BALLAD.

BY WILLIE E. PARSON.

Listen how the linnets sing,
 Cicily, love;
 Mounting, each with airy wing,
 Gaily above,
 Over the meadow and over the wood,
 Over the valley and over the flood,
 Watch how they fly;
 Warbling their matin song cheery and loud,
 Kissing the crimson that fringes yon cloud
 Up in the sky.

Watch you where the lilies look,
 Cicily sweet,
 Into the pellucid brook
 Close at their feet;
 Pensile their white robes, all girdled with bloom,
 Fair as a bride by the side of her groom,
 See how they stand;
 Wooing sweet music from Ariel's group,
 Zephyrs that murmur and sephyrs that droop,
 All through the land.

Listen how the linnets sing,
 Cicily dear;
 Watch you where the lilies spring,
 White and so fair;
 Lilly and linnet remind me of thee!
 Beauty the one hath and one melody,
 Fairest and true;
 The lilies shall be for thy brow to wear,
 The linnets shall sing of the love I bear,
 Dearest, for thee.

THE VENTRILOQUIST.

BY SYLVANUS COBB, JR.

SIMON POTTS was an old man, past three-score-and-ten, with a wasted, bended frame, sharp, angular features, deeply sunken gray eyes, and hair which, from a youthful hue of red, had now changed to yellow sear and crisp. He was a miser of the most rigid stamp, and owned more property than people generally thought. He contrived to be taxed for only about ten thousand dollars, and even at that he swore poverty.

The only real sunshine that ever entered the old man's soul, beyond his notes and gold, was the smile of Lizzie Marshall. She was Simon's niece—the daughter of his only sister. She had been left an orphan at an early age, and had lived with her miser uncle about ten years. She was a beautiful creature; kind and gentle; pure and loving; with a heart as tender and sensitive as it was true and noble.

"Tut! tut!" the old man uttered, in answer to a remark his pretty niece had made. "You must not think of the fellow. I will not allow it. He's a worthless, good-for-nothing scamp, and only wants my money!"

"You are mistaken there, uncle," Lizzie replied, with a flushed face, "for he has begged of me to let some other person come and take you and your money, and go with him and be his wife. He can support a family without help from others."

"How can he do it?—the rascal! He has no business at all. Aha—he'd get you away from me, would he?—the dog?"

"But remember, uncle, you bade me do so."

"Silence! I didn't! I have got your husband all picked out for you. Ha! and here he comes. Now mind, Lizzie, this man is the man!"

As Simon ceased speaking the favored man entered the house. His name was Lot Piper. He was five-and-forty by the town register, though he swore he was young. He was a small, hump-backed man, with sandy hair, which stood stiff and sparse upon his nut-like head; his nose sharp and hooked; his mouth large, but lips thin; his chin flat; his cheeks hollow; cheek-bones prominent; brow low; and eyes green, small, sharp and sunken. He was as miserly as was Simon Potts, though not so rich; and in all the town he was the only man who flattered Simon, and upheld him in his crowding of poor tenants.

Lot did his business with the old man, and then turned to where Lizzie sat by the window. He talked with her awhile, and then took leave.

"Oho, that's the man, Lizzie," uttered the old man, after his visitor had gone. "And mind you, you must marry him. I shan't take any refusal."

On the evening of that day, Lizzie Marshall threw on her shawl and went out for a walk—so she told her uncle. The moon shone bright and clear, and the landscape had almost the clearness of mid-day. At a short distance from the old cot (Simon occupied the poorest of all his buildings) Lizzie met Alfred Bodwell. She hastened towards him when she saw him, and the way in which she suffered his arm to encircle her, and his lips to press her own, would seem to indicate that she had the utmost confidence in his purity of purpose. And so she had. She had loved him during many years, as a child, as a maiden, and now with the deepest emotion of woman's love. She knew him well, and she loved him because she knew him.

Alfred was not over four-and-twenty; tall and well formed; with a face of perfect mould, and in every way the real, true man. His love for Lizzie was the deep emotion of his nature, based on the purest thought and the noblest motive.

"Alas!" murmured the maiden, "my uncle will never consent. He is set in his purpose, and he will not relent. He has been a father to me, and I cannot desert him now that he is old and infirm."

"But, my own Lizzie, must you throw away the whole happiness of the future—must you sink all earthly hopes—just to obey the foolish whim of a foolish old man?"

"Ah, Alfred, the very quality of my soul that would make the faithful wife, must bind me to my poor old uncle. He would be miserable if I were to leave him."

"Miserable!" returned the youth, with some bitterness in his tone. "O, see what misery he makes. Look at the poor old widow Willis: Only last week he would have turned her out of doors had not a friend given her the paltry sum necessary to pay her rent."

"And I know who gave that sum," said the girl, looking archly up.

"Do you?" returned Alfred.

"Ay, I do; and I love you for it, Alfred."

"Well, well—let it pass. I only did what God gave me to do. And then look at poor old Adam Long. He, too, would have been turned out of doors had he not sold some of his furniture to raise the money to pay into the till of Simon Potts. O, what right has he to ask the peace and joy of one like you only that he may waste it in his folly?"

"It is hard," returned Lizzie, after some thought. "O, how I could bless him if he would give his consent. He swears I shall marry with Lot Piper. But of course I shall not do that."

"Let Piper have the money, and let me have you. Tell your uncle to cut you off in his will—cut you off entirely—and let me take you. Will he not do this?"

"Not willingly."

"Then look ye, Lizzie; I will obtain from him by stratagem what I cannot obtain by reason." This was spoken quickly, and with sudden energy.

"What mean you, Alfred?" the maiden asked, in surprise.

"I will tell you; I mean to do what shall be for the old man's benefit, as much as yours or mine. I mean to open his heart. Just look: At present he only makes misery wherever his charity could be of use, and he makes this misery for himself as well as for others. He would blast my joy for life; crush you beneath the weight of lasting torture, and all from mere whim and prejudice. If I am not mistaken he is superstitious?"

"Yes, very."

"He believes in ghosts?"

"Yes."

"Then I will give him a lesson. He has some respect for the memory of his father?"

"Yes. But what mean you, Alfred?"

"You will be secret?"

"Certainly I will."

"Then listen: I am one of the most powerful ventriloquists in the country. You will say nothing of this."

"I will not."

"You do not think it would be wrong?"

"Of course not, Alfred."

Awhile longer the lovers conversed—Alfred learned from Lizzie some of the peculiarities of the old man who had gone, some which he had never seen. Simon's father had only been dead about six years, having lived to be ninety-three years old. He had lived on property of his own: and he died without making his will, so this property all fell into Simon's hands, and it amounted to near eight thousand dollars. Having learned all that the maiden could tell him, Alfred bade her good-night, and took his leave.

It was a dark, drizzly night, and Simon Potts sat close up by the fire. The wind sounded mournfully as it turned the corners of the old cot, and though the season was early autumn, yet the fire was comfortable.

"It's an ugly night, aren't it, Lizzie?" uttered the old man, as he listened to the wind.

But before the girl could answer there came a rap upon the door.

"Ha!" uttered Simon, with a fearful start. "It may be robbers!"

But he was much relieved when he found it was only Alfred Bodwell, though he did not receive the youth with any mark of respect or cordiality. A few remarks were passed upon the state of the weather, and so on, when Alfred thus openly commenced his errand:

"Mr. Potts, I have come to ask you if you will not give me the hand of your beautiful niece?"

"No, sir!" the old man exclaimed, "I will not."

"But," resumed the youth, "you do not realize—"

"Hold, Alfred Bodwell—I realize enough! I want nothing to do with you."

"But, Simon Potts, suppose I should tell you that I had been sent here by a strange dream?"

"Pooh! Nonsense!"

"Very well," returned Alfred, arising from his seat, and moving as though he would leave the house. "If you will not listen to me, then I have no more to say. The spirit can't blame me."

"Hold, Alfred Bodwell! Move not another step if you would live!"

"It is the same voice!" gasped the youth, sinking back into his chair.

Simon Potts started to his feet like one thunder-struck, and then he sank shuddering down again. The voice had come from somewhere—it was deep and sepulchral, and strangely tremulous.

"What was it?" whispered the miser, moving nearer to Lizzie.

"It is a voice I have heard before," Alfred said.

"Ay!" sounded the same unearthly tones again, seeming now to come from somewhere overhead, "and so hast thou heard it, Simon Potts! Do you not know me?"

"Mercy!" gasped the stricken man. "It is my father!"

"Yes, Simon, I am thy father! O, why hast thou thus forced me to leave my resting-place? O, my son! my son!"

"What does he mean?" whispered Simon, springing forward and grasping Alfred by the arm. His face was pale, and he shook at every joint.

"I cannot tell. Last night I heard the same voice, and it said, 'Alfred Bodwell, arise and go to my son. Bid him give thee the hand of his niece—my grand-daughter—and bid him, too, to give back the rent of the Widow Willis, and the rent of Adam Long.'"

"No, no!" cried Simon.

"Hold, my son!" spoke that voice again, more deeply and solemn than before. "You know not yet the tortures of the hard heart and the miserly soul!"

"It is my father's voice!" the old wretch gasped.

"Fool!" resumed the mystic presence, "would ye question the spirit who has come to save you? Go first, yourself, and refund the amounts last paid by the poor widow and the old soldier. Go, and I will be with thee again and tell thee thy reward. Neglect to do this, and thy torture shall be dreadful. Let Alfred Bodwell be here to-morrow evening at this time, and I will appear here again. Beware! Farewell!"

There were a few deep groans, and then all was still as death, save the moaning of the wind. Alfred arose to leave, and in a few moments more the old man and his niece were alone. Simon Potts gazed for a long while into the fire without speaking. Finally he murmured:

"'Twas his property." And he spoke no more that night.

On the following day Simon Potts entered the humble cot where dwelt the poor widow.

"Mrs. Willis," he said, at the same time extending a ten-dollar note, "when I sent for this money I wanted it. You need it now more than I do. Do not refuse it—do not. If you do I shall suffer."

The widow took the proffered note, and for some moments she seemed confounded by the act. But the deed was plain, and she only knew that she should not now have to starve. She caught the old man's hand, and while the tears ran down her cheeks, she murmured:

"O, God bless you, sir! You will not regret this. Bless you, bless you!"

Simon Potts stopped to hear no more, for he was not used to such kind of talk, and he did not know how to answer. Yet there was something grateful in the emotions which followed this scene; but ere he could fully analyze them he reached the house where the old revolutionary soldier, Adam Long, lived. It was a small, poorly-provided cot, and Simon entered without knocking, and here he performed the same ceremony as at the widow's.

Adam Long took the money, and in a tremulous, surprised tone he asked:

"Why do ye do this, Simon Potts?"

"Because I know you need it; and I ought to give it to you. Don't refuse it."

"Simon Potts, you are a better man than I thought. God bless you for your kindness to me! I am poor, very poor."

When Simon Potts reached his own cot he was buried in deep thought, and but very little was said. At the appointed hour Alfred Bodwell came. He bade the old man good evening, and that was all. The silence was becoming painful, when that same deep, mystic voice came again.

"Simon, my son, thou hast pleased me much. Thou hast made two glad hearts. Even now the poor widow is blessing thee. Thinkest thou a blessing was ever truly thine before?"

The old man trembled, but he did not speak.

"Tell me," added the voice, "have you no reward enough for all you have thus far done?"

"Yes, yes!" uttered old Simon, clasping his hands and trembling.

"Then make another glad heart. Look upon that gentle being who has been so faithful to you these long years past. Can you crush her now? O, Simon, you know not the exquisite tortures of the hard heart and the miser's soul! Had I left my property to those poor, suffering people who need it, I should have been happier than I am now. I cannot visit the earth again for the space of one year. O, my son, your own days are numbered, and the evening of your life is drawing to a close. Be wise, and you will be happy. God weighs the human soul, and among all the virtues that shine out redeemingly upon the angel's record, none is so bright as charity. Farewell!"

"Father! Father! Will good in the future wipe out the past?"

"It will! Farewell!"

Alfred stopped not long after this; but in a few days afterwards he came and asked the old man once more for Lizzie's hand; and he was told to take her.

When Lizzie was gone Simon Potts became lonely and unhappy. He went to Alfred's house and begged that they would let him live with them. Of course they could not refuse.

Rent-day came around again, and Lot Piper came to get the list of tenants. But Simon told him he need not go any more to collect rents; and Lot went away so angry that he never came back again. Simon went out himself, and when he came to those who could not well pay, he freely forgave them the debt, and bade them live on, and not worry about him.

And that night the old man returned to his new home literally bowed down beneath the weight of his blessings.

The year passed away, and Simon Potts was a new man. He laughed and danced around Lizzie's baby, and of the happy, he was among the happiest. He had seen and understood the secret of true joy, and he had money enough to purchase a great deal of it.

"Alfred," he said, one evening, "is it not just a year since that night?"

Lizzie tossed her baby, and turned away.

"It is!" It was the same deep voice. "Simon, did I deceive you?"

"O, no, no, no!"

"Then listen: I and Alfred Bodwell are one and the same person!"

As Alfred had thus spoken he had allowed his voice to approach gradually until Simon saw the last word come from his lips.

A few moments of rank astonishment, and then all was understood.

"Forgive me," said the youth, taking the old man's hand. "You now know how I have deceived you; but no one else shall ever know it while you live. If you are dissatisfied, I will pledge myself to pay you back all that the experiment has cost you, save this noble, gentle wife."

"Hold," cried the old man. "Say no more. Should you pay me back, then all this happiness would be yours. No, no; I cannot sell it so cheaply. Let me live on where I am, and when I want to make the exchange I'll let you know. But mind, I must have the whole or nothing; so while you keep Lizzie, you must keep me."

THE FLIGHT OF TIME

BY WM. RODERICK LAWRENCE.

The moments past are now beyond recall,
The future we perchance may never see;
The present, it is ours, and this is all;
O, let this solemn truth be learned by thee.
Time's golden sands are falling one by one,
The last for us is moving on its way;
And soon will glisten in the rising sun,
Whose setting endeth life's eventful day.

Each moment bears us nearer to the grave,
And may it also bear us nearer heaven!
Time moveth on, wave follows wave,
Soon breaks the last to fragile mortals given.
Then never let a moment idle pass,
Nor waste the precious hours of life in vain;
The sands are swiftly falling in the glass,
And time when gone can ne'er be ours again.

THE EVIL EYE.

BY RALPH TRYON.

My friend, Henry Winters, was always impulsive, and upon some little points occasionally superstitious. Generous, frank and companionable, well educated, the only son of doting parents, their wealth and position in society gave him a ready passport into the circles of fashion. But in the midst of his convivial moments, I often noticed that a shadow would flit across his brow, followed by a momentary abstraction. I saw that these seasons became more frequent and prolonged. Fearing his friends would observe this, and vex him with questions, I contrived to be with him almost continually during his leisure hours, hoping to be able to shield him from such observation, for I was well convinced that he was the victim of some real or imaginary sorrow.

My intimacy from childhood enabled me to do this, but for some time I was at a loss how to fathom the cause of his intermittent affliction. He could not be suffering pecuniary difficulty, for his habits did not lead him into extravagance, and his resources were ample beyond his desires. After puzzling my mind with a review of all the evils I could think of, which mankind are heir to, I concluded it must be some affair of the heart; without, however, being satisfied with my conclusion, which I had adopted simply because everything else seemed more improbable.

During a stroll we were taking together one afternoon, I broached the subject in a gentle but serious manner, telling him how pained I felt at the change which I could not fail to notice in his conduct, and the want of confidence he for the first time displayed since we had pledged our boyish friendship to each other. He looked surprised and perplexed for a moment, but presently assured me that he was not aware of appearing changed to any one, much less to me, and wondered what in the world possessed me to make such a charge.

"You may deceive others," I said, "but you cannot mislead me. I have known you too long and too well, and do not hesitate to say that some real or imaginary trouble is now perplexing you."

"Upon my word," he replied, "you look so terribly in earnest, that I fear you will convince me, against the evidence of my senses, that I am indeed miserable, when I was just now thinking that I might be excused for considering myself one of the most careless, jolly dogs alive. And you really think I am suffering?"

"I am sure of it."

"You said real or imaginary trouble?"

"Precisely."

"Now in the name of everything ridiculous, what could happen to me, to effect the change you have noticed? if real, that would not have been the subject of general comment; and if simply imaginary, how could it seriously affect me?"

"Therein lies the mystery," I replied; "but there are sorrows hid from human eyes, which are sometimes considered exclusively the property of the sufferer, who, when he closes his heart against the sympathies of his friends, only the more securely locks the demon to his peace within."

"Tell me this is all a joke got up on purpose to tease me, and I will forgive your accusation."

After a prolonged conversation, which it is not important to give in detail, and in which he avoided giving me direct answers, and consequently I could derive no satisfaction, I said:

"Harry, this trifling will not avail. To bring the matter to a crisis, I ask you bluntly, upon the privilege of a sincere friend, are you in love?"

He now laughed naturally and heartily, and I needed not his denial to convince me, that I had shot wide of the mark upon this point, at least.

"No, my dear fellow," he answered; "I assure you, upon my word, that I have never seen the fair one yet who—"

He paused, and suddenly I felt my arm compressed as though in the jaws of a vice. I could hardly stifle an exclamation of pain, for his fingers seemed penetrating the flesh. I turned instantly to see that Harry was fearfully pale, and almost gasping for breath, while his eyes, with a glance almost stony, were fixed upon—could it be possible—a lady, accompanied by an elderly gentleman who was just passing. It must have been them, or rather her, for they were the only persons near us at this moment.

"Poor fellow!" I mentally exclaimed; "this is more serious business than I anticipated; but what motive could he have in attempting to deceive me?"

As she passed, I only caught a momentary glimpse, while she was in the act of letting fall her veil; but I was so astounded with the conduct of my friend, that I could not tell whether she was white or black, much less retain her features in remembrance. Harry soon recovered, but was still pale and thoughtful. I did not question him, for I now knew that he could not avoid an explanation. However, we walked on a little way in silence, when he said, abruptly:

"Walter, I must leave you. Do not question me now, but come to me this evening, and you shall know all, whatever the effort may cost me."

I was nonplussed. Just as I had made up my mind that love had not caused the mischief, and while Harry was in the midst of a denial, which at least seemed sincere, to be precipitated into such an adventure that so completely unmanned him—I could only regard it as a punishment for the falsehood just passing from his lips.

As I entered his apartment that evening, I saw him thrust a book hastily aside. It might have been "Ovid," what did I care? I seated myself carelessly, and coldly answered his salutation, I believe, for he looked surprised and pained, as though unprepared for such demeanor on my part. After offering me a cigar, which I accepted, and proceeded very deliberately to light, for I had nursed myself into the belief that I was actually an injured person, he laid his hand upon my shoulder, and looking earnestly at me, said:

"Walter, I read your thoughts, and they do me injustice, although I cannot much blame you after my singular conduct this afternoon."

I blew out a cloud of smoke in reply.

"You are offended with me?" he said.

"No," I unfeelingly replied; "love will one day make a fool of me, I suppose, in the course of human events."

"Love, Walter, I can plead with a true heart, not guilty."

"Harry, I believe you," said I, extending to him my hand; "forgive me, for I was vexed with you, myself, and everybody, and did you the injustice to think that you had attempted to deceive me with a falsehood. But what then, could have been the matter with you to-day?"

He did not reply immediately, but paced the room nervously. During the silence, my eyes wandered from him to the table where he had so hastily placed the book. A light broke upon my mind. I was prepared for anything he might reveal; indeed, I felt convinced that he had been nursing a germ of his boyish superstition, until it had, perhaps, conjured up some imaginary demon to torment him. The book he had been reading was "Scott's Demonology."

"Walter," said he, at length, seating himself beside me, "you have a strange penetration for one of your years. When you hinted that I was suffering from some imaginary trouble to-day, you reached my case exactly. I am like that man who was haunted by a demon which he knew was only imaginary, yet its unreal presence pursued him to an untimely grave, in spite of his own reason, and the efforts of physicians."

"I more than half expected as much," I replied, "and knowing your youthful fancies and the demons that I was so often compelled to exorcise, it did not require much penetration on my part to arrive at such a conclusion, especially when I ascertained that it was no everyday affair that had disconcerted you. Pray, what shape does this new phantom assume?"

"That of a pair of eyes. Don't laugh at me, Walter. You have read of the 'evil eye,' and let me assure you, that if ever such a malignant power existed, I have seen it and have been made its victim."

"I have heard that there was witchery in a woman's eye," I said laughingly, "and occasionally a little malignity when she is angry. But for the literal 'evil eye,' with all its old legendary fascination and lightning influence, it will not do for the nineteenth century, notwithstanding its partiality for table rappings."

"I knew that you would laugh at me, but listen, and I will give you the whole story. Some time since I attended a concert, but as the music was not particularly suited to my taste, and the singers rather indifferent ones, I allowed some casual remark of a friend upon spiritual manifestations, to lead me into a train of gloomy reflections, in which I reviewed the supernatural terrors of my childhood, to the total forgetfulness of the place I was in, and the object for which I was present. To tell the truth, I had witnessed some of those so-called spiritual phenomena that very afternoon, and my nerves had not recovered from the excitement I had then experienced. How long I was thus occupied I hardly know, but I saw by the programme, when I had partially shaken off these fancies, that the entertainment was nearly finished. I was gazing about the audience indifferently, when a pair of eyes encountered mine, and I was at once conscious of a strange sensation, but it was very far from pleasure or admiration.

"I had somewhere read of eyes like those, but where? It might have been the state of my nerves, or the gloomy mood I had fallen into, but the traditions of the 'evil eye' flashed upon my mind in a moment, and I shuddered to think that its glance I had always imagined to be such as I had just encountered. Again I ventured another look, and my blood seemed turning to ice in my veins, so strange was the terrible fascination I experienced. I determined not to turn again in that direction, but curiosity would triumph in spite of prudence, and again my eyes would wander to those fearful basilisks, which seemed sparkling with demon-like malignity and exultation. When I returned home that night, I became possessed with a foreboding that some evil was about to befall me, and all night those eyes seemed glaring at me in whatever position I placed myself.

"The next day I felt somewhat relieved, and to obtain some benefit from the fresh air, proposed a ride out of town to my mother. It was then that frightful accident occurred which nearly cost her life. You remember that the horse became unmanageable from fright of a train of cars, ran with us, smashed the carriage to atoms, half killed my mother, marked me most beautifully as I was sent like an arrow into a bed of small sharp stones, and finished the catastrophe by dashing out his own brains against a stone post. Even in those moments I thought of the eyes, and thanked Heaven it was no worse. Twice since then, before to-day, have I accidentally encountered the same glance, and almost immediately afterwards experienced some trouble or danger. What you will think more strange than all, I have no remembrance of her features—I only saw her eyes. Now, Walter, what do you say to all this?"

"I only say, Harry, that unless you are cured of this phantasy, in less than three months, you will be a confirmed monomaniac."

"And you do not regard the affair seriously?"

"Only so far as the effect it causes upon you; for myself, I can only see a combination of events which are liable to happen in everyday life without any supernatural agency. As for the eyes, I have no doubt but they belong to some fair lady whom we may yet be proud to number among our friends. Be assured of one thing, if she is not a myth, and her appearance to-day did not indicate that species, I will find her out, and make her acquaintance, and so shall you, just to cure your folly."

Harry shook his head as though he thought the thing impossible, and that evening I exhausted all my rhetoric in attempting to divert his mind from the imagination of impending evil which seemed to possess him, but in vain.

Several days passed and nothing unusual happened, and I bantered him accordingly, remarking that his evil-eyed genius had been peculiarly lenient in this instance. We were walking together about a week afterward, and Harry appeared to have recovered his usual spirits. We had been talking about the mysterious lady to whom no clue had yet been discovered, when we heard an alarm given, while the clattering hoofs and the shouts of the by-standers called our attention to a carriage which was being madly dragged at a fearful speed, by a pair of powerful and affrighted horses.

Harry's eyes gleamed with excitement, and I knew his generous nature too well not to feel assured, that if the occupants were not rescued from their perilous position, it would not be for the want of aid from his strong arm. I possessed a cooler temperament, but was prepared in a moment to share the danger of the attempt with him. Neither of us spoke, for each knew what was passing in the mind of the other. Harry, with a discretion which I had not given him credit for, gained the opposite side of the street, thus enabling us, by simultaneous action, each to seize a horse at the same instant.

Meanwhile, in much less time than these lines were written, the carriage was upon us; but it did not pass before the horses were in the hands of those who well understood their natures, though we were dragged some distance before the spirited animals were subdued. We luckily escaped without injury, and the danger being over, the crowd pressed around with that idle curiosity common in such cases; but Harry dashed all opposing bodies aside, and was the first to open the door.

We found a gentleman supporting the form of a beautiful girl, who, in her insensible state, resembled some exquisite work of statuary more than anything human. I saw Harry regard her with a tender interest he had never before displayed for anything in the form of woman, and I could not wonder, for I thought I had never before seen features so classically beautiful. In a moment, scores of officious hands were offering their sympathy in the shape of glasses of water. The gentleman whose noble bearing and unruffled countenance had strongly prepossessed me in his favor, after wringing Harry's hand in silence, tendered to him his fair charge for a few moments, while he stepped from the carriage to my side, and gave audible expression to his gratitude. After we had exchanged cards, and I had given him the address of my friend, Harry was called upon to relinquish the fair form which began to show symptoms of returning consciousness, to the custody of her natural protector. When her eyes at length opened, and the rich tint of life was chasing the pallor from her cheek, I saw Harry start with surprise and grow pale, but instantly checked his emotion, and as he met my inquiring look actually blushed like a truant schoolboy. I noticed also that the beautiful stranger, when her eyes first opened to meet his ardent gaze, seemed to repress an exclamation.

The whole was plain to my mind in a moment. The stately form of the gentleman I had somewhere seen before. It must have been—they certainly were the same persons we met on that day when Harry was so strangely agitated. This, then, was the lady of the "evil eye," who had, very innocently no doubt, committed such unparalleled mischief. Ah, thought I, and is now very likely to be guilty of much more, although in a different manner. Harry will no longer fear to look upon those dark eyes, but they will be, if I mistake not, more dangerous to him than ever. Harry and myself were soon again pursuing our way, after having promised to dine with our new friend at his hotel on the next day.

"Now," said I, "this adventure will, I hope, cure your superstitious infatuation!"

"Do not say one word, Walter, she is an angel, and I have been guilty of the most ridiculous folly, that ever entered the brain of man."

At the dinner which we enjoyed the next day, we learned that our host had passed much of his life on the beautiful island of Cuba, where he had married a Spanish lady of rank, who bequeathed to him in the last hour of her life the infant Julia. There, also, had he amassed that splendid fortune which he now enjoyed.

Our acquaintance did not end here, and Harry especially made the most of it. Perhaps in order to compensate the injustice he had done such brilliant eyes, he allowed them to look into his heart and see the image of their mistress enshrined there. I was not surprised some little time afterwards, when he told me of their engagement. Parental authorities had been consulted, and everything was arranged for an early marriage, which shortly after was consummated.

When a brilliant party were overwhelming the bride with congratulations and good wishes, I took the hand of each and slyly said, "Beware, my friends, of the 'evil eye.'" The words were caught by those near me, and I was pressed with questions as to my meaning. Thinking Harry happy enough to bear almost anything, I related the affair just narrated, and Harry joined in the merriment which followed as heartily as the rest. I need not add that he was completely cured of his visionary fancies.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.

The continued success and remarkable circulation of this elegant illustrated weekly, is owing solely to its intrinsic value and the great beauty of its engravings. Richly filled also with original and choice miscellaneous reading, it has become the favorite fireside journal of a vast number of American homes. Its present unrivalled circulation (having a weekly issue of 103,000!) enables the proprietor to beautify it with the finest and most expensive illustrations, and to make it a very elegant work of art. The family circle, to which it is a weekly visitor, must know more of the world, of men of moment, of all that is noteworthy and mentionable, than those who do not have access to its delightful pages.

All notable characters, male or female, are faithfully depicted in its columns, and when one hears or reads of them afterwards they are enabled to recall the features of the party with increased interest. The many American cities, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, are all being depicted from week to week, peculiar European views are regularly introduced, and adventures by land and by sea are here recorded and illustrated. In short, Ballou's Pictorial, is a great indirect and most agreeable instructor, whose influence for good and intellectual improvement can hardly be estimated.

Read the advertisement on our last inside page of the cover, and forward a year's subscription by mail.

VERY OBLIGING.—The proprietors of a cemetery in one of the Middle States, say in their advertisement, that "they would be very happy to attend to any one who may wish for a place for burial." Such grave politeness is absolutely "killing."

UNTRUE.—That, in a neighboring town, when a marriage ceremony was about to be performed, and the clergyman desired the parties wishing to be married to rise up, several spinsters immediately arose!

ENGLISH EXTRAVAGANCE.—At a sale of hunting hounds in England, lately, the puppies sold for $50 apiece. There are some specimens in this country not worth that.

HUMOROUS ILLUSTRATED DEPARTMENT.

The subscribers and readers of BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY will observe that with the present number we have added to our Magazine a humorous illustrated department, which will be continued each month. These entirely original and laughable matters will be racy and mirth-provoking in the extreme; and we know very well that it will be to these pages each month, that our subscribers will turn first. The continued and unequalled success of our "Dollar Magazine" has determined us to add to its value and interest in every possible manner, and this new expense of originating, drawing, and engraving, is cheerfully incurred, to keep pace with the growing circulation of the work. BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY can be bought at all of the periodical depots at ten cents per copy; but the best way to obtain it, and at the earliest possible moment after its issue, is to enclose us one dollar, and become a regular subscriber.

A MODEL ORATOR.—"Mr. President," said an American Demosthenes, "I shall not remain silent, sir, while I have a voice that is not dumb in this assembly. The gentleman, sir, can expostulate this matter to any future time that is more suitable than now. He can talk, sir, of the Herculean revolutions whereby republics is hurled into Antarctic regions, and the works of centuries refrigerated to ashes; but, sir, we can tell him indefatigably, that the consequences therefrom, multiplied subterraneously by the everlasting principles contended for thereby, can no more shake this resolution than can the roar of Niagara rejuvenate around these walls, or the howl of the midnight tempest conflaggerate a marble statue into ice."

FOR THE POOR.—The city of Paris, during the last three years, has paid ten millions of dollars to the bakers, so as to enable those loafers to furnish their wares at reasonable prices.

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.—This society intends to explore the United States and place a copy of the Scriptures in the hands of every individual unable to purchase one.

MORAL INFLUENCE OF DRESS.

The world pays a great deal of respect to a well-dressed man, and even those oracles of the day, the editors, when they record the fact of a tidy criminal performing a dishonest action, always add, in astonishment, "the villain was well-dressed!" Now it is idle to talk about popular prejudices and popular fallacies, in the teeth of notions that have survived centuries, changes of the earth's surface, revolutions in politics and letters, and all sorts of up-rooting tornadoes and whirlwinds. There is and must be something in this respect for dress, based on an idea. Frivolous caprices do not so long stand the test of time.

The fact is, that dress has a great moral effect upon the wearer. The old adage, "fine feathers make fine birds," is certainly susceptible of a moral application. Any one who has seen a professional actor taken off the stage and set up in citizen's attire, to recite one of his favorite parts before a Lyceum audience, must have perceived a vast difference; Mr. Mullins reciting King Lear in a black coat, and Mr. Mullins impersonating the same in the robes of royalty, are two very different persons. The former is quite a vulgar, commonplace individual; the latter is "every inch a king." Mullins forgets himself before the footlights; he catches glimpses of the velvet and gold of his robe, and he rises nearly to the height of the inspired poet, whose burning thoughts he is called upon to render to the audience.

Perhaps it is not very creditable to poor human nature, but it is true for all that, that many heroic deeds of valor, "at the cannon's mouth," have been performed from a consciousness of gold lace, epaulettes and aigulettes. "It won't do to disgrace the uniform." The private, done up in cheap, coarse cloth and worsted lace, conscientiously exhibits a sixpence-worth of valor; but the officer must exhibit several dollars-worth of heroism to justify the splendor of his appointments. What a pitiable spectacle is a moulting bird!—just as pitiable is a man who is not well-dressed. And by well-dressed let us not be supposed that we mean expensively dressed, but, rather, tastefully and suitably attired.

The past century, behind us in so many things, was far beyond us in this matter of appropriateness of costume. Different callings were marked by distinctive apparel; and we have often thought that one of the objectionable features of our day, that of men undertaking things entirely out of their line, and making lamentable failures thereby, was a consequence of the abandonment of the distinctive principle of dress. The eternal black coat pervades all classes, and so every man thinks he can do a little doctoring, a little legal business, and a little law, without any of the proper qualifications. A hundred years ago, if an accident occurred, you could pick out your doctor in the midst of the densest crowd. He stood confessed by his bush wig, his black coat and smalls, and ivory-headed cane. All rascals were known by their garb. In the black periwig, the three-cornered hat, laced scarlet coat, flashy ruffles at breast and wrist, buckskin breeches and high boots with Rippon spurs, the highwayman stood confessed, even if you did not see the handle of a pistol sticking from his pocket. A man could always choose the company he liked from the dress of his companions.

Every man showed his colors. The gay gentleman wore brilliant hues; the serious man a sad colored suit. The well-to-do merchant was known at a glance; the poet, the philosopher, the student were equally distinguished. Now, all things are confounded. The man who dresses like everybody is apt to think like everybody, and loses all his originality. How many mistakes have arisen from all people dressing alike! Financiers have been known to conduct themselves like burglars—and railroad conductors like executioners. We believe we must go back to the old system—every profession and calling must have its dress, and then will men act up to their professions. Then, when a man wanted to change his calling, he would change his dress; and the garb he wore would be a perpetual reminder of the duties he had to perform.

GOOD HUMOR.—A good conscience, good digestion, and personal cleanliness, are the elements of good humor. A morose person is generally one who has done something wrong, or has the dyspepsia, or exhibits hydrophobic symptoms.

POLITENESS.—Lord Byron did not place an undue weight on the importance of politeness. "Never judge from manners," said he, "for I once had my pocket picked by the civillest gentleman I ever met with."

HEAVY LOSS.—The Russians are said to have lost, in killed, in and around Sebastopol, 86,000 men, while 100,000 perished from fatigue and sickness.

GUTTA SERENA.—This article is coming into universal use. Even the pigeons on the eves are gutter perchers.

PORK AND BEANS.

There is a good story in Northall's "Before and Behind the Curtain," which will bear reproducing. Many years ago, when the "Maid of Cashmere" was first brought out at the old National Theatre, in New York, there were two friends engaged in the orchestra. One was but an indifferent master of his instrument, the trumpet, and was so weak as to be unable to blow a blast sufficiently strong to announce the approach of Chopelas, to proclaim the reward for the head of the unknown. He was therefore under the necessity of applying to his friend, the Trombone, to assist him. Now the Trombone was inordinately fond of pork and beans, and refused to aid the Trumpet unless upon every such occasion he would agree to furnish him with a supper of his favorite dish. This was readily acceded to, and the refectory was applied to and furnished the fare. For the first two or three nights, all went on very well. At the end of that time, the Trumpet began to entertain serious views of dissolving the connection with the Trombone, and of course cutting off the supplies of pork and beans. In a moment of rashness, the Trumpet gave notice to the Trombone of the annulment of the contract, and essayed to give the piece of music unaided. But alas! the first tang-arang was a failure—it was too thin.

"Pork!" cried the Trumpet to the Trombone, and in an instant the two instruments gave forth in unison a beautiful tang-arang.

Just then, the Trombone remembered that nothing had been said about "beans," and suddenly ceased playing.

"Beans!" cried the Trumpet.

"Pork and beans?" asked the Trombone.

"Yes," replied the Trumpet, in frenzy.

"Good!" said the Trombone; "that's enough—here goes!" And he did go, to the infinite relief of the trumpet, as well as to the great delight of the whole orchestra, who were in the secret.

A BIBLE FAIR.—We do not often associate fairs and Bibles together. But at the recent annual fair in Manchester, England, a little stall was opened, and in the course of one day eighty-one Bibles and sixty Testaments were sold.

OPPOSED TO LAGER.—"Men who drink beer think beer," said Dr. Johnson. Perhaps that will account for the muddiness of German metaphysics.

THE COOLIES.—The coolies in Havana are let out for eight years by contractors, at $180 a head.

SUBURBAN SORROWS.

With all our love for the country—and it amounts to enthusiasm—we advise no one who loves the city dearly, and yet fancies he has a taste for rural life, to go forth and pitch his tent in the environs, fancying that he is sure to find without the city limits a perfect garden of Eden. There are drawbacks to every rustic Paradise. Gentlemen who luxuriate on winter pears by a city fireside at Christmas, have no adequate idea of the trouble of raising them. Duchesse d'Angoulême are not necessarily suggestive of boreas and fire-blight; nor are Ribestone pippins associated with caterpillars in the minds of comfortable citizens. Yet in the country you will find they go together. The "shepherd's pipe" is a pretty instrument in Arcadian tales, but in this country a shepherd's pipe is a short "dudhem," wafting on the air the fumes of rank tobacco. Eggs are delicious in the thousand shapes that French cookery gives them; but hens that wont lay and will set are sad trials to one's patience. Cream adds much to the enjoyment of the coffee at Mrs. Haven's; but breachy cattle, saddled with continual damages, do not add much to the agremens of your amateur farmer. Then, if you live out of town, you must buy a horse—and if you want to know what that means, get Fred. Cozzens's "Sparrowgrass Papers," and read them. The amount of all this gossip, boiled down to a portable moral is this: that every phase of life has its trials and troubles, and you are sure to meet with them whether you pay your taxes in the city or out of it.

ARCHITECTURAL EXTRAVAGANCE.—The mania for building costly houses in New York city is said to be subsiding. The rivalry among the millionaires in the building of palatial residences at one time menaced ruinous consequences. The most elegant building in New York cost about $225,000; and there are at least a dozen, the aggregate cost of which was as many hundred thousand dollars. This magnificence made both natives and foreigners stare.

A FACT.—All horses offered for sale are just seven years old. The old Yankee jockey was right when he said "that seven years ago was a most tremendous year for colts."

A WEALTHY PENNSYLVANIAN.—Gen. C. M. Reed, of Erie, is said to own property to the value of five millions of dollars.

JUST SO.—Economy is no disgrace; it is better living on a little than outliving a great deal.

STREET BEGGARS.

Nothing strikes a foreigner more forcibly in his first visit to this country, than the absence or the small number of beggars he sees in our great cities. And the farther he proceeds inland in his journey, the fewer traces of mendicity meet his eye. He sees no robust men extending their bronzed hands for charity, because they cannot get work; for here labor is capital. Far different is it in the over-populated countries and densely packed cities of the European continent, where the frightful contrasts of unbridled luxury and indescribable destitution reconcile the American, who takes personal cognizance of it, to whatever may be the deficiencies of his country in the splendor and arts of civilization. Those sumptuous palaces that he sees about him, those miles of marble columns, those splendid pageants in which royalty and nobility are the actors, are too dearly purchased at the cost of suffering humanity. Beggary is the curse of Italy; it is the curse of Spain; and even in imperial Paris, notwithstanding the vigilance of the authorities, it flourishes—if anything so sordid can be said to flourish.

The street beggars of Paris are the most ingenious persons in the world. They possess amazing tact, and nicely adapt their manner of soliciting alms to the character of those they address, and the quarters of the city they frequent. In the Place de la Bastille, when the populace throng about the quacks, the tumblers, and the itinerant musicians, then the beggars reap a harvest. One pretends to be a poor fellow who has lost his sight by the explosion of a mine; another, a carpenter, who has lost both his arms (they are nicely buttoned up in his sack, by the way); another, a tiler, who has lost the use of one leg in consequence of falling from an eight story roof. Charity is no vain word in Paris, nor is credulity an unknown foible; and the laboring man, listening to these appeals, dispenses his hard-earned sous, though at a great personal sacrifice, and though he himself, if work failed him from physical misfortune, would end his miseries by a plunge into the Seine, rather than beg his bread in the street.

In the manufacturing streets of Paris, you meet another class of beggars—old men, with long, snowy boards and wooden legs; and women, surrounded by heaps of ragged, sleeping children. The old man takes off his hat without saying a word, and the woman extends her hand silently, with an appealing look. It is this sort of pantomime which especially touches the sensibilities of the passing operative, whose heart is ever open to dramatic appeals. If he has no money, he gives half his loaf of bread—he is as generous as he is poor.

On the boulevards St. Martin and St. Denis, mendicity, still dramatic, abandons pantomime and takes to speaking parts. Here you are accosted by a young girl, in a low tremulous tone, who begs a few sous for a dying father; farther on, a tearful mother solicits the wherewithal to buy a coffin for a dead child; while a sham operative will tell you of his having hurt his hand while tending a steam engine, of his being too much crippled to resume his business, and not quite injured enough to be taken care of at the hospital. You will find, even, a poet, who solicits a little help to enable him to finish a work that will eclipse Dante's Inferno and Milton's Paradise Lost. It is said that some of these beggars own houses, and are very hard on their tenants!

There are well-dressed beggars, too. There is the omnibus-hunter, who haunts the vicinity of the Madeleine. She is an elegantly-dressed woman, who accosts the most respectable person she can find. "Sir," says she, "I have forgotten my purse; and instead of taking a carriage, I'll ride home in an omnibus. Will you have the goodness to lend me six sous and give me your card? I will send the trifle to your address immediately."

There is literally no end to the ingenuity of these begging sharpers; and we most earnestly advise those ladies and gentlemen who will pour over to the continent the present summer, to be on the lookout, and call up all their Yankee shrewdness, if they wish to avoid, while sojourning in the capital of the world, impositions of the grossest kind.

LADIES' MEASUREMENT.—We are curious to know how many feet in female arithmetic go to a mile, because we never met with a lady's foot yet whose shoe was not, to say the very least, "a mile too big for her."

SWALLOWS.—As a proof of the very valuable services rendered by swallows, it is estimated that one of these birds will destroy, at a low calculation, nine hundred insects per day.

CURIOS.—Billiards make a well known remedy for the blues. The player wields a cue, and it makes him a cuer.

MERELY A QUERRY.—What's all the world to a man when his wife's a widow?

TOO TRUE.—Folly is always in fashion.

THE TWO HEMISPHERES.

Admiral Sir Edmund Lyons is said to have remarked lately to a French officer, "You and I have seen the last war." We really trust the gallant Englishman was right, and we are not without hopes, in spite of the large share that the belligerent element has in the composition of human nature, that the world, East and West, is beginning to find out that war is not only an unprofitable investment, but a senseless and wanton waste of blood and treasure; and that the pen, the tongue and brain combined, are more efficacious instruments in the settlement of international difficulties than the sword. Certainly the sound sense and sound principle of the age is against war; the terrible conflicts of the present century have served, not to exaggerate the glory of war, but, by contrast, to elevate the blessings of peace.

Yet we live in times so precipitate, so prolific of strange events, that it will not do to be too hopeful or too certain. At the time of penning these lines, the idea of a collision between this country and Great Britain, for instance, seems to have been dispelled; but who can tell what a day may bring forth? Yet it would seem that negotiation might untangle the knot of dispute without resort to the sword. In fact, England, and her ally, France, are engaged in projects too gigantic and promising abroad to think of undertaking the hopeless task of humbling the proud flag of this republic. Tired of contending against each other, these twin European giants are moving side by side to the accomplishment of enterprises similar in character.

England is extending her colonial possessions in Asia, absorbing kingdom after kingdom, rich, fertile, and yielding her an abundant harvest of produce and treasure. France has chosen Africa for her field of colonial enterprise. The military expedition, fitted out in the last days of Charles X. (in 1830), crowned with complete success, gave her a foothold on the African continent, which she has ever since been improving. Her African colonies are in a flourishing condition, and the future promises well for the triumph of her arms and arts in that strange continent, which has witnessed so many vicissitudes of fortune. The eastern hemisphere seems therefore to claim all the attention, all the capital, and all the arms of these two great nations.

We say, therefore, as the United States adhere to their policy of non-intervention in European affairs, we may expect these two powers will forego any idea of interfering with the affairs of this continent, as an unprofitable and even ruinous one. They cannot hope to reap any triumph from a war with this country, unless waged on some question upon which our countrymen were divided, and divided to the extent of civil war. Now we hazard nothing in saying, that public sentiment in this country is united and impregnable upon the absolute necessity of prohibiting foreign interference on the soil of the North American continent, and its adjacent islands. So long as Cuba remains in the possession of a power so imbecile as Spain has shown herself to be, no authorized attempt will be made to plant the American flag on the ramparts of the Moro. But let it once be whispered that the island were to be transferred to an active European power, and the whole country would demand its acquisition, and rise in arms to secure it. So with Central America—the American sentiment would never sanction the establishment of any European government on its soil.

This continent, at least, will be preserved for freedom so long as there are stout hands and brave hearts to protect it. To the struggling masses of Europe we can give our sympathies—but not our arms. The law of self-preservation dictates this. We must leave the eastern hemisphere to the influences of the progressive spirit of the age, to those of Christianity and education, and hope that despotism may be obliterated even there. But the western world belongs to freedom; and no foreign despot, however powerful, will be allowed to lay a hand on it.

RATHER AIRY.—The New York Sunday Times thinks that in a few years the U. S. mails will be carried by balloons. There is no lack of gas to fill any number of balloons.

A TOUGH QUID.—A man named Thornhill was recently convicted of stealing two plugs of tobacco, in Clark county, Ky., and sentenced to two years confinement in the penitentiary.

IMPORTANT.—The British ministry triumphed, on a motion censuring the abandonment of the right to capture an enemy's goods on board neutral vessels.

MT. AUBURN.—A practical gardener has been engaged to take charge of ornamenting the private grounds in Mount Auburn with flowers and shrubbery.

CANADA.—The crops of Upper Canada were never more promising than now, including peaches and apples.

IRANISTAN AND BARNUM.—Iranistan is to be sold at auction by the first of September next.

JUMPING OFF.

A very popular amusement in these latter days, is that of jumping off a railway train when under full headway. The gymnastic gentleman who attempts this sensible feat, is sometimes killed in the act, leaving behind him the reputation of having committed suicide. It is uncharitable; however, to suspect that such is the deliberate design of those who resort to this method of displaying their agility. It is more rational to suppose that they merely go in for the fun of a contused face or a broken limb. It is so agreeable to limp about on crutches for six months, and to receive the condolences of your friends and acquaintances, and the kind attentions of the members of your family!—and then a scarred forehead and a barked or disjointed nose add so much to one's personal appearance! If you imitate the example of the conductor, and jump in the direction the train is going, you are not so certain of immortality and glory. You may escape injury—though if you have not served an apprenticeship in a circus, the chances are that you will receive some bodily injury. But if you wish to "make assurance doubly sure," then your course through the air must be the reverse of that of the train. If you jump to the rear, you will probably break your neck—or, failing of that, tumble under the cars, and have both your legs cut off. Of course there will have to be a subsequent amputation at the hospital; but that will afford you a fine opportunity for testing the efficiency of anæsthetic agents—chloroform, ether, or snow. As for the loss of your legs, that is a matter of secondary importance—Palmer's artificial leg is far superior to the Angleses, is sold very reasonably, and will afford you an opportunity of encouraging American manufactures. Then, if you choose to wear a half military costume, you can easily pass for a maimed hero of the Mexican war, or, if sufficiently advanced in life, for a veteran of 1812.

But we have not the heart to pursue a vein of levity in speaking of what is the crying national sin of our day—the headlong velocity which characterizes all our movements. In the pursuit of gain we are ready to risk everything—happiness, comfort, life itself. Who will patronize the slow and safe steamer, when the fast and unsafe steamer leaves port at the same time? What horseman is satisfied with a speed short of 2.40? How long does the memory of an awful railroad accident, occasioned by a headlong rate of speed, endure? We scarcely read the record of one of these calamities, unless we have friends or relatives mutilated or killed by them. We blame steamboat captains and railroad conductors for evils for which we ourselves are responsible. People talk about the horrors of war; but volumes might be written on the horrors of peace, as we employ it. To die in the military service of our country is an honor—to die in consequence of our own headlong haste, is a disgrace. We talk about "fast young men," but we are all fast—men, women and children. Our educational system is fast—our eating is fast—we sleep fast—we hurry with fearful velocity from the cradle to the grave. We crowd the work of centuries into a few years, and with all our great and glorious achievements, we are leaving many sad examples to posterity.

THE ORDER OF THE DAY.

During the siege of Amiens, the inhabitants were forbidden to leave their houses without a lantern. That very night a citizen came out with a lantern in his hand.

"Your lantern!" cried the sentinel.

"Here it is."

"There is no candle in it."

"We were not told anything about a candle."

The next morning an order was issued that no one should go out without a lantern, in which there was a candle. In the evening the same individual appeared with a candle in his lantern.

"Where's your lantern?" asked the sentinel.

"Here!"

"Your candle?"

"Here!"

"But it isn't lighted."

"We were not ordered to light our candles.

Why don't you tell what you want us to do?"

The next morning the citizens were forbidden to appear without a lantern in which there was a lighted candle.

OFFICIAL PRUDENCE.—A regiment being on the point of leaving a country town in England, and having to pass through a wood infested by robbers, the mayor insisted on sending an escort of three constables to protect them.

PULLED DOWN.—The old U. S. building, in State Street, recently occupied by the Merchants' Bank, the corner stone of which was laid July 5, 1824.

NEW YORK.—Broadway exhibits the greatest activity now in the demolition of old and construction of new buildings.

DISPLAY.—Jewellers with plate glass windows take great pains to show off their wares.

Foreign Miscellany.

The Pope has just entered his 65th year, having been born on the 13th of May, 1792.

Mr. and Mrs. Florence, American performers, have been successful in London.

One fifth of the working population of Great Britain is engaged in farming.

The cemetery of Pere la Chaise, at Paris, comprises 155 acres of land.

The expense of crowning the new emperor of Russia is estimated at $2,500,000.

A copy of the first edition of Shakspeare was lately sold at auction in London for over $800.

The thirteenth volume of Theirs' History of the Consulate and the Empire has been published in France.

Five days quarantine are imposed at Leghorn on all vessels arriving from the Levant, and fifteen days if they have sickness on board.

A Russian squadron, now at Cronstadt, was to leave there in May, on a cruise to North America, under the command of Admiral Warakowitch.

London and St. Petersburg are now connected by telegraph, and a despatch recently passed from the former to the latter place, 1700 miles, in a second.

M. Christopoulos, the Greek Minister of Public Instruction, has ordered the researches at the Acropolis to be resumed. They were discontinued in 1840.

The Empress Eugenie has entered on her thirtieth year. It is a curious coincidence that she was born on the anniversary of the death of Napoleon the Great.

The Emperor Napoleon has invited any industrious Chinese who may be expelled from California, to take refuge in Tahiti, where they will find a welcome and employment.

It is said that one hundred clergymen have, within a short period, seceded from the ministry and communion of the English Church, to join that of Rome—a fact unparalleled since the days of Cranmer.

The waters of the Danube have not been so low for the last twenty years as they are at present, and all the commerce of Upper Austria that looks to this river as a medium of transportation, is completely suspended.

The London Chronicle, after giving a description of the late great review of the English fleet at Spithead, says:

"One useful truth we learn from this review; it shows what we could but did not do."

French loyalty and enthusiasm need regulation. It is for this purpose, we are told in a placard printed in the second arrondissement of Paris, the collectors will be sent to every house to receive the subscription of 25c. for a testimonial to the Empress and the Imperial Prince.

There are in Sweden about 2400 noble families, consisting of 11,000 persons of both sexes—or one in every 316 of the whole population—possessing landed property estimated at 71,000 rix dollars (£5,916,666)—an average of less than $30,000, or £2500 for each family.

There are more than six hundred places of worship in London.

With much regret we learn from Vienna that the great basso, Staudigl, has gone mad.

An imperial decree announces that the Russian army is to be reduced to a peace establishment.

Paris is fast becoming a place where no one can live unless he is master of a very large fortune.

The Sultan has sent a magnificent present of pearls to Victoria, and jewelled swords and saddles to Napoleon.

A statue of John Wesley is to be erected, by subscription, at his birth-place, Epworth, in North Lincolnshire.

By a late decision of the French government, professorships of agriculture are to be founded in all the principal educational establishments of France.

The States of the Duchy of Meiningen have just decided that no Jew can be an elector, a juryman, a public functionary, an advocate, or attorney.

The pistols which O'Connell used on the occasion of his celebrated duel with D'Esteira, were sold by auction in Limerick, lately, for 2½ the pair.

The Princess Murat, married to Count Rasponi of Ravenna, has just had a monument executed by the Roman sculptor, Gajammi, to the memory of her father, King Joachim.

Two sabres and two saddles of the most glittering and costly character have just arrived at the Turkish Embassy in Paris, as a present from the Sultan to the Emperor Napoleon.

The greatest clothing establishment in the world is that of M. Godillot, in Paris. He employs sixty-six steam sewing machines, and one thousand girls.

The height of Mount Zion is two thousand five hundred and thirty-five feet above the level of the Mediterranean Sea, and about three hundred feet above the valley below.

Marshal Pelissier has been presented with a magnificent sword—a Toledo blade—by the Spanish officers who were sent out to the Crimea by their government to witness the operations of the Eastern war.

Three Parisian sculptors are each at work on a bust of the late Madame Girardin. Victor Hugo in his recent volumes, "Les Contemplations," has dedicated some beautiful lines to her memory.

Recent experiments at the School of Musketry, Hythe, are said to have demonstrated the superiority of the English and American breech-loading fire-arms over those of continental manufacture, and particularly the much-praised needle gun of the Prussian infantry.

"Mario" Coutts, the much talked of, infatuated, and indefatigable lady, is now quietly residing in London, greatly improved by her eccentric journeying in this country. She has become a sensible woman, and is about to marry a Mr. Ward, of the Board of Trade, a quiet, goodly youth.

Record of the Times.

One of the New York hotels sells $40,000 worth of wine per annum. .

In England, during the reign of Henry VIII., 72,000 thieves were hanged.

Reynolds' picture of the "Strawberry Girl" lately brought 2100 guineas at auction.

Two German translations of "Hiawatha" have met with prodigious success.

Lamartine lost his money by an unfortunate speculation in wine.

The oldest paintings in the world are seven frescoes, lately found in Rome.

The Third Avenue cars, New York, lately took $2000 in one day.

Prussia has refused to take any part in a convention to regulate the issue of paper money in Germany.

The sum set down in the budget for 1856 of the French Minister of Foreign Affairs for Abd-el-Kader and his establishment is 120,000 fr.

Prince Gortschakoff has announced that large quantities of flour and biscuit will be publicly sold by government in the kingdom of Poland.

The constitution adopted by the Mormons preparatory to asking for the admission of Utah into the Union, is very brief and plain, and says nothing about either polygamy or slavery.

Among the late arrivals at St. Louis hotels, is one that reads, "E. Smith and four wives, Salt Lake." The whole party should be rowed up Salt River.

The twentieth year some people say is always too cold to raise corn. It was a very cold season in 1816, and so it was in 1836; and they imagine it will be in 1856.

Hon. James Buchanan, the Democratic nominee for the Presidency, was born in Franklin county, Pa., April 13, 1791, being therefore in his sixty-sixth year.

Miss Lake, an energetic lady, is now on a visit to Philadelphia, with the object of collecting funds to establish a Female Seminary in the island of Hayti.

The wine sales of one of the New York hotels amount to forty thousand dollars a year; and the bar yields, probably, in gross receipts, about as much more; and nearly one half of the aggregate sum is profit.

In five months of 1856 there have arrived at New York 35,345 immigrants—11,367 Irish, 10,173 Germans, 7757 English. For the same time in 1855 the number was 50,049, and in 1854 it was 108,944.

Bearded women have been known in every age; one was seen at the court of Czar Peter I., in 1724, with a beard of immense length. Margaret, Governess of the Netherlands, had a heavy beard.

The news of recent and important discoveries of gold in French Guiana seems to be confirmed, and at last accounts companies of adventurers were organizing in many parts of France, with the intention of proceeding forthwith to the diggings.

The Indians of Florida have recently murdered several white citizens.

Prof. Morse's excellent system of telegraphing has been introduced in France.

Sugar, by a new process, is now converted into loaves in twenty minutes.

A hot air locomotive lately made eighty miles an hour on the Jersey Railroad.

The shops in London are now generally closed on Saturday afternoons.

Great Britain is busy in the process of absorbing nearly all Asia.

One of the shafts for the steamship Adriatic weighed forty tons in the rough.

Mr. Brougham has written a new play founded on Miss Bronte's "Jane Eyre."

Powers, the sculptor, is less than fifty—yet he has achieved immortality.

Grimm, the German scholar, calls English the "universal language."

A gunmaker at Liverpool has made a rifle to be fired four hundred times an hour.

Jullien has been giving concerts at Liverpool with some trumpeters of the Zouaves.

It has been ascertained that the population of Minnesota is 120,000, or more than sufficient to justify her admission into the Union.

During the last four months the sum of $16,000,000 in gold and silver has been shipped from England to the East.

The Viennese police are in a ferment, from the extraordinary escape of the Count Orsini (a friend of Mazzini's) from the fortress of Mantua.

George Bancroft, the historian, is sojourning temporarily at St. Louis, engaged in investigations connected with revolutionary history.

Bolivia, in South America, has sent a diplomatic agent to the Holy See. This is the first time that this republic has established official relations with the pontifical government.

The fraternity of Franciscan Monks are about erecting a monastery in Allegany, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y. The work is to be commenced immediately. So says the Buffalo Express.

Mrs. Strickland died in Portland, Ct., a short time since, at a very advanced age. In the graveyard where she was buried, she saw the first interment, ninety years ago!

The audience in the Opera House in New Orleans recently called out Madame Colson, the prima donna, in "Lucia di Lammermoor," and presented to her a diamond bracelet and brooch worth $1000.

Many slaves have been seen around the coast of Upper Guinea, and the brig General Pierce, of New York, is at Loando, having been captured by the Portuguese government, and condemned as a slave. The captain and crew are in prison, awaiting trial.

The Endicott Tree of Danvers, Mass., and the Stuyvesant of New York, have a compeer upon the bank of Charles River, in Cambridge, Mass., equally venerable. It was set by Simon Stone, who landed there in 1635, and whose descendants have owned the spot ever since, till it was sold two years ago to the city for a cemetery.

Merry Making.

Spinsters should remember that Naomi was not married till she was 180.

Laziness, it is said, begins in cobwebs and ends in iron chains.

Did anybody ever hear of a woman's will? A woman's will is "I wont."

A giddy girl said her head was turned by reading of the moon's rotation.

"I speak within bounds," as the prisoner said to the jailor.

"I'm blowed if I do," as the trumpet said, when it was asked to give a tune.

A good housewife hearing Venice Preserved highly spoken of, asks for a receipt to make it.

Unless your wife's name be Ruth, you will be of a cruel disposition—for you will be Ruth-less.

"I introduce a bill for the destruction of worms," as the woodpecker said in a stump speech.

Soft soap in some shape pleases all, and, generally speaking, the more lye you put into it the better.

The thread of conversation is sustained among several persons by each knowing when to take a stitch in time.

Metaphors are unsafe weapons in a controversy. They admit of so many applications, that the engineer is often "hoist with his own petard."

BRIGHT IDEA.—When the mayor of Garratt's daughter lost her canary bird, her father instantly ordered all the town gates to be closed.

Several philosophical gentlemen are puzzling themselves to account for the circumstance that clams have no legs.

Lord Brougham once facetiously defined a lawyer thus: "A learned gentleman, who rescues your estate from your enemies, and keeps it himself."

A Persian poet says: "Night comes on when the ink-bottle of heaven is overturned." Another calls the evening dew "the perspiration of the moon."

There is only one greater nuisance than a trombone player who performs "after tea," and that is a trombone player who performs "before breakfast."

An independent man is said to be one who can live without whiskey and tobacco, and shave himself with brown soap and cold water without a mirror.

A clergyman was censuring a young lady for tight-lacing. "Why," returned the miss, "you would certainly not recommend loose habits to your parishioners." The clergyman smiled.

Mrs. Kinzie, in her work on the early times of the Northwest, states that the Indians say that the first white man that settled at Chicago was a negro!

A club of unmarried men recently gave a ball in Washington, and called themselves "The Merry Bachelors." Merry bachelors! O, pshaw, don't talk nonsense! You might as well say a skeleton is merry, because it grins! It wont do.

What is never an alderman's motto? Dinner forget.

When does a ship commit a crime? When she forges a head.

Can a watch fitted with a second hand be called a second-hand watch.

The horse's coat is the gift of nature, but a tailor very often makes a coat for an ass.

Fences operate in two ways: If good, they are a defence; if poor, they are an offence.

When is charity like a top? When it begins to hum.

To what particular feature of the face should we attribute longevity? To the nostrils—for they dilate.

A man in Kentucky was so enormously big, that when he died it took two clergymen and a boy to preach his funeral sermon.

An old maid was once asked to subscribe for a newspaper. She answered, "No, I always make my own news."

A coquette may be compared to tinder, which lays out to catch sparks, but does not always succeed in lighting up a match.

"What can we do for Italy?" Louis Napoleon puts this question, and Punch makes this answer: "Take your leg out of the boot!"

Why is a man who gets knocked down at an election like the world we inhabit? Because he is "flattened at the polls."

What is the difference between a popular spring dish and a man with the ague? One is a baked shad and the other is shaked bad.

We see it stated in some of the papers that one of the parties—we forget which one—is "changing front." If they should all of them change all over it wouldn't hurt them any.

Mr. —, of the eating house, lost a customer the other day because a waiter called out "Hurry up the boiled Indian!" To hurry the Indian, after cooking him, he thought was adding tyranny to barbarism.

There is a paper printed in Arkansas on a cheese press. It is hardly necessary to say that it does not throw off sheets quite as rapidly as a flea-bitten lodger in a cheap hotel, or one of Hoe's six cylinder presses.

"Zounds, fellow!" exclaimed a choleric old gentleman to a very phlegmatic matter-of-fact person, "I shall go out of my wits." "Well, you wont have far to go," said the phlegmatic man.

One of our most fashionable bakers, upon being shown a specimen of the bread tree, rejected it with scorn, saying, contemptuously, "Call that bread? Pshaw! Why, there's no alum in it!" —Punch.

It is beautiful to behold at the wedding the sorrow-stricken air of the parent as he "gives the bride away," when you know that for the last ten years he has been trying his best to get her off his hands.

Spirit is now a very fashionable word; to act with spirit, to speak with spirit, means only to act rashly and to act indiscreetly. An able man shows his spirit by gentle words and resolute actions; he is neither hot nor timid.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

VOL. IV.—No. 3.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER, 1856.

WHOLE No. 21.

THE BEAUTY OF TROLHETTA, AND HER PERILS.

BY EMERET H. SEDGE.

THE river Gotha in Sweden connects the magnificent inland sea, denominated Wenner, with the North Sea, or rather the Skaggreack, which it joins near the town of Gottenburg. This stream, valuable as a means of easy communication, possesses little attraction in point of scenery, flowing as it does through a monotonous and comparatively barren country. Perhaps we should never hear of the Gotha, if it was not interrupted by the celebrated Trolhætta Falls, situated not far from Lake Wenner. Situated close by the falls is the village of Trolhætta, containing a population of one thousand persons, many of whom find employment and consequent subsistence in the busy little sawmills which are built close to the edge of the stream, and overhanging the cataract in picturesque and startling positions. The continued industry of these mills is secured by an unbroken supply of timber provided by the northern and western coasts of the Wenner, transported across the lake by sloops and schooners, and finally brought to Trolhætta through the famous canal of the same name—an improvement planned and carried into effect by Charles the Twelfth. From this village the wood in a new form is taken on the canal past the rapids, and down to the débouchure of the Gotha, whence it is transmitted as the commerce of the country directs.

But we have to do less with the wood than with the sawmills, or rather still, with the owner of a portion of them. Olof Schonung was the happiest man in Trolhætta. He ate unflinchingly his four regular meals daily, he drank his beer with unrivalled gusto, and smoked his pipe in a state of complacency and quietude which many a richer and better man might have envied; and the indisputable excellence and superior wealth of Olof was celebrated throughout the region. It would not be easy to reckon the little arable patches whereof he claimed proprietorship, though it could be done with suitable pains-taking, as well as to measure the corn and barley and potatoes, which, notwithstanding they grew in broken and limited localities, made a very fair aggregate. Neither will we enumerate his mills or give a hint at their probable value, lest the stupendous result should seem scarcely credible to those who appreciate the difficulties a sawyer must surmount in attaining a competency, an actual fortune in the furniture of his vocation, and lest, on the other hand, it might be superciliously contemned by such persons as are accustomed to compute their wealth in broad columns.

Olof sustained an unpretending a style of living as his less prosperous neighbors, unless, perhaps, his house was somewhat larger than theirs, and surrounded by a greater number of granaries and offices, while the servants were as numerous as the necessities of the establishment demanded. In his own proper domicile, so far as he had the control, were the same rudeness and simplicity everywhere found among the laboring classes. Plenty and cleanliness were in their estimation the highest advantages associated with wealth, and it abundantly satisfied his notions of display to see his cottages in their bright coat of red paint contrasting pleasantly with the verdure on the overgrown roofs, and within to find no stains on the deal boards or ceiling, and walls scoured to a marvellous pitch of whiteness, and to crumple beneath his feet the newly-gathered fir-twigs and leaves which strewed the immaculate floor.

Olof had experienced one great sorrow which was evidently sufficient for his spiritual discipline, since he was not likely wholly to outlive its effect upon his heart. Despite his joviality and content, he did not cease to remember in long hours of abstracted thought his faithful, loving wife, the mother of his sweet, laughing girl. She had been dead years, and his little Edna had grown almost to womanhood. Olof did not attempt to contract a second marriage, but remained at ease beneath the housewifely rule of his maiden sister. Miss Margaret Schoning was plump and good-natured, in spite of her decision. She had come to her brother when she heard of his affliction, taking a final leave of the social attractions of Gottenburg, in which city she was living, with some pretensions to fashion, on a small legacy. It was better, in her opinion, to care for Olof and her niece, and to look after the housekeeping, than to spend a life in idleness. Accordingly, she relinquished her meagre gentility and two or three "prospects," of which most single ladies have several, and arrived in a state of bustling importance by virtue of her self-denial—a state she never quite escaped from—at Trolhætta.

Miss Margaret would have found her new home dull and coarse, when contrasted with her Gottenburg experience of pleasure and refinement, if the beautiful little Edna had not won her whole heart and absorbed her interest immediately. The sweet, gay child, with skin of snow, heavenly blue eyes and luxuriant golden curls, diffused about her a cheer like very sunshine; and whether she danced on the fir leaves, or learned to sew, or conned her lesson, or skipped along the streets, she was always the same in loveliness. Miss Margaret was ready to die for her, but there being no fitting occasion for the display of such a proof of attachment, she could only devote her life to caring for the rosebud, and she had her reward in seeing it enlarge and open into a flower which verified its early promise of perfection.

While Edna was no higher than her aunt's shoulder, she was allowed to go to the mills as often as she chose, where she talked with her father in his intervals of labor, watched the untiring saws, played with the moist, fragrant wood, and where, above all, she could see the furious Gotha leaping, surging and boiling in its descent over the Trolhætta rocks. For hours together, she would stand looking from the window of the mill, listening to the unceasing rush of the waters, pleasing herself with sparkling, broken fancies and meditations, such as Miss Margaret never told her, and such as she had never read in books. She must have heard them from the water spirits.

One day when she went down to the mill, she found a stranger there. He was already at work, and her father was teaching him how the labor should be performed. He was still young, scarcely arrived at his full stature, but he was strong, vigorous and capable, and Edna very much admired his agility, his coal black hair which the red cap did not entirely conceal, and his dark, shining eyes, which were not slow in sending beaming, inquiring glances towards her.

Aleck Thune, for that was the name of the stranger, was a Norwegian; and, more restless and ambitious than his brothers, who cared for nothing more exciting than the cultivation of their little farms lying far away to the northward, he had left his home, and after a series of ordinary adventures, had arrived at Carlstadt. There he heard of Gottenburg, then in a specially prosperous condition, and determined to go thither to seek his fortune. He crossed the Wenner with a cargo of timber and came to Trolhætta. The beautiful falls attracted his attention. He must stop to see them and to hear their deep, roaring voice. He must find rare and difficult paths alone to the stream, and gain by dangerous passes and the aid of tough and stunted trees, those high, overhanging projections from which he could look down into the wildest eddies, the maddest rush of the waters. Aleck found in his climbing the greatest exhilaration. Full of daring and hope, he sat down on the sloping edge of the precipice and devised plans for his emolument at Gottenburg. Then he thought himself of his slender, hoarded supply of silver, upon which he relied to take him to that city, and he took it out from his bosom and spread it in his hand to count it over. O, horror! He was slipping forward—could nothing save him? He made a desperate clutch at the rocky point beside him; it did not break, and another effort carried him up to a place of security. But the silver—that tinkled along down the crag and parting the black waters, commenced its perpetual whirl in the stupendous basin which contained them. Aleck caught his breath and looked after his falling treasure.

"That money was my nest-egg, and a pretty nest it lies in now. But I'll not leave it. The window of yonder mill cleverly overlooks my possessions, and perhaps the owner will hire me—who knows?" And thus talking and singing to support his courage, Aleck made the best of his way to test this last seeming possibility.

In less than an hour, he was tugging at the heavy timber in the mill. Olof despised the Norwegians, but his objection to having a servant of that nation was overcome by Aleck's truthful story of misfortune, his clear, honest eye, and a strong arm. And Olof had that very day said to himself: "I am growing old, and I will no longer work as I have done. I will have another good lad to help me. It is enough for me to overlook so many fellows and give a lift at a beam now and then."

Aleck moved the logs and waited for the saw to cut them several hours, and he was already tired of the confinement. Surely this, day in and out, would be no better than digging potatoes; it was even worse, for the blue sky was quite hidden by the black roof. Aleck was forlorn and sighed, not for home, but for Gottenburg, and resolved with new determination to go there as soon as he could earn money enough. At that moment, something bright fluttered before his vision. He looked eagerly and saw such a beautiful, airy figure, that he thought an angel had been sent to console him; but it was only a young girl, who embraced and kissed Olof before she perceived that he was not alone. She gave Aleck a pleasant greeting and stayed to see him work, and after a while she ventured to talk with him, and then she laughed very much at his bad Swedish. She offered timidly to teach him a better pronunciation. Aleck did not work late on that day, but went with Olof and Edna to the house before tea-time. Miss Margaret received him graciously. Edna continued to talk to him, and before he fell asleep that night, he thought perhaps he should always live at Trolhætta.

Olof in a few days so appreciated his able assistant, that he would not have exchanged him for the best Swede he knew. The lovely Edna could not part with her companion, and the communicative Miss Margaret set a high value on a good listener; and the pleasant pictures of Gottenburg produced from the storehouse of her memory made the passing gratification of the young people, but occasioned no emotion of longing discontent in the breast of Aleck. Only Edna, sometimes, enraptured with descriptions of the theatre and parties, handsome shops and the fine English residents, would exclaim:

"I will yet stay a while in Gottenburg."

"And go from us?" Aleck would say, sadly.

"Perhaps you would go also?"

"I might do that," said he.

"And I will stay there long enough," said the gay Edna, "to learn English tolerably well, and get me some foreign dresses which will last me a lifetime for my best, just like Aunt Margaret's. And you will have saved money enough then, so that you could go with me and keep me out of harm, and maybe study with a learned professor, and afterwards rise very high in life."

"I never wish to be higher," said Aleck, "than on the black rocks above the mill, with you for my wise little professor. I know a great many things and Swedish perfectly already."

"No, indeed—no!" exclaimed the laughing girl. "Your speaking is full of faults. You would not be thought at all intelligent among Gottenburg gentlemen."

Aleck did not relish that compliment—and it was but fair to say it was quite unjust, since his mind was as active and retentive as could be desired—and he set off for the mill in bad humor, and commenced working. But Edna was in a provoking mood, and she followed Aleck, not to ask his pardon, but to tease him still further, that she might see his eyes grow black and flash, and his cheeks become red. As soon as she had exhausted every topic of disagreement which her invention very unamiably consented to supply, she said to herself:

"Now before I go to the house, I will give him one good fright, and that will vex him more; then it will be so nice to make it all up after dinner, and watch his eyes turn to a soft, deep brown again, while I oblige him to laugh and coax him to tell a pretty story about the north land."

Edna followed the suggestions of her naughty spirit, and stole out to the end of the old mill, where there was a ruinous balcony overhanging the stream. The rude balustrade was decayed, and the place was considered quite unsafe by Aleck, who had given Edna many a caution.

"In mercy come back, or you are lost!" shouted he, as he saw her go to the extreme end and lean against the insecure railing in defiance.

His cry of distress only excited her perverse daring, and she bent over the rotten support, and letting the wind toss her sunny ringlets in the light, looked back with a gay, mocking laugh. It was but for an instant, however, for the old railing broke beneath the weight of her swaying motion, and she went helplessly down into the deep and terrible water. Only a shrill scream lingered in the air behind her.

A bound and a plunge, and Aleck had made the dangerous descent into the Gotha in time to dash forward and catch the imprudent girl before she was thrown against the rocks. Then by almost miraculous strength he combated the furious eddies, and gained a huge mass of granite in the middle of the river.

The fright and sudden bath completely banished the naughtiness from Edna's heart and dispelled Aleck's irritations, and there succeeded as pretty a reconciliation-scene as one would wish to describe. So thought an English traveller, who stood on the nearest bank in an attitude of affected superiority, with foppish dress and a ferocious disposition of hair. He vowed he would gladly sit on the worst looking rock in the Gotha, with a beautiful girl to kiss his hand like that, if—there were only a bridge to the shore. Meanwhile the crowd rapidly increased, as the news of the strange exposure ran through the village. Olof was the only man whose actions were more energetic than his words. After repeated efforts, he succeeded in throwing a rope to Aleck, who fastened it about a corner of the rock and called for another. The second followed shortly. This Aleck tied about his body, and securely holding his charge and clinging to the first rope, was drawn to the shore.

All rushed forward to receive them, and the Englishman pushing aside the others, even Miss Margaret and Olof, with an insolent freedom attempted to take Edna from Aleck, who still supported her. She shrank back, and Aleck motioned him away. But the stranger, uttering some mawkish compliment, the meaning of which was sufficiently evident to the bystanders, by his tone and the expression of his features, persisted in his rudeness, and with insulting familiarity insinuated his arm about the waist of the dripping girl who, terrified, clung to her preserver. The light kindled in Aleck's eye, and seeming to concentrate his entire muscular force in his right arm, with one stroke he laid the intruder on the ground.

"Rightly served! So much for his impudence!" said the spectators.

Incited by the popular approval, Aleck was disposed to add some further token of his displeasure to that already applied to the person of the stranger, who was hastening to recover his footing and dignity. But Olof securing his daughter, bade his household follow him homeward, and strode on with such rapid steps, that Aleck had only time to shake defiance at his adversary with his clenched fists. As the stranger was sufficiently valorous in this pantomimic warfare against a retreating foe, the contest on his part was quite vigorous and edifying to behold. —In a little while Edna became a tall young lady, and no longer went to the mill to play. Aleck also grew large and handsome, and almost every day contrived to gain time for a delightful walk with his master's daughter in some of the wild paths about their romantic home. They professed to study botany under Miss Margaret's guidance, and to go abroad for specimens; but the flowers they might chance to find more frequently adorned Edna's curls than a herbarium, and the students appeared to be better satisfied with sitting side by side on the barren rocks overlooking the Gotha, than with laborious searching in moist and sunny nooks for illustrations of their favorite science.

They were on the topmost crag one day, looking alternately at the prospect and in each other's eyes. All were very fine.

"Don't go so near the edge," said Aleck. "There's where I had the good luck to lose my money once, but it isn't worth your while to go after it."

"I shall not fall," replied Edna. "I wish only to reach that extraordinary glistening pebble. If we do not carry some curiosity home, Aunt Margaret will charge us with sloth and carelessness, as she did yesterday."

But Edna did not calculate upon the time-worn smoothness of the rock, and she commenced the terrible slipping which her companion had once tried before her. Aleck sprang to save her and caught her dress. But he also was too near the brink, and for an instant it seemed doubtful if he could recover himself, much more the burden which drew him downward. It was a moment of silence, suspense and agony. An arm less strong, a nerve less determined than the young sawyer's, would have lost all. It was a close conflict with certain destruction, but Aleck won the victory, and he presently stood at a safe distance from the precipice, pale and trembling, and clasping to his heart his palpitating prize.

"I once lost my entire fortune over that dangerous rock," said he; "if I had there parted with my all again, I should have taken up my abode with my treasures in the black whirlpool beneath."

His words brought the bright color and smiles into Edna's face, and as the echo of their impassioned utterance fell on Aleck's ear, the blood, in compensation for its temporary absence, rushed in crimson floods to his cheeks and more than wonted gladness lit his eye. He took Edna's arm within his own and went directly home. They were so engrossed with pleasanter thoughts that neither remembered to acquaint Miss Margaret with the particulars of their perilous adventure. But nothing on a hill-top can remain unknown, and Olof had seen the whole from the window of the mill.

On that very evening Olof consulted with his sister respecting the means by which he might best testify his sense of Aleck's repeated services that had so happily resulted in the continued felicity of his household. The gratitude of Olof was unbounded, and he studied how to reward Edna's preserver. Miss Margaret's eyes twinkled with delight in anticipation of more than possibilities, and she blushed slightly, being a sensible maiden lady, as she somewhat diffusely hinted at a wedding which would probably be satisfactory to all parties.

Olof's blank astonishment, as he gradually comprehended his sister's drift, grew into towering indignation when her proposition stood clearly before him, and he marched up and down the room scattering the fragrant fir-buds in every direction by his violent footsteps.

"A daughter of mine," he exclaimed, "shall never marry a detestable Norwegian. I hate the whole race, and so did my father. A good Swede always hates them—the Norway men."

"But—but," said Miss Margaret, trying to make prompt headway against a torrent of patriotic invectives which she foresaw, "Aleck has always obtained your approval, and you certainly have no personal dislike to him."

"To be sure I have. Aint he a Norwegian, I'd like to know? and isn't that sufficient?" said Olof, tossing a shower of evergreen leaves towards the ceiling.

"But Edna is so much attached to him—more than to any one else in the world," said his sister, making a bold push forward in the affair.

"Nonsense!" exclaimed Olof, contemptuously. "I wonder if she isn't my daughter, and born in Sweden, too!"

At length Olof left the fir-twigs in peace, and sitting down, half succeeded in persuading his sister that the match which she had proposed was wholly absurd and inadmissible, assured her that he would fully compensate Aleck for his gallant behaviour, and advised, to prevent the growth of an incipient regard, that Edna be sent to their old friends in Gottenburg, where she might find some amusements and pick up a few accomplishments. He requested, also, that the direction of everything should be left to him; and as he was absolute in his household, his sister dutifully and submissively acquiesced.

In two hours, he had made a bargain with Aleck, confirmed by papers, signatures and witnesses, by which the young man was to continue in his service during the two following years, and was then to receive certain unusual advantages that would lay a broad foundation for a fortune large enough to satisfy any ambition instructed by Trolhætta customs. Aleck was in raptures, for he viewed this distinction, which his master had bound himself to confer, as a certain stepping-stone to the attainment of his dearest wish. The obligation seemed to be wholly on his side, and he forgot that Olof or his family were at all indebted to him. But he was greatly taken aback when he soon learned that in less than a week Edna would be carried by her father to Gottenburg.

"You know, Aleck, that you are to go with me there," said Edna, with her sweetest blushes and smiles. "I am sure you have earned money enough to make it possible for you to do all those great things we used to talk about, and many others beside."

"I have money which I could use, yet I cannot go." And Aleck gloomily and even angrily explained the terms of his recent engagement.

He was not without penetration, and he remembered a remark of Olof's which convinced him that the present position of affairs was by no means accidental. But he had too much sense to throw away, through petulance or impulse, a certain chance of ultimate prosperity; and hoping for the best, he determined to abide strictly by the terms of the bond and remain at Trolhætta, as the paper required. If he could only have one more conversation with Edna, he would be satisfied; but this opportunity strangely enough did not occur, and he was forced to part from her, receiving such assurances of her affection as her tears and hand-pressure at the last moment might afford.

It is not our purpose to follow our beautiful heroine to Gottenburg, where, introduced by her father's relative into respectable society, she was directly a cynosure of popularity and admiration. Olof soon came back with letters. There was, indeed, no limit to the letters which followed each other home, and which for artlessness and refreshing unconsciousness, might have compared favorably with those of Miss Harriet Byron. There were the parties and the theatre and the various expected excitements, and there was a handsome merchant who greatly admired her, and an ugly count who was at her feet, and a landed proprietor who was ready to die for her on any imperative occasion, and beside, her English teacher who was more devoted and disagreeable than all the rest. She soon became weary of repelling people who would not retire, and of making conquests whose value was nothing to her, and at the end of half a year, having seen everything worthy of attention, and taken as many lessons in English as she could endure from her pretentious instructor, she petitioned or leave to return home. And Olof by that time was only too glad to grant it, and went for her with astonishing alacrity. Of course she brought with her the foreign dresses and improved manners and a world of sunshine, and nothing could be more joyful than was all Trolhætta on her arrival. So at least thought Aleck, yet I am not sure that all the villagers knew precisely when she returned.

Edna resumed her former habits and occupations, as if she never meant again to resign them, and it supplied employment and happiness for weeks to tell Aleck all that she had seen and learned in her absence. She had also to visit her numerous protégés, poor people in the vicinity, who had missed her beautiful countenance more than the charities which she was accustomed to afford them, since her place had been well filled by the thoughtful Miss Margaret.

A poor lame woman lived in a secluded spot, aside from the thickly settled parts of Trolhætta, and thither Edna went often, accompanied by a servant carrying supplies of food and other necessities. One day she made her visit in unusual haste, for her father had been crippled by some injury received in the mill, and was temporarily confined to the house, and she shortened her absence to contribute to his entertainment. She was expected in time for dinner, and Olof, Margaret and Aleck were waiting, when the servant, who had accompanied her, breathless and terrified burst into the room. Her story was told in matches. She was returning with Miss Edna, when a carriage met them, containing a man, who, Miss Edna said, was her English teacher, and the young lady vainly tried to pass him without being recognized; and the man alighted and held a long conversation with Miss Edna, and she shook her head a great many times and endeavored to escape; and the end of it was she was caught up by the man, who sprang into the carriage and drove rapidly off.

This story produced the utmost consternation. Olof jumped up furiously, but sank groaning into his chair.

"In heaven's name! why do you stand there, Aleck?" cried he. "Take the fastest horse you know, and be off with you."

"Only on one condition," said Aleck, coolly sitting down.

"Are you mad? What is it?" shouted Olof.

"That she be mine when I find her," said Aleck.

"The saints help me! She shall not marry a Norwegian," exclaimed Olof.

"I don't wish to parade my merits," continued Aleck, calmly, "but I will say that I have twice rescued Edna at the peril of my life. That will answer for you two; if I save her again it must be for myself."

"Margaret, let him alone," again shouted Olof. "Call some of the men instantly, and send them on after her."

"They are enervated fellows—they'll probably find her!" said Aleck, sarcastically.

Olof groaned more loudly than ever. Miss Margaret here interfered with her eloquence, and labored to convince her brother that Edna was certainly lost as matters then stood; that she might be in a much more disagreeable situation than that of Aleck's bride, and talked so effectively that Olof gave his extorted consent, with only one proviso and one faint hope.

"You may have her, Aleck, if she is willing—mind, if she is willing. I say, if she is willing, Aleck."

Aleck joyfully accepted the terms, and having already carefully questioned the servant-girl, in two minutes was flying on the track of the refugees, leaving his master to rave at his broken limb, and make the best of a doleful case. Fortune favored Aleck by breaking down the light carriage of the Englishman.

The young sawyer arrived at the scene of the accident soon after it occurred, where he found his old enemy, the Englishman, by the Gotha, somewhat ingloriously occupied in endeavoring to prevent the flight of his lady and in examining his useless vehicle, without appearing to remember that a good cavalier need not be exposed to the unfortunate chances of successful pursuit while his steed remains. Aleck at first determined to give battle to his antagonist, and punish him severely; but he was too happy to sustain a belligerent temper for any time, and he accordingly changed his resolution, and assisted the miserable Englishman in mending his carriage as well as ropes would do it, and saw him safely started on towards Gottenburg, while Edna stood by almost overcome with hysterical laughter.

Olof soon found that his only hope was without foundation, but Miss Margaret, and Aleck, and Edna were so completely satisfied and happy that it was impossible for him to be long perverse and ill-natured.

There was a wedding in due time after this, and nobody even regretted it—not even Olof, for Aleck was a dutiful son-in-law, and became as patriotic a Swede as if he had been born in Stockholm.

I'M ALL ALONE.—TO —.

BY EVELINE.

I'm all alone—what though the world surrounds me,
If from its crowd thy form be gone?
The world has lost its power to charm, without thee,
Alas! alas! I'm all alone!

I'm all alone—what if affection greet me?
It speaketh not in thy sweet tone;
Love's softest speech availeth not to cheer me,
Thy voice I hear not—I'm alone!

I'm all alone—perhaps by love surrounded,
Thy thoughts, from bygone days have flown;
Or else, perchance, enshined in wo unbounded,
Like me, thou sighest, "I'm all alone!"

I'm all alone—yet thoughts of thee still cherished,
Around my heart a charm have thrown;
This shall remain when all things else have perished,
While this is mine—I'm not alone!

"LET WELL ENOUGH ALONE."

A SKETCH FOR YOUNG MEN.

BY SYLVANUS COBB, JR.

ONE of the greatest evils incident to the young mechanics and business workmen of our country is that of frequent change of place and employment. This characteristic is peculiar to Yankees, they seem content only while on the move. This would be well enough if the movement were always onward. But it is not so. The young man who contracts the habit of often changing his business is apt to gain nothing in the end. Not only does "a rolling stone gather no moss," but in time it must lose much of its own substance. And so it is with the rolling portion of our youth—they not only gather no golden moss, but they generally lose some of their previous gatherings. Let a young man gain a good place for employment, and by-and-by leave it for one more flattering, and at length find himself disappointed, and he will be anxious for another change. By the time he has made three or four changes he will be sure to remain uneasy all the time.

Let us not be understood as objecting to all change in this respect. There must be many circumstances under which business changes are necessary. A young man must always look out for that situation which is the most sure, and at the same time most profitable. But the danger is, in allowing fancy to be dazzled by every tempting offer that comes up, without due exercise of the judgment. A simple narrative of real life will explain our meaning.

Samuel Peterson and Henry Willis were both of the same age, and had learned their trade of the same man. They were but a few months past their twenty-first year, and were machinists by trade. Mr. Lot Merrill, their employer, was a staunch business man, understanding every branch of the trade, and enjoying the confidence of the community. He was wealthy and influential, and his word was to all who knew him, as a legal bond. When Samuel and Henry were twenty-one, Mr. Merrill had made them a very advantageous offer. He would pay them a dollar a day for the next year; give them all further necessary instruction; and, at the expiration of that time, if they proved efficient, he would do still better by them.

"You have been my apprentices, boys," he said, "and while you remain steady and industrious I will give you employment in preference to all others who are no better than you are. I will always give preference to those who have learned the trade of me. And more than this, I may have some opportunities to let you do job work, where you may make as much as you can."

So the young men went at work, and for awhile they were both content. Five months thus passed away, and every Saturday night they received their six dollars each.

Some three miles below Mr. Merrill's shop, and on the same stream, there stood a building which had been originally put up for a cloth factory, but none of the machinery, except the water-wheel, and a few shafts, had ever been put in. A new company had bought the establishment, and were busy in putting in machinery. They were going to make a machine shop of it. One bright spring morning the good people saw flaming placards posted up at the street corners, and in the principal stores, announcing that Crafts, Cumfrey & Co. had opened a new machine shop, where "all kinds of work pertaining to their profession could be done cheaper, better, and with more despatch, than at any other place in the country."

A few days after this a man called at Samuel Peterson's boarding place, announcing himself as Mr. Crafts, of the firm of Crafts, Cumfrey & Co., and asked the young man to come and work for him, offering to pay him one dollar and a quarter per day. Samuel told him he would give him an answer the next day.

This was at noon; so in the afternoon, when he returned to the shop, he went into the counting-room and told Mr. Merrill of the offer.

"Well," said the old machinist, "I have no claim on your services after you have given me a week's notice, and I wish you to do in this as you think best. I cannot afford to pay you more than I now do; only I can assure you that you shall have some jobs to do this summer. You know the advantages you have here. You are sure of your pay; of a permanent place while I live; of as much improvement in the business as you have a mind to grasp; and of increased pay when you shall have become more proficient. Of this new company I know nothing, except that to you they are like 'a bird in the bush.' Yet I will venture one word of advice, for I know how apt young men, just commencing in life, are to be led away by dazzling offers. Before you make any change in your business be sure you are going to better yourself. If you are satisfied on this point, then go ahead."

Samuel Peterson bowed his head, and poked the floor with his feet a few moments, and when he looked up his face had thrown off every shade of doubt.

"I shall remain with you," he said, "for I know what will be my fortune here, and it is as much as I have any cause to hope for."

Mr. Merrill was much pleased with the youth's decision, and he plainly said so. Shortly after this, Henry Willis came in; and he also went to the counting-room. He remained there half an hour, and then came out and joined his companion.

"Sam," said he, with an air of importance, "I've had a new offer."

"So have I," returned Samuel.

"Crafts, Cumfrey, & Co., want me."

"So they want me."

"Ah? But they offer me a dollar and twenty-five cents a day."

"So they did me."

"And have you spoken to the old man about it?"

"Yes."

"And did he come to terms?"

"What do you mean?"

"Why—did he offer to pay you the extra quarter?"

"No."

"Then we'll both work together. The old man won't budge an inch. I offered to stay, if he'd pay me as much as Crafts offered, but he wouldn't do it; so I just told him I should leave. What did you tell him?"

"Why—I'll tell ye, Henry: I have concluded to stay where I am."

"What? Not stay here and work for a dollar a day when you can have a dollar and a quarter there?"

"But that aint the thing, Henry. If that place was equal in every other respect with this—or if it was even an old and stable establishment, and I could be assured of permanent work there, the case might be different. But what inducement is there now? We know nothing of these men—whether they are responsible or not, or whether they are even honest. They offer us a dollar and a quarter a day now, and we may stay with them six years and get no more. But we know that when we are worth it, we shall receive more than that from Mr. Merrill. I have thought just enough of this to feel assured that I shall be best off here."

"But I aint a going to work here for twenty-five cents less a day than I can have elsewhere, Sam—not by a long shot. What's the use?"

"Well, Henry, I wont advise you, for you are as old as I am; but yet I think you'll take a foolish step if you leave your old place. Here we have the advantage of extending our knowledge of our business, which we could not have in any other place; and we also know just what to depend upon. We have here a plain, straight business path opened to us, and we know we shall do well in it if our health is spared; and we know, too, that we are receiving all our labor is actually worth. I mean in two months, to be able to make and fit and finish a vault door, with locks and all; and in a year I hope to be able to build a steam-engine. No, Henry—I wont leave this place for any such situation as the one we are speaking of."

"Well, Sam—you can do as you please, but I shall quit at the end of the week, and go at work for the new concern. I can't afford to lose this offer. Let's see—twenty-five cents a day. Now between this and next new years there'll be—let's see; three—four—eight months; and that'll be—thirteen and nine—twenty-two weeks. That'll be one hundred and thirty-two days—just thirty-three dollars. Now if we should—you know, Sam, what we've been talking about?"

"Yes—I know."

"Well, if we conclude to be married next new year, those thirty-three dollars will be worth something, eh?"

"Why, yes; but then I look beyond that. If I had no more of life to look for than up to next January, I might run the risk of some change, but as it is, I think I'm better off as I am. At all events, I am contented here, and so were you till this new offer came up. We both felt we were receiving all that we ought to receive, and our ambition was, to merit more. If we remain here we shall surely gain all we deserve, and what we do deserve we shall surely receive."

"O, that all sounds very well, but I say—take the best you can get."

"So do I," returned Samuel; and here the conversation ended.

Several times during the week young Willis approached his companion on the subject, trying to get him to go and work for the new firm, but without effect.

"I see," said Peterson, at the last conversation, "you are getting a spice of excitement into your system. You will one of these days love change for the mere sake of change. You'll be like Tom Packard—one of the best fellows living, but see how he manages. He loves change—change has become necessary to him. Let him have the best business in the world, and he'd leave it for the first new thing that might turn up. Last year he was making money in the express business. He owned four good horses clear, and was doing well. But as soon as Bascom went to him and opened his plan for that new bowling-alley, Tom went right into it. He wanted something new, and he had it; and now, after losing all he had of money, he's gone to peddling. Next he'll be driving a coach, and he always contrives to leave a good business as soon as something else is offered."

However, the week came round, and Henry Willis left his old employer and went at work for Crafts, Cumfrey, & Co., and Mr. Merrill put a new hand in his place, advancing one of the elder apprentices, and taking a new one. Samuel Peterson worked on with renewed energy. He had determined to merit the confidence of his employer, and prove himself worthy of the advancement he aimed at. He often met Henry, and the latter never failed to congratulate himself on the excellent place he had obtained. Samuel was glad to hear it.

Some time in August—near the first of the month—Mr. Merrill called Peterson to his room.

"Samuel," said he, "I have received an offer to put an iron vault, with double doors, into the Merchants' Bank—the inner door to be triple plated, with the middle plate of cast steel. Here is a minute draft of what they want, so far as form and size is concerned. You may take this, and go up and look at the place where the vault is to be placed; and then you can let me know if you feel competent to do it."

The youth thanked his employer, and, then, with a strangely fluttering heart, he took the plan and withdrew. He looked it over, and then went up to the bank, where he received all the information he desired; and that evening he informed Mr. Merrill that he could do it.

"Very well," returned the master. "And now you shall have my proposition. I am to receive twelve hundred dollars for the safety vault.

About three hundred of that must go for the locks, and some for other matters beside stock. I will give you two hundred and twenty dollars to make it, and you may take such help as you need by paying them the same as I am paying them. For instance: If you use Jones, I shall deduct two dollars for every day you use him—and for Smith I should deduct only a dollar. You understand. But you will say nothing of this to the hands."

Some further conversation was held on the subject, and then Samuel was ready for his job. On the following morning he went at it. He kept Smith at work with him nearly all the time, and most of the time he had others to help him. He made all his own plans and draughts, and every bit of the head-work, and in every case the work fitted to a hair. The door was a splendid specimen of workmanship—in fact, both of them were. The outer door, which was of polished iron, was made with stiles, rails and panels, and when it was done not a seam or mark could be detected where the joints were, nor could the heads of the bolts be seen. It was placed in the counting-room on exhibition while the rest of the vault was under way.

At length the work was completed, and the vault set up. Samuel superintended the masons while they set it, and not until it was ready to put the papers into did he give up the keys. He sat down with Mr. Merrill after the work was done, and reckoned up the result of his job. He had worked on the vault forty-seven days. He had had Smith to help him forty-two days, at one dollar per day; Gurney, twenty days, at one dollar and twenty-five cents per day, and Jones, eight days, at two dollars per day. Then there were five dollars to pay for trucking. This added up amounted to eighty-eight dollars, leaving a balance in his favor of one hundred and thirty-two dollars.

"Well, Samuel, you've made a pretty good speculation," said Mr. Merrill, after this result had been arrived at.

"And—a—how much am I to receive?" asked the youth, tremulously.

"Why, here it is, in black and white. I offered you two hundred and twenty dollars to do the job, and you've done it. You've made a hundred and thirty-two dollars—about two dollars and five-sixths per day. But you are not the only one who has done this. Jones has had several jobs of the kind, and Gurney has had three. The idea is simply here: In mechanics, as in the more intellectual professions, the labor of a capable mind is worth more than the mere labor of physical organs, for one mind may find work for a hundred hands, while without that mind they would be idle. Now perhaps you do not estimate your own abilities high enough. There are ten men in my employ who have had all the advantages that you have had, but somehow they never had a faculty of learning anything but the mere mechanical part. There are men here who have been in my shop fourteen years, and have been faithful and industrious, and yet they could not have made that vault door. With some one else to draw the plans, and give them the dimensions of each particular part, they could have performed the mere work. So you see that in this job you have only received a fair pay for your services, for you have done the work of one good artisan besides doing all the headwork. Henry Willis might have done the same had he remained here, for he possessed an excellent mechanical judgment and taste."

"I cannot express all my gratitude, sir," uttered Samuel, with a brilliant eye.

"O," returned the employer, with a smile, "I am as much benefited as you are, and whatever may be my desire for your good, I at the same time have a selfish inducement for these things, for this very ability on the part of my workmen is of incalculable benefit to me. Now by giving my faithful hands an opportunity to make something by such jobs, they are far more anxious to qualify themselves for the work; and when people know that I have a number of workmen, either one of whom is capable of taking an important work and carrying it through to completion, they will surely bring their best work here. So you see how much I gain by it. And now, if it will not shock your feelings too much, I will tell you something new: Mr. Archer, the president of the Farmer's Bank, spoke with me yesterday, and wished me to let the same man, who built the new vault for the Merchant's Bank, build one for him. Perhaps I might not deem it just to let you have another job so soon; but I shall give it to you and Gurney, and let you share the profits."

From that time Samuel Peterson was one of the best men in the shop. But he had only his dollar per day during the remainder of the year.

One afternoon, after winter had come, and the wind blew cold and cheerless, Henry Willis entered Mr. Merrill's counting-room, with a sad, downcast look. He wished to know if Mr. Merrill could give him employment.

"Have you left Crafts & Co.?" asked the old machinist.

"They have burst up, sir," the young man replied. "Mr. Cumfrey gave us notice that the company could do no more work."

"But you have not lost any of your wages?"

"Not much, sir," the youth answered, gazing down upon the floor. "Cumfrey settled up with us last night. He was owing me twenty-two dollars. He offered me twelve to settle, or I might wait and get my pay with the outside creditors; so I took the twelve dollars and gave him a receipt."

"I am sorry you have lost your place, but I have no room for another workman now. My shop is full. Only let me advise you to secure a good place as soon as possible; and when you once find it hang on to it as long as you can."

The first of January came and Henry had obtained a situation in a blacksmith's shop, at one dollar per day; but the fond hope he had cherished could not be realized. Samuel Peterson on that day became a happy husband. He had explained the whole plan to his employer, and on hearing it, Mr. Merrill advised him to follow it out.

In the spring Henry Willis had an offer to go into a new place, and he took up with it. Near the same time Samuel Peterson had his wages raised to one dollar and fifty cents per day, and the extra pay was the more grateful because Mr. Merrill assured him he was truly worth the price.

And since that time several years have passed away. Samuel Peterson is still with Mr. Merrill, receiving twenty-two cents per hour for his usual labor, and having many jobs on which he often cleared his five dollars per day. He owns a snug little cottage, and he calculates to lay up three hundred dollars per year. He has a wife who helps him well in all his laudable undertakings.

In the meantime, Henry Willis has been tossing about the country—now with work, and now without—always continuing to earn money enough to pay his rent and keep his family in food and clothing. And this propensity for change has become a habit which must cling to him through life. After he has worked a month in one place he becomes uneasy and restless, and the first man who comes along and proposes something new is sure to be listened to.

Now does not the reader call to mind just such cases? They are plenty in our country, and many of the human wrecks which we meet along the rough shore of business have become stranded upon this very shoal. Let our youth steer their life-barks clear of it. Beware of allowing the spirit of discontent to find its way into your bosoms. It is a very homely saying, but yet one of useful application, and may be heeded with profit by those who are commencing business life: "Let well enough alone."

THE UNLOVED.

BY MRS. S. E. DAWES.

I wander round my splendid home,
A sad and sorrowing child,
And oft I wish that I could roam,
To some lone desert wild.
For no one speaks a kindly word
To one they call so plain;
And not a pitying sigh is heard,
When I am racked by pain.

My mother strokes the golden hair
Of my darling sister oft,
And tells her she is very fair,
In tones so sweet and soft.
O, how I long to be caressed,
And told, though plain my face,
That deep within her yearning heart,
I find a cherished place.

They say I'm cross, a stupid child,
A peevish, fretful thing;
They ne'er can know the anguish wild,
Such words as these can bring.
O, why did God my sister give
A face and form so fair?
O, would that I in heaven could live,
For all is beauty there.

An angel whispered soft and low,
Sweet words within her ear,
That made her little face to glow,
And filled her heart with cheer.
"Thou shalt not droop mid human flowers,
Bereft of hope and love;
But fairest in the heavenly bowers,
Shalt blossom sweet above."

MADELINE:

—OR,—

THE LOST DAUGHTER.

BY MRS. MARY MAYNARD.

"Mr dear Frank, that horse will be the death of you yet," said Augustus Eaton to his cousin, the Hon. Francis Carrington, as they met in the Park one fine spring morning; the latter mounted on a magnificent black horse, whose vicious antics almost precluded the idea of his master's conversing with his friends.

"As well die one way as another, Eaton; and if it was not for 'Malice' here, I should have fallen a victim to the blues long ago. The excitement of a dangerous ride is all that has kept me alive this winter."

"Rather a strange confession for you to make," said the first speaker, with a scornful curl of his lip.

"Come, old fellow, you must not be so impatient," exclaimed Carrington to his restive steed; then having conquered the momentary fit of obstinacy, he again came up beside his cousin, and continued: "Why strange, Gus? Is there anything wonderful in a fellow's being wearied to death who has no one to please, no one to think about, no one to admire, abuse, love, caress or tease but himself? Isn't that a fate to be pitied?"

"Yes, very much to be pitied—especially when said 'fellow' is possessed of a princely income, is perfectly uncontrolled, and has been the cause of more 'heart aches' than any other man of his years. You have my pity, most certainly, dear Frank."

Had the speaker said "you have my hatred," it would have accorded better with the expression at that instant flashing from his eyes; but without noticing his looks, the other rejoined:

"You may think I am joking, but to me it is a serious reality. I tell you I am dying for want of something to do—becoming dyspeptic and splenetic—cross, misanthropic, old and ugly,—and all for the want of some reasonable employment. I have danced, and laughed, and chatted away the winter, and now I am going down into B—shire, to get through the summer; of course without any certain aim or end, but trusting to destiny, chance, good luck, or fortune, to give me something to think about, or something to do, which amounts to the same thing with me. And by the way, Gus, I have not thanked you for providing me with such a very superior attendant in the person of Monsieur Louis. He is a perfect treasure of his kind, and I feel duly grateful, although I did hope to have had a little trouble in supplying Pierre's place, just for the sake of the excitement, you know." And with a light-hearted laugh, the handsome young horseman gave the impatient Malice the rein, and in a few seconds horse and rider were out of sight.

"Yes, it will not be my fault if you do not find Louis a 'superior attendant,'" muttered young Eaton, as he cast a glance after the retreating figure of his cousin, in which there was a fearful mingling of bad passions. "My plans must go wonderfully astray if Frank Carrington stands in my path many months longer. To come to me with his affectation and his nonsense about nothing to do! I wonder when the Carrington estates are mine—and mine they shall be—if I shall not find plenty of employment?" And with a low, sneering laugh, the speaker pursued his way.

"And so you leave town to-morrow, Francis?" said Lady Winterton to young Carrington, three days after the above conversation.

Lady Winterton had been a dear and intimate friend of the young man's mother, and he was much attached to her society, and, in spite of his careless habits, rarely failed to pay her punctual visits. Lady Winterton was a widow and childless; people said she had never recovered the shock of her husband's sudden death; certain it is, that, though a most agreeable, pleasant person, and a favorite with all young people, there was a sorrowful expression in Lady Winterton's deep blue eyes, that to discriminating people spoke of some hidden grief—something not so openly mourned as the death of her husband had been.

We will not say at present what this sadness was occasioned by; it is sufficient to state that Lady Winterton was thirty-one years of age, very wealthy, and delicately beautiful, having been "the belle, the toast, and the fashion" for two seasons before her marriage. Of that marriage much gossip had been made, many people affirming that the parties had been previously united, but on account of the lady's extreme youth and dependence on the will of a guardian, and the gentleman's poverty, they had been unable to announce it publicly. No one knew the facts, and when the youthful captain became Lord Winterton, and presumptive heir to a marquise, and the lady, having completed her eighteenth year, took possession of her fortune, and the two were united with all customary pomp and splendor, there was not much to gratify the peculiar taste of the gossiping portion of the community.

The young couple lived happily together for a year, at the end of which time Lord Winterton died very suddenly of an affection of the heart. His widow, yet in her teens, mourned him deeply, refused all other offers, and at thirty-one was still beautiful and beloved by a very extensive circle of friends and relatives. But we have too long neglected the conversation commenced with this chapter.

"I am going down to Wilmington to try and kill time, if such a thing is possible for me to accomplish," was Carrington's reply.

"My dear Francis, I am grieved to hear you make use of such an expression. Surely, with your fortune and talents, time can be both pleasantly and profitably employed."

"I try to pass it pleasantly," was the young man's rejoinder, "but after a season, every amusement palls. My position precludes the idea of useful employment, in the common acceptance of that term; and if it did not, I should be sorry to occupy any place that would perhaps be filled by one who really needed it. No, there is nothing for me to do but to submit to destiny, and make the best of my aimless existence."

"Why aimless, Francis? Are there not high places in the councils of our land always awaiting the efforts of those—"

"Forgive me for interrupting you, dear lady, but believe me—I am not intended for a politician. No, only one resource is left to me—I must marry in a year or two; and in the meantime I will look out for some one that comes up to my idea of what my wife ought to be. I wish you had a daughter, Lady Winterton; I have an idea that she would have been quite different from the young ladies of the present day."

A painful look passed over the countenance of the lady; but with no visible change, save an increased paleness, she replied:

"I would I had, if only for your sake, Francis. But there are scores of fair maidens, who would rejoice to receive attentions from so very desirable a partner; and I must say, if you have no employment for your time, it is in a great measure your own fault."

"Now you are laughing at me, and I cannot stand that. I would rather be as I am, than the slave of a capricious tyrant, like my brother's wife, magnificently beautiful as she is. My mind is almost made up; I will go down into the country and woo some rustic damsel, who, if she is not as accomplished as my fair sister-in-law, will at least have a heart. One empress in the family is enough. Herbert married rank, wealth and beauty—I shall marry for love."

"And have beauty and station no charms for you?" asked the lady, with a smile.

"Possessing ample wealth, I can afford to marry a poor girl if I please. As she must possess a great many good qualities, she will doubtless be beautiful in my eyes; and rank is immaterial, as no one will presume to question my right to please myself."

"Very fine speaking, my dear Francis; but I fear you will find few to join you in your independent ideas—not but what I think you are right. I could tell you a sad story arising from the prevailing opposition to what are called unequal marriages."

"Tell it to me, by all means, dear Lady Winterton."

"Not now; I do not feel equal to the task; but I will some day inform you of particulars relating to my early days—those mysterious events, that some years ago caused so much to be said relative to myself and husband."

We will not accompany Francis Carrington on his journey; it is sufficient to state that he arrived at his fine old mansion at Wilmington without accident or adventure; that, thanks to the excellent management of a most estimable steward, he found his affairs in the nicest order, not even a shadow of excuse for busying himself could be found; and with the exception of a few visits among the neighboring families, he was totally dependent on Malice for amusement.

Day after day he galloped over the surrounding country, and having formed an acquaintance with a gentleman farmer, who appeared to derive great satisfaction from his hobby, he actually had some thoughts of turning his attention to agricultural pursuits, when he met with an adventure that changed all his plans, and forever put an end to his complaining of having "nothing to do."

Very trifling causes sometimes lead to great events.

Francis Carrington was destined to prove the truth of this assertion. Augustus Eaton had foretold his death through the agency of his favorite steed; his life was preserved, certainly, but it was undoubtedly true that Malice was the occasion of his losing his heart. Riding one morning at his usual headlong pace, with less caution than the temper of his steed demanded, young Carrington was suddenly brought to his senses by the startled shyness of his horse, and ere he could recover his control, the animal was rendered furious by a blow from some object, thrown by an unseen hand. Tearing madly along the hedge-sheltered road on which they were passing, he soon freed himself from restraint, and his master with the greatest difficulty kept his seat, owing to the mad plunges and starts of the terrified brute.

It was a fearful ride, but soon over. The sudden appearance of a female in the road caused the animal to turn. One violent leap, a dash through the green hedge, and Malice was half way across a field, and his master lay stunned and bleeding on the stones and sand of a rough by-road.

When Francis Carrington came to his senses, he found himself still on the spot where he had fallen. His head was aching fearfully; he was quite unable to move; but he felt that he was not alone. A hand was pressing some cold application to his throbbing temples, and a soft voice whispered, "Don't attempt to move until help comes." And in a few moments help did come, and he was carefully lifted from the earth, and borne to a little cottage not far distant, and then once more all was dark, and he was again insensible.

"I think I had better cut off all these curls at once; his head is fearfully injured," were the first words the young man distinguished, as once more returning reason enabled him to comprehend his situation. The voice was strange, and he felt the touch of a heavy hand.

"O, I would not cut them off yet, doctor. He may not be so badly hurt as we fear, and it is a pity to destroy his beautiful hair."

"Well, just as you say, little girl; but I am afraid it will be a long time before he will care much about his looks." And there was a very disheartening tone in the physician's voice.

"But he may have a mother, or sister, or some friend who would be sorry; and as I have been the cause of all this, help me, dear doctor, to get him well again."

The sound of a stifled sob touched the sick man's feelings. He felt unable to speak—or as if he had forgotten how; but he held out his hand and clasped the little trembling fingers so timidly laid in it.

As the physician had foretold, young Carrington's injuries proved very severe. For several weeks he raved in the wildest paroxysms of brain fever, unconscious of the attendance of his new friends, or the presence of those whom he loved.

Augustus Eaton had been one of the first to hasten to the presence of the invalid, and it will throw some light on his proceedings to give here a short extract from the letter sent to him by Carrington's valet, five days after the accident. After detailing the circumstances, he went on: "I have watched every day for such a chance; but you must know it was not easy to accomplish. Fortune, however, favored me this time; the horse threw him with great violence, and though not dead, I think there is every probability that he will die. Should he do so, remember I expect my reward just the same as if he had been instantly killed. If he gets better, and all danger is passing, I would not mind risking the last alternative; but in that case you must promise to double the sum. I shall then be able to leave this detestable country and return to my beloved Italy, and you will be in the possession of an immense fortune, out of which my few thousands will scarcely be missed. If it was not for the circumstances, I should feel something almost like pity for your victim. The old steward's distress is quite pathetic at times; but don't fear me; I am true as steel where money is concerned, and as long as you keep to the bargain I will fulfil my part of it."

Such was the precious epistle that induced Augustus Eaton to journey with all speed down to B——shire, to watch in person the progress of his schemes. Other friends and relatives came, but he alone remained, and many were the comments on his conduct, opposed as it was to his well-known dislike of his cousin.

The owner of the cottage—a widow in humble circumstances—was somewhat at a loss how to entertain her aristocratic guests; but assisted by her niece—the young person we have slightly alluded to—she succeeded in making the invalid very comfortable and in furnishing young Eaton with passable accommodations. Mrs. Myers, herself, took but little thought after a time, so well was all attended to; and even Augustus Eaton, deeply immersed as he was in wicked plots, could not forbear bestowing an admiring glance on the beautiful cottage girl, who passed so gracefully through the small rooms, and looked so different from all his preconceived ideas of rustic damsels. But Lina bestowed no thought on him. The sufferer in the sick room occupied all her thoughts, engrossed all her sympathies, and his fate was the one idea that held place in her mind.

"I don't like that dark, evil-looking man, doctor. I know he has no love for his master, and I feel afraid every time he is left alone with him."

"Just my own thoughts, little girl. There is something bad in his countenance, and I intend to watch him. He wants to act nurse to-night; but if he means harm, he will be disappointed. I have taken a fancy to my handsome patient, and if they are meditating evil it will come home to themselves."

That night, through the old doctor's intervention, Francis Carrington was saved from the murderous contrivances of his foes, and foiled and detected in his plans, Augustus Eaton returned to London, and took with him his wretched confederate.

Under the care of his faithful physician and unwearied attendants, young Carrington gradually recovered. For two weeks he had not seen Lina, but on making his appearance in the cottage parlor, the fair young girl greeted him with smiles and tears, and after congratulating him on his recovery, spoke with deep sorrow of her unintentional share in his misfortune. In convincing her of the folly of distressing herself about so purely an accidental occurrence, young Carrington declared that "since it had made him acquainted with her, he felt overjoyed that it had happened, and considered the suffering as a mere trifle in comparison with the reward," and many other speeches of the same nature, very flattering, very complimentary, just such speeches as he had all his life been making to young ladies (for our hero was not perfection, although very much better than many of his class); but happening to raise his eyes to his listener's face, he there beheld a look never to be forgotten—a look in which surprise, disappointment and pain were plainly expressed.

From that hour, Francis Carrington never dared to whisper a falsehood in the ear of the simple country girl, who, all unused to compliments and flattery, could yet distinguish the false from the true with unerring certainty. But in that cottage, and in the person of that humble maiden, the young aristocrat found what he and thousands like him have in vain looked for in their own circles, and amid the wealthy and high born daughters of fashion. He found a beautiful and innocent girl, light-hearted and amiable, of tender, loving disposition, totally free from worldly cares, and yet possessed of womanly pride and reserve sufficient to render her an object of respect to the most hardened in iniquity.

But our hero was far from deserving such a character. Faultless he was not, but that good heart of his beat responsive to the voice of nature, and his sensitive mind keenly appreciated and enjoyed all that was lovely and worthy of admiration. It would have caused some of his young lady friends to shed tears of envy could they have beheld the object of so many wasted arts, so many ambitious hopes and fruitless plans, gazing with such evident admiration on a "little rustic" gathering roses in a very small garden with a white-washed picket fence; said "rustic" being attired in a very plain muslin dress, a well-worn gipsy hat, badly-made shoes and no gloves.

Our hero had felt himself an object of intense attraction to numberless patrician beauties; he had looked indifferently on the fairest members of the aristocracy, robed in satin, sparkling with gems, and displaying a thousand graces and accomplishments; and yet it was reserved for Lina, the beautiful cottage girl, to teach him that he had a heart. And Francis Carrington knew he loved her, knew that his happiness depended on her love in return; he banished all considerations of rank or fortune, asked her to be his wife, and was refused!

"I have said all I could for you, sir; but Lina is very firm when she once makes up her mind."

"But, Mrs. Myers, your niece has given me no reason for so positive a denial. I do not pretend to say that I am worthy of one as pure and good as she is, but surely my love demands some slight return—at least the cause of her determined refusal."

"It is not that she thinks you are not good enough, I only fear my poor child has too high an opinion of you ; but she will not run the risk of some day feeling that you repent having married an ignorant, nameless girl ; one that you would feel ashamed to present to your great relations as your wife. And now since you want to know all the dear child's reasons, I must tell you that she is no connexion of mine, that I do not even know any other name for her than Madeline ; and for aught I can say to the contrary, she may be the child of respectable parents, or she may be descended from very wicked ones. A miserable, starving creature brought her to me while she was yet an infant. The woman died without telling us more than her first name, and my husband and I took the little helpless child to be our own. For fourteen years she has shared my humble home, and while I live she shall never want. You have made her a very generous offer, but I think, brought up as she has been, that her chances of happiness are greater if she remains in a humble station. She has no ambition to live in splendor, and were you a poor man, I think your suit would have been more successful."

Most fervently did Francis Carrington wish he was a "poor man," but being unfortunately doomed to the penalty of wealth, and unable to make the least change in the determination of the fair object of his love, he left the scene of so much pain and pleasure, and by easy stages journeyed to the summer residence of his friend, Lady Winterton.

It was not until he had spent several days at her house that he could summon courage to tell her all the changes and chances that had befallen him since their last meeting. But Lady Winterton was very discreet. She treated his story with all due seriousness, and asked many questions, thus evincing a very flattering interest in the little romance. But little did she dream, while affecting to feel an interest she did not in reality experience, that one simple word would render her almost wild with emotion, and fill her mind with a thousand conflicting hopes and fears, until the state of the disappointed lover was bliss compared with her own.

"You have not told me the name of this divinity, this wood-nymph, this fairy queen of yours."

"Madeline." The speaker was not pleased at the manner in which the question was asked, and answered rather shortly.

"Madeline!"

The young man started at the sudden clasp of those delicate hands on his arm, and the death-like hue of the eager countenance.

"For Heaven's sake! tell me what is the matter, Lady Winterton? What have I said, what have I done to affect you so?"

"That name! that name! O, tell me who she is!"

"Pray be calm; it is no one you can possibly have any connection with. A miserable, neglected babe, she was brought by a beggar to her present home. The woman said she was not her child, but refused to give any further information, save that her name was Madeline. But help! help! the lady has fainted!" And with tender care the young man raised the prostrate form from the ground, and assisted in the endeavors to restore her to life.

Slowly the heavy eyes unclosed, gazing from one face to another with bewildered and unmeaning looks; but as some sudden thought flashes across her mind, with a loud scream she springs to her feet, exclaiming, "My child! my Madeline! O, bring her to me!" and again she lies insensible on the floor.

In the beautiful drawing-room of Winterton House, seated on a luxurious couch, were two ladies, one lovely autumn evening; nearly two months after the time we last mentioned. There was very little apparent difference in their ages, so fresh, and young, and joyous was the appearance of the elder of the two; while the languid attitude, and slight shade of care on the brow of the younger made her look older than she was. Both were extremely beautiful, though unlike; the fair golden tresses and deep blue eyes of the mother (for such in reality was the relationship between them), bearing little resemblance to the brown curls and clear, hazel eyes of her child. Both were gazing on the portrait of a handsome young man, in full regimentals; and it needed but a glance to see how strong was the likeness between the picture and the youngest of the ladies.

The occupants of the room were Lady Winterton and her long lost child; the picture, the likeness of the husband and father, hitherto unknown to one, and long mourned by the other. To explain the appearance of this daughter, we must go back some sixteen years in Lady Winterton's life, when, with the thoughtless impetuosity of youth, she had contracted a secret marriage with the then penniless young officer.

Dependent on a miserly and obstinate guardian, her husband suddenly called away with his regiment to a foreign station, the poor girl found herself most unpleasantly situated, and afraid to acknowledge her imprudence. Without a friend to advise or assist her in her difficulties, she was forced to make a confidant of her maid, and with her contrivance, effectually eluded the vigilance of her guardian. Commending her innocent babe to the care of this woman, the young lady was forced to play her part with the most consummate skill; but her punishment was not long in coming.

The confidant, after corresponding with her mistress for three or four months, and contriving that she should once see the child, suddenly disappeared; and the secret inquiries set on foot by the mother, elicited the facts that she had been deceived. The woman was of bad character, artful, abandoned, and connected with a gang of thieves and strolling players.

When her husband returned, and they were re-married, every exertion was made to recover the lost one; but disappointment was their only reward, and Lord Winterton lived but one short year to mourn the loss of the child he had never seen. The facts were kept secret; but the mother never forgave herself for sacrificing her babe to save herself; and not until the little Madeline was restored to her in the person of young Carrington's "cottage lass," did Lady Winterton realize the meaning of a "mind at peace with itself."

It was touching to behold her joy—quiet, but heart-felt happiness—that manifested itself in a thousand trifling circumstances; that caused her to hover round the couch of her sleeping child, when all was silent and dark, to make sure that her treasure was safe; that prompted her to keep the young girl ever in her sight, and at times to catch her in her arms with a smothered cry of delight, as if fearful that again she had lost her.

Francis Carrington had left England immediately after making it quite certain that his Lina was the daughter of his old friend. Just before his departure he had called on them, and his last words to Lady Winterton were, "I leave her to you for a short time; but remember that I found her first, and some day I mean to make good my claim."

It was useless to blind herself to the fact that, loving and tender as the child was, delightful as the change in her circumstances had been, there was yet something wanting to complete her happiness, to remove the slight shade of sorrow on her fair brow. But the impatient lover returned. There were no scruples now to overcome, as to inequality of birth or fortune; and when Lady Winterton beheld her beautiful child, with smiles and happy blushes, bestow her hand on the son of her once dearly loved friend, she banished a momentary fit of jealousy, and in her daughter's happiness found her own.

Francis Carrington was never afterwards heard to complain that his life was aimless. True, he did not become a member of Parliament, or mix in public life, but in accordance with his wife's wishes, spent the greater part of his time at their several country residences, and that time was not only passed happily but usefully.

Augustus Eaton, after quarrelling with the villain Louis, was by threats of exposure compelled to pay him a sum of money that ruined him, and in poverty and obscurity he spends his miserable existence in some unknown part of the metropolis. He has not come into possession of the "Carrington estates," and from the blooming, beautiful children who surround our old friend Carrington and his lovely wife, we think it unlikely that he ever will.

SOME NOSE.

Deacon C—, of Hartford, Conn., is well known as being provided with an enormous handle to his countenance, in the shape of a huge nose; in fact, it is remarkable for its great length. On a late occasion, when taking up a collection in the church to which he belonged, as he passed through the congregation every person to whom he presented the box seemed to be possessed by a sudden and uncontrollable desire to laugh. The deacon did not know what to make of it. He had often passed it round before, but no such effects had he witnessed. The deacon was fairly puzzled. The secret, however, leaked out. He had been afflicted a day or two with a sore on his nasal appendage, and had placed a small piece of sticking plaster over it. During the morning of the day in question, the plaster had dropped off, and the deacon seeing it, as he supposed, on the floor, picked it up and stuck it on again. But alas for men who sometimes make great mistakes, he picked up instead one of the pieces of paper which the manufacturers of spool cotton paste on the end of every spool, and which read, "Warranted to hold out 200 yards." Such a sign on such a nose was enough to upset the gravity of any congregation.—Hartford (Ct.) Courant.

ADVERTISING OBITUARY.

Died, 11th inst., at his shop, No. 20 Greenwich Street, Mr. Edward Jones, much respected by all who knew and dealt with him. As a man he was amiable; as a hatter, upright and moderate. His virtues were beyond all price, and his beaver hats were only three dollars each. He has left a widow to deplore his loss, and a large stock to be sold cheap for the benefit of his family. He was snatched to the other world in the prime of life, just as he had concluded an extensive purchase of felt, which he got so cheap that the widow can supply hats at a more reasonable rate than any house in the city. His disconsolate family will carry on business with punctuality.—English paper.

In private, we must watch our thoughts; in the family, our tempers; in company, our tongues.

WHAT, NOT BELIEVE ME?

BY A. BALDWIN.

What, not believe me?—Is the spell then broken?
 The charm of being in thy heart enshrined?
 Have faithless words from lips of mine been spoken,
 To change the hopes that long have round me twined?
 What, not believe me? O, the bitter anguish,
 That must forever haunt my burdened heart;
 Beneath that doubt love's fervent passions languish,
 And blissful hopes and dreams of thee depart.

What, not believe me? O, why thus upbraid me,
 However gently, with this slight disguise?
 In error's path e'en love hath not betrayed me,
 Nor would the mists of passion dim mine eyes;
 I feel I've sought thee with a vain endeavor,
 A wish to prove thee—a "forever thine;"
 But scattering falsehoods by the way shall never
 Be a device to consecrate thee mine.

I would be thine—though every phase of error
 Should spread a hindrance in my path to thee;
 Through every form and name of earthly terror,
 My steadfast purpose still is thine to be;
 Thy trustful heart is all the star to guide me,
 To lift my feelings to that home above;
 And though the world may tauntingly deride me,
 My refuge shall be in thy cheering love.

What, not believe me? Sure thy gentle spirit
 Hath to some mystic witchery lent thine ear,
 Or some false echo has been wandering near it,
 To lead thy feelings and thy thoughts from here—
 Here, in this temple, where a true devotion
 For virtues such as ever round thee shine;
 No fitful passion—no mere wild emotion,
 Could blend a doubt with worship such as mine.

AUNT MARY'S STORY.

BY MARIE L'ESTRANGE.

"Who would have thought it?" said our Isabel, flinging her sun-bonnet into a chair; "who would have thought that Fanny Dean was such a hypocrite? Only think, aunty, of all her professions of attachment to me, and how many, many times she has said that she loved me next best to her own sisters, and now, O dear, dear!"

Here Isabel's sobs fairly checked her utterance. We all gathered around, anxious to hear the secret of her present grief. Little Jamie put up his lips to kiss off her tears, and Mary threw her arms about her neck; but still the great drops kept falling thicker and faster, and the deep sobs caused her breast to heave as if her heart were struggling to get out of its prison.

"Do tell us, Isa, tell us all about it," pleaded little Mary. "Fanny Dean is a naughty, wicked girl to make you cry so. I'll never speak to her when she comes here, and I hope she'll never come again."

Isabel scarcely heeded her sister's sympathy, so completely was she absorbed in some overwhelming sorrow. In the course of an hour, however, her tears having somewhat subsided, she told us, between her sobs, that Jane Atwood told her, that Maria Snow said, that Sarah Brooks said, that Fanny Dean said to some one that Isabel Brown was the most disagreeable girl she ever became acquainted with; that she was never, in all her life, so disappointed in an individual; that Isabel was very proud and conceited, and very selfish, always talking to the disparagement of her friends when away from them, and manifesting a deal of attachment for them when in their presence; and was, in short, the most artful, designing person she ever knew.

"And now, aunty," said Isabel, after she had finished the recital, and given vent to a fresh burst of tears, "I don't see how I can ever love Fanny any more, or treat her with civility even; we have been so intimate for two or three years, and I have thought her so amiable and true, and such a good friend of mine!"

"Take this seat by me, Isabel," said my aunt Mary, kindly, "and dry thy tears, and I will tell thee a little story of my early life."

My aunt Mary was a member of the society of Friends, one of the kindest, gentlest creatures that ever lived, and, withal, so well versed in the windings of the human heart, so quick to comprehend difficulties, so ready to sympathize with the troubles of us children, and so judicious in counsel, that she came to be considered as a sort of family oracle. We hardly knew whether we loved her or our mother better. She was not our own aunt, either, nor indeed any relation to us; we only called her aunt. She was an early playmate and schoolmate of my mother—was nurtured in prosperity, but suddenly bereft of parents and fortune. At my mother's earnest solicitation, she came to make it her home with us. Enough was left of her large fortune to keep her from dependence, and she always insisted upon paying her board, though by her care of us children, and her kindness in sickness, she earned it a dozen times over.

Isabel was only a baby when Aunt Mary came to live with us, and Aunt Mary had tended her and instructed her, until an affection had grown up between them very intimate and very pleasant to behold. Now, Isabel leaned her forehead upon Aunt Mary's shoulder, so as to hide her swollen eyes, and Aunt Mary laid aside her knitting-work, and began. The story, though addressed to Isabel, seemed meant for us all, for Aunt Mary's eyes were directed by turns to each member of the family group.

"I was only a little girl when I first knew Julia Evans, about as large as Mary, perhaps. Her parents were wealthy and highly respectable, and quite intimate at our house; and Julia and I, being much together, early formed for each other a strong attachment. We were, in tastes and dispositions, much alike, though totally different in person—she being very handsome, tall and well formed, while I was plain, and on account of ill health, quite small of my age. Her eyes were large and deep, and very black; and her curls were like thine, Isabel, only thicker, and perhaps a trifle darker, and clustering more closely about her regal forehead. Thou shouldst have seen her hand, so slender and delicate and white, never disfigured with rings, for her parents, like mine, belonged to the sect that did not believe in outward adorning. I hardly know how they came to permit her to wear her hair in ringlets, but it was obstinately inclined to curl, and Julia was quite determined to dress it so, and she was a great favorite with her parents, and so for once I suppose they let her have her own way. No matter.

"We grew up together, till we were both sixteen; we had the same teachers, pursued the same studies, were almost daily together, had all our secrets in common, formed the same acquaintances, and for a year or two dressed exactly alike. Nothing occurred to interrupt the harmony existing between us; we were more than sisters to each other. We were just sixteen, when doomed to separate. Business called Mr. Evans, her father, to a distant city, and thither he soon after removed his family.

"The night before they left our town, we took a last walk together. O, never shall I forget that moonlight stroll beneath the cedars! Eden never saw a lovelier night. Everything above and around us served to tranquillize our spirits; and though we were exceedingly sad at the thought of parting, and talked much of our anticipated loneliness, we were hopeful, and indulged largely in speculations and wild, romantic dreams of the future. We talked over the pleasure that would transpire during our long visits, for, notwithstanding the distance that would soon intervene between us, we promised ourselves to pass at least two months of every year in each other's society. Then we pledged to each other to write such long letters, and to write so frequently! and thought how funny it would seem for us, who never had half-a-dozen letters in our whole lives, to be getting one by every other post that came.

"How long we walked and talked, I cannot say—the time passed so swiftly and so pleasantly. Presently we came upon a clump of trees, whose roots, naked and bare in places, swelling up from the soil, had often served us for seats. There we sat down, alas!—though we little thought so then—for the last time!

"'And now,' said Julia, more thoughtfully and earnestly than I had ever before heard her speak, 'before we part to-night, let us pledge ourselves to be firm and faithful friends, till we die. Let me have one of thy sunny braids, Mary,' said she, opening a small penknife, unbinding my hair, and severing a lock of it.

"'And in return,' said I, 'I shall choose thy prettiest curl—here, this one upon thy forehead. Yet no, it will disfigure thee to lose that; let me have another—no matter which."

"But before I could seize her hand, the curl was severed and laid on my lap. I still have it, and some time will show it thee, Isabel; somewhat faded it is, but still beautiful, and I cannot tell you how dear to me! Never had my sweet Julia seemed so radiant as then. Through the trees a ray of soft moonlight struggled, till it rested upon her clustering hair, and as she raised her eyes to mine, floated over her face.

"'We have pledged ourselves by these locks of hair,' she said; 'let us keep them sacred till we die!'

"Then we kissed each other's lips. There was a short pause; Julia broke the silence. Putting her arm about my neck, and resting her fair hand just where thy forehead now is, Isabel, she spoke:

"'And now, Mary, I am going among strangers; I shall have no one to love, while thou hast many friends about thee. There is Sarah Drake and Ellen Saunders, and a dozen or two more; thou wilt not be lonely like me. Besides, I am to live in a great city, where are no retired walks, no green, waving meadows, no flowers, and thou knowest how much I love all these.'

"'Why, I never thought of that before,' said I. 'The city will be no place for thee, Julia; it will seem a prison. But yet thou wilt find friends enough—none to love thee as I do, but many whom thou wilt learn to love.'

"I thought how her beauty and grace would win for her admiration and homage and love, and then, for the first time, God forgive me, I felt a secret yet unacknowledged fear that she would some day love others better than me. Yet I did not cherish the thought; it only flitted through my brain.

"'I do not easily form attachments, Mary,' she replied, sadly. 'I am inclined, I fear, to distrust; or, rather, I shrink from society in general, and find my happiness in the society of a very few tried, constant friends. I shall have none such where I go.'

"I spoke cheerfully to her, and drawing her head to my bosom, kissed off the tears which glistened in her eyes. I was about to praise her beauty and tell her of the power it would give her, but suddenly checked myself, for both of us hated everything that seemed like flattery.

"The setting moon reminded us that it was becoming late. We renewed our pledge of fidelity, set the days when we would write each other, and walked slowly homeward. She was to spend the night with me.

"The morrow came and went, and with it Julia Evans, the sunshine of my heart. It was very lonely without her, and for a long time I found my chief happiness in writing to her, and receiving her sweet, simple, artless replies. Six months passed. At the end of that time she was to visit me, but in this we were disappointed, for she was seized with a fever, and consequently detained at home. My father's business prevented him from accompanying me to her, and I was too inexperienced to travel the distance alone. The time of our meeting was therefore postponed. Letters were, however, still very frequently exchanged, and our affection knew as yet no wane. Some day I will read thee some of her letters.

"At the end of a year I visited her, and the interview was truly delightful. Julia looked more delicate than formerly, for the air of the city did not agree with her, but she was not less beautiful. She had grown more affectionate than ever; our conversation was indeed the communion of soul, and I never loved her as when we parted then. In six months, she was to return the visit; but ere that time had elapsed, my father was summoned to England to take possession of an estate which he had very unexpectedly inherited. As my mother was an English woman, and had many relatives there, he resolved to take his family with him, thinking at that time to return in a few months. I wrote a long letter to Julia, telling her where her letters would find me, and earnestly begging her to be prompt in answering mine. Immediately upon our arrival in England, I wrote again. Two months passed, and still I heard nothing from my friend. Thinking her sick, or that my communication or her reply had failed to reach its destination, I wrote again and again, but still received no word of intelligence from Julia. Every possible reason was assigned for her silence, at least so it seemed to me, but when, after being detained a year in England, I heard no word from her or her parents, though I had several times written them both, I began to entertain a slight fear that she was estranged from me, or at least had found some one to take my place in her affections. It was a revival of the vague impression which occurred to me upon the night of our walk.

"When, therefore, my father decided to take a tour of Europe, and I wrote her again, with the hope that accident and not unfaithfulness on her part prevented my hearing from her, entreating her to write me at Paris, and still no reply reached me, I began to believe that my fears were true. About this time, a letter from a friend residing near my home assured me that Julia Evans was engaged to a gay, wealthy merchant of the city where she now lived, and would probably be married in a few months. I was then almost sure that new affections and interests had usurped the place formerly consecrated to me, though why she should love me less because she loved her future husband more, I could not see. Bitterly did I weep over the thought that she was so different from what I believed—that the heart I once thought so large and warm, and so true to me, should prove itself quite the reverse. Yet I could not fully believe that I had so mistaken her character, so I wrote once more, begging her to tell me if the report of her speedy marriage was true, telling her to direct to Vienna. Our tour was so slow that I thought there would be sufficient time for a letter to reach that city before us. In this I was, however, mistaken. We left Vienna before her reply, had she sent one, could have reached that city.

"We spent the ensuing winter at Florence, and arrived home the following spring, after an absence of two years and a half. We found our quiet village greatly changed. Numbers of those whom we knew best had emigrated to the far West; a railroad had found its way there, and manufacturing interests suddenly started had given a startling impulse to the business of the place. As if by magic new streets had been planned and built up, new buildings substituted for old ones, and so numerous and so various were the improvements, I hardly knew the place of my birth.

"As I said, few who knew us when we left, were there to greet our return. I had been home a little more than a month when a mutual friend of Julia Evans and myself called at my father's. I eagerly inquired for Julia.

"'Have you not seen her?' replied my friend; 'she was in town a week ago. But now I think of it, she made no mention of your arrival. Perhaps she had not heard of it.'

"Impossible!" exclaimed I. "Nearly all our friends had called on us; how could she have failed to hear it?"

"My astonishment was certainly great. That Julia Evans had been in the place without deigning to call upon me, awoke, I am sorry to say, not only my grief, but my pride and resentment. Indeed I could scarcely restrain, for a single moment, my feelings of indignation. My friend went on to comment in lively terms upon Julia's appearance—her brilliant beauty, and her pleasant, agreeable manners and so on, alluding to the common report of her expected marriage in terms which led me to think that she was about making at least a very wealthy alliance.

"When my visitor was gone, I rushed to my room, bolted the door, and wept as I never wept before nor since. It was my first serious disappointment. All along I had cherished the rather improbable hope that our letters had been miscarried or intercepted, and I had, O so many, many things to tell her! I felt almost certain that when I reached home, her silence would in some way be satisfactorily explained. Now all hope of this sort died within me. Julia, I was sure, had ceased to love me. I resolved to write her no more—never, if I could avoid it, to speak of her—and, so far as possible, to banish her from my thoughts.

"Nearly four months passed away, during which time I had come to think of Julia only as a proud, fickle being, whose friendship, even, I scarcely cared to retain. Alas, it seems strange that my own sincere affection could thus be turned into bitterness! yet so it was. I had a proud, unforgiving spirit; indeed, I mentally resolved never to forgive her, should she again seek my favor. I had then, or rather my father had, all the advantages of abundant wealth. He was generally beloved and universally respected, so that we were freely admitted into the best and highest circles of society, though my father was of a quiet disposition and made it a principle to avoid the gaieties of life. Tidings of our present position would, I could scarcely doubt, reach her, and if her character was what I now believed it to be, I thought it possible that she would apologize for the past, and once more seek to establish herself upon terms of intimacy in our family.

"Four months, as I said, passed away, and then I received a letter in the familiar hand of Julia Evans. I was somewhat surprised, but not softened. It contained many professions of regard, though it was rather reserved in tone, and ended by begging me to visit her, or, if that were not practicable, to write her a long letter.

It was a long time, a very long time, since she last heard from me. Why had I not written her since my arrival? Doubtless my large circle of friends engrossed my time; she was aware that society had new claims upon me, but could I not steal one little hour for her?

"I can hardly tell how conflicting were my emotions as I perused this letter. At first, I was disposed to consider it sincere, but further reflection convinced me that it was only a piece of diplomacy upon her part, designed to impose upon my good nature, for I then fancied myself possessing a very liberal, benevolent disposition. The offending sheet was ultimately thrown in the fire, and never answered. Soon another came. Long since I learned it by heart, not by any direct effort, but somehow it stamped itself upon my memory. It ran thus:

"MY DEAR MARY:—Can it be, that thou didst not receive my last letter? Or, in the engrossing demands of a large circle of new acquaintances, hast thou quite forgotten thy old friend and playmate? Being in poor health, I have looked the more anxiously for some word from thee. I long to hear some of the particulars of thy long journey, and much more, Mary, do I long to see thy face, and have a familiar chat about the days 'lang syne.' It is a long time since we last saw each other. Of all the visits planned, when we walked and talked beneath the cedars, only one has transpired. It is four, yes, almost five years since then—eventful years they have been to me, and doubtless to thee also. But I am still too weak to attempt more than a note. May I not hope to hear very soon from thee, if not in a long letter, at least in a note assuring me of thy health and happiness?

'As ever, thy affectionate JULIA.'

"'Strange!' thought I, folding the letter. 'No apology for past neglect—no reason assigned for visiting almost in sight of our dwelling and never calling! Humph! she must be truly anxious to see me!'

"The letter was laid aside. At first, I meditated a haughty, bitter reply; but mature reflection decided me that the matter would sooner end to leave it unanswered. Believing Julia actuated only by selfish motives in writing me and desiring to secure my favor, I felt only a scornful indignation towards her. I made no mention of her letters to any one, not even my parents. Two months more elapsed. During the time, her name had never passed my lips. She was the same to me as though I had never known her.

"One evening a letter from Mary Evans, Julia's mother, surprised me. It was short—containing only the startling intelligence that Julia was in a hopeless decline, a touching account of the progress of her disease, and an urgent invitation to visit them without delay, stating that Julia was very, very anxious to see me.

"This was a thunderbolt to me: I could not resist the appeal of her mother, and yet, at first, I dreaded the meeting. With some misgivings for my past indifference to my former friend, I made immediate preparations for my departure. Already I became aware that I had cherished towards Julia wicked, ungenerous feelings; and as I thought of her as a helpless invalid, soon to die, and recalled her former gentleness and devotion to me, I wept bitterly. Before morning, I had conquered all my late enmity towards her, or rather it had all vanished, and I felt prepared to throw myself upon Julia's neck and embrace her not less tenderly than as if nothing had interrupted our former confidence and affection.

"I found my friend in the last stages of consumption. The meeting with her I will not attempt to describe. She was calm through it all, and only wept when in an agony of grief I clasped her to my bosom, and with many tears and prayers and self-reproaches, besought her to forgive my cruel neglect of answering her letters.

"Had she been in the past my worst enemy, I could hardly have helped loving her, as from day to day I witnessed her uniform sweetness and patience, her confidence in Heaven, and listened to her glowing conversation. How one so beautiful and so young could become so weaned from earth, I could not divine, for then I knew by experience nothing of the sweet fruits of the Spirit.

"She grew daily weaker, but more radiantly beautiful. Her appearance could scarcely be described. Her eyes, though somewhat sunken, were incomparably brighter than formerly—more expressive, for the soul that looked out from them had been purified and spiritualized. With the hectic glow upon her cheek, and the black clustering hair about her forehead, making her complexion appear whiter and clearer than alabaster itself, the brilliancy of her face can scarcely be imagined.

"As yet, no direct allusion had been made to the past. I had, indeed, talked much of my European tour, and all the strange, beautiful things I had witnessed—had seen her eye kindle with enthusiasm as I described the sunny skies and balmy air of Italy and classic Greece, the grand, magnificent, terrible scenery of the Alps, or the noble beauty of the Rhine; but amid it all, no allusion had been made to the fact of her silence. I was already inwardly convinced that she had written me and that her letters had failed to reach their destination, or else that she had never received mine, for her uniform conscientiousness, her constant peace, her look, manner and appearance forbade me to think that there was any act of unkindness in all her life unconfessed and unforgiven. Nor had any allusion been made to the fact of her visiting in our village, so soon after my arrival from the East. There was a mystery here which I felt must be explained before she died. I determined to broach the subject soon. An opportunity presented itself ere I expected, for no sooner had I come to the conclusion, than she called me to sit by her side.

"I am unusually strong, this morning," said she, 'and I have a sad tale to tell thee before I leave thee. Thou rememberest, Mary, that I hinted in my note to thee that the four years past had been eventful ones to me?'

"I nodded assent.

"O," said she, 'the heartaches that I have had, the strange, wild, bitter, terrible thoughts that have agitated me, and the dreadful struggles of soul, ere I attained the peace I now enjoy!'

"And then she related to me the saddest tale of a young heart's best affections all wasted and thrown away upon a vile, worthless wretch, who came to her in the garb of a member of our society, with the specious appearance of piety and worth, but the heart of a fiend—yes, the saddest story, Isabel, that I ever heard. I cannot tell it thee now, for it would alone fill a long chapter, but at some future time, perhaps I will.

"And the name of this man?' I asked, when she had done.

"Samuel Wolcott."

"Samuel Wolcott!'

"Yes, an Englishman by birth. Surely, thou dost not know him, Mary!'

"Was he tall, with large gray eyes and a scar upon his cheek?'

"Yes; then thou hast seen him—thou knowest him! Tell me quick, Mary.'

"He is my mother's cousin. Soon after our arrival in England, he made an unsuccessful attempt to defraud my father of a large amount of money. Upon the failure of the plan, he absconded and was never heard of again in England. Strange he did not change his name, but he hardly expected us to know any one in so remote a city, and probably thought it unnecessary.'

"And now I remember," said Julia, 'that when, soon after my acquaintance with him, I spoke of you, and of our strong attachment to each other, he acted rather strangely. I observed it then, but soon forgot it.'

"The thought at once occurred to me that this man had borne some part in intercepting the letters that passed between us. He would scarcely desire my parents to know his whereabouts, even though he was beyond the reach of justice. At least, provided he designed to win Julia, as he undoubtedly did, he would wish to keep my family in ignorance of the affair. The close intimacy existing between Julia and myself would warrant a fear on his part that his name should be mentioned in some of her letters. Would it not be policy in him to intercept our correspondence?

"And now, Julia," said I, "I must ask thee some questions. How many letters didst thou receive from me during my absence?"

"Two: one immediately after your arrival, and another some three months after, stating that thou hadst received no answer and begging me to write soon. I did so immediately. I answered thy first letter, but it must have miscarried."

"And I wrote thee no less than six."

"O, Mary, what could have become of them all? How much did I wrong thee by judging thee too much engrossed in the strange people with whom thou wast becoming acquainted, and with the beauties thou wast meeting in thy travels, to think of me! I wondered thou hadst not spoken of thy silence, but as I had forgiven thee, I thought it not best to mention it to thee. Now tell me how many letters thou hadst from me."

"Not one, Julia—not one."

"Not one, when I wrote thee five! What couldst thou have thought? Yes, I wrote thee six during thy stay in England, and afterwards I knew not where to direct. Could Samuel have been guilty of that? No, no, I will not judge him so harshly. He always carried my letters to the office, and used to sympathize so much with me, when I felt so disappointed in not hearing from thee!"

"Each pleaded guilty to having thought the other unkind, though I had much more to confess than Julia, for she learned the lesson of forgiveness years before, while I knew it not."

"There yet remains one thing unexplained," said I. "It is with regard to thy visit in our place. That made me more wretched than anything else. That thou shouldst come so near me, and not even call—"

"O, Mary, how strange—how very strange that no one told me of thy arrival! Can it indeed be that thou wast home then? But I only remained one night there, for most of those I knew had emigrated. I took rooms at the hotel and made very short calls. People must have supposed me aware of thy return. I should not have visited there had I not been passing through upon a more distant journey. The last that I heard of thee was through an acquaintance, who told me that thou wast to remain another year in Europe."

"Now the matter was clear to me, and years afterward, Samuel Wolcott, when dying in a State's prison, confessed to having intercepted our correspondence, all but my first letters, the two she mentioned, and her first one, which was lost, previous to his acquaintance with Julia. Ah, I had much to reproach myself with! Alas, alas! how bitterly did I repent the past!—how vainly wish to live it o'er! I shed such tears as I hope thou mayest never shed, Isabel."

"And now," said Aunt Mary, wiping her eyes, "my story is done. Some time I will tell thee how, from day to day, Julia grew more like an angel, until one evening she fell asleep in my arms—how, upon that night, the moonlight fell upon her glorious hair, just as it did when we sat beneath the cedars—how her eyes, lit with a glory such as thou mayest have dreamed of, Isabel, but never saw, were raised to mine, till they were diverted (so I always believed) by the angels—how her slender, white, almost transparent hand grew heavy and cold as I held it to my lips, till the glory left her eyes, and, as I said, she fell asleep in my arms."

"O, do tell me now, Aunt Mary," said Isabel.

"Not now, Isabel—do not urge me. I cannot tell thee now, for I wish thee to think why I have told thee this story."

"Yes, yes, aunty," said Isabel, her cheeks all a-glow, "I see it—I know what you would have me learn! I shall not hate Fanny; I shall go at once, and seek an explanation. Some one must have spoken falsely!"

"That's right, darling," said Aunt Mary, kissing her cheek; "that's right. I tell thee, Isabel, there would be much less suffering in the world, if everybody would do so."

INTELLIGENT.

The Austrian police officers lately pounced on a volume of Plato in Greek in the trunk of an American traveller.

"There may be something improper here," said the official Dogberry.

"Impossible!" replied the traveller. "It's the work of an ancient philosopher."

"What of that?" exclaimed the ass. "How do I know he didn't write against the Austrian government?"—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

Politeness is nothing more than an elegant and concealed species of flattery, tending to put the person to whom it is addressed in good humor and respect with himself.

REST.

BY DARK STEEL.

How sweet a word to the weary one—
 What peace to the troubled breast,
 To know his footsteps are nearing home,
 Where he will find a rest!
 Rest from the wearying cares of life—
 Rest from its toils, its sorrowing strife—
 Rest from the grave.

The wanderer o'er life's darksome way,
 Has faint and weary grown,
 And is sinking by the rough wayside;
 Where thorns are thickly sown,
 When with straining eyes he sees afar
 A light—a guide—a glorious star,
 That points to rest.

A rest for the soul, beyond, beyond
 This misty, cheerless vale;
 Where love's bright blossoms in beauty bloom,
 Nor ever droop and pale;
 For no wintry blasts sweep o'er to chill,
 No autumnal frosts to blight and kill,
 For there is rest.

Where the parting tear is never shed,
 And sorrow is unknown—
 There, there is rest for the weary hand,
 Rest for the weary soul:
 Rest from the wearying cares of life—
 Rest from its toils, its sorrowing strife—
 Rest from the grave.

GRACE CARROLL.

BY WILLIAM B. OLIVER.

It was a cold frosty morning in March. All night the stars had hidden themselves from the pale watchers, whom sickness or suffering had forbidden to sleep, and the morning dawned without sunshine, almost without light, for the dark, slate-colored clouds threw shadows over the pathway of the town, and made still darker the streets of the city.

At ten in the morning, a modest, dark-colored, one-horse carriage stopped at the door of a large brick building, in the upper part of the city, and a lady and gentleman alighted.

"Is this the orphan's asylum?" said the gentleman to a lad, passing. The boy explained that there was a special door at the other side of the house, where people who had business must ring; so leading the horse round the corner, and asking the lad to hold it, the gentleman rang vigorously, and was answered by an old woman whose withered face, bent form and sour look did not impress him as being a suitable portress for the bright forms and faces that might sometimes be brought hither. He asked for the matron, and was ushered into a cold, scantily furnished room, with unpapered walls and uncarpeted floor. A desk and some chairs were the only furniture, and those were of the most meagre description. The matron made her appearance. She was tall and very thin, with harsh gray hair, and harsher gray eyes, and, moreover, she was dressed in gray. Not a trace of warm, human feeling was visible on that cold, stern countenance; no womanly softness, no motherly sweetness. The old apple woman round the corner looked more lovingly after the little ones who did not stop at her stand to buy. She looked as if frozen into stone, and the eye was stony as well as gray; you might have fancied that she was Lot's wife, looking upon the vanished hopes of her youth, and turned into that cold, hard pillar.

Perhaps Miss Cumston never had any hopes to look back upon; surely she could have none in the future, with that hard look. Those thin lips could never have murmured sweet words of love, or sung sweet lullabies to an infant. It was not a face out of which love and music had gone; because they evidently had not been there, to go.

Mr. Carroll thought all this, while he was looking about for some set phrase in which to address her; for his genial nature was chilled, and the benevolent errand on which he came was checked and delayed, by the absence of sympathy in her looks. His wife saved him the trouble of speaking. Already her woman's tongue had found a voice, and she was eagerly inquiring if there were any children in the establishment needing a home.

"Do you wish to take one?" said the thin lips.

"We wish to look at all of them," said Mr. Carroll. "You will please to show us every child in the asylum, and if there is one that suits our purpose, we shall probably take it. But we want, as I said, to see every one of them."

Miss Cumston led the way to a long chamber, where about twenty little ones, of various ages, were assembled, under the care of another person almost a duplicate of herself. The same stony look was distinctly visible, but behind it, there was something a little more human, something that said that the look was acquired by long practice. In the other sister, it was born there. Miss Elinor Cumston appeared to be some few years younger than her sister, and the little ones were more familiar with her. They came around her while they kept aloof from Miss Jane.

"Are these all the children you have?" said Mr. Carroll, for a friend had insinuated to him, that in these places they do not exhibit the brightest and finest children until some of the rest are disposed of.

"All but one, sir," said Miss Elinor.

"Will you allow me to look at that one?"

The elder sister looked reproachfully at Elinor, probably because she had betrayed the fact; but she had no alternative than to show her charge, and she led the way to another and a smaller room. If the other children had not impressed the visitor favorably, here was one that could not fail to do so. Beside the fire sat a healthy, good-looking Irish woman, and in her arms a beautiful, healthy child of about ten months old. The child was not her own, but she had evidently taken good and sufficient care of it, and it did credit to her kindly keeping.

Miss Cumston seemed unwilling to have this child chosen. It was the healthiest and best fed, the happiest of the whole tribe, and would be taken in preference to any other.

She whispered a while to Elinor, and Mrs. Carroll heard her say, "well, let them have her! nobody will want the others while this one looks so well, and we may as well get her away."

It touched upon Mrs. Carroll's womanly sympathy, this reference to the little pinched and forlorn ones she had seen in the other room; and resolutely closing her eyes to the sweet, laughing, crowing baby, she walked into the long chamber, selected a pale, but intelligent-looking little girl, about two years old, and held her up to her husband for his approval. The child held out her arms to be taken, and Mr. Carroll bent forward and kissed her little violet lips. That kiss sealed the child's fortune. She sprang to his arms, and they enfolded her in a loving clasp.

"Wrap her up well," said he to Miss Cumston. "It is very cold, and I fear she will suffer, otherwise."

There was a hesitation which Mrs. Carroll easily divined. "We will send the clothes all home," she said, and the sisters seemed satisfied. By the time that the books were signed, and all the arrangements entered into on both sides, the child was brought in, dressed in a warm cloak and hood, and clapping her hands with pleasure at the story which nurse had told her of going to ride. For it was kind-hearted Katy, in the little room, who had laid down her own charge, and fitted the little one for her journey, and now stood with a tear falling down her rosy, good humored face, contrasting so strongly with her cold, unmoved mistresses, as to make the Carrolls wish that they might exchange places with her. * * * *

At the door of a handsome house in a country town, about fifteen miles from the city, two bright, noble-looking boys appeared, to welcome their father and mother who had just stopped in the same carriage that stood in the morning at the door of the orphan's home.

It was now four o'clock, and already the bright lights were dancing in the windows, and the reflection of an ample wood-fire was throwing up broad red glances on the white ceiling within.

"What have you brought, father?" said little Fred, the youngest, as his father alighted with a large bundle in his arms.

"For shame, Freddy," said Willie, "to ask father now, when he is so cold!"

Willie gave his hand to his mother to help her up the steps, and Mr. Carroll followed with his bundle.

"Send Patrick after the horse, Willie, and tell him to give him a good supper."

Mr. Carroll never forgot the comfort of any living thing. As he entered the room the child woke from her long sleep, and looked round upon the boys, with a smiling, satisfied air, while they stood in utter amazement, unable to speak, gazing upon the fairy gift which their father had brought them.

"This must be your little sister, my son," said Mrs. Carroll, "and I hope I need not ask you to be very gentle and tender with her. You see that she is quite small and feeble, and will be unable to play as you great boys of eight and ten years old can."

"Indeed we will, mother! Thank you a thousand times. A dear little sister! Mother, how good you are! What is her name? Where did you get her?"

"Her name? sure enough, she must have a name—not that harsh uncouth name which was hers at the asylum; but some soft, sweet name. What should it be?"

"Let it be Grace," said Mrs. Carroll, after a dozen names had been proposed and rejected. "Grace Carroll! the names sound well together;" and Grace Carroll, the baby was called. That night, as the family sat at their pleasant tea-table, the "one thing wanting" seemed happily supplied, and a spectator might have safely predicted that the little girl would become an important part of the household.

We pass over ten years. Grace is now twelve years old, Fred is twenty, and on his last year in college, and William was quietly settled down as a physician. Fred, who came home only on Saturday evenings, was very particular in his demands upon the attentions of Grace, who waited upon him scrupulously. She prepared for him coming, arranged her music to play to him, put on her best frock to receive him, and kept the week's news for his special hearing. But after all had been done for his comfort and pleasure, she would draw her low seat beside William, and look up into his face for an hour, without speaking. William would give no other sign of his satisfaction, than a calm smile when she sat down, and an occasional glance from his large volume to her sweet, young face, while Fred would endeavor to draw off her attention in various ways. She would answer him, do whatever he wished, but would relapse into her old habit of watching Willie's face again. Fred would scold or laugh at her for this, and when Fred returned, after four years' travel, during which he had written hundreds of letters to Grace, he came home to find her a beautiful young lady, accomplished, graceful as her own sweet name, and "handsome as a picture," there she was still sitting at William's feet, in the low chair.

"How beautiful you have grown, Grace!" said Fred. "I never expected to see Grace so handsome, did you, William?"

"Is Grace handsome?" said William. "I never observed it; but I suppose she must be, for she is good," and the student relapsed again to his books.

Fred turned impatiently away, and gave a long whistle. Half an hour later, William had gone to see his patients and Fred was teasing Grace to sing.

"Willie does not like that," she said, as he opened to a song which he called beautiful. She would not sing it. Presently he came to one which she called Willie's favorite, and she sang it notwithstanding that Fred declared it hideous.

Mrs. Carroll saw nothing of all this. To her the child was her boys' sister. She never thought of any other feeling coming to either. She must have been blind not to see that they both loved her, and that they never called her sister. Sometimes Grace said "brother" to Fred, but never to William. Mr. Carroll was more observant. He sat by, in his arm-chair, and he made observations occasionally, with which he never troubled his wife. There was no need, "Grace would be our daughter still more truly," he said, and already he saw her as William's wife, as loving, as gentle, as beautiful as now, and bound to their declining days by a new and tender tie.

Mrs. Carroll was not so easy, when she saw that Fred grew jealous of his brother. He showed it now, every time that Grace spoke to William, and he engaged her attention from him on the most trifling pretexts. William missed her from her accustomed seat, but, outwardly, he took no notice. * * *

It was a sweet, moonlight hour, that in which Grace sat by the window alone. The light came in upon her in silvery flecks, between the sprays of honeysuckle and clematis which garlanded the large bay window. Within the room all was darkness. She did not know that some one had come in, and sat there in that darkness, watching the gleams of light as they flitted in the light evening breeze, over her white dress and her beautiful face, made still more beautiful by the sweet serenity that dwelt upon it from the influences of that peaceful hour.

While Grace sat there, Fred came up the long gravel walk. She could not see him, for the honeysuckle lay thickly over the window; but she heard his quick, ringing step, so different to any other, and as he came near, she thought that she heard his hurried breathing.

He dashed into the room, and walked up to that window, where he well knew that he should find Grace.

"You avoid me lately, Grace," he began, "I have not had five minutes' conversation with you for a week. Latterly, you seem to be with William constantly, and I have no opportunity of talking with you at all."

"Don't say that, brother Fred," said Grace; "surely I spend as much time with you as with William. You forget that while he sits here studying, I am often galloping over the hills with you."

"But what chance is there to talk on horseback, Grace? One quiet hour like this, is worth more than twenty such as we spend together every week, because there is no chance for conversation in them."

Grace laughed. "I think we are together as much as most brothers and sisters, Fred, and I do not know what subject we have left untouched. It seems to me that we have gone over everything which comes under the head of conversation, many times over."

"Pshaw! forgive me, Grace, for the word, but surely you must know what I mean. I love you—not as a sister—you shall never call me brother again. You may call William 'brother,' and you may be a sister to him—but never to me. Gracie, you must be my wife!"

Fred's wife! She had never thought of this. Her life had been so peaceful, so beautiful in its relations to them all, that it startled and even terrified her, to have it assume any other shape, even in thought. Loving William as she truly did, watchful as she was of his comfort, she had never dreamed of being anything more to him than she was now. And for Fred, it was still farther from her thoughts; nor could she bring it near, now that he had presented the idea in words.

Fred's wife! He had to repeat it before she could answer, and when she did, it was with a broken and tearful entreaty that he would not seek to put this barrier between their pleasant intercourse; that he would never again trouble the peaceful current of her calm, sisterly love, with words like these.

There was an hour of stormy grief on his side, and of tearful regret on hers, and then Grace begged him to leave her. He went out into the still moonlight, and tried to still his heart, by walking far and rapidly.

And there, in the shadow, still sat the figure that had staid there through the whole scene. Grace almost fell over it, when she was hurrying to her room, and then she knew who it was.

"William!" she gasped out, "have you been listening to all this? I could not have believed it of you."

"Grace, do not condemn me until I can speak in my defence. I came here, silently, before my brother entered; and Grace, I came for the same purpose for which he came! When he came in so suddenly, I was too much overcome with my own feelings to allow him to witness them. I would wait, I thought, until I could speak to you both, calmly. But you know how he spoke; so suddenly, so impetuously, and after the first words were spoken, I could not have moved for my life. I knew that no one thought of my being here, and had you not fallen, no one would ever have known it. Had you accepted Fred, I must have betrayed myself. As it was, I sat in a quiet happiness, which can only be made deeper and stronger by the thought that sometime I may say to you words which you have heard from another, and that you will answer them differently. Forgive me, Grace! I know how my being here must look to you, how it would look to Fred, but he does not know, and never must know, that I heard it all. He is so proud that it would destroy all love between us as brothers. Will you forgive me, Grace?"

"I do; but this has pained me so much, that I must not talk of it now. Let me go, William, you are cruel to detain me, and hark, Fred is coming back."

She went to her room, but it was to lie waking all night. What had she gained? The knowledge of a love which troubled her heart, and made life, for the first time, seem overshadowed. What had she lost? The life long happiness, up to this time, of that tender, sisterly affection, which she had ever cherished for both. O, if Fred had not spoken! And then this other new revelation which had come to her from William! It was all inexplicable to her, and she must bear it unshared, too, for there was no one to whom she could give her confidence. How could she meet her father and mother in the morning, with the knowledge of all this pressing upon her? How could she meet any of them, indeed?

It was, for a moment, in her thoughts, to plead illness as an excuse for not joining them at the breakfast table; but she was above any pretext, and she bathed her wet eyes, and went down. Fred was not there! and William was cold and abstracted. Mrs. Carroll noticed the heaviness of her daughter's eyes, and was profuse in her exclamations of regret, begging William to prescribe for them. Every word deepened Grace's confusion, and as she found it impossible to preserve her serenity, she went back to her chamber. Thither Mrs. Carroll followed, after a brief conversation with William, in which he had told her all. It was with a generous disregard of his own happiness that William offered to waive all pretensions to Grace, if she could love his brother; and when Fred returned, pale and careworn, at evening, his brother actually undertook to plead his cause with Grace.

"Loving you as I do, Grace, I would resign you willingly, if you can make it appear that it will be for the happiness of yourself."

"O, no," said she, "let me be your sister again. It is all that I can wish. This is idle, to break up the peace of this happy circle in this way. Only let us be as before."

This could not be, William said; but before he could finish his sentence, his brother came in.

"I see how it is, Grace," he said, mournfully, "William loves you, too, and more than that, you love him. Nay, do not speak. I have long seen it in both. I cannot stay here to see it; but when I am gone away, as I shall soon go, you will be happy together." His eyes filled with tears. They had not known the depth of affection that lay beneath the crust of Fred's careless and apparently reckless disposition. They felt it keenly now. In a few weeks he was gone.

Four years have passed, and Mrs. Carroll sits holding her little grandson, while another climbs on her husband's knee. The gate opens, and up the long gravel walk comes Fred, and by his side a tall, graceful, dignified woman, and she is Fred's wife.

Whoever feels pain in hearing a good character of his neighbor, will feel a pleasure in the reverse. And those who despair to rise in distinction by their virtues, are happy if others can be depressed to a level with themselves.

TO MY LITTLE NAMESAKE.

Dedicated to the Hon. N. T. Rossiter.

BY BLANCHE D'ARTOIS.

Stranger fairy!
 Artless peri!
 Little namesake mine!
 Deign to list me:
 How I'll kiss thee,
 Wert thou truly mine!
 Clasp thee fondly to my breast—
 Guardian of thy guileless rest—
 Owing meanwhile I am blest—
 Little namesake mine!

Home enchains thee,
 Friendship claims thee—
 Come! this heart's thy shrine!
 "Daughter Mary's"
 Loved more dearly—
 Namesake, thou art mine.
 "Blanche!" I bid thee welcome home!
 Peerless fairy—haste and come—
 Hearts and homes have too much room,
 Little namesake mine.

Sing I—praying—
 Song-conveying—
 All my soul to thine:
 While I'm breathing,
 Fate is wreathing
 Crowns, thy brow to twine.
 Sorrow's toils ne'er tangle round thee,
 Doubt nor darkness e'er confound thee,
 Misery's black waves ne'er surround thee,
 Little namesake mine!

THE OBSTINATE HORSE:

—OR,—

WHO'LL MAKE HIM GO?

BY WILLIAM O. EATON.

CRUELTY to animals has well been made the subject of penal legislation, and if horses but knew this, they would grin with gratitude. And when they are ill-treated—as, for instance, when their loads are greater than they should be, or when they are whipped or beaten unjustly by the hand of passionate ignorance—they would neigh aloud to the lookers-on, "Why don't you take his number down and take him up?" Coaxing often goes a great way with a horse—but I am getting ahead of my story.

Not long ago an omnibus stopped, against the will of the driver, at the head of Milk Street—cause, an unruly horse. A result was the immediate commencement of one of those Washington Street blockades, or caravans, usual on similar occasions. We will not stop to inquire why the horse refused to propel—whether it was an ailment, indignation at being over-worked, objection to the character of any or all of the passengers in the vehicle, sheer fatigue, or a vain wish to attract attention; but will merely suggest in this place that some folks account for the obstinacy of horses by supposing that they either stop to think, or see "sperrits" ahead, and are afraid.

The obstinate horse who is the hero of this story did stop, at any rate, from some cause or other, and occasioned a blockade in the street on one side, and a dense and excited and rapidly increasing crowd on both sides of the way. The driver, an exceedingly "hossy" looking chap, after two or three cuts of the whip, remained in his seat inactive, and with great composure lit a cigar and commenced smoking.

"Go on—why don't you?" asked an impatient gentleman through the ticket-hole. "You've stopped forty-four times in this rascally crooked street already!"

"Horse will go when he gets ready," was the answer.

"Baulky?" said the gentleman, noticing the crowd.

"Rayther!" was the dry response of the driver.

This answer induced all to get out of the omnibus, except a large fat woman with a determined expression and a basket of eggs. As the others went out, they heard her mutter something about she wouldn't get out for no horse, "eggs or no eggs."

"Why don't he go on?" said somebody on the sidewalk.

"Better ask the horse!" said a facetious spectator.

"Touch him up!" cried several.

Impatient gestures and not a few highly indelicate expressions were made by drivers of vehicles in the rear, and "Knock him in the head and take the team down Milk Street!" was proposed by one ferocious personage, who had a note to attend to which he feared would be protested.

But most of the throng, as is usual on such occasions, were more sympathetic, and indulged in a display of their horse-knowledge which was more unique than edifying. The sight of obstinacy stirs up the wrath of many, and those present of that class suggested the most violent means to make the horse do his duty; while others proposed coaxing, or a strategic method.

"Lead him and then he'll go," cried a boy, who conceived that nobody else there assembled ever heard of such an ingenious proceeding.

Some who would have tried this plan, and were just stepping into the street to execute it, disdained to accept of any advice from a boy, and drew back disappointed, for they had flattered themselves upon having a good chance to make a display before a large assembly, with little risk. But the chance was improved by a peaked-looking man, with a silly face, but with no avail.

"Baa! baa! baa! Go away, sheep-head! Get out, calf!" were the jeering cries which soon made him hide himself in the peaceful obscurity of the crowd; and even the horse seemed to sneer at him, for he snorted terribly.

The crowd was all the while growing more noisy and excited, while the resolute fat woman, with the basket of precarious eggs, condescended to watch the proceedings through a front window. The driver's coolness seemed to provoke some of the crowd, for they reproached him with indifference to the public interests.

"Don't you see that ere string of teams ahind on yer?" exclaimed they.

"Not very well," said the driver, looking straight ahead.

"What's the matter of that horse?" inquired a simple-hearted by-stander, who had just come.

"Troubled with the no-goes," said a quiz, seriously.

"Where?" said the other, willing to be instructed.

"In the legs," was the reply.

Here the driver, to save appearances, condescended to give the beast a lash upon his hind furniture, which caused him to show vivacity in the back-stay, for he executed a series of kick-ups with much enterprise.

"He still lives!" said a political spectator, withdrawing a little, to wipe a discharge of mud from his face.

"Beat him—bang him—make him go!" said some. And at this moment an indignant shop-keeper, who felt that the crowd injured his sales, advanced with a window-shutter and spanked the refractory animal a few times, when a brisk young Frenchman stepped forward and interposed with, "Mon Dieu! mon ami! vous sont un fou!" and he went to the horse's head to try the coaxing way—the most approved in France.

Patting the foaming beast upon the neck, he endeavored to whisper in his ear; but he was too short, or the horse was too tall, for he could barely reach as high as the animal's ear, and the horse would not allow his head to come down as low as the Frenchman's mouth—perhaps because he did not understand French. But the countryman of Napoleon was not to be easily disheartened, and keeping a tight hold of the reins, when the angry animal reared again, he was carried up with him and managed to get his mouth to the beast's ear before he came down.—The crowd applauded the Frenchman's tenacity, though they did not all understand what he would be at.

"What's he trying to do?" said many.

"He's kissing his brother!" answered a wag.

"Promising him a feed of oats!" said another.

"No—he is telling him if he don't be still and behave, he will take him up!" said still another.

"Take him up?" laughed another; "he'd better keep him down first."

"Why don't the driver use the whip? Driver, pay on, pay on, with your whip!"

This and many other volunteered advices were declined by the phlegmatic driver, with a knowing wink of the eye.

Twice the disinterested Frenchman got his mouth to the horse's ear, but the plunges knocked his hat off, and as he let go to get it, the horse suddenly made a start forward for a rod or two, and amid the derisive shouts of the thankless crowd, the fugitive chapeau was picked up by its owner, all in one grand smash, having been run over by the wheels. With a torrent of sacres, and a volley of other rather unamiable French, the discomfited Gaul withdrew in the direction of Noah Greely's hat-store.

Innumerable were the suggestions now offered by the magnanimous spectators, not one of whom attempted to put in force his own proposition, though seriously believing in its probable efficacy.

"Rub his nose kindly; that's the way I have always seen it done!" said a positive man, with a very superintending sort of look.

"Rub his granny!" said a scornful fellow, with a turned-up nose. "Stroke his mane wrong ways—that's the only way."

"My father's horse," advanced another, with a persuasive smile and criticising squint of his eyes, "never would go unless you tickled him over his tail. That will set any horse flying! Will any gentleman please to lend me a rattan? Must be done with a rattan!"

As nobody had a rattan, the experiment was not tried.

"Tickle his ribs with a stick!"

"Squeal in his ear!"

"Twist his ear!"

"Blow in it!"

"Twist his tail!"

"Throw some water on him!"

"What a curious driver! He don't seem to mind it at all!"

The nonchalance of the driver so contrasted with the rearing, kicking, snorting, sidling and foaming of his excited horse, as these experiments and others were severally tried, that he began to be an object of admiration. Some inquired what kind of a horse he was, commonly.

"O, he's a pooty bobbin' sort of a horse, sir," was his reply, very complacently.

"I should think he was all of that. What do you do when he acts in this way?"

"Don't do nothing, generally. Let him feel his oats, if he wants to," said the coachee, lighting a fresh cigar.

"But aint there any remedy? You see how the street's blocked up!"

"Sometimes, when he gets steam up, they put a chaw of tobacco between his teeth."

"Chaw of tobacco! Chaw of tobacco! Who's got a chaw of tobacco, to put in his teeth?" exclaimed the shop-keeper aforesaid, who having failed with the shutter at one end of the animal, was now going to try tobacco at the other.

A huge piece was handed him, and after munching it a little to make it soft and taste good, he went up to the chafing cheval, whose bulging eyes and shaking head announced that the fire was not all out of him yet. Determined to make the dose effectual, the shop-keeper, seizing a favorable moment when the horse's mouth was partly open, thrust his hand away in with a fierceness which nearly cost him the loss of it—for the teeth came down upon his fingers, not, however, with full force, but sufficiently hard to make him swear his repentance as he ran with his maimed digits to the neighboring doctor's shop.

"Rather got bit, that time, didn't he?" laughed the driver. "Perhaps that anxious man didn't know how fond the horse is of tobacco. Took two hands that time!"

"Sunthin' must be done, and that speedily!" said a puffy, paunchy little man, with a pink face and wholesale-dealerish air, as he surveyed the motley multitude, whose jostling and density made the prospect of half-a-dozen little fights altogether probable. "It's a pity that one horse should thus disturb the peace and quiet. It injures the interests of the city. I'll give five dollars to anybody who'll make that horse go."

People pricked up their ears, and a few more tried in vain.

"Don't want your money, neighbor Punccheon," said a larger and fatter man at his elbow, "you know I've a plenty myself, for that matter; but here's a man who says that if you walk before a horse in this condition, he will follow your lead. I'll try."

"I'll try it myself!" said the little puffy, paunchy man, with the wholesale air. "It's a sacrifice, but I'll do it for the public good!" and with patriotic condescension he stepped into the street before the horse, with solemn importance, and pulling his hat on firmly, and telling a policeman who had just arrived authoritatively to stand out of the way and not interfere, he faced the horse, as if to let him know who he was, and then turned to the right-about face, and walked slowly on before.

"What's to pay now?" was the question; "who's that?"

"Punccheon, the wholesale dealer, trying an experiment!"

"He'd better not come too near the horse, or he'll be swallowed, boots and all."

Twelve pompous strides and the little man looked back. The horse took no notice.

"You're so small, perhaps he didn't see you," suggested some; "try it again!"

He did try it, again and again and again, and perhaps would have tried it till the present time, in his fervor for the public good, only that, at the fourth trial, the horse made it very evident that he did see him, for as he approached, he reared, and descending, brought his hoofs in such dangerous proximity with the puffy man's head, as to smash his beaver off, leaving him barely time to gather himself forward and save his body corporal. Dismayed and hatless, he retired to the sidewalk.

"Bob," now said the policeman to the driver, "will you, or shall I try?"

"Come up and take the reins," was the reply.

The policeman did so, and Bob got down and spoke in a low tone to the delinquent animal, patting his flank and neck and manipulating his nose. Not a minute elapsed before the hitherto violent quadruped became as docile as a kitten, and Bob remounting with a grin, the policeman still on the box, cried:

"All right!" and bowing to the spectators, drew the reins and the horses went forward as if nothing had happened.

"Nothing like knowing how to manage a horse!" said everybody, dispersing, and the policeman observed the same to the driver, with the remark that he had made quite a sensation.

"Yes," said the driver, "and I didn't care if I did. I might have got him along at the first stop. I knew all the time they couldn't make him go, but there's some folks so ready to interfere, and so sure they know how to manage a horse better than anybody else, that I thought I'd let 'em try. Nobody can make Jerry move in his tantrums but me, you can bet a pile!"

The only praise that ought to be relied on comes from competent judges without temptation to flatter.

AGNA.

BY HARRY VERNON.

Fair as the morning when winged it flies
 From crimson-streaked ocean; fair as the rose
 When its petals expand to the dew of the skies;
 Fair as the spheres when Vesper forth hies,
 Brilliant with glittering of heavenly pearls,
 Is she, the chaste Agna, queen among girls!

Agna, this bright one, first I saw on the lawn,
 Fronting the house of the old village school;
 Here was she romping, romped as a fawn,
 Singing as birds sing, gayly at dawn;
 And as the zephyr blew, laughing it played,
 Tossing her ringlets of bright auburn shade.

Fled have years, many too, phantom-like, close,
 Following me ever, the young beauty elings.
 When the morn dawns, when the eve glows,
 When to the dew opens the red rose,
 Forth springs the lovely shade, soft as a dove,
 Singing as birds sing, singing of love!

THE LAWSUIT.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

ISABEL MOORE sat by the window of her richly furnished drawing-room, half hidden by the folds of beautiful lace and damask that draped it. Everything about her showed, indisputably, not only that the owner and occupant possessed the quality of taste in the highest degree, but also that she had the wealth and ability to gratify it to the utmost.

Isabel was an heiress; and of course, she was a beauty in the eyes of the world. She was more than that; she was intellectual, spirited, and with a dash of sentiment about her, that she unwittingly encouraged, when she should have done her utmost to keep it in check. With all her advantages of wealth, station and character, she was apt to fall into a state of ennui, from which it was difficult to rouse her.

No tie of near and dear family affection had ever belonged to Isabel. Her father and mother dying when she was too young to know their loss, she had been transferred to a boarding-school, from whence she emerged at eighteen, and took up her residence with the family in whose care the house had been left at her father's death.

Mr. Winthrop was a clergyman, and had been a friend of Mr. Moore's. The house had been tendered to his free acceptance, by his friend's will, on condition of receiving Isabel, when she should have finished her education, and remaining with her until she should marry.

Here, therefore, she came; and here she had remained for five years, with every appliance for making life happy, and yet suffering from a restlessness and dissatisfaction, that could only proceed from a life where she had so little, individually, to achieve, and where all incentives to exertion had been taken away. In short, Isabel was suffering for want of a little wholesome discipline.

The truth was, there was a certain incommunicable quality in Isabel's mind, and a self-contained principle about her, which, without making her absolutely selfish, was yet so apparent, that those who failed to enter the sanctuary of her heart, were very apt to baptize it by that name.

But now Isabel was, as we have said, suffering from a lack of discipline. Her ocean had no roughness, her waves were scarcely ripples; and there seemed to be the danger only, of a flat, dead calm. She had read of noble and benevolent people who were always projecting some great good to society; and in books, she admired them; but in real life, such characters had always been repulsive to her, from other elements that had mixed with their goodness, and were distasteful to her love of the æsthetic.

It was a beautiful morning in May, when Isabel, restless from having nothing to do, sat by the window and looked out upon the busy throngs that passed by. Not a few cast glances of interest upon the stately house that held the pretty heiress, but no one came in, and hour after hour she sat in listless weariness, longing for some change, something that would throw a little sparkle over the rapid sort of life which she owed to herself that she was leading.

Almost she was tempted to go up stairs to Mr. Winthrop's study, and question him of her future life, and how she might be able to throw off this weariness, and come out into better and more harmonious being; but she remembered his endless discussions with others who had sought his counsel, and how little they had interested her understanding or affected her heart, when she had occasionally heard them, and she dreaded to make herself an object of his prosy generalities, as much as she would have avoided any personal dictation from him. She had only got along with these people, by taking and giving the most perfect freedom. Herself, impatient of control, as she had often manifested at school, she was not, like many of that stamp, ready to dictate to others; but gave to all that which she dared to preserve to herself. The result of her thoughts was, not to seek him, but to try to work out her own problem.

She did not have to work at it; for Fate, who always has some reserved ammunition for everybody who has been shooting in the dark, brought her a letter by the post, that suddenly turned the whole current of her thoughts, and waked her up to an enthusiasm, which would have perfectly astonished those who were accustomed only to the smooth and severe side of Isabel Moore's character. There was fire beneath the surface, but it required a strong current to make it rise to a flame. The letter ran as follows :

"I am sure that I need only appeal to the candor and good sense of Miss Moore, when I ask her attention to some facts which I wish to state to her. Perhaps you will question the right of a stranger to address you thus ; but believe me, I have adopted this method out of strong respect for yourself, and a feeling that you would, in the end, be thankful that I did so. I will state, en passant, that I am in the profession of the law, and have examined all the facts which I shall now present to you.

"You are, of course, aware that your father married your mother in a foreign land, whither he went on a secret expedition for the American government. You are not, perhaps aware—indeed I am sure that you are not—that he had a wife living at that time, and that there is a daughter now living, who can claim the whole of the large property which has been, nominally, yours so long.

"I see you are roused by this ; you tremble, turn pale, and would throw this true statement indignantly into the fire. But do not ! Wait and see how best you can escape this misfortune. Claiming is not possessing, and it will be difficult to substantiate a claim on the part of this young lady (who is but a few years older than yourself), unless she has stronger proofs than I have yet seen. If you please, I will communicate with you, privately, on this subject, whenever you desire. Forgive me for causing you pain, and believe me yours with respect.

WALTER HAYDEN."

The address was appended to this, showing how she might communicate with him by letter. Isabel's first thought was almost of gladness. Her innocent mind hardly took in the consciousness of her father's guilt in any way ; and the prospect of a sister was somehow, to her lonely situation, rather a pleasant one. Her idea was of a relation, coming to live with her, sharing with her the wealth and comforts from which she had perhaps been unjustly shut out for so many years.

She turned it over in her mind, and her idea soon gave place to another, not quite so pleasant. She looked over the letter again, and the words, "the whole of the property which has been yours nominally, so long," looked larger and stronger every time she glanced at them. She began to tremble, but as she read down the page, she assumed more firmness, as the lawyer's implied doubts met her eye.

Should she seek Mr. Winthrop ? No—he was weak and feeble, physically and mentally. She would act, for once, for herself, at least until she should understand more of the case ; and her father's character was at least too precious to be entrusted to indifferent hands now.

She wrote a hasty note, and appointed an hour in which to meet the lawyer ; a time when she knew that Mr. Winthrop would be in his study and his wife asleep on her sofa. He came punctually, and was shown to her drawing-room, and orders were given to admit no one else.

Walter Hayden entered the room with a start of surprise and almost embarrassment. He had not counted upon anything so imposing as the appearance of the apartments, or the graceful dignity of the occupant. Disdaining the accessories of ornament, Isabel appeared before him in a plain white dress, with her fine hair folded simply in one rich braid around her head. The simplicity of the style was well suited to her face and figure, and no exuberance of ornament or finish could have given such effect to her beauty. She received him with calm and easy politeness, and went immediately into the subject. Her visitor noted every word she uttered, and seemed greatly impressed with the perfect absence of all haste or indignation in her manner.

On her part, she was pleased and interested. He had been so kind and gentlemanly in his statements, and had explained so patiently the various matters which it concerned her to know, that, after their long and exciting interview, Isabel could hardly regret the cause that brought her into contact with such a mind.

Walter Hayden went away with no very distinct idea of his own feelings ; but he knew that Isabel Moore, stripped of all the splendor that surrounded her, would be a greater object of interest to him, a poor and almost unknown lawyer, than the English woman who had come over to take possession, or at least to claim all that Isabel now enjoyed. He had seen her ; and the impression on his mind was that of unmitigated aversion towards her.

It was, therefore, with pain, that the young lawyer turned his steps towards the hotel where the person calling herself Annabella Moore was awaiting him, with her mother. Coming from the refined atmosphere of Isabel's presence, he shrank from seeing the coarse and loud spoken woman who was, he now believed, usurping or trying to usurp her privileges ; and his heart swelled with anger at himself, that he had undertaken her cause at all.

He questioned the mother, and her statement seemed true, although there were one or two points on which she resisted pressing, evidently trying to get away from them as speedily as possible. He then stated to them his conviction that he should not be able to manage the case on their side, and begged to be set aside; resolving inwardly that his influence should operate on the other side, if he were allowed the opportunity.

Something in his manner decided them to give him up, and he then felt a freedom to advise and assist Isabel, which he did not previously feel. He lost no time in preparing for another interview, and offering his services in all things except by appearing as her counsel.

Day after day he saw Isabel, and having chosen for her the very best counsel, and laid matters in train, they only waited for the case to come on, which, as the English women complained of detention and expense, was done immediately.

The main evidence of the woman rested on the production of her marriage certificate, which certainly seemed genuine enough, and was sworn to by a person who said he was present at the ceremony. Indeed, on this certificate turned the whole point of the case, and on both sides it was justly considered of immense importance.

During the day of trial, Hayden had sent repeated notes to Isabel, to inform her how things were progressing. She would not be present, although he solicited her to appear. His last note merely said, "a little light." He had requested Isabel's counsel to allow him to take the marriage certificate into his hands for a brief examination. He looked at it carefully, whispered to the counsel, and sat down.

Joseph Myrick, "curate of St. Gregory's Church, Leedsfield," was sworn. He deposed that on the night of the twenty-first of April, 1821, he joined in marriage, Elias Moore and Annabella Stanfield; that he had christened a child for them in the course of the following year; that this young woman was the child; that the father of the child came to America, and was well known as the husband of Annabella Stanfield, whom he had deserted, being traced hither by her brother, who was now unfortunately dead; and that she had hitherto no means of getting to America, or making her claim until recently.

The counsel for Isabel rose. "May it please your honors, there is only one evidence which can be brought against this. It is short, simple, and to the point. The marriage of Elias Moore and Annabella Stanfield, as sworn to by the reverend gentleman, was in April, 1821. Unfortunately for his cause, or that rather of his fair friends, I have to state that the paper on which this certificate was written, is of American manufacture, and bears distinctly the date of 1840, traced in water lines upon its surface." A murmur of mingled delight and indignation arose in the court. The "reverend gentleman" tried to escape, but was secured, and his fair friends with him, to answer to the crime of forgery.

Walter Hayden's face was perfectly radiant. It was he who had discovered the mark on the paper, and suggested it to the counsel, and it was he, also, who was to bear the tidings to Isabel.

She was awaiting him, and his beaming face told the story before his lips could utter a word. Isabel was speechless with emotion, but drawing from her bosom a paper, she handed it to Mr. Hayden. His face was scarlet in a moment. He had missed it soon after their morning interview. It contained words of love to Isabel, which, had the case ended in her poverty, he intended to place in her hands, when he returned to tell her. Should it result in her favor, he was not to offer them to her consideration. Walter was too proud to win a rich bride—but were Isabel poor, impoverished by this trial—he would ask her to share his lot, and trust to brighter times.

"I wrote this to be given in case of your failure to gain your cause, Isabel," said he; "let me call you so this once. I do not dare to press my cause now."

Isabel's heart was beating so loud that she could hear every pulsation. She wondered if the new emotion was genuine or not. She had never known it before, and was doubtful whether it would pass current in the present inflated state of society. She only knew that she would be willing to share her fortune with and devote her whole life to Walter Hayden; that henceforth, his name would be the watch-word to her soul, rousing up all good and generous emotions within her. When she attained voice to speak, she told him this, and, also, that her only grief was, that she could bring him nothing but her worthless fortune, instead of a life full, as it should have been, of good deeds.

Of the English women and their accomplices, they lost all trace. It was supposed that they had friends who assisted their escape from the country, for the three had all fled from the jail in one night, during an alarm of fire.

Mr. Winthrop rallied sufficiently to unite Walter and Isabel, but he was fast sinking into unconsciousness, and his wife, unwilling to burden Isabel longer, had him removed to a pleasant country home, where he was often visited by the newly married pair, over whose home a beautiful halo rests, and around its hearth two beautiful human blossoms nestle at their feet, bearing anew the names of Walter and Isabel.

Honors and great employments are great burthens, and must require an Atlas to support them. He that would govern others, first should be the master of himself.

BID GOD SPEED.

BY MRS. L. S. GOODWIN.

Jealousies are wicked spirits,
 Haunting breasts that give them room;
 Wishes bearing ill to others
 Bring the wisher self-same doom.
 Earth is wide, and life is scanty,
 What of love ye may, O, grant ye;
 Here a man and there his brother—
 Bid God speed to one another!

Does one climb the mount before thee?
 Make him serve thy guiding star:
 Does one weaker struggle after?
 Cheer him with thy tones afar.
 Every path enough is thorny,
 Neither envy, neither scorn ye,
 But let brother and his brother
 Freely "God speed" one another.

THE LIEUTENANT OF MARINES.

BY HORACE B. STANIFORD.

THE United States frigate Pawnee lay at Port Mahon. I call her the Pawnee, because there is no such frigate in our navy, and because I am not at liberty to use real names in relating the following little actual occurrence.

Our lieutenant of marines was named John Peabody, or, at least, so I name him. He was a noble-hearted fellow, and one of the very few of our naval officers who have sprung from poor parentage and groped their own way up through hard work to manhood. He was a tall, straight man, and looked every inch the soldier. He had black eyes and his beard and moustache were so beautifully black and neat that the captain allowed him to wear them. The soldier looked at home in them, but our old captain (Bolton—he's dead now, poor fellow,) would not let a sailor come on deck with such appendages. The whisks for them must be bounded by a line from the bottom of the ear.

Peabody was a jolly fellow, but always a gentleman. In his dress, especially when on shore, he was most fastidious, and his handsome uniform was of the nicest cut, fit and finish.

"Mr. Peabody," said old Joe, the landlord of about the only decent hotel in Mahon, as a party of our officers were collected in the saloon, "you don't forget that you owe me a little sum."

"Owe—owe you?" uttered the lieutenant of marines, opening his eyes in surprise.

"O, I didn't mean to ask you for it. No, no. Take your time, Mr. Peabody, I only mentioned it."

"Only mentioned it? But what do you mean?" persisted Peabody.

"Nothing, nothing," returned Joe, somewhat perplexed, for he evidently thought the officer only objected to having been dunned in the presence of his companions.

"But you must mean something. What is it? Out with it old fellow. Do I owe you anything?"

"Don't you owe me?" the host asked, now puzzled in turn.

"Not to my knowledge."

"But," stammered old Joe, "you have had nearly twenty dollars charged here."

"Well, go on. What was it for?"

"Why, for drink, mostly; for wine, opera tickets, and suppers."

"W-h-e-w! Well, that goes a little ahead of my time, old chap," the lieutenant uttered. "For the love of mercy, when did I have all this?"

Joe opened his book and pointed to the account. There it was, in black and white:

MR. JOHN PEABODY—Lieutenant,	Dr.
To 5 glasses and four bottles,	$4.50
" 4 opera tickets and 4 bottles,	6.00
" 14 glasses and 7 bottles,	9.00

And so the account went on. Peabody read it over. He could not swear that he had not been on shore on those days, though he could swear that he had not had those things there set down.

"My dear pitcher of brass," he at length uttered, "do you mean to say that I have had those things?"

"But do you mean to say that you have not?"

"Of course I have not."

Old Joe was posed. He dared not get angry with such customers, and yet he hated to be thus imposed upon. At length he got a chance to speak with our first lieutenant (Charles Gordon Hunter. He died only a short time since, in New York. He was a good sailor; a noble-hearted man; beloved by all the good men of his ship; but his own worst enemy. God rest his soul now).

"Mr. Hunter, what does the lieutenant of marines mean?" the host asked.

"But did he really have those things?" Hunter asked.

"Why, most surely he did. But," and here Joe lowered his voice to a whisper, "he was pretty well done up when he did it. He always pays when he's sober."

"Ah," uttered Charley, with a merry twinkle of the eye, "then he does tip a little too much when we aint here, eh?"

"Why, yes. He has been here pretty badly off. Twice I have had to put him to bed, but I have never charged him for that."

"Ho, ho; now I understand. Keep mum, Joe, and I'll bring him around. He's good when he knows the truth. I'll break it to him."

As soon as possible, Hunter communicated to the rest of the officers what he had learned touching Peabody's habits when on shore alone. It was "nuts" for them. The lieutenant of marines was very severe in his strictures upon the habits of those officers who got a little "over the bay" sometimes, and now they had a chance to pay him off; but they said nothing until after they had gone on board.

The table was set in the ward-room, and the lieutenants had set down to supper. Hunter led off by a remark about the strange account which old Joe had found upon his book.

"Why, perdition seize his old cabin, where did he get those reckonings?" Peabody uttered, earnestly. "Do you believe the old rat would really try to fleece a fellow like that?"

"I guess not," returned Hunter. "Don't you think it possible that you might have had those things set down when you have been a little over?"

"Over? over what?"

"Why, over the bay; a little the worse for inward dampness."

"Do you mean drunk?"

"Why, it's what some folks vulgarly call drunk."

Peabody thought at first that they were only joking him; but ere long he was sure they were in earnest.

"Ho, ho—'twont go down, Peabody. Now own up. Haven't you done it when you've been alone, eh?"

"No, I have not."

But the others wouldn't believe him; and from that time the officers only shook their head mysteriously when the lieutenant of marines said anything against drunkenness.

When he next went on shore he steered for Old Joe's at once, and he was charged with indignation to the muzzle.

"It's all right; it's all right," the host said, clapping his hand upon Peabody's back. "I made the mistake, so say no more about it."

Peabody turned triumphantly to Hunter and Dod, who accompanied him, and asked them if they were satisfied. They shook their heads, laughed, and said, "O, yes."

"Say, Joe, how is this?" asked Hunter, as soon as he could get an opportunity to speak with the host aside.

"Why," returned Joe, "he came back here the other night and explained it all when I opened the subject. He told me never to speak of the subject again in the presence of others. That is all he objected to, then."

After this matters passed on for a month, and the only notice taken of the curious incident above set down, was an occasional joke from some of the officers. At length the ship was to sail for Toulon, and the prospect was that she would make a long cruise before she returned again to Port Mahon. On the afternoon before sailing, some of the lieutenants went on shore to have a social game of billiards at old Joe's. The games had been played, and the officers had settled up. Old Joe had been watching our lieutenant of marines, eagerly and anxiously, and as the latter turned to go away the old Dago caught him by the button-hole.

"Mr. Peabody," he whispered, "wont you settle that account now?"

"Account?"

"Yes, sir. You know you told me you would. I have kept still so far; but you are going away in the morning, and I want my money."

"Want your money?" cried the excited officer. "What do you mean?"

"Why," returned Joe, speaking loudly, too, while the rest of the officers gathered round the spot, "here's your account, run up now to over fifty dollars; and you said if I wouldn't say anything more about it you'd—"

"Hold! Why, you lying, thieving, cheating, rascally old land-shark! Do you mean to insult me?"

"No, no. But, Mr. Peabody, you wont cheat me so."

The lieutenant of marines made a spring at Joe's throat, and would have throttled him had not his companions held him back.

"Does he mean to accuse me of cheating him?" gasped Peabody, struggling in the arms of those who held him.

But Hunter soon contrived to restore quiet. He assured old Joe that all should be settled to his satisfaction.

"We'll watch him narrowly," he said to the host, "and when we catch him drunk, we'll explain the whole matter to him."

"That'll do," Joe returned, "I s'pose he don't remember what he does when he's drunk."

It was nearly dusk when the officers went off, and Peabody supposed all was settled. On the following morning all hands were called to get under weigh. Just as the capstan bars had been shipped a shore-boat came alongside, containing a man and a woman. The first lieutenant asked them what they wanted, and the female returned that she wanted to see the "lieutenant of mar-eens." She was allowed to come on board.

She was a pretty girl, stout, fair, and florid, and was recognized as the daughter of an old shoemaker who did the making and cobbling for the officers. She gazed around the deck a moment, and at length her eyes rested upon the poor lieutenant of marines, and with a very energetic step, she reached his side.

"Ah, Mistare Peabodee, you run off, eh? You no marry me! What for you leave me so, eh?"

"Fool!" uttered the lieutenant, starting back. "What do you mean by this?"

"Oho, what I mean, eh? You make love—you say me be your wife—you will marry me right away—very quick—you eat, and drink, and you sleep in our house—you drink all our best wine, and you no pay 'cause you will make me your wife, eh?"

"Why, you miserable she satan, get out of this!"

"Oho! You tell me get out, eh? You tell once—great many times—I be your wife—I be wife of the lieutenant of mar-ee-s, eh? Now you marry me, else you pay for everything you eat, and for all ze wine you drink."

"Good heavens, Hunter!" cried poor Peabody, turning to where stood the lieutenant convulsed with laughter, "will you turn this crazy thing out of the ship?"

"Oho!" exclaimed the wrathful maiden, while her great black eyes snapped, "you very easy say, turn me out—but what you mean when you say you marry me, eh?"

"Marry you, you she devil! Get out of this before I throw you overboard!"

"O-ho-o-o-o," sobbed the girl, spasmodically, "you break my heart. You lie now to me. You did swear you marry me—I should be ze wife of lieutenant of mar-eens. You lay down when you get very drunk, and I hide you away—and now you—O-ho-o-o-o!"

At this juncture old Bolton came out of his cabin, and Hunter cleared the girl out. She was indignant, and swore terribly; but she had to go.

Poor Peabody looked like one sent for. But he swore that 'twas all moonshine. He said there was a conspiracy somewhere to fleece him. The officers did not directly dispute him, but their looks plainly showed that they had their doubts.

The old frigate went to Toulon, where she remained three weeks; from thence to Marseilles, where she stopped two weeks; then to Genoa, and then back to Port Mahon. During all this time, the other officers had watched the lieutenant of marines carefully, but they had not seen him out of the way. There was something strange. But they resolved still to watch him.

The old ship cast anchor once more in the noble harbor of Mahon, and one pleasant afternoon some of the officers went on shore, and the lieutenant of marines was with them. The first place they visited was old Joe's.

"Ah, Mister Peabody," cried old Joe, regarding that officer with surprise, "where you come from?"

"Where?" returned the devoted man. "Why, where should I come from but from the ship?"

"But not just now?"

"Yes, just now. I left the ship not half an hour ago."

"You say you no been here before to-day?" the host exclaimed.

"Ask these men," said Peabody.

"He has not been on shore before since we came in," said Mr. Hunter, assuredly.

"Not yesterday?" asked the host, growing more and more puzzled.

"Of course not."

"But the lieutenant of marines is eating dinner now," said old Joe. "My conscience!"

"Where?" asked Peabody and Hunter in one breath.

"In there," answered Joe, pointing to the door of the eating-room.

And towards that door the officers started. They threw it open, and—sure as the world—there sat the exact counterpart of our lieutenant of marines! The same uniform—the same tall, straight frame—the same black hair, and the same beautiful black beard and moustache!

"Well, my dear friend," uttered Peabody, after he had gazed into the fellow's face a few moments, "may I ask, who—you—are?"

But the fellow did not speak. He stood there, trembling from head to foot.

"Ah!" cried Hunter, in an enlightened tone, "I think I see it now. My dear son of a gun, allow me to relieve you of your false colors!"

As Hunter thus spoke he placed his hand upon the fellow's fine beard, and with a quick pull he tore away whiskers and moustache, leaving revealed the well-known features of Mister Dick Lanepier, one of the crew of our captain's gig!

And so the mystery was solved. In New York, Dick had got possession of the uniform of a lieutenant of marines, and taking advantage of his close resemblance to Peabody, he had obtained the false beard, and had thus been enabled to pass himself off for the veritable lieutenant, by which means he had thus far gained good credit, and literally lived in clover, as he was on shore most of the time, always going when the captain went, and generally staying while he stayed.

"Well," uttered Hunter, after they had taken a good look at the culprit, "you do look very much like the man whose name you have so freely used; but we shall be under the disagreeable necessity of clipping your wings a mite. Your ambition overruns your pocket."

Of course, old Joe understood the whole matter now, and in order that the shoemaker's family might receive the benefit of the same intelligence, they caused Mr. Dick Lanepor to put on his beard again, and then they took him to the house where lived the afflicted maiden. Miss Shoemaker recognized her recreant swain at once, and while the real lieutenant stepped honorably out of the scrape, the false lieutenant received a broadside such as can only come from the tongue of an indignant woman.

Mr. Dick Lanepor was caused to pay up all bills he had contracted under his assumed title; then he was removed from the captain's gig; and finally, he was kept on board the ship, thereafter, until his term of service expired. And, furthermore, the officers had no more occasion to doubt the social integrity of our LIEUTENANT OF MARINES.

AN INTERESTING STORY.

"Shon, mine shon," said a worthy German father to his heir of ten years, whom he had overheard using profane language; "Shon, mine schon, come here, and I vill dell you von little stories. Now, mine shon, shall it be a dru story, or a makes pelieve?"

"O, a true story, of course," answered John. "Ferry vell den. Dere vas once a goot, nice oldt shentleman (shoot like me), and he had von dirty liddle poy (shoot like you). Andt von day he heard him schwearling like a young fillian, as he vas. So he went to der winkle (corner) and took out a cowhides (shoot as I am toing now), and he took der dirty liddle plackguard py de collar (dis way, you see), and volloped him shoot so! And den, mine tear shon, he bull his ears dis way, and smack his face dat way, and dell him to go mitout his supper, shoot as you vilt do dis efening."—German town Eagle.

STUDYING LATIN.

The New Era relates the story of a farmer whose son had for a long time been ostensibly studying Latin in a popular academy. The farmer not being satisfied with the course of the young hopeful, recalled him from school, and placing him by the side of a cart one day, thus addressed him:

"Now, Joseph, here is 'a fork and there is a heap of manure and a cart; what do you call them in Latin?"

"Forkibus, cartibus et manuribus" said Joseph.

"Well, now," said the old man, "if you don't take that forkibus pretty quickibus, and pitch that manuribus into that cartibus, I'll break your lazy backibus."

Joseph went to workibus forthwithibus.

"THAT BLESSED BABY."

BY CARRIE E. EMERSON.

It was a great day in Benchley—that on which Mrs. Lieutenant Crossman's baby saw the light. All Crossman's naval friends spoke of firing guns in honor of the occasion; but as there was no precedent for the thing, the project died a natural death before night. Not so the baby. It lived, cried, struggled manfully with old Mrs. Tarr, the head nurse, and wrinkled its tiny brow when the lieutenant handled it too roughly.

That baby was a godsend to the house of Crossman, where, heretofore, the fly-trap, as Mary Howitt expresses it, had "hung motionless on the wall," and all was in prim, precise order, emulating the holy-stoned decks of the sloop-of-war in which the lieutenant had passed so much of his life.

Now, what to name that baby, was the first inquiry. Every name in the directory was examined—names that did well enough for ordinary cases—but none that seemed suitable for a genuine lieutenant's baby; a child whose name was to be immortalized, probably, by deeds of valor and courage unheard of before. Old Mrs. Tarr suggested Washington as a dernier resort. The idea was new! and Crossman admitted it for a moment; but recalling to his mind a poor idiot so named, who went by the name of "Washy," he rejected it with disgust. Mrs. Crossman proposed calling it Madison Jefferson; but her husband said the time had gone by for naming after old presidents, and more than that, it sounded too rhyming—too much like old Mr. Robinson's family names, given on purpose to rhyme:

"William and Mary,
Becky and Sary,
John, Thomas Jefferson, and Elbridge Gerry."

Everything was suggested, but nothing fixed on. It was too important a matter—so that "blessed" child remained for weeks without even a "nominis umbra."

But the christening was too important an occasion not to be soon observed, and as the christening waited upon the name, and could not go on without it, something must be decided on; and as we often go through the woods and pick up a crooked stick at last, the all-important name degenerated, after all, into plain Peter. Mrs. Crossman happened to tell her husband that she had a rich uncle who rejoiced in that simple appellation. Peter, henceforth, was exalted in the lieutenant's ideas, and intertwined with pleasant associations of future wealth and grandeur, which, as he was only a poor man, looked very bright in the distance. And this is suggestive of the fact, that many people are condemned to go through life with a miserable sort of name attached to them, offending their own sensitive feelings and the good taste of the community, merely because there is some hoped-for Danish shower to fall upon it. It is positively cruel thus to entail the misery of such names upon the Hezekiahs, Jedidiah and Palatiah, who try in vain to avoid it by writing the obnoxious initial only, and taking the convenient middle name, which, after all, does not effect the purpose intended.

But we are running away from "that blessed baby," who grew and flourished in spite of his name, and arrived at the very respectable age of thirteen months, went through the orthodox diseases—teething, whooping-cough and measles—and exhibited occasional fits of ill temper and obstinacy worthy of the first Peter whose history was ever recorded, and in all respects was like other blessed babies.

The lieutenant had a great idea of instructing the boy, even at this early age, in naval tactics—which attempt of course failed; as, notwithstanding little Peter was the son of a naval officer, his tender age might seem to preclude him from having any very definite conception of the duties demanded of him.

People do seem to act differently with an only child from those who have many—and Mrs. Crossman herself did not always exhibit that tact and good sense in regard to the child that one might have expected from her usual habits. Peter, being the sole representative of the family, was suffered to be also the sole recipient of all the cakes, candy and sweetmeats which generally suffice for a whole family.

Neighbors and friends shook their heads over little Peter's future, as visions of the disastrous fate of "only children" came up to their recollection: Peter was destined to disappoint all their predictions. He grew up gentle, manly, handsome and intelligent. What more could he be? good? yes, and good too. He was good to his parents, good to the poor, and good to the unhappy wherever he found them.

At the age of twenty-one he actually did come into possession of the estate belonging to his uncle, so long coveted for Peter, and his first act was to buy for his parents what they never had before—a permanent, comfortable home. Everything which the truly English word comfort embraces in its wide arms, he gathered for them in that pleasant abode. And better still, he lived with them himself. It was beautiful to see the love which Peter showed for the two beings who made his little world.

Choosing the profession of a physician, rather than that which his father had marked out for him—for the lieutenant thought that everything good or great must centre in the navy—the old officer consoled himself that Peter might yet become a naval surgeon.

"Dr. Peter Crossman does not sound very bad," the mother thought; "and then, O, Peter," she said, "how beautiful to think that your homely name procured for us this delightful home!" And the good lady wept tears of gratified pride and love.

And surely Doctor Crossman was a son, of whom any mother might be proud. Contrasted with the shrunken form of the lieutenant, who was small and spare, his son seemed to expand into such generous proportions, that they who loved him felt a sort of protection in his physical strength and overshadowing presence. The sick felt that he was powerful enough to raise them—so much more powerful than little Doctor Den-net, who bustled about in a sick room, skipping here and there with his little dancing-master's feet!

Yes, Peter's physique did wonders for him; and his inner qualities were worthy of the casket. He could draw the most timid children to him by just showing one of his magnificent smiles; and old, gouty men, who had "pshawed" and "pished" at little Doctor Den-net for years, were quite respectful to the noble figure that walked in with such a majesty, and gave his orders with a sort of commanding gentleness that the most choleric patient dared not disobey.

"Dr. Peter Crossman," said his mother one day, as she laid her hand caressingly on the wealth of wavy brown hair that shadowed without concealing his fine forehead; "I think—"

"Call me Peter, dear mother! The name does not repulse me from your lips."

"Peter, then—my own darling Peter, as I used to call you, I have been thinking lately how selfish—how unutterably selfish we are, to live on with you after this fashion and never seem to think that at your age, and with your advantages, you need different society and a more cheerful and younger set about you than your old father and mother! I do believe that you will not get married just because you think we should feel hurt, or that we should feel lonely without you. And indeed we should be lonely, dearest, but that should not hinder you from making a pleasant home for yourself; and the nearer to us, the better."

"Well, dear mother, have you fixed upon any one to share this pleasant home which you have contrived for me?"

"Whoever you may love, Peter, will be loved by me. I shall make no choice for you. I should be very fastidious in a wife for you. I am afraid I should hardly think any one good enough."

"Now, mother, you do set me high. I am glad that the young ladies do not hear your exaggerated praises of me. Well, if you cannot choose me a wife, I must wait until I can find one whom I think good enough. I am going to Mrs. Thornton's, mother; the little girl is sick, and I promised to look in this afternoon."

"Afternoon! why, is she so ill as that, my son? I thought you never called on patients except in the morning, unless in dangerous cases."

"No—that is—well, she has had a bad cold, and—feverish—yes—decidedly there was a feverish tendency last night, I am sure."

Mrs. Crossman looked up to the large, healthful-looking being who stood there, seeming to fill the room with his life-giving presence, and wondered what made him stammer so about a child's illness. He was usually quite clear and decided, she thought, in regard to his patients; and she began to think that little Fannie Thornton must be dangerously sick indeed. She saw, as he dropped his gloved hand from his face that there was a deeper glow than usual on that clear, calm face. She could not make it out, but she feared that he had a difficult case, and that for once, he did not quite understand it. He would not call in Dr. Dennet, she was quite sure, for she did not believe that the little mincing, ambling, bowing doctor could "hold a candle" to the man who stood before her. She knew, too, that a belief in Dr. Dennet's skill was not written in her son's creed. A little baffled by his manner, she allowed him to depart without questioning.

And how do you think the doctor sped on his errand to the sick child's bed? As he entered Mrs. Thornton's parlor, little Fannie called playfully to him from the sofa, where she lay wrapped in a shawl:

"I am all well, doctor! I sha'n't take any of your medicine again. Mother says I need not."

"Where is your mother, butterfly? What does she know about medicine? You shall lie there a week longer. I won't have any interference with my practice. Where is your abominable mother?"

"Gone out. I am well enough, you see, and I made her go out for me. I wanted something nice. You need not shake your head, Dr. Crossman; you are not going to keep me on water gruel any longer. Fannie Thornton is going to have supper to-night—real supper. If you don't believe it, you may stay and see her."

"You shall not have a morsel, little owl!"

"Owl, yourself! Come, Dr. Crossman, you are not going to treat me like a little child. I am ten years old to-morrow, and mother says I am getting to be a great girl; and you need not think I am going to be starved!"

The child by this time had crept from the sofa to the doctor's arms, in which he enclosed her little figure, shawl and all, and sat rocking her, with her head on his shoulder, when Mrs. Thornton came back.

"A very pretty tableau!" she said, as she saw Fannie perched up with the doctor.

"A pretty nurse you are!" said he. "Is this the way you take care of my patients? This child has been raving ever since I have been here. She demands food, and is decidedly in a state of high and unmanageable!"

"Don't believe him, mother! He has been abusing me, on account of the water gruel."

Soon, however, the child, weak and weary from illness, fell into a deep sleep, and the doctor laid her again on the couch.

"Mrs. Thornton," said he—it was quite dark in the room now, for the windows had been shaded for Fannie's eyes—"Mrs. Thornton, my good mother suggested to me this very day that I ought to think of giving her a daughter. I invited her to select one for me, to suit herself, but she declined the task. I wish you would be more obliging, and tell me if you know any one who would accept a man like myself."

Mrs. Thornton blushed. "Indeed, I do not know any one whom I think would be good enough for you, Dr. Crossman. I am unacquainted with many young ladies here, and those whom I know are scarcely competent to take charge of a physician's house."

"Will you tell me, Mrs. Thornton, what you would consider would be required in a lady, to take charge of such a house as I should probably have?"

"That is a question that requires a good deal of consideration. Besides, I do not think myself competent to judge of all that you would require."

Duskier grew the room, and sounder slept little Fannie; and before Mrs. Thornton was aware, her hand was enclosed in another, and a voice whispered:

"Then you must take me yourself, for I must obey my mother, you know."

The imprisoned hand trembled, and then a low, sweet voice said, "I will;" and that was the way in which Dr. Peter Crossman won his bride.

"Well, mother, I have obeyed you. I am going to bring you a daughter very soon."

"What do you mean, Peter?"

"Just what I say, mother. I told you I would, and I did as I said I would—asked some one to marry me."

"But who—who?"

"Ah, mother, there is the point! I am almost afraid to tell you. You need not guess any of the young girls whom you know. I would not have them."

"Well, my son, I will wait just five minutes for you to tell me who she is. If you don't tell me then, I will not take any notice of her for a month."

"Wicked mother-in-law! Well, I will tell you. It is the widow of my dear friend, James Thornton."

"Mrs. Thornton! Why, Peter, she must be too old for you!"

"Three years and eleven months old when I was born, mother, and I have made up my mind to offer those years and months to her acceptance. She is welcome to them, if she will but have me. Don't you like her, mother?"

"As I have never looked at her in the light of your wife, Peter, I cannot give you an answer. Had you asked me before I knew this, I should have said that she was 'altogether lovely.' Her character, her sufferings, her manners, and the beautiful soul that looks out from her eyes, have all had their influence upon me. Seen as your wife, I shall have to take another view before I decide."

"No, mother, look at her straight with your own honest eyes. Do not borrow spectacles—they will deceive you. She is most truly a woman! not an angel; and I don't want an angel, mother. It will be enough for me that she is a woman—'not too bright or good' for me, but true, affectionate, and loving me in spite of those faults which my indulgent mother never sees, but which she, as my wife, will see and forgive."

"Well, my son—"

"Well, mother, you are not yet reconciled, I fear. Speak out, and let me know all your doubts."

"Her child—"

"Her child is an additional inducement. A pretty, sprightly, interesting child, like little Fan Thornton, cannot be any bar to the happiness of a man like Peter Crossman, who loves children, and who has passed his fortieth year without linking to himself any of the sweet ties of life, except those which nature kindly gave him. Why, mother, you do not reflect that your son is already falling into the sere and yellow leaf. Getting to be an old man, mother! If you did not look so young and pretty and delicate, I should not stand any chance to be thought a young man; but you know that in company, I take every opportunity of calling you mother, at the top of my voice. Didn't I see Miss Araminta Johnson smile behind her fan the other evening at the Halle's, when I waited on you? Your Mechlin lace and gray satin made you look young enough to be my wife."

"Foolish Peter! trying by flattery to get his mama's consent to be married to another old lady. Well, as you are of age, I think you must even suit yourself. Do you bring her here?"

"Assuredly. I shall have then only four beings whom I wish to live with, and they must all be under one roof. Besides, mother, you and I could not do without each other, and it will not be long before you will say that you cannot live without my wife. Hard word to learn at forty, mother!"

The old lieutenant put on his most polite manner to the widow, and welcomed little Fan as his playfellow. History does not record any of the usual difficulties which attend the bringing together of two families into one house, in the case of Dr. Crossman's. On the contrary, it is pleasant to state that life seems passing away for them in a very serene and peaceful way. As the two old people are descending gently into the valley, their way is cheered and lighted by the beautiful attentions of her who came to them in the place of the daughter who, like Betsey Trotwood's niece, never was born; and in the lovely boy whose golden curls mingle with their silver locks, and whom they loved with all the proverbial affection of grandparents, they found anew their "blessed baby."

A GOOD STORY.

It is said of a gentleman in this city, that he has a passion for the purchase of second-hand furniture at auction, and that in making "good bargains" he has filled the house with antiquated and almost useless articles. Upon one occasion, his wife took the responsibility, without consulting or appraising her husband, to have a portion of the least useful truck removed to an auction room. Great was her dismay, and extreme her astonishment, when on the evening of the day of sale, a majority of the articles came back to the house. The husband had stumbled into the auction room, and, not knowing his own furniture, had purchased it at better bargains than at the first.—Boston Transcript.

WOMAN.

BY WILLIAM ROWLAND, JR.

Be gentle with woman, our heart of hearts,
Who loveth us even while life departs;
O, call her not fickle, nor false, nor vain,
O, touch not so tender a heart with pain.

What woman, the treasure, the gem, the flower,
The star that is bright in the wildest hour,
The bird that comes singing to our stern breast,
O, should we not teach it to love its nest.

Come, then, let us vow that they all are fair,
Let us shout of their virtues to earth and air;
Let us soothe them and guard them, and so repay
The love that they lend in our darkest day.

O, value their gifts beyond gifts of gold,
All you of the sterner and coarser mould;
And learn that their love, amidst toil and strife,
Is the spirit that calmeth and quieteth life.

A NIGHT UP COUNTRY IN CHINA.

BY FREDERICK W. SAUNDERS.

THE natural strength and elasticity of my constitution having enabled me to triumph over and rise superior to the combined attack of a typhus fever and two physicians, I decided to leave my comfortable quarters on shore and once more "pitch my moving tent" on board the ship. We had been laying at the anchorage below Canton, waiting for our cargo, something more than four months, during which time everything that it was possible to do in port, in the way of repairs, had been completed. The greater part of the crew forward, having become tired of inactivity, had deserted; and at the time of my return to the ship, there were, besides the three or four hands in the fore-castle, only the first and second mates on board, the captain only making a flying visit to his ship at intervals of from four to six days.

Our "after guard" consisted of the chief mate, a great Dutchman from Hamburg, with rousing yellow whiskers and an ever present laugh of the most surprising dimensions. He had sailed for many years in the American service, so that his English was unexceptionable—that is to say, he could master everything but the letter "j," which no Dutchman ever can pronounce, always using "y" in its place; as, for instance, his name being John Johnson, he would inform you that it was Yohn Yohnson, whereupon our second mate—a jolly son of Erin, with no end of mischief—would with a sly look finish out the sentence by saying something to the effect that "Yohnny Yohnson, mit ter yaller jacket, yumped over the yibboom into the jolly boat"—a proceeding which always resulted in a vigorous scuffle. These two, together with myself—a slab-sided Yankee—formed a group which Rory, our second mate, would have described to you as "a bunch of curus divvuls."

It was late in the afternoon when I came on board, and having finished our supper, we seated ourselves comfortably under the quarter-deck awning, to enjoy the cool breeze and the beautiful sunset. Around us lay moored a hundred ships of all nations, English, French, Dutch, Portuguese, American, Siamese—in fact, a representative of every nation that boasts any commerce whatever. On one side, were vast rice swamps of waving green; on the other, the village of Whampoa with its frail-looking bamboo houses, its swarms of boats with their screaming, chattering population, forming an aquatic city. In front, towards Canton, vast lumbering hulks of war junks encumbered the stream, while in and out among them, gay-looking mandarin barges, with sounding gongs and volleys of India crackers, swept swiftly on, impelled by their multitudinous oars. In the distance was a sombre-looking brown fort, and still further, a tall and graceful pagoda rising up against the clear sky. Behind us stretched the broad river, looking warm and rosy in the level rays of the setting sun, while the peculiar-looking eastern trees—a great deal of trunk and a scarcity of foliage—such as I had seen in pictures of tropical scenery in my boyhood, gave me a far away feeling, such as I had not experienced for years.

We were all somewhat affected by the beauty of the scene, and remained quietly smoking our cigars until the sun descended below the horizon and the full-orbed moon arose to flood the landscape with her silvery light.

"A delightful evening this!" said Rory, tossing his cigar over the rail and supplying its place with a corpulent "cud" of tobacco.

"Yes, just such as I have seen hundreds of, on the Elbe," responded Johnson, who had evidently been thinking of home.

"O, get out of that, now," responded Rory, petulantly; "there's no such scenery in Holland—it bates the Lippy, aven. But I say, sailors, what are we going to do for amusement? There's no use of sticking so close to the old boat—for all the world like a sick monkey to a lee back-stay. What do you say to taking a tramp up the country to-morrow—just to see what it's like?"

"'Tis a go; the undersigned agrees to that in a minute," replied Johnson, who had somehow got into a way of speaking of himself as though he were drawing up a memorial. "What do you say to it, Yohnathan?" he continued, addressing himself to me.

"O, I'm resigned to anything."

"Talk enough for the boarders!" ejaculated Rory, as he "executed" a sailor's hornpipe on the top of the hen-coop. "Let's turn in, then, and get some sleep ahead, so as to be ready for an early start."

This latter proposition struck us favorably, as had the former; so selecting a soft spot on the deck, we severally kept a bright look-out for the drowsy god. Now any one who has lain any time at Whampos anchorage, knows very well why we chose the deck for our couch, in preference to our snug state-rooms below; but as it is very possible there may be one, or even more of my readers, who have not passed a summer at that popular resort, I may as well mention for their especial benefit that, aside from the suffocating heat, which is some, the place abounds with the biggest, ugliest, noisiest, striped-leggedest and venomousest skeeters, that can be found anywhere between your own residence and fourth of July. I do not wish to be understood as saying that we escaped them altogether by sleeping on deck—far from it; they were plentiful enough anywhere, in all conscience—but upon repeated trials, we had found that by passing the night in that position, we came off with some thirteen or fourteen less bites in the morning than if we had slept below.

Being much fatigued with the exertions of the day, I speedily fell into a doze, and had just arrived at that state in which a multitude of ideas get mixed up in inextricable confusion, without the proprietor of the aforesaid ideas caring a snap whether they get disentangled or not, when I was aroused by a kicking, snorting, slapping, and a sound of muffled cursing from Rory, who was engaged in a skirmish with his tormentors.

"Say, Jack—did they have any skeeters up where you've been?" he exclaimed, with a sounding slap at an invisible foe.

"M—m—m," I grunted in reply, not being a mite too well pleased at being roused; and in a moment more I was in a pleasant dream of home.

"And didn't you suffer a sight wid 'em, being sick?" he inquired in a strong voice, again interrupting my slumbers and knocking my pleasant dream all to pieces.

I was a good deal provoked at being thus unceremoniously deprived of my rest, but as the question was a kind one, I could not well avoid answering; so I growled in no very pleasant tone, "No, no, we had mosquito nets."

"Nets! nets for skeeters! holy sailor! nets!"

I heard him mutter to himself, in a tone betokening intense amazement, and again I dropped off to the land of nod; but my sojourn in that delightful Ælme was to be of short duration, for another volley of slaps roused me sufficiently to hear his melodious voice asking in a more than doubtful tone: "D'ye mane to tell me that up there away, where you've been, they have nets to scoop up skeeters like you would minims?"

"Where've you been to all your life, you double-headed paddy, not to know what a skeeter net is?" interposed Johnson from behind his yellow whiskers; and the last I remember hearing, he was describing the use of a mosquito bar to our wakeful and inquiring friend.

I might have slept a minute and a quarter, possibly a minute and three eights, ere I was again rendered half frantic with anger by Rory's bawling out:

"Jack, Jack, do you think them skeeter net consarns would work here?"

"Yes, yes, yes, of course they would," I returned fiercely, in my most terrific tone.

"Wal, I'm saying, Jack, wouldn't it be a worrald of comfort and convanience to have 'em aboard this boat, just now?"

"Why the deuce, Rory, can't you hold your tongue and let people sleep?" I exclaimed, now thoroughly out of temper.

"Sleep, is it? Can you sleep?"

"Yes, of course I can sleep, if you ever give me a chance with your eternal gabble!"

"Well, well," returned Rory, with an air of injured innocence, "if you can sleep with them murdering, singing, blood thirsty heathen a-screaching about your ears, I don't see why the amusing and enlightened conversation of an intelligent Christian gentleman should break ye of yer rest; it's mighty quare intirely—" and much more to the same effect; but his eloquence was lost upon me, for when I came to my senses again, day was breaking, and the steward was setting the table for an early breakfast.

It would occupy too much space to describe how, after despatching our breakfast, we fortified ourselves with something good to take, and armed our pockets with sundry silver dollars and other smaller twigs of the evil root, in the shape of China cash—eight hundred to the dollar. It would take too much time to narrate how we passed that day—how we wandered through orange groves and gorged ourselves on bananas fresh from the tree, or shrub, or whatever else you may please to call a stout plant a dozen feet in height—how we bargained with, and teased the Chinamen—how we tickled the pretty China girls and complimented them upon their good looks—and how they replied to us at great length, and with great propriety, no doubt, only neither party could understand a word the other said.

Let the disappointed reader, then, suppose that it is within an hour of sunset—that we, although homeward bound, are twenty miles from the ship, in a somewhat wild and thinly inhabited region, rather tired, very hungry, awful thirsty, and in a particular hurry to get somewhere, right off. It was rather queer, certainly; it must have been the bananas and other fruit we had eaten, or possibly the “something good to take,” that induced us to prolong our walk to such a distance, and to such a late hour. But we didn’t mind it much; there had been a good big moon the night before, and there was every reason to suppose there would be one that night—so we trudged along merrily enough, except that hunger and thirst would insist upon keeping us company.

“By the powers, sailors!” said Rory, stopping to take a good look about him; “I wish to Moses we could clap an eye on some sort of a shanty, in this hithen country, where a chap could get a nibble of salt horse, or so, and a gallon or two of beer.”

“The undersigned entertains the opinion that he could make short work of a fried Chinaman, with plenty of beer and an onion, at this present juncture,” responded Johnson, with a hungry look.

“Faith, you’re right, boy; there’s something about this pagan land that makes a chap feel mighty like a cannibal. For my part, I’m that peckish, I could cheerfully make a lunch of my respected grandmother, and think nothing of it. But what in the name of Saint Troublesome is going to come to us now?” he ejaculated, looking anxiously to windward.

Turning our eyes in the direction indicated, we saw to our dismay that a thick bank of black clouds had rolled up above the horizon; and even as we looked, ominous looking soud, of the same sable hue, was drifting rapidly across the heavens.

“Here’s a go!” muttered Johnson, uneasily.

“Here’s another go; I’m off hot fut, to get in sight of somewhere before we get the worst of it. It will be dark as a stock of black cats afore long—then we’ll be lost intirely;” and saiting the action to the word, Rory started into a brisk trot, which we were not slow to imitate, for the chance of being compelled to wander about in a dark, wet night, was no joke.

But although we made pretty good time, and got over the ground at a very respectable rate, we were no match for the storm king. The dense black clouds slowly but steadily extended, until they completely covered the sky, and the great drops began to patter heavily around us, rapidly increasing to a perfect deluge—raining as it only can rain in a tropical climate. It was as if some one had pulled the spile completely out of the reservoir ^{up} aloft, and let a continuous torrent upon our devoted heads, instead of straining it through a sieve, after the usual fashion. It reminded me of what I had read of water spouts; and Rory expressed serious fears that, in the promise there should be no more any flood to destroy the world, all pagan countries, and this one in particular, had been excepted. By this time, it had become intensely dark; but we still kept on in what we judged to be the right direction, until we could no longer distinguish each others’ forms, when we came to a halt.

The reader is probably aware that in the Celestial Empire, and especially in that portion of the “central flowery nation” which we chose for our ramble, there are no well-ordered and commodious turnpikes for the accommodation of travellers; neither are there railroads, with lightning trains of cars, to annihilate time, space, passengers, and the stockholders’ money. Consequently, it was folly for us to keep on, when, without anything to guide us, we might be fruitlessly wandering round and round in the dark, or worse still, directly in an opposite direction from the one we would take; there was nothing for it but to stop where we were.

“Well, now we have done it,” muttered Johnson; “we’re in for an all night job, anyhow.”

“And the shakes and ague,” said Rory.

“And the typhus,” I grumbled, thinking of my late illness.

“And the jungle fever,” chimed in Johnson.

“Well, sailors,” said Rory, with a miserable failure of an attempt at cheerfulness, “there are just two ways we can manage; either coll right down here in our native mud, and take it aisy, or stand on our pins and growl about it. But hello! what’s that, aint it? If there aint a light, I’m a Dutchman! Better be born lucky than rich! Come along, sailors; darkest time of night is just when you can’t see anything, as the old adverb says;” and he rattled away with any amount of nonsense in his satisfaction at a chance of escape from our predicament.

The light which he had seen was a feeble glimmer, apparently at a considerable distance and not steady at that, sometimes disappearing for several minutes and shining out again when we began to fear we had lost it altogether; but we stumbled along towards it as fast as possible, now tumbling head first into a hole full of water, now breaking our shins against a rock, while the almost smothering rain came down as hard—no, not hard, as easy as ever; it wasn't hard for it to rain that night. Having followed the light to its source, we found it to proceed from the half-open door of a small bamboo house, such as are usually occupied by the poorer classes of the Chinese. We were too tired and wet and hungry to stand upon ceremony; so kicking open the door, we entered.

"Hello, heathen! how's yer health and how are your folks?" said Rory, advancing into the room and familiarly slapping on the shoulder a solitary Chinaman, who was seated at a little table sipping a dish of weak tea.

The "heathen" sprang from his seat as though it had been red hot, and with a countenance expressive of surprise and alarm, he faced our dripping party and ejaculated the national exclamation, "hi-ya-ah," with that peculiar hesitating drawl which in the mouth of one of his nation so well expresses surprise and doubt.

"Well, I reckon they're all in pretty good case; you seem to talk up like it," continued Rory. "But that aint the question; the point we want to settle is an all-fired sharp-pointed appetite. We want something to eat; savey? all the same as chow-chow."

"Hi-yah!" faltered the Chinaman, making an uneasy movement towards the door.

"No you don't, my jolly pagan!" said Johnson, closing the door and placing his back against it; "you don't quit this mansion till we've had supper for three, and champagne for fifty."

"Yes, chow-chow, grub, feed, victuals—pray, anything you're a mind to call it," said Rory, raising his voice higher and higher at every word, as though it only required strength of lungs to cure the unfortunate celestial of his ignorance of the English language.

The poor fellow's eyes, which were naturally set at an angle of forty-five, now became absolutely vertical from fright, and he made another attempt to escape.

"Come, give us something to eat, or we'll eat you!" roared Johnson, grabbing him by the shoulder and making as if he would bite him, snapping his teeth in a particularly ferocious manner. "We are cannibals, we are; or anthropophagi, to simplify the word to your benighted intellect."

Whether it was that he understood the formidable word, or whether Johnson's expressive pantomime let him into the secret of our wishes, is a question; but without further words, he opened a sort of trap in the floor, and fishing out a large dish of boiled rice and several smaller dishes of meat, placed them on the table before us. It wasn't easy to discover of what species of flesh the meat dishes were composed, but we were too hungry to be critical. Had we been sure of its being dog, cat, rat or any other animal, it would have been all the same at that moment, and we fell to eating with a vengeance. Watching a favorable opportunity, the Chinaman sprang to the door, opened it and darted out like a shot.

"You might have gone before, if you'd only thought to mention it," spluttered Johnson, with his mouth full of supper, as he looked after the flying form of our host. "I only wish we had thought to make the old scalawag give us the keys of his wine cellar, if he happens to have such an apartment; however, we've done better now than we'd any right to expect. It's a wonder he didn't stop to get his pay; we'll have to leave the money on the table. I s'pose it will be all the same to him." And addressing himself once more to his supper, nothing was heard for some minutes save the splashing of the rain outside, and the energetic working of our jaws within.

We had not more than half completed our meal—that is to say, we had not devoured supper enough for more than a dozen men, when we were startled by what appeared to be the hurried tramp of a multitude of men, mingled with an indescribable chattering and gabbling of voices.

"What the djeuce is that?" said Rory, starting to his feet; but before any one could get an opportunity to answer his question, a little million of stalwort Chinamen, armed with stout bamboo clubs, rushed tumultuously into the house and commenced a vigorous onslaught upon us.

For several minutes we defended ourselves valiantly with whatever articles of furniture we could lay our claws on; after that, I have only a confused recollection of receiving a tremendous whack from a heavy club on one side of my head, which sent me to the floor, quickly followed by a rousing kick on the other side of my knowledge-box which sent me to my feet again, then a vigorous punch in front which staggered me up against the wall, and an able seaman's kick that sent me flying through the air like a ball. Upon coming to the floor again, I found myself near the open door, through which I shot, without stopping to shake hands or even so much as to say good-by to our bespit-able entertainer. Rory, who had been served in very much the same style as myself, was close at my heels, and together we rushed out into the storm and darkness, with no end of infuriated celestials shouting, screaming and yelling, close in our wake. The last we saw of Johnson, he was vigorously defending himself with a table leg, with which he was breaking a head at every blow, and replying to the execrations of his foes with a long string of maledictions in choice Dutch, of which he delivered himself with remarkable fluency.

I thought at the time, and I still think, that it was very cowardly of Rory to run and leave our shipmate in such a predicament. With me, the case was entirely different; although I am naturally as bold and valiant as a lion, and could without doubt have annihilated as many Chinamen as could be brought against me, yet what I had seen of the row had thoroughly disgusted me with such a mode of warfare, and as I have constitutional scruples about fighting where there is no honor to be gained, it was but natural that I should leave just as soon as I could make the necessary preparations for travelling. With Rory, it was different; having no such scruples, there was no excuse for him—he should have stayed and seen it out. I, however, abstained from mentioning anything of the kind to Rory, for not being accustomed to logical arguments, I might have failed to convince him of the true state of the case, or even my motives for stepping out as I did.

We must have run at a break-neck pace something more than three miles, before we dodged our last pursuer and breathless and panting, came to a halt. It had rained as fast as it is possible for rain to descend, and been as dark as darkness can be, before we entered the Chinaman's house; but now it was twice as dark and twice as rainy as before. It was utterly impossible to distinguish any object whatever, and I am confident a fish might have swam about in the rain, or even gone up to the clouds, had he felt so disposed.

"I'd give a shilling to know where Johnson is," said I, when I had recovered sufficient breath to enable me to speak.

"I'd give two and sixpence to know where I am myself," said Rory. "This comes of tramping up the country. If I'd had my way, we'd never started on such a foolish expedition."

"Why, it was yourself that proposed it!" I returned, in astonishment.

"Well, well, s'pose it was; do give a chap something to growl about, can't ye? Here are my two boots just like a pair of force pumps; they are full of water, and every step I take, it squirts clear up to my ears. But hark a bit; we must be near the river, by the sound."

By listening attentively, we could clearly distinguish the light ringing sound which every one must have observed to be produced by the falling rain on the smooth surface of any large sheet of water, particularly in a calm night—and it was powerfully calm that night.

"Well, this is lucky! We begin to know something about our latitude and longitude now," said Rory. "Look sharp, we're in a jetty, to my thinking."

At that instant, I felt myself falling, and only stopped to bring up at some considerable distance under the surface of the river. Struggling to the top, I relieved myself as speedily as possible from the feeling of strangulation occasioned by the unexpected plunge, and called out:

"Rory, where are you, my boy?"

"Where am I, is it? In the drink, to be sure; where d'ye s'pose? and by the powers of mud, I'm not so clear but we've made a good exchange of it, barring that it came a little sudden like. We are sartinly drier here, than we should be on shore in the confounded rain. But we can't stay here all night. So let's put for the shore, if we can find it. Can you lay hold of anything solid, convenient to ye?"

I had been unsuccessfully pawing about, since I came to the surface, in hope of getting hold of some of the piles of the jetty from which we had fallen, and I replied: "I can't feel anything. What the deuce are we to do, Rory?"

"That's a question of your own asking, my boy. If we had the tools to navigate with, I should advise to crowd sail for Boston; we are as likely to fetch there, as any other port. But mayhap that would be too long a swim for ye, as you are in a feeble state of health, so let's try another way; swim straight ahead from where you are now, and keep jabbering all the time, so that I can take just the opposite direction, by the sound of your voice, and if we aint swimming up and down stream, we must fetch up somewhere between now and morning."

This plan was adopted and followed, until the distance between us became so great that I could scarcely distinguish Rory's voice. Suddenly he ceased his jabbering, and a splashing ensued.

"Have you found anything, Rory?"

"Yes," was the welcome reply.

"What is it like?" I asked, swimming in the direction of his voice.

